49. (a) Demoſthenes maketh mention of another Law, commanding that he who ſtruck out his Neighbours eye ſhould be puniſhed with the loſs of one of his own, as a Lex talionis. It hapned that a naughty man bearing a grudge to his Neighbour that had but one eye, threatned him to ſtrike it out, though with the loſs of one of his own. The poor man terrified exceedingly herewith, and judging continual blindneſs worſe than death, with a rope about his neck came into the Council, and asked a Law, that whoſoever ſhould ſtrike out his eye that had but one, or deprive him of the uſe of one who was purblind, ſhould loſe both of his own, or be puniſhed with the like calamity and loſs that he ſhould bring upon his Neighbour. This as juſt he eaſily obtained, and this was the only new Law which in two hundred years time was brought in, the Inſolency of innovators being repreſſed by the ſeverity of the former conſtitution, as the Orator obſerveth. Another there was, that a thing controverted ſhould remain in the poſſeſſion of him whoſe it was when the ſute commenced, till ſuch time as a difinitive ſentence paſſed; concerning which (b) Polybius telleth a notable ſtory of two men that contending about a ſlave, the one having had him long in poſſeſſion, the other got him into his hand two days before the Tryal, and then the former went and taking him away, poſſeſſed him the ſecond time. The Judges referred the matter as an hard caſe to the Coſmopolis, who determined in favour of the firſt and laſt poſſeſſor; but the other contended with him about the ſenſe of the Law, to whom he offered that both of them ſhould go with ropes about their necks and diſpute about it. The young man told him, he was old, and expecting but three or four years longer to live, dying now would be no great loſs to him, whereas he expecting a far longer time, according to the courſe of nature, ſhould have the far worſe bargain; with which facete reply he handſomly ended the diſpute, and the Judges confirmed the opinion of the Coſmopolis. (c) Ariſtotle mentioneth a Law of Zaleucus, which forbad inheritances to be ſold except in urgent neceſſity, and this was to be proved, which Law being neglected amongſt the Leucadians, made their Government degenerate into too much Popularity. (d) Heraclides mentioneth other two, whereof the one forbad mourning for the dead; it being the cuſtom of the Locrians to feaſt after Funerals. The other inhibited all retailing ſhops, commanding Husband-men to ſell their own Commodities. This was the form of the Commonwealth of Locri, called Epizephirii, from the Promontory Zephyrium near adjoyning, being a Colony of Locri (e) Ozolæ, one of the two Locri of Phocis in Greece: whereof the other was called Locri Opuntii and Epicnemidii. Dionyſius the elder having got footing in Italy, made himſelf maſter of this place; but yet left them to their own freedom, but Dionyſius his ſon Tyrannized in the manner aforeſaid.

(a) Contra Timara.
*(b) Excerpt.*7. lib. 12.
*(c) Politic. lib.*2.*cap.*5.
(d) In Politiis.
*(e) Lege Polybium lib.*12. Excerp. 3.

The Syracuſians beg aid of the Corinthians.

50. When Dionyſius recovered his Principality over Syracuſe, the Citizens were more inclining to one Hicetas born amongſt them, who at that time was Lord of Leontium; yet notwithſtanding all their attempts he kept his poſſeſſion. But within awhile the Carthaginians from without invaded them, being thus at odds within amongſt themſelves, which conſtrained the Syracuſians to ſend, and beg aid of Corinth their Metropolis. Hicetas with the Meſſengers ſent ſome of his own, as deſiring the ſame thing; but held ſecret intelligence with the Carthaginians. The Corinthians reſolving to ſend aid to their Colony, pitched upon Timoleon for their Captain. He was the ſon of Timodemus or Timenætus, of a quiet and loving diſpoſition, but a great Enemy to ſuch as maſtered their Neighbours, which he ſhewed effectually againſt his own brother, whom, having made himſelf Lord of Corinth by the help of ſome Mercenaries, he gave way to have killed, being in the room, and burſting out into tears, whilſt his two companions did it. Some accounting this act as unnatural and impious, though others commended it, he thereupon abſtained from all imployment for twenty years, till this charge was laid Plutarch in Timoleon.

Timoleon.

Sect. 2.

Sent to their aid.

laid upon him. Whilſt he was preparing for the Expedition, Icetas dealt underhand with the Carthaginians, that he might be advanced into the place of Dionyſius, wrote to Corinth to ſtop their proceedings, and procured the Carthaginians to ſend to forbid Timoleon from ſetting foot in Sicily. He beſieged Dionyſius, but riſing up upon other thoughts and returning homewards, the beſieged followed him, and falling on his rear, forced him to fight. Having the better in this ingagement, he killed three thouſand of Dionyſius his men; then purſuing the reſt to Syracuſe, got it all into his hands, except the Iſland. Timoleon being more earneſtly preſſed forwards by his fellow Citizens, upon diſcovery of Icetas his treachery, though he fell into the hands of the Carthaginians ſent from him to intercept him, yet eſcaped, and arrived in Sicily with ten ſhips and twelve hundred men. The ſeveral Cities in the Iſland being accuſtomed to be deceived and ill uſed by others, ſuſpected him alſo; but finding the Inhabitants of Adranum to be part for him and part for the Carthaginians, he uſing admirable expediton, fell ſudainly upon the Enemies Camp, which taking, he was admitted into the Town. After this diverſe other places joyned with him, and with ſpeed marching to Syracuſe, he unexpectedly alſo broke into the City.

He expelleth Dionyſius.

Who liveth in great want at Corinth.

A. M. 3661. Ol. 109. an. 2. V, C. 411. Ochi 19. Philippi 18. Juſtin ut ſupra.

Var, hiſt. l. 12. c. 60.

51. Syracuſe was now held by three ſeveral parties, Timoleon's, and that of Dionyſius, and Icetas, in ſo many ſeveral quarters; moreover the Carthaginians were in the Haven with an hundred and fifty Gallies, which carried fifty thouſand men. It troubled Timoleon to ſee himſelf overmatched, but preſently things turned very well for him. Ten ſhips came loaden with men and money from Corinth to his aid, and Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and diverſe ſorts joyned themſelves to him, which ſo diſcouraged the Carthaginians, as they weyed anchor and departed into their own dominions: Icetas being deſtitute of their aſſiſtance was quite diſcouraged, and Meſſana now alſo declared for Timoleon. Dionyſius too being terrified at this his ſucceſs, ſent to him, and yielded up himſelf and all he had into his hands, whom he ſuffered upon his delivery of the Caſtle, and laying down his Principality, to depart Corinth, ſome four years after the recovery of his former eſtate. Thenceforth, having loſt all by his ſluggiſhneſs, he lived in great contempt and penury, ſo as he would walk up and down in poor ragged cloathes, frequent the Stewes and drinking-houſes, gaze upon that meat in the ſhambles which he had no money in his purſe to buy, and at laſt took upon him the office of a Pædagogue, in which he might beſt imitate his former carriage towards his Subjects, in tyrannizing over his boys. Ælian reporteth, that Philip of Macedon meeting him on a time, asked him the reaſon why he kept not that great and ſtrong Principality left him by his father; to which he anſwered, That his father left him that inheritance, but not his Fortune, whereby he defended both himſelf and it. This was the end of the Tyranny of Dionyſius father and ſon, ſixty four years after the firſt beginning of it, in the ſecond year of the one hundred and ninth Olympiad, A. M. 3661.

Plutarch.

Timoleon recovereth Syracuſe, and ſetleth the State thereof.

52. Icetas very unwilling to loſe his hopes of preferment, procured the Carthaginians to return to Syracuſe. Mago filled the Haven with his Ships, and landing ſixty thouſand men, pitched his Camp in the City; Icetas then laid ſiege to the Caſtle, which the Corinthians now held from the reſignment of Dionyſius. Timoleon relieved them by Proviſions ſent from Catana in little Veſſels through the Carthaginian Fleet; whereupon Icetas and Maga drew out a ſtrong party and beſieged Catana, after whoſe departure, Leon Captain of the Corinthians ſallied out of the Caſtle, and falling upon the beſiegers lying in a ſecure and careleſs poſture, killed ſome, and, the other flying, took Achradina the ſtrongeſt quarter of the City. This the two Generals underſtanding, quickly faced about and returned; but miſſed of both places, out of a deſire to poſſeſs both. Timoleon having ſecured Meſſana, returned with four thouſand men towards Syracuſe, whereupon Mago for fear hoiſed up ſails and departed for Africk, having by his lazineſs and cowardize loſt a fair opportunity of reducing all Sicily into the power of his Superiours. Afterwards Timoleon dividing his men, ſet upon ſuch places of the City as Hicetas yet retained, and by force got them all into his power, without any bloodſhed of his own party: then threw he down all the Fortifications and Monuments of the Tyrants, except Gelon's Statue, calling the People to the work by a publick Crier. Then he applied himſelf to making of Laws agreeable to a Popular Government, which yet he endeavoured but to little purpoſe ſo to reſtrain, as to prevent the inconveniences which formerly had their riſe from too much popularity. In explaining and illuſtrating Diocles his Laws, he uſed the help of Cephalus, and Dionyſius, both Corinthians. He ordained a new annual and chief Magiſtrate, whom he would have called the Servant of Jupiter Olympius, in memory of their recovered liberty, commanding that by his name the year ſhould be ſigned, as by the Archons at Athens, and the Conſuls at Rome. The firſt that bore this Office was Callimedes, a man of prime note, being choſen by the Suffrages of the People. Now whereas by reaſon of Wars, Seditions, and Baniſhments, the City was even exhauſted, he recalled the Exiles out of Sicily, Greece, and Aſia, which being in number ten thouſand, he increaſed by a far greater, conſiſting of Sicilians and Italians of Greekiſh Original, to whom being made free of the City, he diſtributed Lands and Poſſeſſions.

53. Icetas having retired to Leontium, Timoleon laid ſiege to that City; but finding it ſtrongly manned, roſe up from before it, and went about to other places, to which he reſtored liberty, expelling their Tyranni. In this mean while Icetas went againſt Syracuſe; but was forced to retreat with great loſs. Timoleon's renown was by this time ſo ſpread abroad, that many Towns of the Sicanians, and others ſubject to the Carthaginians, ſent to him, to deſire they might be admitted into the ſocial League. The Carthaginians herein were ſo concern'd, as to prepare amain for the renewing of the War, procuring Soldiers out of Gall, Liguria, Spain, and Africk. Mago had killed himſelf after his ſhameful return, and his dead body was nailed to a Croſs for the mal-adminiſtration of his Office; therefore in the third year after they ſent over Aſdrubal and Amilcar, with two hundred long-ſhips, and above one thouſand of burthen, wherein were ſo many men tranſported as made up thoſe already in Sicily ſeventy thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe, which with warlike Chariots marched againſt Timoleon. He having compoſed the difference with Hicetas muſtered all his forces, and judging it wiſdom to transfer the War into the Enemies Country, for this purpoſe he choſe out of all twelve thouſand men, with which he marched away in haſte; but in his journy a great mutiny happened amongſt his Soldiers. For one Thraſius a raſh impudent fellow, who with the Phocians had rifled the Temple at Delphos, cried out, that Timoleon being mad, led them into moſt certain death, for that the Carthaginians in number ſo far exceeded them: and he adviſed the Mercenaries to return to Syracuſe, and demand the pay already due to them. Timoleon had much ado to take up the matter, and one thouſand utterly refuſed to follow him. But he rejoyced that the mutineers had already fallen off, before they came to any ingagement, and with the reſt haſted toward the Enemy.

The Carthaginians receive a great overthrow.

54. By the convenience of a miſt he got near to the Enemy undiſcried, then lying upon the River Crimeſus. Ten thouſand of the Carthaginians paſſing the River, he fell down upon them from the hills, and made great ſlaughter, and their friends coming in to their relief, the fight was ſharply renewed, and the Carthaginians by their great numbers began to incompaſs the other round, when fell ſuch a ſtorm, as, together with the valour of the Greeks, forced them to to their heels. Flying into the River by heaps, the Foot amongſt the Horſe, and Chariots, multitudes periſhed, being either preſſed, wounded to death by the ſwords of their Companions, drowned through the ſwiftneſs of the ſtream then increaſed by rain, or elſe killed by the Enemy on their backs: the Sacred band ſo called, conſiſting of two thouſand and five hundred of the choiceſt Soldiers, fighting moſt valiantly, all died in the place. Near upon thirteen thouſand were ſlain, and fifteen thouſand taken, with two hundred Chariots (the greateſt part whereof was broken in pieces) and one thouſand brigandines with ten thouſand ſhields; though moſt of the Arms were ſwallowed up in the water: Thoſe Carthaginians that remained, in great conſternation eſcaped to Lilibæum. Their friends at Carthage hearing of their defeat, were in no little fear, out of conceit that Timoleon would now come over thither. Wherefore they recalled Giſco the brother of Hanno out of baniſhment, and made him General of the Army, which they raiſed with money out of other Nations, not thinking it meet to thruſt themſelves into ſuch danger for the time to come. But Timoleon returning to Syracuſe, found it a convenient time to puniſh the mutiniers, whom he baniſhed Sicily, commanding them to depart the City before Sun-ſet. Paſſing over into Sicily they ſeized on a Town amongſt the Brutii, who riſing and beſieging them, took the place, and therein put them all to the ſword.

55. Hicetas often mentioned before, and Mamercus Tyrannus of Catana joyned with the Carthaginians againſt Timoleon, perſwading them, for fear of loſing their ſhare in Sicily, to ſend over ſome Forces. They ſent away Giſco, who hired ſome Greeks, the firſt which ſerved that Nation. They cut off ſome hundreds of Timoleon's Mercenaries, and Hicetas invaded the Syracuſian Territories, whence getting much booty he marched into Calauria, in contempt of Timoleon, who lay there now with inconſiderable forces in compariſon of his. Hicetas being purſued by Timoleon, got over the River Damyriæ, and then endeavoured to hinder his paſſage; but he preſſing upon him, ſlew one thouſand of his men, and putting him to flight, purſued him into the Territories of Leontium, where he took him alive, with his ſon Eupolemus, and put them both to death as Traitors to their Country, together with Euthymus his General of the Horſe; for that in a ſpeech to the Leontines he had ſcoffed at the Corinthians, ſaying, they needed not to be afraid, though the Corinthian women were come from home, terming Timoleon and his men no other than women. After this Timoleon overthrew in battel Mamercus, killing two thouſand of his men, whereof the greater number were Carthaginians, who thereupon earneſtly begged peace, and had it granted on theſe conditions: That they ſtill retaining all in their hands within the River Lycus, it ſhould be yet lawful for any one to remove thence to Syracuſe with his goods and family, and to renounce alliance with them, and with all the Tyranni in Sicily, which at this time had enſlaved many Cities of the Iſland. Mamercus fled over into Italy, and Catana was delivered up to Timoleon, who betook himſelf to Meſſana, where he beſieged Hippo both by Land and Sea, and taking him in his flight, delivered him up to the Citizens, who put him to death. Mamercus yielded himſelf to Timoleon, who having promiſed him he would not be his accuſer, he caſt himſelf upon the People of Syracuſe; but perceiving them as he began to ſpeak inraged againſt him, he attempted to daſh out his own brains, and that not diſpatching him, he was taken up and executed as a robber.

Timoleon taketh and putteth to death Hicetas.

Overthroweth Mamercus.

Hippo and Mamercus put to death.

Nicodemus and Apolloniades put out of their power.

Timoleon's death.

56. Timoleon, after this, drove away Nicodemus, who ruled over the Centorippini, and forced Apolloniades to lay down his power, which he exerciſed over the Agynnæans, whom having reſtored thus to liberty he made free of Syracuſe. Then did he reſtore all the other Cities to their deſired liberty, one after another, and received them into confederacy with Syracuſe: and it was proclaimed by the voice of a publick Crier throughout Greece, that The People of Syracuſe offered houſes and land, to all that would joyn themſelves as members to their Commonwealth. Hereby it came to paſs that multitudes flocked thither as to a new inheritance. Timoleon ſetting himſelf to the care of the State, corrected and explained the Laws of Diocles, and acted other things neceſſary, as he thought, to the well being thereof, till growing old he loſt his ſight, which calamity as he bore very moderately, ſo by reaſon of it he intermitted not publick buſineſs. Not long after, he died, and was buried by the confluence of all Sicily, the affairs whereof he had ſetled; games being celebrated yearly in memory of him, as for an Hero. This hapned in the fifty eighth year of his government, the laſt of the one hundred and tenth Olympiad, and the laſt alſo of the reign of Philip of Macedon father to Alexander the Great; about the year of the World 3668, the ſecond of Arſes King of Perſia, and ſeven before the beginning of the Macedonian Empire, to the time whereof, what we have further to ſay concerning the affairs of Sicily, is to be referred; which affairs will ſhew, that the infirmity of Popular Government is greater than that Timoleon by his conſtitutions could heal the diſtempers thereof, and further evince the worth of Monarchy.

A. M. 3666.
Ol. 110 an. 8.
V. C. 415.
Ochi 13.
Phir. 22.

A. M. 3668.
Ol. 110. an. 4.
V. C. 417.
Arſis 2.
Phil. 24.

CHAP. IV.

The Affairs of the Romans contemporary with the ſecond Empire.

SECT. I.

From the Baniſhment of Tarquinius and firſt change of the Government, to the alteration made by the Decemviri.

Containing the ſpace of fifty ſeven Years.

Conſuls.

Whence ſo called.

1. THe Kingly Office being baniſhed with Tarquinius (though both rebelliouſly and impudently) that of Conſuls ſucceeded. Who were ſo called à Conſulendo. Feſtus obſerveth out of Verrius, that the word Conſulas was uſed by the Antients, not only for Conſilium petas, and perconteris; but alſo for judices and ſtatuas: Moreover the word Conſulere is many times taken for providere, or proſpicere. According to this Etymology various is the opinion of Learned Men concerning this Office. Some derive it from the duty or work of conſulting the Senate, which was incumbent upon the Conſuls. Others interpret it of judging, which, ſaith (a) Lipſius, I only read in (b) Quintilian, who puts the queſtion, whether Conſul was ſo named from conſulting, or judging, ſeeing that conſulere was uſed alſo for the later, whence aroſe that phraſe: Rogat boni Conſulas, that is, judices; but not only Quintilian, but Feſtus alſo, in the word Conſulas, giveth this Etymology. Laſtly, ſome derive it from the end of the Office, which was conſulere, or providere, as (c) Florus and Juſtinian's Code. But thoſe Magiſtrates were not firſt of all named Conſules but Prætores, which name, although it was common to others, yet ſtuck to them by way of excellency. (d) Feſtus ſaith it expreſly; and ſo doth (e) Juſtinian in his Novellæ Conſtitutiones. Xonaras ſaith the name of Prætor continued till the Decemviri, who being baniſhed, then at length crept in the name of Conſul. But he ſhould rather have ſaid, that then the name of Judex crept in; for it appeareth out of Livy, that they were called Judices next after Prætors, before the name of Conſuls came in. The Hiſtorian in his third Book ſpeaking of ſuch things as hapned in the firſt year after the writing of the twelve Tables addeth: In theſe times it was the cuſtom not to call the Conſul by the name of Judex, but Prætor. (f) Varro out of antient Commentaries confirmeth this, and (g) Cicero giveth the Etymology of all theſe Offices thus, à præeundo, judicando, conſulendo, Prætores, Judices, Conſules appellantur. Some upon good grounds conjecture, that after the creation of Prætors, who were peculiar Judges, the name of Judex was left, and that of Conſul ſucceeded, which continued to the laſt.

(a) De Magiſtrat. pop. Rom. cap. 7.
(b) Lib. 1. c. 9.
(c) Lib. 1. c. 9.
(d) In voc. Prætoria Porta.
(e) 24, & 25.
(f) De Ling. Latina. lib. 5.
(g) De Legib. lib. 3.

Their power.

2. The power of Conſuls was at firſt the ſame with that of Kings, allayed only by plurality of perſons and ſhortneſs of time, ſo that Cicero calleth it Regium Imperium, and Regia Poteſtas, and the Greeks choſe to call them Hypatoi, which ſignifieth thoſe that are moſt excellent or chief, as Dionyſius telleth us. In the beginning they might impriſon and ſentence at their pleaſure, having the power of life and death over the Citizens, though ſcarce the authority to make Peace and War, as Lipſius affirmeth. By degrees this great power was diminiſhed, and that eſpecially by two things, viz. Appeal, and Interpoſing, called Provocatio and Interceſſio. The former was preſently brought in after the baniſhment of the Kings, by Valerius Poplicola, who preferred a Law for taking away animadverſion upon Citizens from the Conſuls, and giving liberty of Appeal to the People as the higher Judge. But by the Interpoſition of the Tribunes of the People who were afterwards created, all actions of the Conſuls whatſoever might be obſtructed, as by the voice of the People it ſelf, whoſe power and dignity thenceforth daily increaſed, and took authority over all Magiſtrates. Hereby was that of the Conſuls much diminiſhed; Yet not quite broken and diſſolved as long as the Commonwealth continued; their Offices being both many and large. For firſt they were the head of the State, all ordinary Magiſtrates being ſubject and obnoxious to them, (except the Tribunes) in whoſe actions they might interpoſe. Secondly, they had the chief Command in the War over Citizens and Aſſociates, as alſo over Provinces and Subjects, whom they might puniſh; and Authority to appoint Officers in the Army, as appeareth out of Cicero and Polybius in ſeveral places. Thirdly, they aſſembled the People, conſulted with it, preferred Laws alſo, which if enacted bore their Names. Fourthly, they received Letters from Governours of Provinces, from Nations and Cities: gave audience to Ambaſſadors, and what was to be done either by Senate or People paſſed through their Hands as chief Miniſters of State. Fifthly, as the Senate handled and executed all things in Peace and War, ſo did they govern it in ſome Sence, they aſſembled and diſmiſſed it: therein they asked the Members their opinions, counted and divided them: and in concluſion they ſteered the Ship of the Commonwealth. This was their Power while the free State continued; but after it was ſubjected to the power of one Perſon, their Authority was again much impaired, few of all theſe Privileges remaining to them; for that the Prince aſſumed the Rights of all Magiſtrates, but eſpecially thoſe of the Conſuls and Tribunes. Under the Emperors they were employed in conſulting the Senate, adminiſtring Juſtice, aſſigning Tutors or Guardians, manumitting Slaves, letting out to farm the Cuſtoms (which Office formerly belonged to the Cenſors) and managing publick Games: beſides, they had the honour of having the year Characterized by their Names, as formerly. Theſe things will be ſufficiently evinced (at leaſt moſt of them) in the ſequel of this Hiſtory concerning Roman Affairs.

Certain Rites concerning them.

3. There were obſerved certain Conſular Rites, which it will rather behove us in this place to relate, than ſcatteringly hereafter to give an account of them. Firſt of all the time wherein the Conſuls aſſumed their Office was not ſet or conſtant, but various, till the year of the City five hundred and thirty two, when both they and other Magiſtrates entred on the Calends of January, having before, as * Simpſon and others obſerve, Commenced on the Calends of Quintilis called July, as well as at other times. The firſt day was an high day, and very creditable to them, the Senate and people meeting at their Houſes, ſaluting, and accompanying them to the Capitol, where they took their Oaths and Sacrifized. Thence they went to the Senate Houſe, where they were ordered by a Senatus-Conſultum to give thanks to the Prince of the Senate; then ſent they Gifts to their Friends, and threw Money to the People, which later expenſe was afterwards taken away by the Emperors, and appropriated to the repairing of aquæducts. They twice ſwore to govern according to the Laws (as all other Magiſtrates did, none being to keep his Office above five days, except publickly ſworn) when firſt they entred; once in the Capitol, and then again in the Roſtra, in their hands to whom they ſucceeded: and at the laying down of their Office again at the years end they ſwore in like manner, that wittingly and willingly they had done nothing, contrary to the ſaid Laws. Another Rite there was, as Lipſius termeth it, about their power, which thereby was ſo increaſed as to become as abſolute as the Kingly was. This was only upon an extraordinary occaſion, or in extream neceſſity, when all lay at the Stake, and the City was in danger. Then a Decree of the Senate paſſed in this form: Viderint Conſules nequid Reſp. detrimenti accipiat, or Dent operam Conſules nequid Reſp. detrimenti Capiat, as * Salluſt hath it, who addeth, that this greateſt Power was given by the Senate to theſe Magiſtrates, to raiſe Forces, make War, all manner of ways to puniſh Citizens, and Aſſociates, to have, both at home, and abroad in War, abſolute Command and judiciary Power. Otherwiſe without the command of the People no Conſul could do any of theſe things. In a word, by this Decree was reſtored to them that power (or rather more given) which was taken away by the Appeal, and other Laws.

* Ad A. M. 3676.

* De bello Catalin.

4. What the Ornaments and Enſigns of the Conſuls were, we have formerly obſerved out of Dionyſius, to which ſhall be added upon occaſion what may be thought requiſite. As for the Age wherein a man was capable of this Office, (a) Tacitus obſerveth, that of old it was lawful at any age to ſue for the Conſulſhip, and the ſupream power of Dictator. But afterwards being taught otherwiſe by experience (in the five hundred and ſeventy third year of the City) the Romans thought fit to ſet bounds to juvenile heat and ambition. This was, as (b) Livy writeth, by a Law which L. Julius (or Villius) Tribune of the People preferred, whereby was limited a certain age before which it was not lawful to ſtand for any place of Magiſtracy; but from Cicero it ſhould rather appear that there were ſeveral Laws made for the ſeveral Offices; and at length the Lex Julia or Annaria, included, and aboliſhed all the reſt. For (c) he maketh them many, calling them in the plural number Leges Annales; and Livy, ſaying that then firſt of all a Law was preferred by Julius, in effect contradicteth himſelf, relating elſewhere a (d) paſſage concerning Scipio Africanus, that when he ſtood for the Ædileſhip, the Tribunes of the People oppoſed him, alleging that he was not yet arrived at the lawful age which was required for that Office; and yet he was many years before Julius or his Law. Cicero (e) declareth the fourty third year to have been the age of Conſulſhip, ſaying, that Alexander the great having died in his thirty third year, came ten years ſhort of the Conſular age. If his words be taken ſtrictly, the fourty third, but if more largely, the fourty ſecond was the year, and this rather as many examples do confirm. A grave age became this moſt grave and weighty Office; but ſometimes the People diſpenſed with the Law, as will be ſhewn, the Emperours neglected it, and Cæſar Dictator before them, who made Dolabella Conſul at twenty five. Laſtly, as for the Term or duration of the Conſulſhip, it was annual, as we before hinted in Brutus his Model, and ſo continued, till Julius Cæſar made ſeveral in one year, ſo that afterwards Conſuls were nominated for three, two, and one moneth, and others ſubſtituted one after another. Hence came it to paſs that there were two ſorts of Conſuls, Ordinary and Subſtitute, the former beginning on the Calends of January, and the later at other times. This cuſtom continued till Conſtantine, who again made the Office Annual, and inſtead of the Suffecti, or Subſtitute, ordained a new kind, called Conſulares, and Conſules Honorarii, whoſe Office was not called Conſulatus, but Conſularitas, having derived its Original from the Conſular Ornaments invented by Julius Cæſar. Of this titular promotion (f) Caſſiodorus is to be conſulted.

The age capable of this Office.

Its duration.

(a) Annal. lib. 11.

(b) Lib. 10.

(c) Philipica 5.

(d) Lib. 25.

(e) Quo prius.

(f) Lib. 6. Epiſt. 12.

5. But (to come to the matter in hand) the firſt Conſuls were L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, who began this Office, according to (o) Dionyſius his Computation, in the beginning of the ſixty eight Olympiad, wherein Iſchomachus of Crotone was Victor, Iſagrus being Archon at Athens. Becauſe they could not deny that many good things had been done by Kings for the Commonwealth, they would have the name preſerved for ever in the State, and therefore gave order to the Pontifices and Augurs to chuſe out ſome one, who taking care of Superſtition, and being exempted from War, ſhould be called Rex Sacrificulus, to which Office allotted unto the Patritians, Manilis Papirius of that Order firſt attained. Next after this, fearing that the People might have, as they well might, an ill opinion of their intentions, and ſay that for one they had got two Kings; to diminiſh Envy, whereas each of them had as yet twelve Axes carried before them, as the Kings uſed to have, they ordered that but one of them ſhould have twelve Axes, and the other twelve Lictors with Rods alone, and each his Moneth ſhould have the Axes. This contained the People better in obedience, as other things whereby they laboured to render themſelves popular. For they revived the Laws of Servius Tullius, concerning publick Meetings and Aſſemblies, with other things which conduced to the ſatisfaction of the common ſort, who now looked upon their lawleſs liberties as recovered.

The firſt Conſuls.

Their Acts.

(a) Lib. 5.

A. M. 3496.
Ol. 67. ann. 4.
V. C. 245.
Darii 13.

6. Tarquinius after his baniſhment firſt ſtayed at Gabii for ſome time, whither many of his party flocking to him, after he could not prevail with them of that place to make War in his behalf againſt the Romans, he betook himſelf into Toſcany, or Hetruria, where he could claim kindred by his Mother, and there winning mens minds by his munificence, and moving them with his Tears, he procured Ambaſſadors to be ſent to Rome in his behalf. Firſt they moved that he might be received again, promiſing on his behalf very good demeanour for the time to come, and when this equity could not be heard, they (or others ſent afterwards, as Plutarch writeth) deſired he might have his Goods, eſpecially ſuch as were deſcended upon him from Tarquinius Priſcus his Grandfather, who had in no wiſe ill deſerved of them. Brutus, according to his furious and malicious temper, very vehemently oppoſed it, ſaying, that it would ſhew little forecaſt in them to furniſh him with money to imploy againſt themſelves; but his Collegue was for reſtoring the goods, and prevailed to have the Decree paſs on his ſide, by one Vote only overpowering the contrary party, according to Dionyſius. The Ambaſſadors having it in charge to labour with the friends of Tarquinius, that they might do ſomething effectually, drew out the time in length, pretending they wanted carriages, and muſt ſell ſuch things as could not be removed. They ſtayed ſo long as to draw over to them ſome of the two notable families of the Aquillii and Vitellii, viz. two perſons of this, and three of that. Of all theſe Collatinus the Conſul was Uncle; and Brutus alſo had married the ſiſter of the Vitellii, by which he had ſeveral Children, whereof two youths they drew in, having convinced them of their fathers vehemency, madneſs, and folly, and given them good hopes of great things to be done for them by Tarquinius.

Lege inter alios Dionyſium l. 5. & Plutarch. in Poplicola.

7. Theſe men met in the houſe of the Aquillii to ripen their buſineſs. There in the dark, a certain ſlave, Vindicius by name, fearing to be found in that room when they came in, and not with any intent to hearken, had himſelf behind a Cheſt, and heard their whole debate concerning their purpoſe of killing the Conſuls; about which they gave Letters then to the Ambaſſadors (who lodged in the houſe, and were preſent at the meeting) to be delivered to Tarquinius. The Slave in this caſe knew not how to carry himſelf; for, to go to Brutus, and to accuſe his own ſons to him ſeemed an hard and bold attempt, as alſo no leſs to do it unto Tarquinius their Uncle; no private perſon he knew to whom he might communicate ſo great a matter, and yet a thing of ſuch conſequence he thought was not to be buried in ſilence, nor yet the diſcovery thereof deferred. At length he betook himſelf to P. Valerius, who had alſo a great hand in caſting out the King. Valerius exceedingly ſtruck with the thing, that he might proceed warily, firſt ſecured the ſlave to have him forth-coming, then ſending his brother Marcus to ſeize the King's houſe, and watch the ſervants there, that they ſhould carry away no Letters, he himſelf with his Clients and Friends went to the houſe of the Aquillii, where he got into his hands what was written to Tarquinius. The Aquillii being abroad met him at the Gate, where they endeavoured to recover by force the Letters from him; but he through the help of thoſe about him drew them into the Forum, as his brother alſo having ſeized on other Letters at the King's houſe, forced ſome of his ſervants thither. The tumult being appeaſed by the Conſuls, Vindicius related the Story, and the Letters were read. The parties ſaid nothing for themſelves; all were aſtoniſhed and ſilent; at length ſome to flatter Brutus mentioned baniſhment; Collatinus ſhedding tears gave the priſoners hope, and this was increaſed becauſe Valerius held his peace.

Revealed.

8. But furious and implacable Brutus calling both his Sons by their names (Titus and Tiberius) asked them why they ſaid nothing to what was laid to their charge, and when they anſwered not at the third time, he turned to the Lictors or Executioners, and ſaid, Now is it your part to perform the reſt. They preſently took the youths, and ſtripping them tied their hands behind them: then did they beat with rods, and after that beheaded them, he, whilſt others could not behold ſo abhominable a ſpectacle, feeding his angry eyes with the object, till all was done. Then left he the reſt to the diſcretion of his Colleague and departed; after which a ſtupidity, horror, and amazement, as the things required, for a time poſſeſſed all. Collatinus his backwardneſs and delay incouraged the Aquilii to deſire time to anſwer, and that Vindicius their Slave might be given up to them, and not continue in the hands of their accuſers. The Conſul was about to do both, when Valerius who kept the Slave all this while in the midſt of his followers, would neither deliver him, nor ſuffer the People to depart without cenſuring the accuſed, though Collatinus was ready to diſmiſs the Aſſembly. He laid hands upon the Aquilii, and ſent for Brutus, crying out, that Collatinus did unworthily, to impoſe upon his Colleague a neceſſity of killing his ſons, and think of granting the lives of the other unto Women. The Conſul being vexed, commanded the Lictors to take away Vindicius, ſo that they laying hands on him, wounded thoſe that kept him, and Valerius his friends fighting in his behalf, the People cried out for Brutus. When he came he ſaid, that by his full authority he had animadverted upon his own Sons, and left the other delinquents to the People, giving leave to every man to ſpeak.

Brutus putteth to death his ſons.

The reſt beheaded.

There was no need of this, ſaith Plutarch (though Dionyſius relateth a great conteſt between the two Conſuls) but the Rabble called to the vote, condemned them by all their Suffrages, according to which Sentence they were beheaded. Collatinus now, who for being akin to the King had been ſuſpected, and whoſe name was hateful to the People, having by his carriage in this buſineſs offended the Generality, voluntarily laid down his Office and departed from the City, ſeeing now to what a ſad paſs he had helped to bring things, and too late repenting of his Rebellion. To him ſucceeded Valerius (the Comitia being held for an Election) whom Brutus much deſired to have had his Colleague at firſt, but that the greatneſs of Collatinus carried it from him.

Valerius Conſul in the room of Tarquinius Collatinus.

Brutus ſlain.

9. Valerius being with the good-will of all the Multitude created Conſul, thought the firſt Fruits of his Office due to Vindicius, whom manumitted he made free of the Commonwealth, this privilege being given to him firſt of all Liberti or Freed-men, according to Plutarch (which Appius long after communicated to them all) and from him a perfect and full manumiſſion had the name of Vindicta. This done, the Conſuls gave the Goods of the King to be rifled by the People, demoliſhed his Houſe, and laid the Campus Martius which he had to himſelf, open as before, wherein lying Corn cut down already, they threw it into the River, and ſending Trees that grew there after it, theſe receiving Gravel and ſuch Rubbiſh that came down the Chanel, at laſt grew into an Iſland called Inſula Sacra; though ſome ſay, this happened in after times, when Tarquinia a Veſtal Nun gave the adjoyning Field to the Publick, and for that obtained great Honours, as theſe amongſt the reſt; of all Women alone to appear as a Witneſs in any cauſe, and liberty to marry, which ſhe refuſed. But Tarquinius ſeeing that reaſon failed, betook himſelf to Force, and brought a great Army of Tuſcans againſt Rome. The Conſuls oppoſed him with another, and when they came to joyn, Aruns the Son of Tarquin, and Brutus the Conſul, with greater wrath and Fury than diſcretion, ſingled out each other, and ſo careleſly demeaned themſelves, as both of them loſt their Lives. A great and bloody Battel was fought betwixt the Armies, which Night only broke up, and that with ſuch equal Fortune, as neither party could boaſt it ſelf, till at length either by a Voice out of a Grove, as the Story goeth, that the Etruſcans had loſt one man more, or ſome other way, the Romans were ſo revived, and the other diſcouraged, that the later forſook their Tents for fear, and being fallen upon by the Enemy, were nigh five thouſand taken Priſoners, having loſt eleven thouſand and three hundred in the Fight. Valerius triumphed at his return to the City (leaving an example to poſterity which was duly followed) and then buried his Colleague with great Honour, making himſelf a funeral Oration in his commendation, which cuſtom Dionyſius will have more antient at Rome than in Greece; although Anaximenes wrote that Solon was the Author of it.

Dionyſ. lib. 5.
Livius lib. 2.
Val. Maxim. l. 1. c, 8.
Plutar. in Poplicola.
*Plin.l.29: c.* 1*:*
Feſtus in voce Inſula.

A. M. 3497.
Ol. 68. an. 1.
V. C. 246.
Darii 15.

Valerius ſuſpected.

Cleareth himſelf.

10. But when the People conſidered how Brutus the Father of their liberty, as they accounted him, would not govern alone without a Colleague, and yet Valerius made no haſte to take a Partner, they began to complain, that he had not taken to himſelf ſo much the place of Brutus (which yet not at all belonged to him) but that of Tarquinius, and were much offended with him. They confirmed themſelves in their hard opinion, from his having all the Rods and Axes carried before him, and with them, in greater ſtate than Tarquinius uſed, marched from his Houſe, which was much larger than the Palace that he demoliſhed. His Houſe was very fair, ſituate in ſuch a place as afforded him proſpect round about, and had a difficult aſcent; ſo that the convenience of the Site, conſidered with his Kingly port and attendance, ſeemed to threaten their infant Commonwealth, now an Orphan by Brutus his Death. His Friends remonſtrating to him theſe particulars, he contended not; but that very night ſent for Carpenters, who demoliſhed the Houſe ere morning: the next day the People were preſented with a New and unexpected Sight, which fully altered their opinion concerning Valerius, who now wanting an Houſe of his own, was glad to accept of the Courteſie of Friends, till the People gave him a place, wherein he built a Manſion leſs ſtately than the former. Further, that he might render not only himſelf, but alſo his Office, in ſtead of Terrible, familiar and acceptable to all, he removed Axes from the bundle of Rods, and, the Rods themſelves, when he came into the Aſſembly, he bowed or vailed to the People, thereby intimating, that in them lay the chief Power; which cuſtom his Succeſſors followed. Hereby, as to his own Perſon, he leſſened not himſelf, but cut off Envy, and got ſo much Power, as he renounced

of

Sect. 1.

of liberty, the People willingly ſubmitting to him, becauſe he flattered them, out of which reſpect they gave him the Sirname of Poplicola, not Publicola; as Sigonius hath evinced. He gave free leave to any to ſue for the Conſulſhip, but before a Colleague ſhould be joyned with him, being ignorant what might happen, and fearing he might either through emulation or ignorance croſs his deſigns, by his ſole authority, he gave birth to ſeveral Popular Conſtitutions, which at length produced ſuch effects as ſhewed the excellency of that Government which he had helped to deſtroy.

His conſtitutions.

11. Firſt he filled up the Senate which had been exhauſted, by an addition of one hundred and ſixty four Perſons, as ſome delivered the number. Then made he ſeveral Laws, which gave beginning to that paramount or rampant liberty, whereof the People were afterwards poſſeſſed. By one he gave leave to an accuſed perſon, to appeal from the Conſuls to the People. By another, he made it death for any one to take upon him an Office of Magiſtracy without the People's order. A third gave relief to poor Citizens, by taking away the payment of Tribute. Another puniſhed diſobedience towards the Conſuls, and appointed the mulct to be the price of five Oxen, and two Sheep: the price of a Sheep was ten Oboli (each Obolus was worth 1 d. q.) and one hundred the value of an Oxe. For at that time the uſe of money was but rare amongſt the Romans; wealth conſiſting in plenty of Cattel, whence riches were afterwards called Peculia from Pecus, and upon the antient money an Oxe, Sheep, or Hog was ſtamped, which gave it the name of Pecunia: and hence they impoſed upon their ſons (as Plutarch obſerveth) the names of Suillii, Bubulci, Caprarii, and Porcii. Another Law Valerius made, which gave power to any man to kill him unheard, that affected the Supreme Power, if he could demonſtrate the crime. The laſt was a Law for the creation of two Queſtors or publick Treaſurers, as Plutarch writeth. For it being neceſſary that the People ſhould contribute money for maintenance of Wars, he would neither undertake the keeping of it himſelf, nor commit the care of it to his friends, neither thought it convenient that the Publick money ſhould be kept in a private houſe: therefore he made the Temple of Saturn the Ærarium, or Treaſury, and cauſed the People to chuſe out two young men to be Quæſtors. The firſt were P. Veturius, and M. Minucius. A great quantity of money was now brought into the Ærarium. For at the Cenſus one hundred and thirty thouſand were ceſſed or valued, beſides Widdows and Orphans. Thus much Plutarch delivereth concerning this Office.

The Quæſtors.

When firſt made.

12. But ſome give a more antient beginning to the Quæſtors, making theirs antienter than any Office, except that of Kings. (a) Gracchanus a Lawyer wrote, that both Romulus and Numa had their Quæſtors, created by the conſent of the People; however he ſaith it is certain that Tullus Hoſtilius had his. (b) Ulpian confirmeth the later, and (c) Tacitus ſeemeth to agree with either of them, affirming that under the Kings there were Quæſtors, which the Lex curiata ſheweth, that was renewed by L. Brutus. He addeth, that the Conſuls had power to chuſe them, till the People took that honour to it ſelf, and firſt of all created Valerius Potitus, and Æmilius Mamercus, that they might follow the Army, in the ſixty third year after the baniſhment of Tarquinius. Lipſius thinketh this number ſhould be read twenty three, that it might agree with (d) Dionyſius, and alſo (e) Livy, who firſt mentioneth the Quæſtors in the two hundred and ſixty ninth year of the City, twenty three years after the baniſhment of the King, and differeth only in one of their names, having for Æmilius, Cæſo Fabius. Concerning the antiquity of theſe Officers (f) Pomponius alſo the Lawyer agreeth with the reſt. They had their name à quærendo ſaith (g) Varro, becauſe they made inquiry after publick money, and alſo Malefactors, or the actions of ſuch, which later employment was afterwards committed to the Triumviri for capital matters, ſo that Quæſtor is written as for Quæſitor. Juſtus Lipſius is of opinion, that though the Kings might have theſe Officers for the puniſhment of Vice, yet the Treaſurers were not created till the change of the Government, when the publick Treaſure being increaſed there was need of ſuch. At the beginning they were but two by conſent of all; and thoſe were made for the City, retaining afterwards the name of Urbani. But afterward when they were to look to the paying of the Armies abroad, and ſelling plunder and booty, then were there other two made, to accompany the Conſuls, as Livy ſaith, which hapned about the two hundred and thirty ſecond year of the City.

Their number.

23. This number long continued, until all Italy was brought in; then was it

(a) Lib. de Poteſtatibus.
(b) Lib. de Officio Quæſtoris.
(c) Annal. l. 16. 11.
(d) Lib. 8.
(e) Lib. 3.
(f) Lib. 2. ff. de Orig. Juris
(g) De Lingua Latin. lib. 4. pag. 22. ex Edit. Joſeph. Scalig.

Their duty.

The Ærarium or Treaſury.

it again doubled, no fewer than eight being thought to ſuffice for the Tributes of the Provinces; and this hapned when Silver money was firſt coined, about the four hundred and thirty ninth year of the City,as may be gathered from the Epitome of Livie's fifteenth Book. Not long after Sylla procured by a Law, that twenty ſhould be made for the aſſiſtance of the Senate, as Tacitus writeth, to which he had delivered the judicial power: and for ſuch an end did Cæſar cauſe fourty to be created. The Quæſtorſhip was the firſt ſtep to Offices of Magiſtracy. Their duty, as is clear from ſeveral Authors, was to gather, lay up, and pay out the publick revenues, to keep the military Enſigns of Gold and Silver (for they then uſed no Banners) in the Treaſury; to ſell plunder and booty, receive, lodge,and carry out Ambaſſadors. They had alſo the government of certain places, as Oſtia and Cales. They received from Auguſtus the privilege of keeping the Senatus conſulta, which formerly belonged to the Ædiles and Tribes. And the Emperours had a certain Quæſtor of their own called Candidatus Principis, and Quæſtor Principis, or Auguſti, whoſe Office Ulpian deſcribeth. This gave original to the Quæſtor Palatii (ſaith Lipſius) to whom was granted great authority, as to make Laws and Decrees, ſubſcribe Petitions, return anſwers, and to be as it were the keeper or Preſident of the Laws, which name is now changed into Chancellour. But, to ſpeak ſomething of the Treaſury, the Temple of Saturn was firſt made uſe of to this purpoſe, as Plutarch telleth us. Here alſo were kept the Libri elephantini, Books wherein the thirty five Tributes were written, and the Decrees of the Senate; but the Libri Lintei, or the Annals, were kept by the Pontifices, who therein recorded ſuch things as were memorable. In the Ærarium was alſo a more ſecret place, where the twentieth part of the revenues were reſerved for caſes of extremity only. The Ærarium was afterwards called Fiſcus, from the Fiſcella, or bags wherein the money was kept,according to Varro. The firſt Advocatus Fiſci was inſtituted by Adrian the Emperour, as Spartianus witneſſeth. Amongſt other tributes, the People of Rome had the twentieth part of all revenues of Corn throughout Italy, beſides Salt, which was the device of Livy, thence Sirnamed Salinator. Thoſe that farmed the Tributes of Cuſtom were called Publicans, and the principal of them Mancipes, according to Pedianus, whom Volateranus followeth.

Lucretius Conſul.

14. Valerius Poplicola having finiſhed his conſtitutions of Setlement, held the Aſſembly of the People for the election of another Conſul. Lucretius the father of Lucretia was choſen, to whom, as the elder, Poplicola granted the Faſces or bundle of Rods; which reſpect of age was ever obſerved by their Succeſſors, till the time of (a) Plutarch, as himſelf writeth. This granting of the Faſces was yet but for the firſt month, which indeed afterwards was wont to be granted to the elder Conſul; but no longer than till the Lex Julia, in the ſeventh Chapter, whereof this privilege was given to him who had moſt children, either ſtill in his own power (that is to be underſtood not Emanicipated) or already loſt in War. But if both Conſuls had an equal number of children, he who at preſent was a married man was preferred. If both were husbands and fathers alike, then the antient cuſtom returned, and he who was eldeſt had firſt the Faſces. Concerning ſuch who were both unmaried, had the ſame number of children, or were both maried and had no children, the Law commanded nothing. But I hear, ſaith (b) Gellius, that thoſe who were exempted, were wont to yield the Faſces of the firſt month to their Colleagues that far exceeded them in age, or in birth, or entred upon their ſecond Conſulſhip. In the mean time that Conſul who had no Faſces, that he might be known by ſome note of diſtinction, had an Accenſus (a certain Beadle or Crier, concerning whom (c) Varro is to be conſulted) that went before him, and Lictors followed with Rods and Staves, as (d) Dionyſius, (e) Livy, and Suetonius do teſtifie.

Horatius.

15. Lucretius died alſo a few days after his creation, to whom ſucceeded M. Horatius, who continued the Colleague of Poplicola for the remaining part of the year. Now was the Capitol finiſhed which had been vowed by Tarquinius Priſcus, and begun by Superbus his grand-ſon. Poplicola had a great ambition to dedicate it, but the Nobility envied him the honour, and ſtirred up Horatius to ſtand for it, whom when the other was conſtrained to be abſent in the War, they injoyned by a Decree to do it, and carried him up thither, knowing that in the preſence of Poplicola they could not have prevailed. Some write, that by lot the War fell to Poplicola much againſt his will, and the Dedication to Horatius. On the Ides of September, which fell in with the full Moon of the Greek month Metagitnion (anſwering to Auguſt the twenty eighth of the Julian year,

(a) In Poplicola.

(b) Noct. Attic. lib. 2. c. 15.

(c) De Ling. Lat. pag. 62.

(d) Lib. 5.

(e) Lib. 3.

(f) In Julio.

as Jacobus Capellus computeth) when many flocked to behold the Solemnity, Horatius having commanded ſilence, and finiſhed all the uſual rites, touched the door, and pronounced the words of Dedication. Then Marcus the brother of Poplicola ſtanding near for that purpoſe, and watching for an opportunity, ſaid, Thy Son O Conſul is dead in the Camp, whereat when all others were ſtruck, Horatius nothing diſturbed anſwered only, Then caſt him out whither you pleaſe, for I admit not of mourning, and went on with the matter in hand. Neither was the ſtory true, but feigned by Marcus to deter him from the Dedication. The ſame fortune hapned to the Dedication of the ſecond Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, after this was burnt in the Civil Wars. For Sylla having rebuilt it died before the Dedication, as Tarquinius was baniſhed, and ſo that honour came to Catulus. When this had periſhed in the ſedition of Vitellius, Veſpatian built the third, and was herein more fortunate than Sylla, that, as he died before the Dedication of his, ſo the Emperour lived not to ſee the deſtruction of this, which preſently after his death was alſo burned. The fourth which ſtood in Plutarch's time was both built and Dedicated by Domitian. Tarquinius, as was reported, ſpent fourty thouſand pounds of ſilver in founding his Temple; but the fourth was not guilded for ſo little as the wealth of the richeſt private man. The Marble Pillars Plutarch ſaw at Athens, being then of a thickneſs anſwerable to their length, but afterward when they were new cut at Rome, they got not ſo much ſplendor as they loſt of proportion and beauty, being rendred too ſlender in bulk or ſubſtance.

The Capitol dedicated.

16. In the * Conſulſhip of Junius Brutus and M. Horatius (that is in the ſame year that Horatius ſucceeded, though not immediately, into the place of Brutus, who with Tarquinius his Colleague governed but four months) when the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was Conſecrated, twenty eight years before Xerxes his expedition into Greece, the firſt League was made betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians. Herein it was provided, that the Romans ſhould not ſayl beyond the Fair Promontory, which lay before Carthage towards the North. Polybius thinketh the cauſe was, for that the Carthaginians would not have them take notice of the places about Byzacium, nor the little Syrtis; which for the fruitfulneſs of the ſoyl they termed Emporia. But if it hapned that any, either by Tempeſts or Pirats, were forced in thither, they promiſed they would furniſh them with all things neceſſary, but forbad any thing to be taken by force, and commanded all to be gone thence within five days. It was lawful hereby for the Romans to Traffick to Carthage, and all that part of Africk which lieth on this ſide the Fair Promontory, as alſo Sardinia, and that part of Sicily then under the Carthaginians, who promiſe upon their publick faith that all Juſtice ſhall be duly executed. From this League it appeareth that the Carthaginians ſpeak of Africk and Sardinia as abſolutely their own, but far otherwiſe concerning Sicily expreſly diſtinguiſhing of that part thereof which they had ſubdued. The Romans alſo include in this League only Latium, making no mention of the reſt of Italy, which was not in their power. After this another League was made, or rather this renewed, wherein the Carthaginians comprized the Tyrians, and the People of Utica. To the Fair Promontory were added Maſtia and Tarſeium, beyond which it was neither lawful for the Romans to make any depredations, nor build a Town. Theſe things Polybius obſerveth concerning theſe Leagues, which he alſo exemplifieth, and to which we refer Students in Hiſtory.

* *Polyb.lib.*3. p. 160.

The firſt League betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians.

17. Tarquinius, after that great battel wherein he loſt his ſon Aruns in a Combat with Brutus, betook himſelf to Cluſium, the King whereof Porſena by name (one of great account for his power, and munificence amongſt the Kings of Italy) he procured to take upon him his quarrel. He firſt ſent to Rome, commanding them to receive their King according to their duty, and upon refuſal, both threatned, and made War upon them. Now were created Conſuls Poplicola the ſeond time being abſent, and T. Lucretius Tricipitinus on the Calends of October, according to the Pompilian year, which anſwered to September the fourteenth, of the Julian in the new Moon. Jacobus Capellus obſerveth that the Conſuls commenced at this time of the year from the firſt of Poplicola, till fifteen years after, in the two hundred and ſixty firſt year of the City. Sp. Caſſius and Poſthumius Cominius began their Office a moneth ſooner, viz. on the Calends of October. The reaſon might be, for that the new Moon fell in with the Autumnal Æquinoctial on the twenty ninth of Julian September, from which the Pompilian, or Numan, September ſeemeth to have Commenced that year, the Moon increaſing, Porſena warreth againſt Rome.

Livius lib. 2.

Plut.ut prius.

Ad A. M. 3452. & 3507.

increaſing, although without order. For the Calends of October ought rather to have been on that day; but ſuch Errors were frequent in the Pompilian year, either through the negligence, or willful neglect of the Prieſts. After the third year the Calends (or firſt day) of January recovered their true place, viz. the next new Moon to the Winter Solſtice; but September obtained to be the beginning of the year until the two hundred and ſeventy eighth year of the City, wherein the Comitia for Creation of Conſuls were caſt back to the Calends of the moneth Sextilis (afterwards called Auguſt) at what time A. Virginius Tricoſtus, and Sp. Servilius Structus were made Conſuls, in the Summer Solſtice, as Dionyſius obſerveth.

18. Poplicola returning to Rome, firſt reſolved in magnanimity to outvy Porſena, and for that purpoſe, when the King was now approaching, founded the City Sigliucia (or rather Signia) which with great expence he fortified, and then planted it with ſeven hundred Inhabitants, making hereby a ſhow that he could without any trouble or fear ſuſtain the War. But Porſena laying cloſe Siege to Rome, very fiercely with all his might ſet upon the City. The two Conſuls with much ado repelling the Toſcans, at length were both ſo wounded as they muſt needs be carried off, after which the Romans fled from before their Enemies, who in their retreat into the Town followed them cloſe, and flocked upon the Bridge. There Horatius ſirnamed Cocles (either for that he had but one Eye, having loſt the other in War, or becauſe his Noſe was ſo depreſſed that both his Eyes ſeemed to go into one, whence intending to call him Cyclops, by ignorance of the Language they pronounced it Cocles) together with Herminius and Lartius, oppoſed himſelf againſt the Toſcans. Cocles ſtood before the Bridge, and repulſed the Enemy ſo long till it was broken down behind him, which done, he caſt himſelf armed as he was into the River, and ſwom out to his Friends, having received a Wound with a Spear. To requite him for the Lameneſs he contracted by this Wound, and in admiration of his Valour, Poplicola cauſed all the Romans to give him, every one ſo much Proviſion as would ſerve one for a day, then conferred he on him ſo much Ground as he could plow round about in one day, and they erected to his Memory a Statue in the Temple of Vulcan. But Porſena drawing out the Siege in length ſore ſtraightned the City. Poplicola now executing his third Conſulſhip, together with his laſt years Collegue M. Horatius Pulvillus, led forth his men, and giving the King Battel, overthrew him, and killed five thouſand of his men. Yet this little availed, the honour of finiſhing this War being reſerved for the Valour and Policy of Mutius Cordus.

Plut. in Poplicol. Dionyſ. lib. 5.
Livius lib. 2.
Florus lib. 1. cap. 10.
Aurel. Victor de viris Illuſtr.
Val Max. lib. 3. cap. 2, 3.
Vide etiam Polyb. lib. 6.

Horatius Cocles.

Mutius Scævola.

A. M. 3498.
Ol. 68. ann. 2.
V. C. 247.
Darii. 15.

19. Mutius a man of excellent courage, and no leſs Skill in War, reſolving with himſelf to lie in wait for the Life of Porſena, put on the Tuſcan habit, and uſing that Language, came into the Kings Camp, where obſerving the place in which the King was, but being ignorant of his Perſon, he ſtabbed his Secretary who ſate with him amongſt ſeveral others. Being taken in the Act, when they went about to examine him, he thruſt his right Hand into the Fire, as intending to puniſh it for ſo great a miſtake, and whilſt it burned beheld Porſena with a ſtedfaſt and angry Countenance, who admiring his reſolution diſmiſſed him, and reached him back his Sword from his Seat. Mutius took it with his left Hand (whence he had the name of Scævola, which Word ſignifieth one that uſeth his left Hand, ſaith Plutarch) and telling the King that he was now overcome by his braveneſs of Spirit whoſe Threats he had contemned, he ſaid in way of Requital he would reveal a thing to him which no force of Torment could have compelled him to diſcover. He affirmed there were three hundred Romans now in his Camp watching an opportunity to kill him. As for his part, having been by lot deſtined to make the firſt attempt, it did not trouble him that he had failed in killing him a right good man, and one much worthier of the Friendſhip than Hatred of the Romans. Porſena hearing this, inclined preſently to a compoſure of the Difference, not ſo much out of fear of the three hundred, as admiration of the Roman Courage. Poplicola having notice hereof, was glad of ſuch a Friend, and content to make him Umpire betwixt the Commonwealth and Tarquinius. He often challenged Tarquinius to put the matter to arbitration, to which the King anſwered couragiouſly, that he would not admit of any Judge, much leſs of Porſena, who having promiſed him aid now baſely falſified his word. Porſena hereat diſpleaſed, eſpecially through the ſolicitation of Aruns his Son, made Peace with the Romans on theſe Conditions: that they ſhould quit thoſe Tuſcan Grounds they had got into their hands, reſtore all Priſoners, and receive all their Fugitives.

Peace made with Porſena.

Clœlia.

20. For the eſtabliſhing of this Peace the Romans gave up twenty Hoſtages, viz. ten young Youths, and as many Girles, amongſt which was Valeria the Daughter of Poplicola. All Acts of Hoſtility ceaſing, the young Virgins went down to the River to waſh, and taking an opportunity, when none were preſent to hinder them, got over the Water, and returned home. Some reported, that one amongſt them named Clœlia went over on horſ-back, and perſwaded the reſt to ſwim after. When they preſented themſelves to Poplicola, he neither admired their reſolution, nor approved of their return, fearing it would be objected as a breach of Faith to the Romans; ſo that apprehending them all, he ſent them back to Porſena. Tarquinius aware hereof placed in ambuſh a party to entrap them and their Convoy; but Aruns the Son of Porſena hearing of it, came in, and reſcued them out of danger. When Porſena ſaw them, he demanded which had been the cauſe of their departure, and finding Clœlia the principal, beſtowed on her one of his own Horſes ſumptuouſly adorned. Then to give a further Teſtimony of his reſpect towards the Romans, beſides other things wherein he ſhewed his Magnificence, he commanded his Soldiers to depart out of the Camp only with their Arms, delivering up to the beſieged his Tents furniſhed with Victuals, and all other good things. Therefore for a long time after, when publick Goods were ſet to Sale, firſt of all the ſtuff of Porſena was cried, to preſerve the memory of his kindneſs: and about the Court-houſe was erected his Statue in a plain and antient Faſhion. For the next year Dionyſius nameth as Conſuls, Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, of whom Livie maketh honourable mention, but not as executing his Office. He writeth that at the Bridge Sp. Largius and T. Herminius both nobly deſcended, together with Horatius Cocles, ſuſtained the firſt brunt of the Hetruſcans, but Learned men tell us that it ought to be written Lartius, not Largius.

A. M. 3501
Ol. 99. ann. 1.
V. C. 250.
Darii 18.

War with the Sabines.

Actius Clauſus.

21. The Year following being the two hundred and fiftieth of the City, and the fifth after the Baniſhment of Tarquinius, the firſt of the ninty ninth Olympiad, ſaith Dionyſius, wherein Iſchomachus of Crotone was Victor, Aceſtorides being again Archon at Athens, in the eighteenth year of Darius Hyſtaſpis King of Perſia, A. M. 3501. M. Valerius the Brother of Poplicola, and P. Poſthumius Tubertus were Conſuls. Now the Sabines made depredations in the Roman Territories, and proceeded ſo far in their Injuries that it ingaged the Parties in a War: Marcus by the Counſel and Aſſiſtance of his Brother obtained great Honour in his undertakings. He overthrew the Sabines twice, in the later of which Battels were ſlain of them thirteen thouſand, and not one of the Romans loſt. Wherefore beſides Triumphs this was given him as an addition of honour, to have an Houſe built for him in the place on the publick coſt. Beſides, whereas all the doors of other Houſes opened inwards, they would have this of his Houſe to open outwards toward the Street, as a mark of Honour in this reſpect, that he was ever ready to move for the publick good. Indeed all the Gates of the Greeks are ſaid moſt antiently to have opened this way, and that by Teſtimony of the Comedies, wherein they that are going out firſt knock within, that ſuch as either go by or ſtand near, may prevent being hurt of the Door, which was caſt forward into the Street. The next Year, wherein Poplicola was Conſul the fourth time, and his Collegue T. Lucretius Tricipitinus, the whole Nation of the Sabines with the Latines conſpired againſt Rome, which was alſo much diſturbed by Superſtition, for that all the Women with Child miſcarried of mutilous Births, and nothing came into the World perfect. When theſe things much dejected the minds of the Romans, another erected them, and afforded conſiderable incouragement to the War. Appius or Actius Clauſus, an eminent man amongſt the Sabines for Riches, Valour, Virtue, and Eloquence, being much againſt the War, was therefore maligned by his Emulators, as favouring the Romans, and deſigning to bring his Country under their Yoak. His Enemies gaining credit with the Vulgar, he feared to put himſelf upon Trial, and therefore raiſed a Commotion, which retarded the War. Then did Poplicola invite him to Rome, whither he came with five thouſand Families of his Friends and Dependents. The Families were made free of the City, and to every man aſſigned two Akers of Ground by the River Aniene; but to Clauſus himſelf twenty Akers, and the degree of a Senator. Having got this opportunity, he ſo improved it, as to become equal to the greateſt, and raiſed his Houſe ſo much, that the Clauſi afterwards called Claudii, became inferiour to no one Family.

22. His Revolt much more exaſperated the minds of his Country-men to the War, who coming with an Army to Fidenæ, placed in Ambuſh two thouſand Foot, and then ſent ſome Horſe to make incurſions, commanding them to retreat, as if they fled, and ſo draw on the Romans into the ſnare. Poplicola, having notice hereof by certain fugitives, divided his Army into three parts, and taking the advantage of a miſt, fell upon the Sabines on ſo many ſides, and did ſuch execution, as the nearneſs of Fidenæ only hindred the deſtruction of them all. The Romans, beſides the advantage of much plunder, obtained that good by this Victory, to be furniſhed with courage for all aſſayes; yet imputed they the whole merit to the Conſul, and ſticked not to ſay, that he delivered into their hands their Enemies, blind and lame, only to be diſpatched with the Sword. Having triumphed, and given up the charge of the Commonwealth to the two new Conſuls, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and Publius Poſthumius, ſhortly after he died, finiſhing his life, as he had lived, in great grace with the multitude whom he had ſo flattered. The People, as if they had nothing at all requited him when living, but owed him yet his whole reward, decreed he ſhould be buryed at the publick charge, every one contributing a ſmall piece of money. Some ſay, that he was ſo poor, as he left not enough to bury him. The women by univerſal conſent mourned for him, as formerly they had done for Brutus, an whole year. He was by a ſpecial Decree buried within the City, (which honour (ſaith Dionyſius) hath only happened unto him to this day) and that privilege was alſo granted to his family. But now, (Plutarch writeth) none of them are there interred: the Funeral is only drawn out thither, and the Coffin being ſet down, one puts under fire, and preſently again taketh it away, ſhowing, that the deceaſed hath a right there to be buried, but on his own accord quitteth the privilege. This being done, the body was carried away.

Poplicola dieth.

23. The ſame year that Poplicola died, the Sabines provided of numerous Forces, invaded the Roman Territories, as far as the City walls. The Conſuls taking the field againſt them, Poſthumius was entrapped in an Ambuſh, and eſcaping narrowly himſelf, loſt many of his men, which defeat ſtruck the Citizens with great terror, who now ran to the walls, expecting the Enemy would fall upon the City. But nothing being attempted in this kind, they marched out, reſolving to redeem their credit; and Poſthumius, much more concerned in honour than the reſt, ſo behaved himſelf, as he made amends fully, and both the Conſuls obtained a notable Victory, which had been completed by the ſlaughter of all the Sabines, if the darkneſs of night had not interpoſed. The Senate ordered the Conſuls to return in pomp; Menenius with full honour in triumph, ſitting in a Chair, drawn in way of a Chariot, but Poſthumius, becauſe of his late defeat, in a more humble manner, which the Romans called Ovation, ſo named (ſaith Feſtus or Paulus from him, as he from Verrius) from the letter O, which the Soldiers in way of joy were wont to eccho at their return from a Victory; or corruptly pronounced for the Greek word Euaſte, as Dionyſius conjectureth. Ovation differed herein from a Triumph properly ſo called, that the General entred not the City in a Chariot, but on foot before his Soldiers; for the Robe interwoven with Gold, he only wore the Prætexta toga, the ordinary habit of Conſuls and Prætors; neither had he a Scepter, but only Laurel; and on his head a wreath of Myrtle, when the War had not been denounced, or finiſhed without bloodſhed. The year following, wherein Sp. Caſſius Viſcellinus, and Opiter Virginius Tricoſtus were Conſuls, the Sabines were overthrown in a great battel at Cures, ten thouſand and three hundred being ſlain, and about four thouſand taken, which defeat cauſed them to beg peace, and purchaſe it with Corn, Money, and part of their grounds. Whilſt Sp. Caſſius did this good ſervice againſt the Sabines, his Colleague ſubdued the Camarinæans who had revolted, and having put to death the Authors of the injury, ſold the reſt, and razed their City.

Ovation what.

Dionyſ.

The Sabines beg Peace.

24. The year that followed, being the firſt of the ſeventieth Olympiad (wherein Nicæas of Opus (a Town of Locri) was Victor,) Myrus executing the Annual Office of Archon at Athens) had for Conſuls Poſthumius Cominius, and T. Largius. Now all the Latines (to the number of thirty Cities, ſaith Livy) conſpired againſt Rome, by the procurement of Mamilius Octavius, ſon-in-law to Tarquinius (who at preſent was with him at Tuſculum) though Valerius the Roman Ambaſſador pretended to anſwer to ſuch accuſations as were made, and laboured to diſſwade the ſeveral People of Latium. In the mean time alſo the Slaves at home contrived how to ſeize upon the Capitol, and burn the City, but were diſcovered, and nailed to croſſes. The following year wherein Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Manius Tullus Longus, were Conſuls, a Faction in Fidenæ, having ving received ſome men from Tarquinius, killed or expelled their adverſaries, and cauſed the Town to revolt from the Romans. The Senate would not make War upon the Latines in general, knowing many amongſt them were inclined to Peace, and thought it ſufficient to block up Fidenæ, for which they ſent out Manius with a ſtrong Army. The beſieged implored aſſiſtance of the Latines, who in their general meeting heard alſo the complaints of Tarquinius, and though they were much importuned by ſome amongſt them, yet they only ordered the Ambaſſadors to be ſent to demand the reception of the King, and the removal of the ſiege from Fidenæ, which was done alſo meerly to give time, giving the Romans a years time to conſider of the matter, and taking ſo large a ſpace for to make preparations, in caſe the overture were rejected. Tarquinius and Mamilius having little hopes to prevail this way, ſeeing that the minds of the generality were averſe from War, endeavoured to bring his right about in an eaſier way, by raiſing in Rome an unexpected and inteſtine difference betwixt the rich and poorer ſort.

Tarquinius his endeavours for the recovery of his Kingdom.

25. For at this very time, as Dionyſius writeth, a great part of the common People, eſpecially the indigent and ſuch as were burthened by uſury, did not like of the preſent ſtate of affairs, which diſſatisfaction was cauſed by the extravagant courſe of Creditors, who ſeizing upon the bodies of their Debtors, uſed them no better than Slaves purchaſed with money. Tarquinius not being ignorant hereof, ſent certain of his friends with Gold, who gave them ſome in hand, promiſing more after the King's reſtitution, and procured thereby a conſpiracy of many poor Citizens, with ſuch Slaves as had been offended with their Maſters the year before, for the ſeverity ſhown towards their fellows. The matter was diſcovered to Sulpicius, who after he had returned a denyal, though very civilly, to the Latin Ambaſſadors, by a wile drew the Conſpirators into the Forum; where incompaſſing them about, he put them all to the Sword. The ſtirs being thus allaied for a time, the Conſuls of this and the following year looked abroad, and, in the next, Fidenæ was yielded up to T. Largius Flavus. Hereat the Latins were exceedingly ſtartled, and now all railed on their principal men, for that no order had been taken for relief of the Town. Tarquinius and Mamilius ſo improved this opportunity, that all the Cities (twenty four in number, as they are reckoned by Dionyſius) decreed War againſt the Romans, ingaging that none ſhould forſake their aſſociates, nor make Peace without common conſent, ſealing it with an Oath, and direful curſes againſt ſuch as ſhould break the League, who were to be held as Enemies by all the reſt. They gave liberty to Tarquinius and his ſon in-law to levy what Forces they thought convenient, and that they might have ſome kind of pretence, ſent a meſſage to Rome, whence the Senate returned a ſtout and reſolute anſwer.

A. M. 3504.
Ol. 96. an. 4.
V. C, 253.
Darii 21.
Poſthumius
Cominius
Auruncus
T. Lartius.
Ruffus. Coſſ.

War with the Latines in his behalf.

26. Great were the preparations of the Latines; the Romans ſending round about, could make no friends, and yet were not dejected, but truſting to their domeſtick ſtrength alone, were thereby rendred much more reſolute and couragious, as ſuch upon whom lay a neceſſity of being valiant. But a great difficulty was found in liſting Soldiers; for the poor and thoſe that were ſurcharged with debt, of which there was a great number, being cited, would not appear, ſaying, they had nothing to do with the Patritians, except their debts were remitted by Decree of the Senate, nay ſome talked of leaving the City, and exhorted one another not to ſtay in that place, where no good thing was communicated to them. The Patritians by good words laboured to appeaſe them, but all in vain; ſo that the Senate fell into a ſerious debate about ſo weighty a matter. Some were for a free remiſſion of the debts, after the manner of the Athenian Siſachthea, as the only way to remove all prejudice, and beget a fair correſpondence betwixt Nobility and Commons. Others condemned this as too great a condeſcention, and which would encourage them to like Seditions for the time to come, thinking it the better way to liſt ſuch as would give their names, and not at all value the reſt, who though gratified at preſent, would hereafter be unſerviceable. Betwixt theſe extremes ſeveral other ways were propounded; but this at length prevailed, that nothing ſhould now be determined, but the War being happily finiſhed, the Conſuls ſhould report it again to the Senate, and in the mean time all ſutes and proceſs concerning debts were to ceaſe, that Magiſtrates might make effectual proviſions for the matter now mainly incumbent. This expedient, though ſomething it wrought, had not ſufficient ſtrength to end the difference; and therefore the Senate was put upon another exigent. Whereas by the Law of Valerius, power of life and death was taken away from the Conſuls, and all conſtrained, by an appeal to the People, ſo that no man could be forced to the War; It ſeemed neceſſary to create a Magiſtrate, who for ſix Moneths ſhould rule as abſolute above the Laws, and from whom ſhould lye no appeal. Thus having renounced Monarchy in effect, they had again recourſe to it, and ſhewed as well the neceſſity as excellency of it.

The Dictator.

27. This Supreme Officer was called Dictator, either for that he was dictus, or named, by the Conſul, according to (a) Varro, or rather from dictating, or ſhewing and commanding what was to be done, which Etymology (b) Dionyſius approveth. He was alſo called (c) Magiſter Populi, and (d) Prætor Maximus. Both name and thing came from the Albans, whoſe Dictator Metius Suffetius we have formerly mentioned. Spartianus ſaith, it was an ordinary Magiſtrate of old Latium. Dionyſius bringeth the Teſtimony of Licinius Macer for this opinion; yet he thinketh the Office firſt taken from the Greeks, who had their Æſymnetæ or extraordinary Kings made upon ſome urgent occaſion, with abſolute Power. The Dictator was created upon ſome urgent occaſion of War or Sedition, for fixing a Nale in time of a Plague, to hold the Comitia for electing of Conſuls, celebrate Games, make inquiſition, chooſing Senators, or in ſum, when there was need of a ſodain and extraordinary command. The manner of his creation was not, as of other Magiſtrates, by the Suffrages of the People; but, at the command of the Senate, the Conſul named ſome one of Conſular Dignity whom he pleaſed, in the Night, and who was approved by the Auſpicium, or divination from Birds, a Ceremony obſerved ever in the election of ſome Officers. The occaſion being many times ſodain, they could not ſtay for the Suffrages of the People, and the deſign being to reſtrain, or conſtrain, the Multitude, many times, he was not to be choſen out of their Body, although ſometimes theſe Rules were not fully obſerved, either through the abſence of the Conſul, or ſome other reſpect. L. Cornelius Sylla alone was named by the Interrex, as C. Cæſar by the Prætor; both which nominations Cicero in his Epiſtles conceiveth done contrary to right and order.

His Power.

The Authority of the Dictator was exceeding large. He had Power of Peace and War, to levie Forces, lead them forth, and disband them, and act all things according to his pleaſure, without referring them to the Senate. So that not only had he the Power of both Conſuls (whence the Greeks called him Diſypatos, or double Conſul) but more alſo, in that upon his Creation all other Magiſtrates, except the Tribunes, laid down their Offices, and the whole Government was left in his hands. He could puniſh as he pleaſed, without all appeal, and for the oſtentation of his Power, had twenty four bundles of Rods carried before him, with as many Axes, or Hatchets, as Plutarch and Polybius do teſtifie; although Livie diſſenting from them, will have Sylla firſt of all others to have had twenty four Bundles. Hence this Office came to be ſo terrible, as the Edict of the Dictator was ever obſerved as the command of a Deity.

(a) De Ling. Latin. l. 4. p. 56.
(b) Lib. 5.
(c) Varro quo prius. Cicero de Fin. l. 3. Feſtus in voc. Optima Lex.
(d) Lex Antiqua.

The bounds of his Office.

28. It was neceſſary, according to the Roman Government, that this extraordinary Power ſhould be bounded by certain Limits, wherein might lie redreſs of Inconveniencies thence ariſing. Six months were the time aſſigned for its duration, and never was it lengthned, except for meer neceſſity, as might be inſtanced in Camillus, L. Papirius, and Fabius Maximus: for the perpetual Dictatorſhips of Sylla and Cæſar were notorious Violations of the Laws. And not only the time but the place alſo was limited, it being unlawful for the Dictator to ſtir out of Italy, leſt being out of ſight, he ſhould take advantage at the diſtance of place, to attempt ſome new matter; and this conſtitution was never violated but once whilſt the old Commonwealth ſtood, by Attilius Collatinus. He was not to come on horſe-back, but march continually on foot, to ſhew, ſaith Plutarch, that the Roman ſtrength lay in the Legions, or rather to teach him Humility. Now becauſe in great Expeditions this could ſcarce be obſerved, he formally before his departure asked leave of the People that he might ride, as Livie informeth us.

Appeal from him.

But thoſe reſtrictions were inconſiderable, in reſpect of the Appeal which afterwards came to be made from him to the People. Feſtus in theſe words Optima Lex, ſaith, that firſt the power of the Magiſter Populi, or Dictator, was full or abſolute, as that of Marcus Valerius; but afterwards an Appeal lay from this Magiſtrate to the People. Livie ſeemeth alſo to hold out the ſame thing, where he bringeth M. Fabius in behalf of his Son thus ſpeaking to L. Papirius the Dictator: Seeing that neither the authority of the Senate, nor mine age, which thou goeſt about to bereave of my Son, neither the Virtue and Nobility of the Maſter of the Horſe-men named by thy ſelf, prevaileth with thee; nor yet Prayers and Intreaties, ties, which are wont to appeaſe an enemy, and the anger of the Gods: I appeal to the Tribunes of the People, and the People it ſelf which I make our Judge, (ſeeing thou regardeſt not the Judgment of the Army and Senate) which alone can do more than thy Dictatorſhip. I ſhall ſee whether thou wilt give place to that Appeal to which the Roman King Tullus Hoſtilius yielded. Hereupon the People aſſembled, and the Tribunes were preſent at the meeting. Papirius denieth neither the Power of the one nor the other, but continueth reſolute for the puniſhment of the Maſter of the Horſe-men, who had fought in his abſence contrary to his Command, ſhewing how all diſcipline elſe would be deſtroyed. A way was found out to preſerve the Honour of both Offices, the power of People, Tribunes and Dictator, with the ſtrength of Diſcipline. For the People betook it ſelf to intreaties, and was ſeconded by the Tribunes. Whereupon the Dictator pardoned the party, granting his Life to the requeſt of thoſe, who, as he confeſſeth, might have commanded it.

Lib. 8.

29. At what time this Appeal was brought in, or how long it continued in Force, ſeeing that Sylla and other Dictators made uſe of the old and abſolute Power, is uncertain. It is probable, that the People being overwitted in ratifying the Decree of the Senate (as Dionyſius telleth us they were) grew ſenſible, how they had thereby given the Power again out of their Hands; it being lawful for the Senate at any time when they ſhould pretend a neceſſity, and that for the bridling of the People it ſelf, to give order to the Conſul to name a Dictator, and therefore reſumed its antient Power of Appeal, without which no lawleſs Freedom could be enjoyed. But in the declining condition of the Commonwealth, when Dictators grew more imperious, their Soldiers more diſſolute, and the Tribunes of the People eſpecially more Factious, and opportunity might be wanting for it to exert that right which as yet it had not given up to any other. If what Dionyſius writeth of the Dictators being approved by the People after the Conſuls nomination be true, the State ſtood in leſs need of the Appeal; but it being not poſſible for a Multitude never to miſtake in its Opinion of a Perſon, this defect might at length be experimentally diſcovered, and thence a recourſe had to that remedy which was ever certain whilſt it could be applied. By theſe cautions and reſtrictions, with the modeſty of the Romans, this Grand Office was for four hundred years managed for the publick good, as it was accounted, till Sylla, and afterward Cæſar, converted it into a Tyranny, as the multitude counted it, and rendred the very name thereof ſo odious, that after Cæſar's death, in the ſeven hundred and tenth year of the City, when M. Antonius, and P. Cornelius Dolabella were Conſuls, a Law was made (from the former Conſul called Lex Antonia) whereby it was for ever baniſhed. The Dictator when he was created made choice of one who had either been Conſul or Prætor, to be Magiſter Equitum, who, ſaith Varro, had chief Power over the Horſ-men, and Adcenſi ( Criers, Beadles, or publick Meſſengers*) as the Dictator had over the* Roman People, whence he alſo was called Magiſter Populi. The reſt, becauſe they were of leſs value than theſe Magiſtri, were named Magiſtratus, as from albus Albatus. If the Dictator was abſent, the Maſter of the Horſe-men executed his place in the Army, but if he was preſent, he commanded the Horſe, yet ſo as to be obedient to the Dictators Orders, and not to Fight, either contrary to, or without his Command. In the ſecond Punick War, M. Fabius Buteo was made Dictator for filling up the Senate, without a Maſter of Horſe-men. But he alleged, that he could not approve of two Dictators to be at the ſame time, nor a Dictator without a Maſter of horſ-men, and having perfected his work on the ſame day laid down his Office.

The Magiſter Equitum.

De Ling. Latin. lib. 4. p. 22.

30. Concerning the time of the firſt Dictatorſhip, Authors differ in the ſpace of two years, and do not fully agree about the Perſon. Dionyſius, a grave, faithful, and wary Author (by conſent of the moſt learned ſort of men) referreth it to the two hundred and fifty fifth year of the City; but Livy, and moſt Latine Authors aſſign it to the two hundred and fifty third. Dionyſius ſaith expreſly, that T. Largius Flavus was the firſt Dictator, being Conſul that year. Livy ſaith it could not be certainly known from antient Authors who was the firſt, yet confeſſeth that the moſt antient mentioned Largius, and upon good Grounds approveth of their opinion rather than that which maketh M. Valerius the Son of Marcus yet living, and Grand-ſon to Voleſus the firſt of all, which Feſtus ſeemeth to follow. Livy mentioneth no other cauſe of the Original than a falling out with the Sabines, and the conſpiracy of the thirty Latine Cities, putting off the Sedition till after the finiſhing of the Latine War; but as there can little hold be taken of one who uncertainly relateth matters; ſo no need would there have been of an abſolute Authority for the Latine War, if no ſtir had been made in the City, all giving their names with alacrity, and obeying the Conſuls, as in former Wars. And if the Conſuls had been ſuſpected to ſavour the cauſe of Tarquinius (as ſome wrote they were) then new ones might have been made in their rooms, nothing being prevalent to alter the ordinary form of Government, but a neceſſity of abſolute Power for a time; and no ordinary accident about War could make this neceſſity; ſo that compulſion muſt have been the end, and the taking away that help from the multitude, which was unalterably given to it againſt the Conſuls by the Valerian Law. Thus might the Nobility, if they had had that duty, have ſeen cauſe to repent in time of their Kings baniſhment.

The time of the firſt Dictatorſhip.

The Perſon.

T. Largius the firſt Dictator.

31. T. Largius, the firſt Dictator, having named Sp. Caſſius for his Maſter of horſ-men (who had born the Office of Conſul in the ſeventieth Olympiad) cauſed Axes to be carried before him with the Rods, as had been wont, till the time of Poplicola, before the chief Magiſtrates, both Kings and Conſuls. Having with theſe and other Enſigns of power terrified the Seditious, he began the Cenſus after the Pattern of Ser. Tullius, according to the Tribes, taking the names and ages of ſuch as were Ceſſed, and of Children. In a ſhort ſpace, fear of loſing freedom of the City, and Eſtates, ſo prevailed, as one hundred and fifty thouſand and ſeven hundred of ſuch as were ripe of age gave their names, which he diſtributed into four parts, whereof taking one to himſelf, he gave the reſt to his Maſter of horſ-men, and two others, one being to continue in the City for the defence thereof. This done, he ſent ſome who underhand dealt with the ſeveral Latine Cities, and procured them to ſuſpend the War, and make a Truce for a year, notwithſtanding all that Mamilius and Sextus Tarquinius could do to the contrary. Then returned he home with the Army, and e're his ſix months were out, the Conſuls being appointed, laid down, no Citizens being killed, baniſhed or otherwiſe chaſtized by any grievous puniſhment; which carriage was imitated by his Succeſſors, until the third age from that wherein we live, ſaith Dionyſius. But in the time of our Fathers four hundred years from the Dictatorſhip of Largius, L. Cornelius Sylla firſt of all others behaved himſelf cruelly in this Office, ſo that the Romans conceived then what before they had cauſe to be ignorant of, that the Dictatorſhip was a Tyrannis.

Dionyſ. lib. 6.

32. When the Truce betwixt the Latines and Romans was ended, both parties prepared for the War: The former were againſt their wills, 'tis ſaid, drawn in by the intereſt of Mamilius; but the later with all cheerfulneſs imbraced the opportunity. The Romans thought fit a Dictator ſhould be Created, and accordingly Virginius the Senior Conſul named A. Poſthumius his Collegue, who choſe for Maſter of horſ-men T. Ebutius Helva, and haſting his Levies, divided his Forces into four parts, whereof one he kept to himſelf, aſſigned the ſecond to Virginius, the third to Ebutius, and the fourth to Sempronius, who therewith was to defend the City. News being come that the Latines had taken the Field, the Dictator with ſpeed marched to the Lake Regillus (at this day called Il Lago di Santa Severa) in the Country of Tuſculum, where he fortified his Camp againſt the Enemy, who as yet had not united his Forces, and expected Aſſiſtance from the Volſci. The Roman Army divided into three parts incompaſſed the Latines, who endeavoured to beat off Ebutius from an Hill he had ſeized on betwixt them and home; but he kept his Ground in deſpight of them, and fortified himſelf. The Latines hereupon being hindred from all Proviſions, reſolved to fight; the Dictator at firſt was minded to end the War without Blood, by famiſhing his Enemies, but underſtanding that the Volſci were expected within three days, changed his reſolution. The right Wing of the Latines was led by Mamilius, the left by Sextus Tarquinius, and the middle Battel by Titus Tarquinius his other Son. On the other ſide againſt Mamilius ſtood Virginius, Ebutius was oppoſite in the right Wing to Sextus Tarquinius, and the Dictator led the middle Battel againſt Titus, and the Roman Exiles. The Romans brought into the Field twenty four thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, but the Latines fourty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. When they joyned, both parties miſſed of their expectation; for the one truſting to their numbers, and the other to their Valour, thought to bear all down before them. The Dictator gave the firſt opportunity of Victory by over powring Titus, after which, though Mamilius and Sextus omitted nothing requiſite to valiant and able Captains, yet both loſing their Lives, their followers were diſcouraged and overthrown; ſcarce ten thouſand eſcaping home of the whole number. Of the Romans fell M. Valerius, whoſe dead body his two Nephews by his brother Poplicola, Publius and Marcus, endeavouring to get off, were alſo ſlain in the attempt.

The Latines overthrown at the Lake Regillus.

33. After the Fight, the Volſci, whom the Latines had expected, arrived at the Camp, which ſeeing full of dead bodies, and learning the iſſue of the battel, ſome of them were for falling on the Romans now weary, but another party prevailed to ſend Meſſengers to the Dictator, to tell him they came to his aſſiſtance, thereby to ingratiate themſelves with the Conquerours. But the Dictator convinced them of falſhood by their Letters which he had intercepted, and giving leave to the Meſſengers to return, whom the multitude would have pulled in pieces, reſolved on the morrow to fall on them; but in the night they deſerted their Camp and fled. From the place of this action the Dictator obtained the ſirname of Rhegillenſis.

34. The Latines ſent to deprecate the anger of the Roman State, laying all the blame upon their Nobility. The Ambaſſadors managed their work with ſuch earneſtneſs and humility (caſting themſelves at the Feet of the Senate, and making great lamentations) that the motion of Largius prevailed in their behalf for the former League to be renewed. This was the end of the War which in behalf of the Tarquins had been carried on for fourteen years: Tarquinius himſelf being only left behind of all his ſtock, now almoſt ninty years old, for that the Latines, Hetruſcans, and Sabines, refuſed to harbour him, as alſo all other neighbouring Cities which were free, went into Campania to Ariſtodemus the Prince of Cumæ, with whom he ſhortly after died. Of the man we may judge charitably, becauſe his ſtory was only related to poſterity by his bitter Enemies. However, his baniſhment our Religion muſt cenſure as Rebellion. And ſuch were the ſtirs, ſeditions and tumults afterwards, and ſo many changes and rechanges, as if the Reader ſeriouſly conſider them he will ſee that the Romans ſuffered much for want of Monarchy, and the contrary Government did not contribute to their happineſs. That this may appear, he hath here a fuller view of their changes than in any other modern Writer.

Great ſtirs in the City.

35. The Romans now freed from this War, fell into a grievous ſedition in the City, the Courts of Juſtice being again opened by the Senate, and the proceſs againſt debtors revived. The Plebeians alleged they were not able to pay their debts, by reaſon of their loſſes ſuſtained in the late Wars through want of tillage, and plundring of their Cattel by the Enemy. Their Creditors replied, that theſe loſſes had alſo befallen them, which made the remiſſion of the debts impoſſible; and ſo neither ſort would yield at all, but many tumults were raiſed, wherein the parties did not abſtain from blows. Poſthumius the Dictator perceiving ſome expedition to be neceſſary for the quiet of the City, created Conſuls for the following year, and laid down his Office. The Conſuls were Appius Claudius the Sabine, and P. Servilius Priſcus, who being of the Dictators mind as to the War, reſolved to go out againſt the Volſci, who had aſſiſted the Latines againſt the State, and now were making preparations for War; when they came to make Levies none of the Plebeians would give their names, complaining that they having already undergone the heat, and danger of the War, both for liberty and dominion, they were by their fellow Citizens at home kept in bondage (it being the cuſtom then for Creditors to make uſe of them as Slaves bound in fetters) and many times cruelly beaten, till they could pay their debts. They cried out, that the ſecurity of the common ſort was more provided for in War, and amongſt their Enemies, than in Peace, and with their friends. The diſagreement of the Conſuls amongſt themſelves added to the preſent diſtemper; Servilius being willing to comply ſomething with the deſire of the poor, but Appius inveighing againſt them with great bitterneſs, and earneſtly urging force and rigour to be the moſt ſuitable means for appeaſing theſe tumults. The Senate was forced to betake it ſelf to the popularity of Servius, who with fair words drew the people out againſt the Sabines, and when he had by this good ſervice deſerved a Triumph, the honour was denied him through the ſuggeſtions of his Collegue to the Fathers, for that by bearing with the multitude he impaired the Dignity of their Order.

Diverted by War.

36. After the finiſhing of the War the common ſort thought again of their own concernments, and expecting performance of what Servilius had promiſed, Appius exacted the payment of debts as rigorouſly as ever: This doubled the people's rage, and made them carry on all things by force, ſo that they reſcued their Companions out of the hands of Sargeants, and holding ſecret councils by night, denied to the ſucceeding Conſuls to take up Arms, till they could have a relaxation of their burthens. This putting the Senate to a ſtand, Appius ſtill urged that nothing was to be granted to the rabble, and procured a Dictator to be created. When moſt looked upon him as fitteſt for the time, the Conſuls judged quite otherwiſe, and made choice of M. Valerius the Brother of Publius, and ſon of Voleſus, a popular man, being perſwaded that the terror of the Office alone would do the work, and that a man of mild temper would beſt manage it. The Dictator told the People, in caſe they would freely follow him, not only what they juſtly required concerning their debts, but other rewards alſo, and by this means liſted ten Legions againſt the Volſci, Æqui and Sabines, who were all up in Arms, which being brought under, he divided amongſt his Soldiers ſome grounds taken from the Volſci, but requeſting of the Senate, that his and their promiſe might be made good, was checked for his love to the multitude, and becauſe he was an old man above ſeventy, being unfit as he ſaid to contend, he laid down his Office. The People hereat much inraged, kept private meetings, and conſulted how to ſeperate themſelves from the Patritians, which when the Senate perceived, they gave order to the Conſuls not to diſband the Armies, pretending that the Sabines and Æqui had conſpired againſt Rome. The Soldiers being bound by the Oath taken at their liſting (called by them Sacramentum, and ever ſtrongly obſerved) could not forſake their Standards, but the Conſuls having their Camps near to each other, they all went into one by the advice of one Sicinius Bellulus, and taking away the Enſigns from the Conſuls, departed to the Mount called afterwards Mons Sacer, lying three miles from the City beyond the River Aniene, now called Taverone.

The firſt ſeparation of the Commons.

37. Notice hereof being brought into the City, filled all places with marvelous tumults. The Patritians were in great fear leſt War ſhould be made upon them; the Plebeians grew exceeding high, and many flocked to the Army, though the other hindred it as much as poſſible. The Fathers had alſo great ſtrife amongſt themſelves, while ſome pleaded for the multitude, and others would hear of nothing but carrying the matter through by ſtrong hand. But the former ſort prevailed to ſend a meſſage to the Armies, deſiring them to return home; promiſing that for the future all things ſhould be forgot, and the Senate would be ready to reward their faithfulneſs and ſerviceableneſs to their Country; withall, the Ambaſſadors had it in charge to know the utmoſt of their deſires. To the meſſage nothing would be returned but diſdainful words, and high complaints, ſomething mixed with threatning language, which more grievouſly afflicted the Fathers, not knowing what way to procure a reconcilement; and now would not ſuch as they had by their authority and intereſt hitherto retained in the City, be with-holden from going to the Army. The time for creation of new Conſuls was now at hand. The old ones appointing the Comitia, no Candidates (ſo called becauſe they appeared in white garments) would ſtand for the Office, nor any accept of it, till at length the Conſuls appointed by their ſole authority Poſthumius Cominius, and Sp. Caſſius, who had born it before, and were equally in favour with the Nobility and Commons. They having entred on the Calends of September (ſooner than uſual) in the ſeventy ſecond Olympiad (wherein Teſicrates of Crotone was Victor, and Diognetes Archon) firſt of all conſulted the Senate about the return of the Commons. Agrippa Menenius a man of great wiſdom and temper, being firſt asked his opinion, by all means poſſible exhorted the Fathers to a compoſure. He ſhewed what neceſſity there was of it in regard of the Roman Dominion, which could not be either preſerved or increaſed without the inferiour ſort of People, and made it clear, that they could not expect to have any of better temper than the preſent were, for as much as all, whoſoever they were, who by their labour and blood obtained power and Soveraignty of the City, would expect to be ſharers in its advantages. He preſſed the danger they were now in from their Enemies round about, and having uſed other motives, concluded with his advice, that they would ſend meſſengers with full power to treat and conclude what they ſhould find convenient, without any more conſulting the Senate.

38. After Menenius ſpake M. Valerius, and upbraided the Senate for not giving him credit when he foretold theſe diſtempers. He adviſed them to cure the Wound while it might be healed, ſhewed what reaſon the Commons had to be concerned more of late, becauſe of the Dictatorſhip, which took from them their former Appeal, as alſo for that the Senate had denied the honour of Triumph to Servilius when they deſired it for him, becauſe he was ſuſpected to favour them, and for that neither he, the Conſul, nor he himſelf the Dictator, could at all profit them in what had been promiſed. He enveighed againſt the avarice and cruelty of Creditors, and particularly fell foul upon Appius for his rigour, and raiſing a Faction, which if others were not wiſe to prevent, would utterly deſtroy the Commonwealth. Laſtly,he commended the advice of Menenius, and deſired it might ſpeedily be executed, ſo as whatever the Commons required might be granted. Appius a man of an high Spirit, moſt ſtudious of the Patritian Dignity, and alſo of a ſober and venerable carriage, being asked his opinion next, in excuſe of himſelf recriminated Valerius. With great animoſity he noted the ambition and ſenſeleſneſs of the multitude, admiring that any of the Fathers ſhould be ſo abſurd, as having denied remiſſion of debts to them when friends, would grant it to them now Enemies, who would not * reſt here, but require alſo a communication of honours, and what not? ſo that at length the power would come into the hands of the rabble, and the Commonwealth degenerate into a Democracy. He leſſened, or rather endeavoured to remove, the danger which threatned either from the Armies revolt, or the hoſtility of old Enemies. He endeavoured to perſwade them, that they were able enough to reduce them by force, having their Wives and Children in the City; and alleging for further confirmation of this, that the multitude were without any perſons of good conduct, whereas the Patritian order abounded with experienced Commanders, concluded with this advice, neither to ſend any meſſage to them, nor remit them their debts, nor do any other thing which might ſhew the leaſt fear or trouble: If they would lay down their Arms and returning into the City, ſubmit to the Senate, then moderately to determine concerning them; ſeeing that all fools eſpecially the Vulgar, are inſolent againſt ſuch as condeſcend, but cowardly towards thoſe that reſolutely demean themſelves.

The Prophecy of Appius concerning the lawleſs rabble.

*Note.

39. The wiſe ſpeech of Appius ſo inflamed thoſe of his party, eſpecially the younger ſort, that nothing could be determined for the heat of contention. This put the Conſuls upon diſmiſſing the Senate for that time, admoniſhing the younger ſort to carry themſelves more reſpectfully and modeſtly for the time to come, or elſe they would neither uſe them as Adviſers nor Judges, but prefer a Law for limiting a certain age for Senators. The graver men they exhorted alſo to concord, letting them know they had a way to end the controverſie, by referring the matter to the deciſion of the People, which had right to judge of it, as a caſe about Peace and War. At the next meeting the antient men were of the ſame opinion as formerly, but the younger modeſtly referred themſelves to whatſoever they ſhould determine, ſo that the major part by far, being wearied with the cries and ſollicitations of thoſe who had relations in the Army, rather than any reaſon, notwithſtanding Appius ſtuck cloſe to his former reſolution, reſolved to follow the advice of Menenius, who with nine others were commiſſionated with full power, both by Senate and People, to compoſe the difference. At firſt the offers of the Commiſſioners could not be heard through the inſtigation of two cunning and turbulent fellows, Sicinius, and L. Junius, who conceited of his abilities, affected the name of Brutus alſo. Menenius, to give full ſatisfaction, promiſed that ſuch as were unable to pay their debts, ſhould be diſcharged both from obligation and impriſonment, and for the time to come matters of this nature ſhould be ordered by the joynt conſent both of People and Senate. Then adding the Fable of the ſeveral numbers falling out with the belly, as conſuming all which they provided, and thence the ruine and decay of the whole body, he ſo improved it to the preſent occaſion, likening the Senate to the belly (which digeſteth and diſtributeth ſuſtenance to all the reſt,though they provide it) that the whole multitude convinced of the neceſſity of Union, cried out, He ſhould lead them home without delay.

40. Little wanted of their departure without any other ſecurity than the bare word of the Commiſſioners. But Junius Brutus a Plebeian formerly mentioned with-held them, ſaying, that they were gratefully to acknowledge the kind offers of the Senate; but whereas ſome men of tyrannical ſpirits might reſerve their anger to a convenient opportunity, the Commons wanted ſuch good ſecurity for the time to come, as might defend them from the unreaſonable malice of great ones, and he moved, that they might have certain Officers created yearly out their own body, whoſe power ſhould only be to give relief to ſuch Plebeians as were injured, and ſuffer none to be defrauded of their right: and therefore not to reſiſt the Conſuls, as ſome thought. This being received by the multitude with great approbation, was inſiſted on to Menenius, and his fellows, who thought not fit to admit of a matter of ſuch large conſequence, without leave from the Senate, and demanded time to know the pleaſure thereof. The Conſuls reporting the matter, Valerius thought this favour was to be granted to the Commons, and, though Appius oppoſed it earneſtly, crying out, calling their gods to witneſs, and truly foretelling what calamities they would bring upon the Commonwealth, yet the major part inclining to Peace, it was carried for them, and the Commiſſioners were ſent back with the reſolution of the houſe. The Commons by the advice of Menenius, firſt ſent to take from the Senate a religious confirmation of this privilege, and afterwards in the Aſſembly of the Curiæ elected L. Junius Brutus, and C. Sicinius Bellutus, to whom they afterwards joyned C. and P. Licinius, and Sp. Icilius Ruga. Theſe five firſt entred this new Office on the fourth of the Ides of December according to the Hiſtory and computation of Dionyſius, ſixteen years after the expulſion of Tarquin.

A Compoſure by bringing in the Tribunes.

A. M. 3511.
Ol. 71. an. 3.
V. C. 260.
Darii 28.
A. Virginio Montano, T. Veturio Gemino. Coſſ.

41. Theſe Officers were called Tribuni Plebis, there having been from the beginning other Tribunes in the City named Tribuni Celerum, ſo called from the Peoples being divided into three parts at that time, from which ſo many were ſent into the Army, as (a) Varro and (b) Pomponius derive the word; or becauſe they were elected by the Tribes, or overſaw them, as others. Varro ſeemeth to hold that the Tribuni Plebis were called Tribunos, becauſe they were firſt made of the Tribunes or Colonels of the Soldiers. Livy nameth C. Licinius, and L. Albinus, for the firſt two, to whom were ſhortly after added three more, viz. Sicinius, the Author of the departure, and two others, concerning which, ſaith he, Authors differ. In the two hundred ninty ſeventh year of the City five more were added, and this number of ten ſo continued. As theſe Officers were elected by the Commons, ſo ever out of their body, except where we read in Livy (in his third Book) of two Patritians; Nay moſt commonly of the lower ſort, till a Law ordained that they ſhould be created out of the Senate; that is, out of ſuch Plebeians as were admitted into the Senate. What time this Law was preferred, cannot certainly be diſcovered. (c) Appian ſaith, it is not certain whether Sylla did it. It ſhould appear from (d) Gellius, that there paſſed a Plebiſcitum or Decree of the People, for this purpoſe, called Plebiſcitum Atinium; but what Atinius this ſhould be is alſo obſcure, there being one P. Atinius Tribune of the Commons when Julius Cæſar and Bibulus were Conſuls. as concerning their power (e) Cicero ſaith, they were oppoſed againſt the Conſuls: but this is not true, the occaſion of their making not riſing from the Conſuls. At the beginning their power was only to relieve the oppreſſed, as a ſhield to keep off evil, and not as a weapon to inflict it. They nulled the unjuſt (as they accounted them) Decrees, and Commands of the Senate and Magiſtrates; and to ſhew their readineſs to protect the meaneſt, (f) their doors ſtood open night and day to their complaints. (g) Gellius telleth us, that they could not be abſent from the City one day; not an hour ſaith (h) Dion; and (i) Appian going further, confineth them within the Walls. They interpoſed by this one word Veto ſolemnly pronounced. They procured themſelves afterward to be accounted Sacroſancti, ſo as by a Law confirmed with an Oath, none might compel a Tribune to do any thing, as one of the vulgar, neither ſtrike, nor command him to be beaten; neither kill, nor command him to be killed. If any did contrary, he was to be held as Sacer, and his goods being Confiſcated unto Ceres, it ſhould be lawful for any to kill him. And leſt afterwards the People ſhould abrogate this Law, they made all the Citizens take the moſt ſolemn Oath that could be deviſed, both for themſelves and poſterity, to preſerve it for ever inviolable, as (k) Dionyſius writeth, who hath alſo exemplified the Law it ſelf. To this (l) Cicero addeth, that they were not only by ſacred Laws fortified againſt Force and Arms, but againſt words alſo, and interruption of ſpeech.

Their number.

Power.

Privilege.

(a) Ling. Lat. l. 4. p. 22.
(b) Di Orig. Juris par. 20.
(c) Bel. civil: lib. 1.
(d) Lib. 14. c. 8.
(e) De Legib: lib. 3.
(f) Plutarch probl. 81.
(g) Lib. 3. c. 2.
(h) Lib. 37.
(i) De bell. Civil. l. 2.
(k) Lib. 6.
(l) Pro Sext.

42. But as their power of Interpoſing was moſt powerful againſt Conſuls and Senate, ſo alſo againſt themſelves; the diſſent of one man being ſufficient to hinder whatever all his Collegues deſigned. This appeareth to have been the only conſtant effectual means for moderation of that power which afterwards they aſſumed, when the Patritians could prevail with one of the College to interpoſe. By that awe which their Sacroſanct Magiſtracy ſtruck into all men improved through through their prompt boldneſs (very common in men of meaneſt condition) they took advantage to inlarge their bounds. Valerius Maximus writeth, that at firſt it was not lawful for them to enter into the Senate, but they had Seats placed before the Door, where examining the Decrees of the Fathers, ſuch of them as they ſuffered to paſs they ſigned with the Letter T. But nothing in Dionyſius is more common than their ſpeaking in the Senate, and their contentions with the Members thereof in that very place at the very time, and that in the Infancy of their Office. However theſe fellows at firſt preſumed not to Tyranniſe and diſturb all, as afterwards they did, they preſumed not at firſt to aſſemble the Senate, which afterward they did in the two hundred and ſeventy ſeventh year of the City, and in proceſs of time to diſmiſs it alſo, when called by another. Within a ſmall time they aſſembled the People, preferred Laws, executed their ſawcy Decrees againſt the Magiſtrates themſelves, commanding the Conſuls to be carried to Priſon, (eſpecially after the enacting of the Hortenſian Law, whereby the Plebiſcita obliged the whole Roman people) for that they were the chief Officers of the Commons.

The ballance to their power.

Lib. 2. cap. 2. Exemp. 7.

The extravagancy of their power.

43. Great were the Seditions and Tumults, which turbulent Spirits backed with ſuch liberty, ſtirred up; ſo as notwithſtanding their firſt end was to preſerve right, Lucan rightly termeth them Turbantes jura. Sylla was the firſt that bridled their extravagancy, by depriving them of liberty to prefer Laws, to make Orations, and obtain any Office of Magiſtracy; but after his death Aurelius Cotta by a new Law reſtored the latter privilege to them, and all the reſt they recovered when Pompey and M. Craſſus were Conſuls. Their Power thus recovered they kept till the Emperors ſwallowed it up themſelves, and left them little more than a name, which continued till the time of Conſtantine. As for the Enſigns of their Office, they wore not the Prætexta, had no Lictors or Sargeants, neither uſed they a Curule Chair; only a ſort of Beadle, called Viator, went before them. For want of theſe Ceremonies, as becauſe they entred not at the beginning of the year, and laid not down their Office upon the Creation of a Dictator, which others did, Plutarch writeth that ſome held them to be no Magiſtrates, but rather a curb and reſtraint to ſuch. Laſtly, beſides theſe Tribunes, and the Tribuni Celerum formerly mentioned, there were afterwards many other ſorts, as Tribuni Militum, and Tribuni Ærarii, during the Commonwealth: under the Emperours are found Tribunus Voluptatum, Tribunus Matrimoniorum, Tribunus Chartariorum, Tribunus Provinciarum, Tribunus Fori, and Tribunus Scholarum, concerning which Caſſiodorus in his Epiſtles, and Lipſius in his Commentary of the Magiſtrates of old Rome are to be conſulted.

Several other ſorts of Tribunes.

44. The Commons having got from the Senate a confirmation of the Office of Tribunes, obtained further, that they might yearly chuſe out of their own body two, to be as Miniſters to theſe Officers; to judge certain cauſes referred to them from the Tribunes, take care of publick buildings and proviſions. Theſe were firſt called the Miniſters and Aſſiſtants of the Tribunes; but afterward ſaith Dionyſius from one of their Duties had the name of Ædiles. Many things of great conſequence were committed to their truſt, being very much like to the Agoranomi amongſt the Greeks. Feſtus acknowledging that in the beginning Ædilis was a Magiſtrate who took care both of publick and private buildings, yet ſaith he was ſo called, quòd facilis ad eum plebis aditus eſſet. Truer is the derivation which Varro giveth, agreeable to that of Dionyſius; that they were named Ædiles, from Ædes the buildings, of which they took care, or thoſe particularly, wherein the Plebiſcita were kept, of which they had the over-ſight. This later Etymology is rendred by Pomponius, who in his ſecond Book of the Original of Law, deſcribing the ſeveral Offices of Magiſtracy, maketh the end of the conſtitution of the Ædiles to have been, that they might take care of that Houſe where the Decrees of the People were laid up. Whence ſoever the word was derived it came out of Latium, being a name of certain Magiſtrates in the Latine Towns, as was alſo Dictator and Duumvir, as ſome obſerve out of Spartianus. To theſe Ædiles Plebis, who were inſtituted in the two hundred and ſeventy firſt year of the City, at the ſame time with the Tribunes, were added two more out of the Patritian order one hundred and ſeventeen years after, called for diſtinction Ædiles Curules, becauſe they uſed the Curule Chair, whereas the other only ſate on Benches, as the Tribunes and Quæſtors. The occaſion of creating thoſe ſhall be ſhewn in its place, the end was only then for celebrating of Games.

The Ædiles created.

45. This number continued till the time of C. Julius Cæſar, who in the ſeven hundred and tenth year of the City added two more, whom he would have created alſo out of the Patritians. They were called (a) Cereales from Ceres, being appointed to take care of, and make Proviſion for Corn. This number of ſix thus diſtinguiſhed, continued till the time of Conſtantine, as is probably conjectured, and were as moſt other Offices of Magiſtracy taken away by him. The Ædiles, ſaith (b) Cicero, are the Curators of the City, of Proviſions, and of ſolemn Games. Of the City, becauſe they looked to publick works and Temples; made proviſion againſt Fires (which Auguſtus ſeemeth to have charged upon them ſaith Lipſius) had inſpection over Funerals, and ſuch like Rites of ſmaller moment; over Marriages and Adulteries, Baths, Aqueducts, Sinks, and Streets, both for repairing and cleanſing of them. Of Proviſions, for that they had the over-ſight of all things to be ſold, men, and other Creatures, determining, judging, and cenſuring by their words and Edicts. Of ſolemn Games, and only ſolemn (not votive and private ones) as the Ludi Florales, Circenſes, Megalenſes, Romani, &c. Sometimes at their own charge they made theſe ſhews, and ever examined the Fables written before they were acted. And (whether from this inſpection of Play-books it came or no is uncertain) they ſeem to have been Licenſers and Judges of other Writings, being ordered by a Decree of the Senate, as (c) Tacitus telleth us, to burn the Papers of Cremutius Cordus. It is further (d) obſerved, that the Generals when they returned home after ſome Victory, delivered up the Corn and Proviſions which had been made prize to them, as the Captives to the Prætor, and the Money to the Quæſtor. All ſuch Victuallers as offended againſt the Laws, as alſo Monopolizers and others that tranſgreſſed in this kind, they accuſed to the People, and with the Fines celebrated Games, made Preſents to their Gods, or ſome publick works. Laſtly, 'tis obſerved, that they took care that none but Roman Gods, and thoſe after the Roman manner only, ſhould be worſhipped.

Their Office.

(a) Diod. lib. 43.

(b) 3. de Legibus.

(c) Annal. lib. 4.

(d) Janus Gulielmus.

46. But, to return to the Story, the rabble having obtained theſe Officers, willingly gave their names to the Expedition againſt the Volſci, under conduct of Poſthumius Cominius the Conſul. He took Longula and Poluſtia with no great difficulty, and preſently laid Siege to Corioli a ſtrongly fortified Town, and the head of the Nation. The Antiates coming to the relief of this place, he left part of the Army to continue the Siege under the Command of Titus Largius, and with the other went to give them battel. Largius attempting to ſtorm the Town, the Inhabitants ſallied out, and charged the Romans ſo furiouſly, that they forced them back into their Camp: all but a few whom C. Marcius, a Patritian of great Nobility, and greater Valour, kept about him. This Marcius with ſo ſmall a Company received the violence of the Enemy, and doing great execution, forced him at length into the Town, and following himſelf ruſhed in with him, whereat the beſieged were ſo afrighted, that not conſidering their own numbers, they fled to the contrary part of the City, and ſuffered him to let in the reſt of the Army. When the Soldiers now fell to plunder, he ſuffered them not, but haſted to the Battel to help the Conſul, and with the good news of his ſucceſs to chear the Army.

War with the Volſci.

Dionyſ. lib. 6.
Plutarch. in Coriolano.

Marcius.

47. He deſired of Cominius that he might be ſuffered with his men to fight againſt the middle Battel, wherein the chief ſtrength of the Enemies lay, which obtaining, he ſhewed there more valour than formerly, and was the greateſt cauſe of the Victory. The day following the Conſul gave him extraordinary commendations, and a good ſhare of Booty before it came to be divided amongſt the Soldiers; but he would accept of nothing except an Horſe, which gained him greater Honour from the whole Army, and moved Poſthumius to beſtow the ſirname of Coriolanus upon him for his incomparable valour ſhewn at that place. The Volſci were by this overthrow forced to ſubmiſſion, and made their Peace. This year was the League of Amity and Confederacy renewed with the Latines with all chearfulneſs, becauſe they had been faithful in the late Sedition and War, and had ſent to congratulate for the Peace made betwixt Nobility and Commons. The Senate for this Civil Union decreed ſupplications or thanks to their Gods, a third feria or Holy day, to be added to the other two Latine Feriæ, whereof Tarquinius had dedicated one, when he conquered Hetruria, and the People the other after the baniſhment of Tarquinius. In this Conſulſhip died alſo Agrippa Menenius, whom the People out of gratitude reſolved to bury at the publick charge, every man contributing ſomething, becauſe he died poor, and when the Senate would needs defray the charge out of the Treaſury, they beſtowed the money upon his Children. Now alſo the Cenſus being celebrated above one hundred and ten thouſand heads were Ceſſed.

Sirnamed Coriolanus.

A. M. 3512.
Ol. 71. ann. 4.
V. C. 261.
Darii 29.
Sp. Caſſio 2.
Poſthumo Cominio Coſſ.

48. The

A dearth, 48. The year following wherin T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minucius were Conſuls, a great dearth fell upon the City, the effect of the late Sedition. For, the Commons having departed a little after the Autumnal Æquinoctial, about the time of ſowing, the Country was forſaken of Husbandmen; Dionyſ. l. 7. the richer ſort betaking themſelves to the Patritians, and the poorer to the Army, and the diviſion continued till a little before Mid-winter. All the middle ſpace of time there was no tillage, though it was moſt proper for ſowing, and for ſome time after the agreement, it could ſcarce be renewed, for that Slaves had run away, and there was great ſcarcity of Cattels by theſe means, for the year following they were little beforehand in Corn, either for ſeed or proviſions. This put the Senate upon ſending into ſeveral parts of Italy, and alſo into Sicily, to buy Corn. But notwithſtanding their care, the multitude being exceedingly pinched with Famine, raiſed tumults, getting together by companies, and Which cauſeth a Sedition, laying all the fault upon the Fathers, as if by their wilful neglect they had in this way revenged themſelves. The Volſci being acquainted with this new Sedition, and the weak Eſtate of Rome, conſpired how to improve the advantage; but were diverted by a grievous plague, which ſo raged, as Velitræ a Noble City of that Country was almoſt utterly exhauſted, the ſmall remnant of the Inhabitants whereof gave up themſelves to the Romans, deſiring they would ſend a Colony thither.

49. Of this advantage the Senate was very glad, to leſſen the multitude of the City, and the poor were content to inhabit ſo fertil a place; but when they conſidered the danger of infection, they were again diſcouraged, and wreſted this to ſo bad a ſence, as to make it a deſign to deſtroy them. But the Senate laying a great penalty upon ſuch as refuſed to go, many obeyed and went thither, as alſo to Norba a Latin Town. This inraged more ſuch as ſtaid behind, being ſtill pinched by the famine, ſo that raiſing great multitudes, they called the Tribunes into the Comitium. Great ſtriſe hapned betwixt the Conſuls and them; The Tribunes affirming they had promiſed not to interrupt them in their diſcourſes to the People, to which the other anſwered, that it was only when they called the People together, not when the Conſuls themſelves did it, as now they had done, to promiſe them all fair accommodation from the Senate. Hereupon Brutus, who being ſo great a ſtickler before, was And this a new Law in behalf of the Tribunes. choſen one of the firſt Tribunes, deviſed a Law, which under ſuch a penalty as the Tribunes ſhould impoſe, forbad any one to contradict or interrupt them, when they ſpoke to the People. Such as could or would not give ſecurity for the payment of the fine, were to be put to death, and their goods be ſacred to Ceres. If any controverſie aroſe about the fine, it was to be determined by the judgment of the People.

50. This Law being enacted by the ſuffrages of the Tribes, cauſed greater diſturbance; the Senate refuſing to ratifie the reſolves of the People, and the People the Decrees of the Senate; yet proceeded it not to any greater inconveniency than words, and ſome blows without weapons. For the poor broke not into the ſtore-houſes of the rich, but were content to purchaſe victuals at an exceſſive rate; and when money failed were contented with Roots and Herbs: neither did the rich deal harſhly with the poor, but carried it towards them as indulgent Fathers, ſo that we muſt ſay, it was the infirmity of the Government, and not any bad diſpoſition of the People which cauſed the Seditions. The Conſuls, to divert their minds, and eaſe the charge, offered to lead them out into the Enemies Country, but few or none would give their names; ſo that Marcius Coriolanus with ſome Patritians, and a few of their Clients made incurſions, and returned home loaden with booty; the knowledge whereof made the poorer ſort murmur againſt their Tribunes, who had diſſwaded them from the Expedition. The following Conſuls M. Minucius Augurinus, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, famous for their abilities both in War and Peace, bent themſelves, by making proviſion for Corn, to allay the preſent diſtempers; though not with wiſhed ſucceſs. They procured much to be imported, and this Summer returned thoſe that were Corn brought out of Sicily. ſent into Sicily, with a great quantity of Wheat, whereof half they bought at a very cheap rate, and half was beſtowed on them by Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes. Now the Patritians conſidering how to diſpoſe of the Corn; ſome were for ſelling it to the poor at eaſie rates, thereby to win upon the multitude, but others urged they were to be harſhly uſed and afflicted; and the Corn to be ſold to them on dear rates; that by neceſſity they might be brought to ſobriety, and become ſubject to the Laws.

Coriolanus his Counſel thereupon.

51. Amongſt theſe was Coriolanus the chief, being offended with the Commons, as was given out, for a repulſe at the laſt election of Conſuls. He had been ever an extraordinary aſſertor of the power of the Nobility, which made the People afraid to chuſe him; but now incenſed he much more ſhewed his inclination, openly declaiming againſt the innovation of the multitude, and exhorting others to reſiſt the petulant endeavours of the Tribunes and rabble. The Conſuls calling together the Senate, he inlarged himſelf in a ſet ſpeech to this purpoſe, and preſſed that by force they ſhould take away the Tribuneſhip, as the only means for the recovery of the State; concluding with his opinion, that no favour at all ſhould be ſhewed to the multitude in the ſale of Corn. Some were offended with this freedom, perceiving what inconvenience it would bring; but others approving of it, the Tribunes who were preſent (ſay both Dionyſius and Plutarch) ran forth, and crying out, called the People together, and declared to them the effect of Marcius his ſpeech. The multitude inraged, would have violated the Senate inſtantly, but that the Tribunes ſtayed them, laying the whole blame upon Marcius. They ſent ſome Beadels for him to come and anſwer it before the People, but they returning with nothing but ill words, they went themſelves, and commanded the Ædiles to apprehend him. Theſe were Brutus and Icilius the firſt Tribunes, who going to do what was injoyned, were repulſed and beaten by the young Patritians he had got about him. This put all into a flame, the whole City being gathered together and ready to deſtroy it ſelf; but by the wiſdom of the Conſuls the matter was put off till the following day. Then the Conſuls laboured to heall the breach, confirming as from the Fathers, what was formerly granted to the Commons, and palliating as much as might be the ſuppoſed offence of Marcius. The Tribunes anſwering, inveighed againſt the Senate, as deſirous to break their faith, and laying open the fault of Marcius, concluded the action with a Decree of their College, That he ſhould be forthwith caſt down headlong from the Tarpeian Rock. For, having given him liberty to ſpeak, he was ſo far from recanting his former ſpeeches, that he flew out into the ſame invectives, as they were termed.

Put all into a flame.

52. The Ædiles laying hands on him, the Patritians again reſcued him, the ſober part even of them taking it ill he ſhould be condemned to death without due proceſs, and the more underſtanding ſort of the Commons not approving of the attempt; ſo as a great tumult being raiſed, the Tribunes nulled their former Decree, and ſet him a day wherein to anſwer, and ſtand or fall by the judgement of the People. In the mean time the Senate, by ſelling the Corn at moderate rates, and by intreaties, ſought either to procure the tryal to be utterly laid aſide, or at leaſt to defer it till the wrath of the multitude ſhould be appeaſed, which was alſo to be imployed in a War againſt Antium. When the former could not be done, and the War was blown over, the Conſuls being very unwilling to let the People take ſo much upon themſelves, as without Decree of the Senate firſt had (according to the antient Cuſtom) to paſs their judgment in any caſe, procured the Tribunes firſt to ſue out ſuch a Decree, on this condition, that they might be heard ſpeak their minds, and each Senator before he gave his judgment, ſwear ſolemnly, as was uſual in judicatury proceſs, to deliver what he thought moſt behoveful for the Publick. The Tribunes then argued much in the behalf of the Commons, who they ſaid had undergone the heat of all Wars, both in the time of Kings, in the expulſion of them, and ſince in the inlarging the Roman Dominion; in conſideration whereof, they could not in conſcience have leſſer privileges than of late they had obtained. They aggravated by ſeveral circumſtances the Crime of Marcius, who in ſo high a manner had gone about to infringe them, and therefore as well for maintenance of right, as the ſafety of the City, they deſired he might be left to the juſtice of the People. Appius Claudus ſtifly impugned the Decree, arguing that the Senate would be enervated, and the Commonwealth betrayed, if they granted to the People power of judging Patritians.

53. M. Valerius, and other popular men made a better conſtruction of the People's deſire, thinking they would uſe this power moderately, and in oppoſition to Appius his politick reaſons, ſtrangely conceived it would make for the ſecurity of the Commonwealth, and particular Members thereof, if the Commons were admitted to ſome ſhare in the Government, that ſo it might neither wholly lye in the Patritians nor Plebeians, but be tempered and poiſed betwixt both. He urged, that they had allayed the Kingly Power, by giving it to two annual Magiſtrates, and that therefore there was no fear of its degenerating into Tyranny, being alſo awed by the overſight of three hundred moſt prudent and worthy perſons, of which the Senate conſiſted. But for the Senate it ſelf, there was no curb; ſo that it might afterwards (though of the preſent Members he had no cauſe to judge ſo) draw all things into extremity, and indeed ruine the State, except the People might be admitted to have an hand in the judgment of ſuch faults as concerned the Commonwealth, as when any was accuſed of moving Sedition, affecting Tyranny, Treaſon, or the like crimes; becauſe the more ſolemn and ſevere the Tryal was, ambitious men would be the more terrified from ſuch attempts. The generality inclining to give up the man, Marcius demanded of the Tribunes whereof they would accuſe him. They conſulting with themſelves apart, knew not well how to form an Impeachment out of his former words, which might paſs with the Senate, and therefore anſwered, they would lay the affectation of Tyranny to his charge. Hereat he very chearfully put himſelf upon Tryal, not refuſing the ſevereſt puniſhment, if it could be proved; and a Decree of the Senate paſſed accordingly, time being given him till the third Market-day, to prepare for it. For a Market was kept once in nine days, at which time the People that lived in the Country, came either to Traffick, receive Juſtice, or give their Suffrages in ſuch matters as either primarily concern'd them, or were referred from the Senate. When the day came, a greater multitude of Country-men than ever formerly was ſeen, early in the morning placed it ſelf in the Forum, and the Tribunes called the People to the Comitia Tributa, or Aſſemblies of the Tribes, ſevering each Tribe from another by cords. Now it having been the Cuſtom for the People to give their Suffrages by Centuries in the Campus Martius in Arms, and under their Centurions, the Patritians called hard for them, and proteſted againſt this innovation; but by the other way of Centuries brought in by Servius, the ordinary ſort of People being excluded, (for that moſt commonly the two firſt Claſſes carried it from the other four) the Tribunes would in no caſe ſuffer it, and the Crime of Coriolanus ſeeming to concern all alike, at length they obtained the conſent of the Patritians to this innovation.

He anſwereth before the People.

54. Minucius the Conſul beginning the action, declared the worth of the perſon now to be judged, and exhorting the People to mildneſs, ſignified that the Senate became petitioners in his behalf. Sicinius one of the Tribunes ſaid, he would neither betray the liberty of the People, nor ſuffer another to do it; therefore if the Patritians would, as they pretended, ſubject him to their judgement, he would give forth the balls without any more to do, to which the Conſul replyed, they did ſo, but on this condition, that he ſhould anſwer to the charge of the affected Tyranny, and therewith proteſting, went down. Sicinius then ripping up all that ever Coriolanus did, that might any way make for his purpoſe, laboured to put a bad conſtruction upon it. But when the party came to ſpeak, he ſo related what particular ſervices he had done the State, and ſhewed the Skars received all over his Body; withal, thoſe that he had ſaved in the Wars, made ſuch lamentation in his behalf, that the People generally cried out he was to be diſcharged. Then Decius another of the Tribunes ſtepping up, ſaid, that ſeeing the Senate, as the Conſul alleged, had abſolved Marcius from thoſe words he had ſpoken in their houſe, and ſuffered him not to be accuſed for them, he would wave his words, and come to actions, by which he would make good the charge. There was a certain Law that all Booty and Plunder got in War, ſhould be appropriated to publick uſe, ſo as no General was to meddle with it, but give it up into the hands of the Quæſtor. Now, whereas no man ever brake this Law, or ſo much as ſpake againſt it, this Marcius, ſaith he, hath dared to contemn it; for when in the late incurſion into the Territories of Antium, we had got great plenty of Slaves, Cattel, and Proviſions, he neither delivered theſe things up to the Quæſtor, nor payed any money unto the Treaſury, but divided all the Booty amongſt his friends, which could not but be taken as an argument that he intended to inſlave his Country; it being the Cuſtom of Tyrants, this way to procure themſelves inſtruments for their purpoſe. Though he had done this not with any ſiniſter intention, but for the ſervice of his Country, at ſuch time as all were full of Seditions at home, and the Enemy from abroad waſted the Roman Territories; yet the multitude interpreted it in the ſame ſence as Decius, and the whole matter was quite changed; he being abaſhed at ſo unexpected a charge, and the Conſuls and Patritians utterly to ſeek what to anſwer. The Tribunes named perpetual baniſhment, and gathered the ſuffrages of the Tribes, which being twenty one in number, nine only abſolved him, and ſo he ſtood condemned by the major part.

Is baniſhed.

55. This was the firſt ſentence paſſed by the people upon any Patritian, and henceforth the Tribunes were wont to ſet the day to whomſoever they pleaſed; whereby the power of the Commons was inlarged exceedingly, and the Intereſt of the Patritians was more and more diminiſhed; Plebeians at length being admitted into the Senate, Offices, and Prieſthoods, which in former times were only communicated to the other: the Senate partly againſt their wills and by conſtraint, partly by a wiſe foreſight giving way to it, as will be ſeen in due place. Marcius being accompanied home with the lamentations and tears of many, ſaluted his Mother, Wife, and Children, as they made pitiful complaints, and without any appearance of trouble, bidding them bear their condition cheerfully, ſtraitway departed out of the City, attended only by a few Clients, and without any thing to bear his charges. He went to Antium, and there in the habit and poſture of an obnoxious ſuppliant betook himſelf to Tullus Attius, a man of royal condition amongſt the Volſci, both for Nobility, Riches, and Valour, whom he knew to be his greateſt Enemy in that Nation, becauſe in battel they had often challenged each other, and out of Æmulation added a private to the publick hatred. But knowing him to be of a magnanimous mind, and moſt willing to catch hold of any advantage againſt the Romans, he caſt himſelf at his feet, bidding him either avenge his Countrey of him, or elſe him againſt Rome, which by her unnatural carriage toward him had forfeited all duty and ſervice that ſhe might have expected at his hands. Tullus imbracing him with ſingular kindneſs, reſolved to make uſe of his great abilities. Marcius adviſed that ſome fair pretext might firſt be ſought for War, and for that purpoſe ſending many of the Volſci to behold the ſolemn Games at Rome, cauſed one to go to the Conſuls, and accuſe them of having ſome deſign againſt the City, that ſo they forcing them out on a ſudden, might be ſaid to have broken the peace. This accordingly ſucceeding (for the Conſuls commanded all by Proclamation to be gone before Sun-ſet) Tullus ſo aggravated the matter to his Country-men, that he procured them to ſend to Rome to demand back all the Towns and Territories which by War had been taken from them.

Dionyſius Halicarnaſſ. l. 8.

Stirreth up the Volſci againſt Rome.

56. The Senate taking the meſſage in great ſcorn, anſwered, that if the Volſci firſt took up Arms, the Romans would laſt lay them down. Tullus then perſwading the Volſci to the War, procured Marcius to be joyned with him as General, with full power, who preſently invading the Roman Dominions, waſted all ſuch grounds where ere he came as belonged to the Plebeians, not ſuffering any thing to be touched which belonged to any of the Nobility. His deſign was accompliſhed; for this raiſed great envy and malice againſt the Patritians, who upbraiding the people that they had baniſhed unjuſtly ſo conſiderable a man, were accuſed with greater indignation, that to be revenged for former injuries they had procured Marcius to invade the Countrey, ſeeing they were idle ſpectators, when others were undone, and kept their goods, being out of all danger of the War. Coriolanus leading home his men richly laden with Booty, was ſent out ſhortly after with one half of the Forces, and taking by ſurrender the Town of the Circeians, a Roman Colony, thence invaded the Latines, who being Confederates with Rome ſent thither for relief; but the common people were averſe to the War, and the Conſuls being almoſt out of their Office were unwilling to begin any thing; ſo that the Meſſengers were diſmiſſed without any ſatisfactory anſwer. Marcius then by ſtorm took Tolerium, Lavici, Pes, and Bola, which he plundered, and made the Inhabitants Slaves. Such as yielded he mildly treated, but having ſtormed Bola, which lay within thirteen miles of Rome, he put almoſt all to the ſword that were of age. The Volſci now ſo admired him, that ſuch as were left to defend the Towns would not ſtay, but all flocked to him, owning him only for their General. At Rome there was nothing but confuſion, all being in deſpair, and ſeeking no relief any other way then by venting their ſpleen one againſt another: but when news came that Lavinium was beſieged, it made a marvelous, yet abſurd change in their minds. The people now cried out that Coriolanus was to be reſtored by a repeal of the Decree for baniſhment; but the Senate utterly refuſed to aſſent to it, and plainly forbad it in full houſe; either for that they deſired to oppoſe the people in all things, or would not have his reſtitution aſcribed to the Commons; or elſe were incenſed againſt Marcius, who was become Enemy to all, though Invadeth its Territories.

but injured by ſome, and had declared againſt his own Country, wherein he knew the greater and better ſort to ſympathize with him, and account his no other than a common grievance.

He marcheth towards Rome.

57. The reſolve of the Senate being publiſhed, the People could do nothing as to his reſtitution, the cuſtom requiring that the Fathers ſhould propound. Marcius hereupon roſe from before Lavinium, and marching towards Rome it ſelf, pitched his Camp at the Ditches of Clælia, five miles from the City. This forced Senate and People into agreement, all in common being ſeized with horrour and amazement, ſo that it was agreed a Meſſage ſhould be ſent to him, offering him his reſtitution. The Meſſengers were Patritians, and ſuch as for their love to him he had moſt cauſe to favour; but though with all advantage poſſible they made their addreſs, yet he received them with wonderful ſeverity in a Council of Officers, and gave them this anſwer, that if they would expect Peace, they ſhould reſtore to the Volſci all Towns and Territories taken away in War: and make them free of the City as the Latines were: and he would give them thirty days time to conſider of it. Hereat the Captains of the Volſci, eſpecially Tullus, took occaſion to malign him, though he employed this time of Truce very profitably, ſubduing ſeven great and ſtrong Towns. When the time was out, and he returned, another Meſſage came to him, deſiring that refraining himſelf he would draw off the Volſci, and then conſult in common; for they would do nothing by conſtraint or fear: but if he thought the Volſci were to be gratified, they would yield to him if they would lay down their Arms. He replied, he carried himſelf not as General of the Volſci, but as a Roman Citizen, and deſired, that, having a reſpect to juſtice and moderation, they would return within three days with a grant of what he had formerly demanded; elſe he muſt proceed in his enterprize. Hereupon the Senate, in ſo great a Tempeſt which threatned all, betook them to their ſacred Anchor as they accounted it, and ordered all the Pontifices, Prieſts, Governours of their ſuperſtitious Houſes and Augurs, in their ſeveral habits, ſhould go and beſeech him to compoſe the matter: but neither was Marcius moved with this Pompous train; but required they ſhould either accept of the terms, or expect hoſtility to the utmoſt.

58. The Prieſts being returned, the Citizens were warned to be ready at the Walls, thence to repel the Enemy if he came, for that no other hope remained, than what time, and viciſſitude of Fortune might afford. The whole City being full of Tumults, trembling, and amazement, the Women flocked to the Temples, but the moſt, and eſpecially the chiefeſt, made their ſupplications at the Altar of Jupiter in the Capitol. Amongſt theſe was Valeria the Siſter of Poplicola, into whoſe mind came this device, that they ſhould go to Veturia (ſay Dionyſius and Livy) or Volumnia (ſaith Plutarch) the mother of Coriolanus, and procure her, with Volumnia (ſay they) or Virgilia (ſaith he) her daughter-in-law, to go, and interceed for their Countrey. Veturia earneſtly preſſed to undertake ſo pious a work, anſwered, they had little hopes to obtain their ſute, for that her Son had never ſent to ſee them ſince his departure, being fallen out with his own family as well as his Country; yet ſhe was ready to improve that intereſt ſhe had in him, and ſet forth towards him with her daughter in-law, and two Nephews. Coriolanus ſeeing the women come, reſolved fully to give them a denial; but when he perceived his Mother amongſt them, he deſcended from his Tribunal, and went to meet her. Having courteouſly received her with his Wife and Children, he gave ear to her requeſt, which ſhe made with all the Oratory that ſhe could compaſs out of the impending ruin of his own Country, and the infamy which would neceſſarily follow a fruitleſs attempt. When herewith ſhe could not prevail, ſhe put him in mind how much Nature, together with a careful education of him in her Widdow-hood, had ingaged him to obedience, and in concluſion caſt her ſelf down at his Feet which ſhe imbraced and kiſſed. He preſently lift her up, and cried out, Mother, thou haſt got the Victory, advantageous to my Country, but deſtructive to my ſelf, and accordingly drew off the Volſci into their own Country, who were variouſly affected. Some blamed both him and the Action: others that were ſtudious of Peace did neither; and ſome, though they condemned the thing, yet abſolved the man, who was conſtrained by ſo great neceſſity to do it; yet none refuſed to obey his orders, but followed him, more through the authority of his Virtue than of his Power.

His mother prevaileth with him to retreat.

A. M. 3517.
Ol. 73. an. 1.
V. C. 266.
Darii 34.
Sp. Nantio
Sex. Furio
Coſſ.

59. But when he was come to Antium, Tullus, the great Emulator of his Glory, ſuppoſing he had a ſufficient advantage againſt him, required him to lay down his Office, and give an account of his actions to the People. He refuſed to reſign his place, except commanded by the People to do it, unto which he ſaid he was not afraid to give an account of any thing he had done, at that preſent. The people being called together, the principal of Tullus his faction inſtigated them againſt him, but when he roſe to ſpeak for himſelf, thoſe turbulent ſpirits for ſhame gave way, and all ſober and peaceable men openly declared they would hear him candidly, and judge him according to right and equity. Tullus then fearing the man's eloquence, and ſufficiently apprehenſive how much repute the very Crime objected would bring him (for they could not ſeem to be injured by him in not taking Rome, without conſidering that he had brought things to that paſs by his incredible valour and dexterity, that they were near taking of it) would not expect the judgment of the multitude, but crying out with his complices, that the betrayer of the Volſci was not to be ſuffered to hold the Tyranny over them by refuſing to lay down his Office, ruſhed out, and ſlew him in the place. Though no man ſtood up in his defence, yet that this wicked act diſpleaſed moſt, it preſently appeared. For upon report of his death they came generally out of the Towns and buried him honourably, adorning his Sepulchre, as of a General and a famous Warrier, with Arms and Trophies. Such was the end of the Eminenteſt Man of that age for valour, who by his ſour rigidity procured extreme hazard to his Country, and deſtruction to himſelf, whilſt he preferred private revenge before publick good, and yet would not ſtoop to any proviſion for his own ſafety.

He is ſlain.

60. At Rome upon Marcius his retreat was ſuch exultation, as is ſuitable to the joy of thoſe that are reſcued from utter deſolation. The Senate Decreed to the women what honours they would ask, but they only deſired they might build a Chappel to Women's Fortune, in the place where they had delivered their Country, which was done at the publick charge, and they at their own dedicated the Image. When the death of Coriolanus was heard, there was neither expreſſion of joy nor ſorrow further than this, that the women were permitted to mourn for him ten months: the longeſt time allowed by Numa for the neareſt relations, according to Plutarch. The Conſuls not long after took the field with a conſiderable Army, but had no occaſion to make tryal of it; for the Volſci and Æqui joyning their Forces together reſolved to take the Romans unprovided; but in their march they fell out about a General, of whether Nation he ſhould be, and from words to blows, in ſuch a manner that they fought a great Battel, and if night had not ſevered them, one party had been utterly deſtroyed. The year following the new Conſuls, C. Aquilius and T. Sicinius, overthrew, the one the Hernici and the other the Volſci, amongſt whom fell Tullus Actius, a man of perſonal valour, but no good conduct. Their Succeſſors, Proculus Virginius, and Sp. Caſſius took the field with the Legions; the Æqui falling to the former, as the Volſci and Henrici to the later. The Volſci preſently asked Peace, having in the laſt battel loſt the flower of their ſtrength, and after them ſhortly the Hernici, refuſing any more to conteſt for equality with the Romans. Caſſius having received money and proviſions, as from ſuch as confeſſed themſelves conquered, gave them truce, and referred them for conditions to the Senate.

61 After a long debate, the Fathers reſolved they ſhould be received into amity, and that Caſſius at his diſcretion might preſcribe the conditions of the League, confirming whatſoever they ſhould be. Caſſius returning home, asked, and obtained a Triumph, though he had neither taken any City, worſted any Enemy, nor had any Captives or Spoils for ornament of the ſolemnity, which poſſeſſed men with an apprehenſion of his arrogancy, and procured him envy. After his triumph he publiſhed as conditions of peace, the very ſame that were granted to the Latines, which gave great diſtaſte, it being conceived an unworthy thing to make ſtrangers equal in privilege with their kinſmen the Latines; ſuch as could allege no merit, with thoſe who had exceedingly well deſerved of the State: the Patritians took it alſo diſdainfully that he would determine fully on his own head a matter of ſuch weight, without asking any of them his advice. His rhree Conſulſhips, and two Triumphs, made him ſeem to himſelf far ſuperiour to any of the ſame rank, ſo that no leſs than the Principallity would now content him. Knowing that the ordinary way to it was to gain the favour of the People, by ſome great act of kindneſs, he reſolved upon that courſe, and firſt to divide amongſt them certain publick grounds, which through the neglect of the Magiſtrates, had been ſeized on, and poſſeſſed by the rich. The ſucceſs might have been dubious had he ſtayed here; but he would alſo have the Latines into the Lot with the Hernici his new denizons, that he might procure the Favour of thoſe Nations. The day after his Triumph, calling together the People according to the Cuſtom, he recalled to their memories the great ſervices he had done in his ſeveral Conſulſhips: how in the firſt he had ſubdued the Sabines, in the ſecond reduced the Commons into the City, after the appeaſing of the Sedition, as alſo received the Latines into fellowſhip and Communion: in the third, the Volſci of Enemies were made Friends, and the Hernici, a great and powerful Nation, received into cloſe and inward confederacy. By theſe diſcourſes he inſinuated, as if above all others he took charge of the Commonwealth, and ſo would continue to do. And he concluded with a promiſe to do more for the Commons, than any man ever did who was moſt in favour, and that ſhould preſently appear.

Caſſius aimeth at the Sovereignty.

62. The day following, he called together the Senate, which was very much troubled at his Speech, and declared, that becauſe the Common People were very uſeful both in procuring Dominion, and defending Liberty, it was convenient to divide to them thoſe publick Grounds, which were moſt impudently held from the State by ſome Patritians, and pay the money back out of the Treaſury, that they had laid out for that Corn, which being given freely to the City by Gelon the Tyrant of Sicily, ought to have been divided amongſt the Inhabitants. The Fathers heard him with great diſdain, and rejected the motion, his Colleague Virginius grievouſly accuſing him as ſeditious. For ſeveral daies after, Caſſius diſcourſed of this to the People, and Virginius held the Senate conſulting how to withſtand him. The Tribunes of the People at length, either for that they were jealous of ſome deſign, or were diſpleaſed that they themſelves had not firſt propoſed this thing, withſtood it, alleging it was an unjuſt thing that what they had dearly purchaſed with their Labour and Blood, ſhould be common to Strangers as well as themſelves. As this raiſed ſome diſlike, ſo Caſſius again drew them to his party, by propounding that the Grounds might be divided amongſt ſuch as had moſt need, and by urging that it was better to have a little, than by expecting much to be fruſtrated of all. As the People were thus perſwaded to and fro, C. Rabuleius one of the Tribunes found out a way, which for the preſent ended the diſpute. Virginius pretending that he was for a diviſion of the Grounds, but not unto Foreiners, hoping that theſe would ever be joyned; and Caſſius being both for Citizens and Strangers; he took them both at their words; for the one and the other yielding there ſhould be a diviſion, he bade the People accept of that, and defer that wherein they diſſented to another time.

63. For ſome days after this, Caſſius kept his houſe, pretending ſickneſs, and ſtudied how he might cauſe his Law, called Lex Agraria, to paſs by force. For this purpoſe he ſent for the Latines and Hernici to be preſent at the Comitia, that he might carry it by greater number of Voices, ſo as the City was filled with them. Virginius hereupon made Proclamation, that all ſuch as dwelt not in the City, ſhould depart within a ſhort time prefixed, and Caſſius cauſed it to be proclaimed, that all ſuch as were free ſhould ſtay till the matter were determined. No end of the contention appearing, the Fathers feared it might come to Blows, or further inconvenience, and therefore aſſembled to make ſome effectual proviſion for the publick Peace.

64. After a little debate they came to this reſolution, that ten men of Conſular dignity ſhould be created to ſurvey the Grounds, and declare how much of them was to be let out to farm, and how much divided to the People. That it ſhould be declared, that for as much as it was inequitable for the new Aſſociates, or Denizons, to expect part in ſuch Lands as were gained to the State before their admiſſion, if any afterward ſhould be got by their aſſiſtance, to each ſeveral People ſhould be aſſigned it's portion, according to the League. That for the choice of the ten men, and the diſtribution of the Ground, the ſucceeding Conſuls ſhould make proviſion. This Decree being publiſhed to the People, appeaſed all, and fruſtrated the deſign of Caſſius.

His deſign fruſtrated.

65. In the year following, being the firſt of the ſeventy fourth Olympiad, wherein Aſtylus of Syracuſe was Victor, Leoſtratus executing the place of Principal Archon at Athens, according to the computation of Dionyſius, in the firſt year of Xerxes his Reign, Q. Fabius and S. Cornelius were Conſuls. Now two moſt noble young men, Cæſo Fabius, the Brother of the Conſul, and L. Valerius the Grand-ſon of Poplicola, being Quæſtors, and thereby having authority to aſſemble the People, ſet a day to Caſſius the late Conſul to anſwer in the Comitia to the charge

A. M. 3521.
Ol. 74. an. 1.
V. C. 269.
vel 70.
Xerxis 1, vel 2.

charge of affected Tyranny. Then in full Aſſembly did they lay open his actions; how he had beſtowed upon the Latines the third part of the Plunder, who thought it happineſs ſufficient to be made free of the City: then the Hernici, who could expect no leſs than to be deprived of their own Lands, he choſe rather to make Friends than Subjects, and Citizens than Tributaries. whence both grounds and plunder being divided into three parts, two of theſe muſt go to Subjects, and Strangers, ſo that if it were found neceſſary afterwards to give others the ſame privilege of the City, the Roman Citizens being by right Lords of all, ſhould not have remaining one third to themſelves. They aggravated this with the management of the buſineſs, as his doing all without conſulting the Fathers, and againſt the interpoſition of the Tribunes. That theſe things tended to the deſigned eſtabliſhment of a Tyranny, they proved from the money and arms wherewith the Latines and Hernici had furniſhed him, as alſo from the company of ſtout young men of thoſe Nations which he had about his perſon. In teſtimony hereof they produced ſeveral credible perſons, both Citizens and Aſſociates, who averred it. To theſe the People giving credit, notwithſtanding his premeditated Orations, and his three children, who with many Friends and Clients accompanied him in mourning habit, and interceded for him; notwithſtanding all his ſervices, and the honour obtained by them, they would not at all pity him, but out of extream hatred to Tyranny condemned the man, and that to death, leſt being baniſhed, he ſhould procure the State ſuch trouble and danger as Marcius lately had done. Therefore judgment being paſſed, the Quæſtors preſently led him to the Rock near to the Forum, and thence caſt him down headlong in the ſight of the People, this being the then ordinary kind of puniſhment. His Eſtate was confiſcated, and his houſe razed. Some would have had his Sons alſo put to death, but the Senate refuſed to uſe ſuch ſeverity, and at Rome the children never ſuffered for their Father's fault, although for high Treaſon, till the Marſian War, wherein thoſe that broke the cuſtom miſcarried, and he who deſtroyed them reſtored it to the State, as Dionyſius obſerveth, who diſliketh the practice of ſome of his Countrey-men the Græcians, in killing, or condemning to perpetual baniſhment the ſons of Tyrants themſelves.

He is condemned, and put to death.

66. By the death of Caſſius the Patritians were more elevated, and the Commons grieved after they ſaw this, and conſidered how ſerviceable a man to their intereſt, as they fooliſhly thought, they had cut off. They now called hard for the Execution of the Agrarian Law, but the Senate being reſolved to put it off, cauſed the Conſuls to make proviſion for an Expedition. None would give their names, and the Tribunes interpoſing hindred the Conſuls from puniſhing any; but it being given out that a Dictator would be created, the multitude fearing to fall into the hands of Appius, liſted themſelves, and ſo Cornelius waſted the Territories of the Veientines, as Fabius thoſe of the Æqui. The year following, being the two hundredth and ſeventieth of the City, when Nicodemus was Archon at Athens, the Patritians procured Cæſo Fabius one of Caſſius his accuſers, and L. Æmilius, to be created Conſuls, during whoſe Office all was quiet at home, the Volſci renewing the War upon the Romans. Fabius was ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Latines and Hernici whom they had invaded, and Æmilius led the other part of the Forces to Antium, where he was worſted by the Volſci, and being forced to deſert his Camp, had with his whole Army been cut off, but that his Colleague in good time ſent ſome choice Companies to recruit him. For the next year M. Fabius Brother to Cæſo, and L. Valerius Son of Marcus, who put Caſſius to death, being Conſuls, propoſed it to the Senate to fill up the Army at Antium. A Decree paſſing for new Levies, the People refuſed to be liſted, calling for the diviſion of the grounds, and one of the Tribunes withſtood the Conſuls. This put them upon this device, to ſit in the Campus Martius, where whoſoever was cited and did not appear, they puniſhed him, if he had any Lands, by cutting his trees, and pulling down his houſes; or if he hired grounds, by driving away his Cattel, or other ways, the Tribune not being able to do them any good. for that the power of his Office was confined within the walls; ſo as it was unlawful for them to lye one night out of the City, except in the Latine feriæ, where all the Magiſtrates for the common ſafety were wont to ſacrifize in the Albanian Mount unto Jupiter.

The Conſuls evade the interpoſition of the Tribunes.

67. This forced the Commons to ſubmit, and ſo the Conſuls making Levies led out the Legions, Fabius to the defence of the Aſſociates, and Valerius againſt the Volſci; who ingaging with him in battel, came off on equal terms; and after Commotions in the City.

afterwards neither part were forward to fight. It was believed in the City, that the Roman Army wilfully neglected an opportunity of Victory, out of hatred againſt the Conſul, whom they deſpiſed as a man of no experience, and in revenge againſt the Fathers who had ſo long fruſtrated their hopes about the diviſion of publick grounds. At this time one of the Veſtal Nuns Opimia by name, being convicted of Incontinency, was ſhut up within the ground in the Forum, and her corrupters ſcourged and put to death. At the next election of Conſuls there was great contention, the Patritians having a deſire to prefer ſome in whom they could confide, and particularly pitching upon the ſon of Appius, a man of the ſame temper with his Father; and the Commons as much labouring the Contrary. When the Conſuls held the Comitia, the Tribunes interpoſed, and when the Tribunes called the People together, the Conſulls would not ſuffer any thing to be done, contending that it belonged to their Office. Both parties being incompaſſed with thoſe of their Factions, railed, and ſometimes came to hand-cuffs, ſo that worſe threatning, and the Senate conſulting what was to be done, ſome moved to have a Dictator named, who might firſt correct all diſtempers of late brought in, and then deliver the power to men of approved integrity; but a middle way pleaſed; to create Interreges for holding of the Aſſemblies. The firſt was A. Sempronius, who for his five days governing affairs in a peaceable manner, the other Magiſtrates having laid down, created according to the manner Sp. Largius. He in the Centuriata Comitia made Conſuls with the well liking of both ſides, C. Julius a favourite of the Commons, and Q. Fabius now the ſecond time elected, a man addicted to the power of the great ones. In their Conſulſhip the Æqui and Vientes invaded the Roman Territories, and did mnch hurt. Againſt the later they were ſent with the Legions, after ſome conteſt with the People (who were hardly drawn in by Largius, becauſe the Senate had now deferred the execution of the Agrarian Law five years) and harrazing the Country returned home with much ſpoil; neither was any thing elſe of moment done that year.

Dionyſ. l. 9.

Wars abroad.

68. The year following (which was the firſt of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, wherein Xerxes made his Expedition into Greece, Callias being Archon at Athens) had for Conſuls Cæſo Fabius again, and Sp. Furius, to whom came meſſengers from the Latines, deſiring aſſiſtance againſt the inſolence of the Æqui; and all Hetruria was reported now to be in Arms at the deſire of the Veientes. The Conſuls were ordered to aſſiſt the one, and ſuppreſs betimes the other; but when they came to raiſe men, Icilius one of the Tribunes interpoſed upon the old pretence of the Agrarian Law. The work being hereby hindred, Appius adviſed the Senate to ſet one Tribune againſt another, by drawing over ſome of them unto their ſide, as the only way to abate the power of that Office now ſo ſacred and inviolable. This courſe both at preſent and afterwards was effectual, and the Conſuls with their Armies departed each one into his province; Furius againſt the Æqui, and Fabius into Hetruria. Furius harrazed the Enemies Country, and returned home with great Booty. Fabius, though an able Warriour, was ſo hated by his men, that when they had in battel routed the Enemy, they refuſed to purſue or do any thing more, but departing againſt his command to their Camp, thence alſo marched home, leſt they ſhould procure him the honour of a Triumph. The following Conſuls Cn. Manlius, and M. Fabius, again were both ſent to carry on the War in Hetruria, where they held the Soldiers in the Camp ſo long, till the Enemy was ready to fall upon it, and for ſhame they deſired to be led forth. Fabius taking this opportunity, upbraided them with their diſobedience to the Conſul the laſt year, in that place; and ſhewing them how little cauſe he and his Colleague had to truſt them, having ſufficiently humbled them, led them forth. A greater and longer battel was never fought by the Romans, who were thought to be Victors only, becauſe the Hetruſcans, the night following, forſook their Tents. Manlius was ſlain, and for that cauſe his Colleague refuſed the Triumph, ſaying, it was not right for him to take the Laurel at his Funerals. Having diſbanded his Army, he laid down his Office two months befor the time, becauſe his wounds diſabled him for ſervice; and by the ſecond Interrex in the Comitia, were declared Conſul Cæſo Fabius his brother (who having extraordinarily deſerved in the late battel, was now honoured with this Office the chird time) and T. Virginius.

69. Virginius being ſent into Hetruria againſt the Veientes, was overpowered by them, and had loſt his whole Army, but that Fabius upon the intimation of his extreme neceſſity came out of the Country of the Æqui, and brought him

The Family of the Fabii ingage againſt the Veientes.

him off. When the Romans were retreated, the Veientes made excurſions very near the City, to the great loſs and diſparagement of the State. The Senate found it neceſſary to have a conſtant Guard upon the Borders; but the Treaſury was low, the Tributes of private men were not ſufficient for this new charge, and it ſeemed that none would give their Names willingly to ſo conſtant a Work. When they were at a ſtand, the whole Family of the Fabii, by the procurement of the Conſul, voluntarily offered to take both the charge and trouble upon it ſelf only, which was gratefully accepted. The Fabii then under conduct of Marcus the laſt year's Conſul, fortified a Caſtle near the River Cremera, and not far from Veii. Their whole number was at firſt four thouſand, whereof their Clients and Friends made up the greater part, and of ſuch as bore the name of the Family there were three hundred and ſix: afterwards another Company followed, being led by Cæſo Fabius the Conſul. Out of this Caſtle, which they named Cremera from the River, they made excurſions, and much endamaged the Enemy. This cauſed the Veientes again to implore the aid of all Hetruria, which making preparations, news came that the Æqui and Volſci alſo had agreed upon an invaſion. The Senate hereupon ordered their Armies to be provided, whereof L. Æmilius the next years Conſul led one againſt the Hetruſci, with whom joyned Cæſo Babius as proconſul. C. Servilius the other Conſul, marched with another part againſt the Volſci: and Ser. Furius with the third againſt the Æqui, having alſo the power of Proconſul. Furius no leſs happily than ſodainly finiſhed his work. Servilius raſhly managing his affairs loſt many men, and not daring to adventure all in a Battel, drew out the War in length; but Æmilius giving Battel to the Veientes and their Aſſociates, overthrew them, and then ſtorming their Camp, forced them to beg Peace.

70. Having purchaſed a Truce by the grant of Proviſions for two months to the Conſuls Army, and ſix months pay, they had leave to ſend to the Senate. The Fathers upon reading of Æmilius his Letters, who adviſed them by all means to finiſh the War, reſolved to make Peace, and left the Conditions thereof to him. He having a reſpect rather to equity than the profit of the Conquerours, made a League with them, neither taking from them any Grounds, nor any more Money, nor receiving any Hoſtages to ſecure their obedience, which procured him much evil will, and deprived him of the due honour of a Triumph. They ordered him to aſſiſt his Colleague againſt the Volſci; but he complaining grievouſly of them to the People, and ſuggeſting to the Multitude that they were angry, becauſe the War was finiſhed, out of a deſire to have the Peoples thoughts diverted from the Agrarian Law, disbanded his Army, as alſo that of Furius, and hereby afforded much matter for contention betwixt the Nobility and Commons. The year following, being the firſt of the ſeventy ſixth Olympiad, wherein Scamander of Mitylene was Victor in the courſe, and Phædon Archon at Athens, the new Conſuls, C. Horatius, and T. Menenius, found ſome obſtruction in the Levies; the Commons ſtill complaining that the Agrarian Law was not executed. But neceſſity cut off the diſpute, eleven ſeveral Cities of Hetruria having declared againſt the Veientes, for making Peace without publick conſent, and forced them to break it. The pretence was, for that the Fabii were not drawn off from Cremera, who ſending Intelligence to the Senate of this intended breach, it ordered Menenius to march into Hetruria, as Horatius againſt the Volſci. While Menenius loitered in his Expedition, Cremera was taken, and the Fabii all cut off. Some wrote that it was by an Ambuſh, as they were returning to Rome, to ſacrifize for the whole Family, according to their cuſtom. But others delivered more probably, that being accuſtomed to make depredations, they were drawn into Snairs by the Hetruſcans (who cauſed herds of Cattel to be driven thither, where they had beſtowed a ſufficient quantity of men) and being overpowred, were all at length deſtroyed, though with the great loſs of the Aſſaliants, except ſuch as they had left to keep the Cattel. Theſe were ſo far from being diſcouraged at what had befallen their Fellows, that they alſo ſtood it out to the laſt man, enduring all extremity, and fighting when half dead, with Weapons wreſted from the Hands of their Enemies.

All the adventurers are cut off.

71. A Tradition remained to poſterity, that three hundred and ſix of this Family being cut off, none remained except one Boy, who for his youth could not ſerve in the Expedition. Dionyſius ſheweth the Vanity hereof, by theſe reaſons. 1. All except one could not be unmaried, or without Children, for an antient Law commanded all at a legitimate age to marry, and provide for Poſterity, which being diligently obſerved till their age, the Fabii alone would not contemn:

A. M. 3528.
Ol. 15. an. 4.
V. C. 277.
Xerxis 9.

Whether only one Boy remained of the family.

but, 2. Grant this; it is not to be granted, that none of thoſe had a Brother of young years. 3. If their Fathers had been ſo utterly deprived of their Sons, yet certainly all would not have been ſo old and dry, as to deſpair of any more Iſſue, and conſequently make no proviſion for it by mariage. 4. And if they had no Fathers living, yet would it be a prodigious thing to ſuppoſe that none of them left any Son as yet an Infant, a Wife with Child, or a young Brother. This is true, that of the three Brothers, Cæſo, Marcus, and Quintus, in the Family of whom the Conſulſhip had continued for ſeven years, Marcus only left a young Son, beſides whome none of this Name afterwards being famous, thence the report might riſe that none elſe was preſerved. Concerning the time of this Defeat Authors ſomething differ. (a) Macrobius maketh the day to have been the ſeventeenth of the Calends of Sextilis; (b) Plutarch after the Summer ſolſtice, and about the full Moon in the middle of the month Quintilis. (c) Livy and (d) Tacitus on the fifteenth of the Calends of Sextilis, which ſuiteth with that of Plutarch, and (e) Ovid on the Ides of February.

(a) Lib. 1. c. 16.
(b) In Camillo & Problem.
(c) Lib. 6.
(d) Lib. 18.
(e) Faſt. 2.

The Veientes peirce within two miles of the City.

72. The Veientes having recovered the Caſtle, went confidently againſt the Roman Legions, which lay incamped not far off, and as was thought might have relieved the Fabii, but that Menenius the Conſul out of envy would not make uſe of the opportunity. They took the advantage of his unskilfulneſs, and ſeized on an Hill near unto him, where placing a Guard, they made Sallies upon the Camp, and ſo ſtraightned it, that they brought him to fight upon very unequal terms, and put his Army to the worſt. The Romans forſook their Camp, and fled in ſo tumultuous a manner, that had the Veientes not been too greedy of Plunder, they might utterly have deſtroyed them. The day following they invaded the Roman Territories, and came as far as the Hill Janiculus, two miles from the City, whereon they ſeized, and thence made excurſions to the great diſgrace of the Romans. Horatius the other Conſul returning from the Volſci, overthrew them twice, and gave the People ſome reſpit from their fear. The following year two skilful men in Military matters, Sp. Servilius and A. Virginius, entred the Conſulſhip after the Summer ſolſtice in the month Sextilis. Now the Hetruſcan War, though difficult enough, ſeemed profitable, compared with domeſtick Affairs; for the ſeizing upon the Mount, and the depredations thence made had hindred Tillage for the laſt Winter, and no Traffick having been for that time, there was ſuch ſcarcity of Corn that the City was brought into extream want, containing one hundred and ten thouſand men of ripe age, as appeared at the next Cenſus, beſides Women and Children, Slaves, Merchants, and Artificers (for no Roman Citizen was allowed to keep a Victualling-houſe, or to exerciſe any ſordid Trade) thrice as many. The People made great Tumults, and were ready to take away violently the proviſions of the rich: the Tribunes alſo made great diſturbance.

Menenius fined for the miſcarriage of the Fabii.

73. The Conſuls laboured to ſatisfie the pooreſt ſort by buying in all they could, and cauſing ſuch as had Corn to ſell it, till their Levies were finiſhed. Then led they out by night againſt the Enemy, and paſſing the River before day, unexpectedly fell upon him, and got a bloody Victory: after which the Mount was forſaken by the Garriſon, which having no relief ſent in, retired to Veii. This War being ended, Menenius the laſt years Conſul was called to an account, and condemned in a pecuniary Mulct for ſuffering the Fabii to miſcarry, whom the people ſo gratefully eſteemed, that they hated all who ſeemed to have been to blame as to their defeat, and placed the day thereof amongſt their Nefaſti, or unlucky ones, wherein no good Work was to be begun. The following year alſo, when Servilius was out of his Office, he was called before the people, for that in the laſt Battel againſt the Hetruſcans, he had ſo unadviſedly purſued the Enemy, as thereby to loſe the Flower of his Army; but the Mans abilities being conſidered, and his own defence with that of his Collegue weighed (who deſired either to ſtand or fall with him) he was acquitted. This year and that following, the Veientes were ſo overpowred, having been overthrown in Battel together with their Aſſociates the Sabines, and now cloſely beſieged, begged Peace once more, and having with a whole years pay for the Conſuls Army, and money for two months proviſion purchaſed leave to ſend to the Senate, obtained a Truce for fourty years. The next year being the firſt of the ſeventy ſeventh Olympiad, wherein Dates an Argive was Victor, and Chares Archon, L. Æmilius Mamercus the third time, and Vopiſcus Julius were Conſuls. Their Conſulſhip was very turbulent through the attemps of Cn. Genatius Tribune of the People, who required them to divide the Grounds formerly Decreed to the people by the Senate. They

Great ſtirs about the Agrarian.

They denied it belonged to them to execute what had been Decreed in the Conſulſhip of others, and alleged that a Senatus Conſultum was not of force, but for one year. Becauſe he could not compel his Superiours, he ſet the day to Manlius and Furius, the laſt year's Conſuls, to anſwer before the People, why they did not divide the grounds, pretending ſome reaſons wherefore they ought to be queſtioned more than others, though it was now twelve years ſince the paſſing of the Decree, and alleging, that except the preſent Magiſtrates were quickned by a ſence of puniſhment inflicted upon others, they would never ſet upon the work.

74. The Patritians exceedingly ſtartled at ſo bold and impudent an attempt, reſolved by force of Arms, if fairer means would not prevail, to protect the accuſed, and the City might have been in blood had not Genatius died ſuddenly that very morning, no ſign of violence appearing on the Body. This al'ayed the fury of the multitude, and the Sedition might have been quite appeaſed, had the Conſuls born their ſucceſs with moderation, and conſidered what was fitting for the time. But making new Levies, they would force one P. Volero, who had before-time been an Officer, to go in the preſent expedition as a Common Soldier, and when he alleged that he ought not to be compelled ſo to ſerve, for that he had not deſerved it by any offence, they commanded him to be ſtrip't and beaten. He flying to the aſſiſtance of the Tribunes appealed to the People, wherewith they not being at all moved, he became a Tribune to himſelf, with blows repelling one or two Lictors: and when the Conſuls ſent all their Officers to take him, ſuch Plebeians as ſtood by calling one upon another reſcued him from their hands. This diverted mens minds from thoughts of Land, and raiſed a zeal for privilege and liberty; the Patritians complaining that the Chief Magiſtrates ſhould be ſo contemned, and the Plebeians alleging it was a great breach upon their right for a Roman Citizen not to be heard when he appealed to the people, but ſcourged like a Slave: and they demanded Juſtice of the Senate againſt the Conſuls; with theſe ſtirs, without any other thing of moment, was their Conſulſhip paſſed over. For the following year Volero an impudent fellow, obtained, though a man of meaneſt condition, to be Tribune, having made himſelf popular by reſiſting that Office, which was once equal to the Kingly, and promiſing that he would clip the power of the great ones. He propoſed a Law for holding the Aſſemblies of Tribes at the Election of Tribunes, inſtead of the other of the Curiæ, betwixt which there was this difference. In the Curiata Comitia were ſuch things treated on, and confirmed by the ſuffrages of the Curiæ, as the Senate had firſt Decreed, and that with the Auſpicia; for except the birds predicted good, the Comitia were null and fruſtrate. But the Tributa Comitia were managed without any conſulting of the Senate, without the ſuperſtitious obſervation of birds (called Auſpicia, and obſerved at the Election alſo of Patritian Magiſtrates) and all things were determined by the ſuffrages of the Tribes gathered apart.

A Law propoſed for Creation of Tribunes in the Aſſembly of Tribes.

75. When the day for determination of the queſtion was come, great endeavours were uſed on both ſides; the whole time conſumed in ſpeeches, for, and againſt the Law. The Tribunes then put it off till the Trinundinum, againſt which time the Patritians improving all their intereſt, Volero reſolved by force to keep them from the Comitia, and the Conſuls from diſwading the thing, becauſe they carried mighty highly, and with their friends, and Clients, took up a great part of the Forum. He was prevented by a grievous plague, which like a Torrent carried away multitudes, ſo as his year being out before he could accompliſh his deſign, by his great promiſes he obtained to be Tribune again, as alſo his two Collegues who ſided with him in this enterprize. The Fathers to ballance him procured to be made Conſul Appius Claudius, the Son of Appius, abſent, againſt his will, and to their own prejudice. His Collegue was T. Q. Quintius Capitolinus, of a contrary diſpoſition. Appius was all for Wars, that by expeditions the multitudes might be diverted from Seditious Attempts, the effects of idleneſs; and Quintius contended that cauſes were not to be ſought for, leſt the ordinary ſort being forced to unneceſſary War, ſhould break out into rage, and trample Magiſtracy under their feet; and the Government being his, ſaith Dionyſius, this month, he prevailed. But Volero renewed his endeavour for the Law, and thereto added, that the Ædiles ſhould be elected by the Tributa Comitia, as alſo whatſoever ſhould concern the Commons, might be tranſacted, and paſſed in them, which tended to no other than to transfer the power from the Senate to the people. Appius now earneſtly preſſed

Appius and Quintius Conſuls.

to make Levies, and undertake ſome expedition; but Quintius prevailed that they ſhould rather go about to diſſwade the people by reaſons, than to compel them by force.

Appius ſpoileth all.

Is commanded to depart the Aſſembly.

76. Quintius to this purpoſe made a ſeaſonable Speech in the Aſſembly, and ſo far prevailed, that the Law as unjuſt had been laid aſide, but that his Collegue uſed, though juſt and true, yet unſeaſonable words, ſpeaking to the Commons, not as free Citizens, who had an hand in making, and abrogating Laws, but as a rabble of baſe perſons. He upbraided them with unthriftineſs, defrauding of their Creditors, revolting from the Conſuls, and voluntary Exile; as alſo perjury, and turning of the Weapons taken up in defence of their Country, into its bowels. He ſaid, it was no wonder that ſuch as they were ſhould proceed thus from one wicked Act to another, inſtancing in their ſeditious Attempts for the gaining of the juſt power of the Patritians. Having ſpared no contumelious, or afronting language, he came to that which gave moſt offence: that the State would never be at reſt ſo long as the Tribunitial power remained; for as much as it was impoſſible that what took its Original from violence, iniquity, ſedition, fear of a Civil War, and other abominable things, could produce any profitable effects. He concluded with an aſſeveration, that as long as he was Conſul, he would neither ſuffer this, nor any other Law to paſs without approbation of the Senate, and this he would ſtand by, both with Words and Deeds alſo if need ſhould require; ſo that, if never before, they ſhould learn in his Office, of what force was the Conſulſhip. Then ſtood up C. Lictorius, the principal man amongſt the Tribunes, and in anſwer to his accuſations related what labours the Commons had ſuſtained before, and ſince the baniſhment of Tarquinius; how, for all this pain and danger, they were not made partakers of any thing which they had obtained by their blood, till forced to ſeperate from the Patritians. That then they got this Office of Tribuneſhip, as a protection for the poor, with other Laws afterwards, as of judging the Patritians, and tranſlating the ſuffrages from the Centuriata to the Curiata Comitia, all which he accounted nothing. Then reproving Appius ſharply, he told him he would ſhew him of what force that Office was upon which he had trampled, and the power of the people called by him ſordid, and without Houſe or Harbour. Having ſpoken this, he ſwore moſt ſolemnly that he would, and not live except the Law paſſed, and commanding ſilence, when all men expected earneſtly what he would do, he ſawcily required Appius to depart the Aſſembly.

And to be ſent to priſon.

Is defended.

The People ſeize on the Capitol.

The Law paſſeth.

Appius his Soldiers refuſe to fight.

77. Appius not obeying, but incircling himſelf with a Company he had brought for that purpoſe, having made ſilence to be proclaimed by a Crier, he declared that the College of Tribunes commanded the Conſul to be carried to priſon, and therewith ſent an Officer to apprehend him. He was beaten back by the Lictors, whereat Lictorius himſelf exhorting the multitude to ſtick to him, went to lay hands on him. Appius being defended with a company of ſtout young men, a great and unſeemly Conteſt followed with railings and thruſtings to and fro: and at length it came to blows, and caſting of ſtones. The Conſul Quintius by his intreaties throwing himſelf into the middle, and the more grave Senators, hindred the tumult from proceeding to further inconvenience, which was ended ſhortly after by the night. Several days were ſpent with mutual recriminations; but at length the Tribunes and People ſeized on the Capitol, and there kept watch night and day. The Senators were very ſollicitous what to do, both in reſpect of the danger, and the difference betwixt the Conſuls; for Quintius thought the Commons deſiring no unjuſt thing, were to be gratified; but Appius would rather die than yield. Quintius taking great pains, at length procured the Tribunes to refer the Law to the diſcretion of the Senate, which after a long diſſwaſion of Appius, and perſwaſion of the Tribunes, permitted it to be put to the queſtion of the Comitia, wherein the Commons readily paſſed it. After this, the Conſuls were ſent out with the Armies; Quintius againſt the Æqui, whoſe Territories he waſted, and he returned with honour, which his Soldiers were careful to purchaſe for him; but Appius going againſt the Volſci, bore himſelf ſo auſterely towards his men, that they would not obey him, but out of hatred, and to procure him an ignominious retreat, when they came to fight, retired to their Camp without ſtriking a ſtroak, and no more could he draw them forth againſt the Enemy, ſo that he was conſtrained to depart homewards, and in his way put to death ſuch Centurions and Enſigns, as had been faulty, with every tenth man in the Army. Some were beheaded, and ſome knocked on the head with clubs: this decimation being an uſual puniſhment amongſt the Romans, of ſuch as had forſaken or loſt their Colours.

78. The following Conſuls Q. Valerius again, and Tib. Æmilius, being both well affected towards the Commons (the former out of envy to the Patritians, for that they had denied his Father a Triumph, and the later becauſe he would reconcile himſelf to the multitude, offended by him for accuſing Caſſius the Author of the Agrarian Law, when he was Quæſtor) promiſed the Tribunes to promote in the Senate the diviſion of publick grounds. The Tribunes in confidence of their aſſiſtance, came into the Senate, and ſpake very mildly in favour of the Law, which the Conſuls would not contradict, leſt they ſhould ſeem to ſeek after contention, but asked the ancienter Senators their opinions. L. Valerius Father to the Conſul, preſſed the diviſion of Lands; but Appius ſo ſeverely and plainly withſtood it by ſeveral invincible reaſons, that he carried it againſt the other, for which the Tribunes ſet him a day to anſwer before the People for his life. The crimes were: That he gave ill advice againſt the Commons, raiſed Sedition, laid violent hands ſorſooth on the Sacroſanct Body of the Tribune, and being General of an Army had received a defeat, and returned with ignominy. The Patritians exceedingly concerned, left nothing unattempted to ſave him, and deſired him, that giving way to the time, he would take the habit agreeable to his condition; but he flatly refuſed to do any thing poorly, or unworthy of his Anceſtors, adding, that he would die a thouſand deaths rather than touch the knees of any, as was the cuſtom of Supplicants. He forbad his friends to ſupplicate for him, ſaying, his ſhame would be doubled, if he ſaw any do that in his behalf, which he himſelf diſdained to do. Giving out many ſuch like ſpeeches, he neither changed his apparel, nor his countenance, nor remitted any thing of his antient magnanimity, but when he ſaw the whole City earneſtly intent upon his Tryal, a few days before the appointed time he killed himſelf. His friends gave out that he died of a natural death, and the Body being brought forth into the Forum, his Son was there ready, and asked leave of the Conſuls to commend him in a funeral Oration, according to the cuſtom. The Tribunes commanded the body to be taken away without any ceremony; but the People was thereat diſpleaſed, and ſuffered the young man to perform this laſt and uſual Office of honour to his deceaſed Father.

He croſſeth the Agrarian, for which he is called to anſwer for his life.

Before the Trial he killeth himſelf.

79. For this and the two following years the Romans fought ſucceſſively againſt the Æqui, Sabines, and Volſci. From the later was taken Antium, being ſurrendred to T. Quintius Capitolinus the Conſul, who placed therein a Garriſon. In the following year, wherein were Conſuls Tib. Æmilius again, and Q. Fabius (ſon to one of the three brothers, that with their friends and Clients died at Cremera) the Tribunes made new ſtirs about the Agrarian, and Æmilius furthering the buſineſs, the Senate to gratifie the multitude, decreed that ſome part of the Lands lately taken from the Volſci and Antiates, ſhould be divided. Yet not many would give their names, being unwilling to forſake their native Country, ſo that the Colony was made up out of the Latines and Hernici. The Conſuls marched, Æmilius againſt the Volſci, and Fabius againſt the Æqui; both had ſucceſs; the later forcing the Æqui to beg Peace, the conditions whereof were left to him by the Senate. But the Æqui receiving the Fugitives of Aatium, ſuffered them to make excurſions into the Territories of the Latines, and refuſed to give them up, whereupon ſucceeded another War, though the Romans obtained a bloody Victory, in the third year after the making of the Peace. In the next Conſulſhip which was executed by L. Ebutius and P. Servilius Priſcus, fell a more grievous plague upon the City than ever before hapned. It firſt conſumed almoſt all Cattel, and from the Country came into the City, wherein it ſwept away an innumerable company of ſlaves, and a fourth part of the Senators, and amongſt theſe the Conſuls, with moſt of the Tribunes. Livy writeth, that the Ædiles ſupplied the place of Conſuls. The diſeaſe began about the Calends of September, and continued that whole year, ſparing no Sex nor Age.

A moſt grievous plague.

80. When this was known by the neighbour Nations, the Volſci and Æqui, ſuppoſing the time of deſtroying the Roman Empire to be come, provided all things for a Siege, and to divert the Romans invaded the Latines and Hernici their aſſociates. Theſe ſending to Rome for aid, Eubutius was already dead, and Servilius as yet alive, in ſmall hope aſſembled the Senators, who were brought half dead in their Litters to the Court. They gave them liberty to defend themſelves, which doing, when the Enemies had waſted their grounds at their pleaſures, they marched for Rome, but contrary to their expectations, found it ſufficiently guarded, though with ſick and feeble men. When the next Conſuls were created, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Geminus, the Peſtilence ceaſed; and all things being quiet at home (for the Tribunes making adoe according to the cuſtom about the Agrarian, were commanded by the people to deſiſt, and expect better times) they invaded thoſe who had taken advantage at the publick calamity. They had good ſucceſs abroad, and better near home, when the Æqui in their abſence came and thought to have ſurprized the City. For underſtanding the Walls to be furniſhed with armed men, and four Cohorts of ſix hundred apiece to ſtand before the Gates, they altered their courſe when they came to Tuſculum; but Lucretius met and gave them battel, which they were haſty to imbrace before the coming of his Colleague. For a time they fought couragiouſly; but ſeeing a band of men behind them, which came from a certain Caſtle, they thought it had been the other Conſul, and fearing to be incloſed ran away, having loſt both their Captains, and many other valiant men. Afterwards without any let, the Conſuls waſted the Territories both of the Æqui and Volſci, and returned home at the time of the Comitia: Lucretius in full Triumph, and Veturius in the other called Ovation, by decree of the Senate, with the like Pomp in all things, except that he entred on foot, and not in a Chariot; which words conclude the ninth Book of Dionyſius his Roman Antiquities.

War with the Æqui and Volſci.

Dionyſ. l. 10.

Freſh ſtirs about new Laws.

A. M. 3545.
Ol. 80. an. 1.
V. C. 294.
Artax. Longim. 5.

81. For the year following (which was the firſt of the eightieth Olympiad, wherein Torymbas the Theſſalian was Victor, and Phraſicles Archon) P. Volumnius and Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus were created Conſuls, who having nothing to do abroad, imployed themſelves at home in defending the power of the Patritians againſt the Commons, now much inſtigated againſt it by their Tribunes. They were come ſo far, as to aſſert, that it was moſt agreeable with the conſtitution of a free State, for the Citizens to have equal power in Government. The People now would have all things done by the preſcript of Laws, whereof as yet there were none written, the Kings having judged according to their own diſcretion, and the Conſuls by certain preſidents of thoſe Princes formerly in power. The leaſt part was recorded in the Books of the Pontifices, which none could come at except the Patritians. C. Terentius or Terentillus Arſa according to Livy, Tribune of the Commons the foregoing year, had endeavoured to circumſcribe within certain limits the power of the Conſulſhip; but left the matter unfiniſhed, becauſe the greater part of Citizens were imployed in the War; the Conſuls on ſet purpoſe drawing it out in length, till the Comitia. Now the whole College of Tribunes renewed the attempt by the procurement of A. Virginius one of the number; the whole City being divided about it. Much contention there was in the Senate, betwixt the Tribunes and the contrary Faction; but at length, not doing any good in that place, they called the people together, and propoſed a Law, that ten men might be choſen in Lawful Aſſembly, ſuch as were moſt eminent for Age, prudence, and dignity, and who eſpecially reſpected their repute, and honour; that theſe men ſhould publiſh Laws both concerning private and publick buſineſs, by which right ſhould be preſcribed, both to private Perſons and Annual Magiſtrates. The Queſtion they put off till the Trinundinum, giving any one leave to ſpeak freely, either for or againſt it.

Cæſo Quintius called to an account.

82. The Patritians extraordinarily moved, that the Senate's authority in this matter was utterly neglected, both by fair and foul means laboured to hinder the debate; caſting the meaneſt ſort like Slaves out of the Forum, who minded their private commodity more than the publick Peace. Amongſt thoſe ſticklers Cæſo Quintius the Son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, was principal, one of great Nobility, beautiful in perſon, and very ſtout and expert in War. Him the Tribunes reſolved to make an example to all young men, and called him to anſwer for his life before the People. He refuſed to anſwer, except at the Tribunal of the Conſuls; but his Father earneſtly intreated for him, recounting the ſeveral eminent ſervices he had done for the State, and imputing this miſcarriage to his youth, and indiſcretion. The multitude plainly declared by ſigns, that they were ready to gratifie him, which when Virginius perceived, knowing, that if Cæſo eſcaped without puniſhment, the inſolence of the young Patritians would be intolerable, he procured M. Volſcius, one of his Colleagues, to tell a feigned ſtory, how in the time of the Plague he and his brother returning from a friends houſe in the night, were ſet upon by Cæſo and his drunken Companions in the Forum, who killed his brother outright, and left Volſcius himſelf half dead. He added, that both the Conſuls dying of the Plague, he could have no ſatisfaction, and in the ſucceeding Conſulſhip, whenſoever he cited Cæſo before the Magiſtrates (as ſeveral could bear witneſs) he received nothing but blows. This ſo inraged raged the multitude, that they had torn him in pieces, but that the Conſuls and ſome of the Tribunes kept them off. His Tryal then was deferred, not without a great controverſie, whether he ſhould lye in priſon, or be out upon Bail, the later whereof was at length accepted by the interpoſition of the Senate, and he fled into Hetruria, leaving his ten ſureties to pay the money, which was exacted of them by the Tribunes, who alſo condemned him. His Father ſold the greateſt part of his Eſtate to reinburſe the ſureties, and content with a ſmall quantity of ground beyond Tiber, and a little Cottage, ſuſtained himſelf very laboriouſly by the help of a few ſlaves; for grief and poverty abſtaining from the City and his friends, and neglecting to divert himſelf with publick ſolaces.

Flieth and is condemned.

A plot of the Tribunes.

Diſcovered by the Conſul.

83. The Tribunes were much croſſed in their expectations. For the calamity of Cæſo was ſo far from moderating the inſolency of the young Patritians, that they grew much higher, oppoſing the Queſtion both by words and deeds; ſo as in this Conſulſhip the Law could not be preferred. For the following year P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus, were created Conſuls; and the Commons made the ſame Tribunes as the year before, who perceiving the Law was not by perſwaſion to be enacted, ſought to terrifie both People and Conſuls. They cauſed various rumours to be ſpread, that Enemies had hatched a great conſpiracy againſt the Commons, then coming into the Senate, there affirmed it, pretending they had letters from ſome friends to aſſure them of it. They ſaid certain Senators were in the plot, but that the greateſt part conſiſted of the order of the Equites, which it was not ſeaſonable then to name; but they had deſigned in Conjunction with Cæſo Quintius the Exile, to murder the Tribunes with others by night, and then at their leaſure to reſcind whatever had been granted by the Senate to the Commons: In concluſion they deſired the inquiſition of ſo grievous a deſign might be committed unto themſelves. The Senate being very ſollicitous, Claudius the Conſul (who was fully perſwaded that what the Tribunes went about was the only conſpiracy) by ripping up their deſigns concerning the Agrarian Law, and the bad ſucceſs of their endeavours which put them upon this Exploit, fully convinced the Fathers how the matter ſtood, eſpecially when they would neither name their friends from whom the Letter came, nor the Meſſenger: and though the Tribunes highly complained of him, and the Senate, unto the People, yet the moſt ſober amongſt the Commons were ſatisfied with his reaſons. Whilſt the heat of this contention remained, the City fell into ſuch danger from outward Enemies as never before, which, ſaith Dionyſius, had been foretold by Sibyll's Books that it would ariſe out of inteſtine diviſion, and was likewiſe ſignified by the prodigies of the foregoing year, when beſides ſtrange ſights and noiſes, it rained pieces of fleſh, of which ſome were devoured by all ſorts of birds before they fell to the ground, and the reſt continued long upon the Earth, without either change of colour or ſmell.

Ap. Herdonius ſeizeth on the Capitol.

Which is retaken.

84. Ap. Herdonius a Sabine with four thouſand men ſeized upon the Capitol, and called the Slaves to their liberty. At this time of extream danger, the Tribunes made what diſturbance they could, inſtigating the multitude not to fight againſt the Enemy, except the Patritians would ingage by Oath to create ten men for the making of Laws, and ſuffer the Commons to live with them upon equal terms of privilege. Claudius would have wholly omitted them, and carried on the War by the Patritians, and their Clients only; but Valerius thought it neceſſary to have a cloſure in the body before it ſhould go about to defend it ſelf from outward attempts, and therefore promiſed with an Oath, that if the people would chearfully carry on that War, as ſoon as peace was reſtored, he would permit the Tribunes to put the queſtion, and indeavour to ſatisfie the deſire of the Commons. Claudius then being appointed to look to the City, Valerius on all ſides ſet upon the Capitol, which was taken by ſtorm, though he loſt his life, having omitted neither the part of an able General nor valiant Soldier; For though he had received many wounds, yet he gave not over, till climbing the Walls a great ſtone was tumbled down upon him, which took away his life. The War being ended, the Tribunes required of Claudius to make good the promiſe of his Collegue; but he deferred the matter by ſeveral pretences, and at length alleged he could do nothing of himſelf. He appointed then the Comitia for Creation of a new Conſul into the room of Valerius. The Patritians were very ſollicitous to get ſome choſen that would defend their intereſt, and reſolved upon L. Quintius Father to Cæſo, lately baniſhed, who at the day appointed was choſen by all the Centuries of the firſt Claſſis, as well Equites as the other,

Sect. 1.

Quintius made Conſul.

other, ſo that the reſt of the Claſſes were not called. They that were ſent to fetch Quintius into the City, found him at Plow without as much as a Coat about him, only in his Truſs, and a Cap on his head. Seeing the company make towards him, he wondred what it meant, but being told by a Viator that run before, he put on other apparel, and in a ſeemlier habit preſented himſelf. Being ſaluted not by his own name, but by that of Conſul, inveſted with Purple, honoured by the Faſces, and other Enſigns of Magiſtracy, he was deſired to begin his journey, whereat pauſing a little he anſwered with tears: Then for this year this little field ſhall be unſown, and we ſhall be in danger of want. After this, taking leave of his Wife, and commending his houſhold affairs to her care, he departed for the City.

His carriage in his Office.

85. Quintius reſtrained the Tribunes from preferring the Law, by denouncing, that except they were quiet, he would lead out all the Citizens againſt the Volſci. When they ſaid they would not permit him to make Levies, he called the people, and put the younger ſort in mind of their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had bound themſelves to the Conſuls to follow whitherſoever he would lead them, and not be wanting to the Majeſty of the Roman people. He affirmed they were all obnoxious to him by this Oath now he was Conſul, and ſware he would animadvert upon Offenders according to the Laws. Herewith he commanded the Standards to be moved out of the Ærarium, and told them that to make them know they ſhould have no leaſure for Tribunitial Actions in his Conſulſhip, he let them underſtand, he would not return out of the Enemie's Country till his office was at an end, and bade them prepare for wintring in the Camp. The multitude terrified hereat, deſired him to forbear this rigour, and he did it upon this condition, that they would not moleſt him for his whole time, but ſuffer him to ſpend it in adminiſtring Juſtice. He behaved himſelf with ſuch Prudence, Juſtice, painfulneſs, and courteſie, that the Commons thought they ſtood not in need now of any new Laws, and the Senate was deſirous to have him Conſul for the following year, to oppoſe him to the Tribunes, who executed that Office now the third time. But as he approved it not in them, ſo he himſelf would not commit the ſame fault as he counted it, and in the Aſſembly ſpeaking much againſt ſuch as would not quit their Office when their time was finiſhed, ſwore moſt religiouſly, that he would not accept the Conſulſhip till he had laid down his preſent charge. Having finiſhed a new Election, he betook himſelf to his little Cottage, and his former laborious courſe of life.

Dionyſius ut ſupra. Livius l. 3.

He is made Dictator.

He overthroweth the Æqui.

86. The year following the Æqui ſurprized Tuſculum, which action cauſed a War betwixt them and Rome, wherein they were worſted, together with their friends the Volſci, and forced to beg peace. But in the next Conſulſhip they were drawn again to revolt, and making War upon the Latines, by Gracchus Clælius their Captain, an induſtrious man, who had improved the power granted him by his Country almoſt to regallity. He drew the Roman Army into ſo diſadvantagious a place, that it was thought convenient to make a Dictator, which was L. Quintius Cincinnatus. The Meſſengers found him newly dreſſed; for when he eſpied the company, ſuſpecting they came to him, he left the Country-work he was in hand with, and put on his better Clothes. Seeing himſelf made Dictator, by the trapped Horſes, the twenty four Axes, the Purple, and other royal Enſigns, he was ſo far from being delighted with this honour, that he ſaid with indignation: This year's Crop will alſo be loſt by reaſon of mine imployment, and my family muſt be famiſhed. When he came to the City he incouraged the people, and named Maſter of Horſmen, L. Tarquinius, a man of no great eſteem by reaſon of his poverty, but a good Soldier: Having gathered together the Forces, he gave Clælius battel, and beat him into his Camp, which having beſieged ſome time, he forced the Æqui to give him up, with other incendiaries, to be puniſhed with death according to their deſerts, as alſo to paſs under the Jugum (two Spears ſet in the ground, and a third laid over upon them in form of a pair of Gallows) in token of ſervitude; and becauſe they had the year following without any provocation plundred Tuſculum, to ſuffer him to deal in the like manner with Corbio. The choiceſt part of the plunder he cauſed to be carried to Rome; the reſt he gave to his own Soldiers, and thoſe of T. Quintius the Quæſtor, ſaying, that the other of Minutius the Conſul, who had been beſieged by the Enemy, ought to be content that they fell not as a prey into his hands. Having cauſed Minutius to lay down his Office, he returned to the City with a more illuſtrious Triumph than any Captain before him, (the General of the Æqui, and other Eminent Priſoners in Chains preceding his Chariot) having overthrown a ſtrong Army, and plundered, and fortified a City of the Enemy within ſeventeen days after his Creation. That abſolute power which he might have kept for ſix months he preſently reſigned, having firſt given an account of his adminiſtration. And when the Senate and his private friends would have enriched him with publick Ground, Plunder, and Contributions, he utterly refuſed it, and betaking himſelf again to his ſmall Cottage, preferred a laborious life before Kingly power, for that he pleaſed himſelf more in his poverty, than others in the abundance of their wealth.

87. The year following, the Sabines, whoſe grounds the other Conſul Nautius had waſted, as alſo the Æqui, were in Arms, having retaken Corbio, againſt whom when Levies came to be made, the Tribunes again withſtood them, being all new Created the fourth time. Hereupon the Fathers with weeping eyes ſignified to the People, that being forſaken by them, who hitherto had ſtiled themſelves their Children, they would go forth and fight againſt the Enemy in their own perſons, wherewith the multitude being ſore moved, and Virginius ſeeing that do he what he could they would give their names, he averred it to be the reſolution of the Commons to live and die with them; only they deſired ſome reward for all their pains and danger, which was, that they might live in equal freedom. If this could not be granted, they waved it, and deſired another thing, which he was ſure would not intrench upon the Senate's privileges. The Conſul affirming the thing ſhould be propoſed if they would but refer it to the Senate, he deſired that the number of the Tribunes might be increaſed unto ten. The Senate debating the matter, C.Claudius, the ſon of Appius the Elder, ſpake againſt it, alleging, that the Commons would never be ſatisfied; but Quintius, who now bore the greateſt ſway, commended the opinion of Appius, that the * only way to croſs the deſign of the Tribunes was to ſet them one againſt another; and if ſo, it would make more for the Intereſt of the Senate to have their number increaſed. Accordingly a Senatus Conſultum was drawn, that it ſhould be lawful for the Commons to increaſe their College of Tribunes to the number of ten, and it was preſently confirmed by the People. After this the Sedition being appeaſed, the Conſuls levied Forces, and managed the War ſucceſfully againſt the Sabines and Æqui.

* Vide ſupra Parag. 66.

The number of Tribunes increaſed to ten.

A.M. 3350.
Ol. 81. ann. 2.
V. C. 280.
Art. Longim. 10.

88. The enſuing year, being the ſecond of the eighty firſt Olympiad, and the two hundred and ninty ſeventh year of the City according to Cato, as the two hundred and ninty eighth after the account of Varro, had for Conſuls M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius, who having nothing to do abroad, had too much employment in the City. Before this time, the Tribunes only reigned in the Aſſemblies, neither taking upon them to call together the Senate, nor give their voices therein. But now they ventured to aſſemble the Fathers, by the procurement of Icilius principal of the College, an induſtrious, and eloquent man, who preſumed to make a further innovation in the State, requiring the Aventine Mount for the People to build upon, which being a mile and an half in circuit, was not as yet fully inhabited, but publick, and full of wood. The Tribune moving the Conſuls to procure a Decree of the Senate for his new project, and they deferring the matter, an Apparitor was ſent from the College to cite the Conſuls before it. He applying himſelf to one of their Lictors, was beaten, and ſent back, which ſo inraged the Tribunes, that apprehending the Lictor, they led him to the Tarpeian Rock, the Conſuls, though much troubled, not being able to reſcue him; for that none could hinder the execution of what the whole College reſolved; all they could do was to deſire ſome of the Tribunes themſelves to interpoſe. But this could not be effected, they having reſolved at the beginning not to diſſent from one another, that thereby they might preſerve their Authority inviolable. As concerning the Lictor, then they anſwered they were reſolved, yet they put not the man to death, giving his life to the intreaties of the graver ſort of Patritians, leſt that order ſhould be driven by juſt indignation to attempt ſome thing extraordinary. Having then aſſembled the Senate, the Conſuls ſharply reprehended them, but Icilius excuſed what had been done to the Lictor, by the ſacred Laws, which forbade all, both publick and private, to croſs a Tribune. By a premeditated Oration he endeavoured to ſhew, that he had not unjuſtly aſſembled the Senate, and when he had ſeemed ſufficiently to have anſwered the charge of the Conſuls, he mentioned the Law: That what private men were poſſeſſed of, and was juſtly gotten, ſhould remain unto them; what ground by force, or fraud, was already furniſhed with buildings, the expence of building being conſidered by arbitration, ſhould be recovered to the uſe of the People, and what was yet publick be divided amongſt them. He ſhewed that this Law would be exceedingly profitable for the ſuppreſſion of all Agrarian Seditions, foraſmuch as the Commons would be ſatisfied with poſſeſſions at home. No man diſſenting, except C. Claudius, a Decree of the Senate paſſed for it accordingly.

Their incroachments.

A Law for diviſion of certain grounds.

Diſſentions renewed.

89. The remainder of the year was ſpent in building. For the next were created Conſuls T. Romulius and C. Veturius; Icilius and his Colleague being continued in their Office: The civil diſſentions ſuppoſed to be removed by the late Law, were again revived, and the forein Enemies of the Commonwealth were in Arms, to the greater profit than diſcommodity of it. For ſuch a viciſſitude now there was, that Peace brought Sedition, and War procured Concord, which the chief Magiſtrates apprehending, wiſhed for nothing more than external motions, and when there was Peace abroad, ſought occaſion for War; as underſtanding the growth of the Citie's proſperity to be procured thereby. The preſent Conſuls were of this mind, being jealous of the beggerly and idle multitude. And their opinion was right, that they were to be diverted; but there they failed, that whereas in ſo ill a Craſis of the State, they ought to have proceeded gently, they admitted the excuſe of none who deſired exemption from the War, but ſeverely inflicted penalties upon all; which gave occaſion to the Tribunes to make diſturbance, crying out, that they violated the privilege of their Office, by impriſoning ſuch as appealed to it. From mutual revilings ſometimes it came to blows, both parties being berounded with thoſe of their faction,and the people not fully complying with the Tribunes in their demands,they went into the Senate, where they required, that the Conſuls might either lay down their Offices, or anſwer to their Crime againſt the Sacroſanct Tribunitial power before the People. The Senate determined nothing, ſeeing it dangerous to diminiſh the power either of the Conſuls or Tribunes, at which the later much diſcontented, returned to the multitude. Some were for departing again from the Patritians; others more moderate, would expect the courſe of Law againſt thoſe who had violated ſo ſacred an Office; and a third (the moſt ſober party) diſliked this as well as the other, for that the Conſuls were the Supreme Magiſtrates; and thought it meeter to puniſh their Abettors. If the Tribunes had not at length reſtrained their anger againſt Senate and Conſuls, the City that day had deſtroyed it ſelf, ſo intent were both parties upon Arms and War. But they ſet the Conſuls a day to anſwer before the People, and then were prevailed with to let the matter fall, telling the Commons that they remitted what concerned themſelves for their ſakes whom they ought not to deny it, but would revenge the injury done to the whole, to prevent an ill example.

The Agrarian Law after 30 years with another of epual right publiſhed.

90. This was by promulgating the Agrarian Law, which hitherto had layn dormant for thirty years, to which another was added of equal right, which the former year could not be paſſed. Having with an oath promiſed to prefer theſe Laws, they appointed a day for the Comitia, wherein having firſt themſelves ſpoken largely, ſeveral others related what good ſervice they had done for the Commonwealth, and laboured to ſhew how unworthy a thing it was for them to be defrauded of thoſe grounds, which by their labour and danger they had gained, and admitted to no part of reward. The multitude gladly hearing ſuch diſcourſes, none more affected mens minds than L. Siccius Dentatus, a man of admirable ſhape, fifty eight years old, and furniſhed with military eloquence, for a ſeditious attempt. He told them, he had ſerved his Country in the Wars fourty years, and been an Officer thirty; ſometimes a Centurion, afterwards a Tribune. He was raiſed to that honour by Sicinius the Conſul, for defending the Enſign of his Cohort, when the Centurion was ſlain, for which he was alſo adorned by his fellow Soldiers with a golden Crown. In another battel, wherein the Tribune of the Camp was ſtruck to the ground, and the Eagle (or Standard) taken, fighting for the whole Legion, he recovered it and ſaved him, for which the Tribune would have given him his place, but he refuſed it,and the Conſul made him Tribune of the firſt Legion, which Office was then void. Having thus purchaſed himſelf honour; to maintain his credit he ſpared no labour, nor refuſed any danger, being ever rewarded by the Conſuls with ſpoils,crowns, and other rewards and honours.

The atchievements of Siccius Dentatus.

91, In ſhort; during thoſe fourty years, he had fought one hundred and twenty battels,received fourty five wounds,all before and none behind,whereof twelve that day wherein he fought againſt Herdonius,who ſeized upon the Capitol. As for rewards wards after the ſeveral battels, he had obtained fourteen Civick Crowns (which ſaith Gellius, were beſtowed upon him who had preſerved the life of a Citizen, and were made of Oake, becauſe the moſt ancient meat was thought to be the fruit of that tree;) three Murals (which were given by the General unto him who firſt mounted the walls, and entred a Town, being adorned with an image of the battlements) and eight Golden Crowns; beſides eighty three Golden Chains, ſixty Golden Bracelets, eighteen pure Spears, (which were Spears having no iron at the ends of them, being alſo called Haſtæ donaticæ, and Haſtæ gramineæ,) and twenty three Horſe trappings, whereof nine were for killing Enemies that he had challenged to ſingle Combats. To this relation of Dionyſius, Gellius addeth a Crown, called Obſidionalis (which was given to one who had freed the preſenter from a Siege) and increaſeth the number of Bracelets to above one hundred and ſixty, that of Spears to twenty two, and the other of Horſe trappings to twenty five. He calleth him L. Sicinius Dentatus, and writeth, that for his incredible atchievements, he had the appellation of Achilles Romanus. Lib. 5. c. 6. Lib. 2. c. 11.

92. Siccius proceeded, ſaying, that though he had fought ſo many years, ſerved in ſo many Expeditions, received ſo many wounds, and helped to gain ſuch large Territories for the Roman People, yet neither he, nor his fellow-ſoldiers partakers with him in the ſame dangers, had received any portion of thoſe Lands, being poſſeſſed by others, who could neither ſhew title nor merit for them. After this, he accuſed the Patritians of having put Caſſius to death, for no other cauſe than favouring the Commons, as alſo of privily murdering Genutius the Tribune, eleven years after, which had terrified others ſince from ſuch attempts as his were. He mentioned the affronts lately made to the Tribunes, and concluded with an exhortation to the multitude, to free themſelves from this Tryanny of the great ones, by paſſing the Law without giving heed to the diſſawſions of any. The Aſſembly was ſo moved by his words, that they ſeemed impatient of any thing to be ſaid againſt it; but Icilius riſing up, after he had extolled the worth of the man, ſaid, it was neither juſt, nor agreeable with the cuſtom of the City, to hinder any one from ſpeaking againſt the Law, eſpecially ſuch an one as aſſerted right, and oppoſed violence. He adjourned then the Comitia till the next day, when he commanded all to be preſent, who would ſpeak any thing againſt it. The Patritians meeting at the Conſul's houſe in the evening, reſolved, if they could not with words, by deeds to hinder the paſſing of the Law, and betimes in the morning took up the Forum, ſpreading themſelves all over to hinder the uniting of the Commons. Tumults about the Law. The Comitia being full, thoſe that ſpake could not be heard, ſome incouraging, and others interrupting them with great clamours. The Conſuls proteſted againſt this carriage, and that if any violence ſucceeded, the Commons were the procurers of it; and the Tribunes anſwered, that they had heard long ſuch diſcourſes as they were now making. The day being far ſpent, the People required the ballots; but then the young Patritians hindred them from uniting in their Tribes, and ſnatched away the pots and ballots, beating out of the Forum the Officers attending for the gathering of Suffrages. The Tribunes crying out, and caſting themſelves into the throng, they gave way to them, where ever they went, but hindred ſuch as would have followed, and rendred their Office thereby unſerviceable. At length the Patritians prevailed againſt the paſſing of the Law, by the means of three Families eſpecially, viz. the Poſthumii, Sempronii, and Clœlii, moſt eminent for Nobility, Riches, and Clients, who, alſo, eſpecially hindred the confirmation of the Agrarian by a Plebiſcitum.

93. The Tribunes conſulting how to vindicate their cauſe, the moſt moderate opinion prevailed, that neither the Conſuls, nor any other Patritians, ſave thoſe of the three Families now mentioned, ſhould be called to anſwer before the People; and not for their lives, but eſtates, for reſiſting the Tribunes in preferring the Law. The Patritians gave way to it, and having redeemed the eſtates, reſtored them to the owners. Afterwards, when the Tribunes again went about to prefer the Law, news came that the Enemy was on his march to Rome, as far as Tuſculum, which place only ſtopped him, but could not long hold out. Diverted by War. Levies now being to be made, according to a Decree of the Senate, the Tribunes endeavoured to hinder them, but another Decree being publiſhed, that the Patritians with their Clients, and ſuch as voluntarily came in, would undertake the War; ſome for ſhame, ſome for plunder, and others to gratifie the Nobility, gave their names; and amongſt the reſt Siccius himſelf, whom followed a Cohort of eight hundred old Souldiers to do him honour, though excuſed from warfare by the Laws. A ſtrong Army being preſently raiſed, the Enemies retired, and were followed by the Conſuls to Antium, where the Armies lying incamped one againſt the other, the Æqui, confident of their ſtrength, at length provoked the Romans to fight. Romulius having then the command, ſent for Siccius, as the ſtory goes, and gave him order with his Cohort to go a certain way, and fall behind upon the Enemies Camp; intending either to diſgrace him upon refuſal, or deſtroy him by ſo impoſſible an undertaking. When Siccius laboured to ſhew him that the thing could not be done, he upbraided him with his ſpeeches uſed in the Comitia concerning his own exploits, and objected to him pretended valour. Herat he undertook the matter, and giving all to underſtand his caſe, departed with his men all weeping, to the regret of the Army, who expected of theſe eight hundred to ſee no man return alive. Siccius led them not the ſame way as the Conſul thought, which being mountainous, would have brought certain deſtruction to them aſcending, but another through a Wood, by which they came upon the Camp of the Æqui, where it was forſaken of the guard, now gone to behold the fight of the two Armies, before this time joyned. Falling in with a ſhout, the Æqui ſuppoſing the other Conſul preſent, forſook the Camp and fled, after which Siccius and his Cohort marched down towards the battel, whom the Enemy diſcovering on their back, and knowing their Camp to be taken, were alſo diſcouraged and fled: The Romans purſued them till night, and did great execution, but none ſo valiantly demeaned himſelf as Siccius Dentatus.

A plot againſt Siccius.

He eſcapeth as Conquerour.

He revengeth himſelf upon the Conſuls.

A new Law.

Romulius perſwadeth the Senate to ſubmit to new Laws.

Commiſſioners choſen to fetch ſome out of Greece.

94. Siccius having lodged himſelf and his men in the Enemies Camp, the next day ſet it and all the ſtuff therein on fire, and with haſte marched for Rome, on purpoſe to deprive the Conſuls of the honour they expected. Coming into the Forum, he related to the Tribunes and People the whole paſſage, how he and his old men being deſtined to ruin, had obtained the Victory. Hereby he not onely ingratiated himſelf with the People, but procured the diſpleaſure of the Senate alſo againſt the Conſuls, who were denied the honour of a Triumph. The Commons gratified Siccius in the higheſt meaſure they could, making him one of their Tribunes for the following year, wherein Sp. Tarpeius, and A. Ternius (or Thermus rather as Gellius hath it) were Conſuls. The firſt he did relating to his Office, was to ſet the former Conſuls a day to anſwer before the People, for violating the power of the Tribuneſhip, and deviſing the deſtruction of him and his Souldiers: and ſo reſolved was the whole College, that the judgment paſſed without interruption intended by the Patritians, and they were both condemned in a pecuniary mulct. The preſent Conſuls were hereby rendred more inclinable towards the Commons; ſo that they procured a Decree of the Senate, and a Law paſſed in the Centuriata Comitia, that All Magiſtrates ſhould have liberty to puniſh ſuch as violated their authority, which was formerly the privilege of the Conſuls onely. But the mulct was not left to their diſcretion, proviſion being made, that it ſhould not exceed the worth of two Oxen, or thirty Sheep; which Law was long obſerved by the Romans. After this, the Tribunes propounded to the Senate, that Laws might be made, which the Citie ſhoud uſe for ever. After a grave debate, the advice of Romulius the late condemned Conſul prevailed, who contrary to the expectation of both parties ſpoke in behalf of the thing propounded. He ſaid, he was for the intereſt of the Patritians as long as there was any hopes of its continuance, but finding things in ſuch a condition, as it muſt neceſſarily decline, he thought it wiſdom to comply with that neceſſity, and adviſed that Ambaſſadors might be ſent to the Greek Cities in Italy, and to Athens, thence to fetch ſuch Laws as were moſt excellent, and befitting the Commonwealth. After their return was to be propounded to the People the choice of Law-makers, what their power ſhould be, for how long, and what other things ſhould appertain to them. Siccius extraordinarily affected with the mans ingenuity, ſaid he was now friends with him, and remitted his fine; but he refuſed to forbear the payment of it, becauſe already ſacred to their gods. A Senatus Conſultum being made, and confirmed by a Plebiſcitum, Ambaſſadors were choſen to fetch Laws from the Greeks. Theſe were Sp. Poſthumius, Ser. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, to whoſe uſe Gallies were aſſigned, and furniſhed at the publick charge, as was ſuitable with the Majeſty of the Roman People.

95. For the following year, being the firſt of the eighty ſecond. Olympiad, wherein Lycus a Theſſalian of Lariſſa was Victor in the courſe Charephanes exerciſing ſing the Office of principal Archon, the three hundredth year of the City being now ended (as Dionyſius computeth, following the account of Cato) P. Horatius and Sext. Quintilius were Conſuls. Now fell a greater plague than ever had been known, upon both City and Country, which ſwept away Quintilius the Conſul, and Sp. Furius choſen in his place, with four Tribunes, and many Senators. The ſucceeding Conſuls were L. Menenius and P. Sextius, who took care for Corn to ſupply the City, which laboured under a famine, by reaſon that the grounds lay untilled the former year. In their year the Ambaſſadors returned out of Greece with Laws, preſently after which the Tribunes required, that according to the Senates Decree, law-makers might be appointed. The Conſuls knowing not how to deny them, yet unwilling to weaken the intereſt of the Patritians, deferred the matter, ſaying, that the time of the Comitia was at hand, after which they would labour, joyntly with the Conſuls Elect, in the buſineſs. The Tribunes were content; but when the Comitia were paſt, wherein Appius Claudius, and T. Genutius were choſen, they grew idle, and neglected the adminiſtration of affairs, as now belonging unto others; and Menenius was ſickly, pining away, as was thought, by melancholy; of which Sextius took advantage, pretending he could do nothing by himſelf. The Tribunes then betook themſelves to the Conſuls Elect, and though they had not yet entred upon their Magiſtracy, importuned them to gratifie the Commons, by propoſing great honours and rewards. Appius being elevated with the hope of a new kind of Magiſtracy, grew popular, and perſwaded his Collegue to a compliance, ſo that Sextius was forced to call together the Senate, and propound concerning Laws.

96. Many things were ſpoken, as well by thoſe that deſired a new model, as others, who thought it ſufficient to reſt ſatisfied in the cuſtoms of their Country. But the opinion of the deſigned Conſuls prevailed, which Appius the principal of the two delivered, being asked his advice, according to the cuſtom, before any other Senators. Their ſenſe was, that ten men out of the chief of the Senate were to be Elected, whoſe power continuing for a year ſhould be the ſame with that of the Kings and Conſuls, and all other Magiſtracies ceaſe till they might be renewed according to Laws: in the mean time the ten men, or Decemviri, were to adminiſter Juſtice to private men, and model the Commonwealth. When the day came wherein this Senatus Conſultum was to be confirmed by the People, the deſigned Conſuls reſigned their Office, for which they were exceedingly admired, and remembred in the choice. In the Centuriate Comitia were created App. Claudius and T. Genutius, late Conſuls Elect, P. Sextius Conſul for that preſent year, the three Ambaſſadors who fetched Laws out of Greece, P. Poſthumius. Ser. Sulpitius, A. Manlius, and one of the former year's Conſuls T. Romulius, who had been condemned by Siccius the Tribune, and afterwards was the author of this popular act: beſides theſe, out of the Senate C. Julius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all of Conſular dignity. The Tribunes, Ædiles, Quæſtors, and all other Magiſtrates were for a time deveſted of all power. Inſtead of Horatius, Livy mentioneth P. Curiatius.

The Decemviri choſen.

SECT.

Sect. II.

From the Creation of the Decemviri to the War of Privernæ, which fell out the ſame year that Darius Codomannus died.

Containing the ſpace of one hundred and twenty one Years.

The ſecond change of Government when.

A. M. 3554.
Ol. 82. ann. 2:
V. C. 302.
Artax. Longim. 14.

1. THe ſecond change in the Government (from Conſuls to Ten Men, or Decemviri, as the firſt was from Kings to Conſuls) hapned in the three hundred and ſecond year of the City, according to the account of Cato, and the three hundred and third after the computation of Tarrutius and Varro, which fell in with the ſecond and third years of the eighty ſecond Olympiad, the fourteenth of the Reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, four hundred and fourty nine before the Æra of Chriſt, A. M. 3554. and, as may be gathered both out of Dionyſius and Livy, on the Ides of May.

The acts of the Decemviri for the firſt year.

2. The Decemviri having taken upon them the Government, in reference to a new conſtitution, agreed that only one of them at one time ſhould have the Faſces and other conſular Enſigns. He aſſembled the Senate, confirmed the Decrees, and did other things agreeable with chief Magiſtracy. The reſt (to leſſen envy) differed little in habit from private men, having only an Accenſus, or ſort of Beadle, going before them, which Livy addeth to the relation of Dionyſius. They ſucceeded by turns, for a certain limited time, till the year went about. The preſent Poſſeſſor of the Faſces only ſaith Livy, but all of them as Dionyſius ſeemeth to mean, judged private cauſes together with publick ones belonging to their Subjects, and aſſociates. All things they managed with ſuch Juſtice and moderation, that the Commonwealth ſeemed moſt happy under them having no need of appeal. Appius above the reſt grew exceeding popular by his familiarity with the ordinary ſort; ſo as in a manner he carried away the praiſe from the whole College, for he had a further deſign than any of the reſt.

3. At length having made a model out of ſuch Laws as were brought out of Greece, and their own Country's Cuſtoms, they propoſed it to the view of all men in ten Tables, that any one might make exceptions; liberty being given to private perſons to inform the Law-makers, who conſulted much with the Nobility about the work. When all approved of them; a Senatus Conſultum paſſed, nemine contradicente, for the ratifying of theſe Laws, and the queſtion being put to the People in the Centuriata Comitia, they were confirmed moſt religiouſly in preſence of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Prieſts. Then were they ingraven in braſs, ſaith Dionyſius and others, in Ivory ſaith Pomponius the Lawyer, and propoſed to the publick view in the moſt conſpicuous part of the Forum, as Minos of old, according to Plato, and long after him Solon cauſed his Laws to be written in Tables by the Athenians called * Cyrbes and Axones. The year being almoſt out, the Decemviri moved the Senate about the Comitia. After a great debate it was reſolved to continue this kind of Magiſtracy for the following year; becauſe ſomething ſeemed yet wanting to the new model, through the ſhortneſs of time allotted to the work; but eſpecially for that by this Office the Tribuneſhip was ſuſpended, of which the Patritians had cauſe to be moſt jealous. The Commons thought they had good reaſon to concur with the Fathers in this choice, and the day for holding the Comitia was appointed.

* κύρβεις & Ἄξονες.

4 The moſt antient and honourable of the Fathers ſtood for this Office, fearing that if turbulent ſpirits were poſſeſſed of it, they might have a great advantage againſt the State. Above all others was Appius

extolled

Appius obtaineth to be Decemvir the ſecond time by cheating the credulous multitude.

extolled to the Skies, the Commons labouring earneſtly to retain him in his place, for that none had behaved himſelf better than he. He deſired to be excuſed, pretending he had rather be diſcharged of ſo troubleſom and ingrateful a work. At length overcome as it were by the intreaties of the people, he profeſſed himſelf amongſt the Candidates, and by accuſing all others, as owing him ill will for his publick ſpirit, made way for himſelf and his friends. In the Centuriata Comitia he was made Decemvir the ſecond time, and with him was joyned Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been Conſul three times, a man hitherto of unblameable carriage: out of the other Patritians by the procurement of Appius were created M. Cornelius, M. Servilus, L. Minucius, T. Antonius, and Manius Rabuleius, perſons of no great Eminency; and out of the Commons Q. Petilius, Cæſo Duellius, and Sp. Oppius, whom he took in, the more to ingratiate himſelf with the rabble, ſaying, it was juſt that the Commons ſhould ſhare in that Magiſtracy, which was to govern and command all.

He and his Collegues labour to eſtabliſh themſelves.

5. Appius, a man more popular than any Magiſtrate that ever governed, either King or Conſul, with his nine Collegues, entred his Office on the Ides of May, which ſaith Dionyſius hapned in the full Moon, according to the courſe whereof months at that time were obſerved. The firſt thing the Decemviri did, was mutually to agree and confirm by Oath to be of one mind, not to hold the Aſſemblies, but perpetually to retain the power in their own hands: to admit none into their number, and to be of equal power and authority amongſt themſelves: to make uſe of Senatus Conſultum's, and Plebiſcitum's, but rarely, and never except in caſe of neceſſity, acting moſt things by virtue of their own power. On the firſt day (which to the Romans was ever Feſtival and Religious) after their ſuperſtitious Ceremonies were over, they all appeared with regal Enſigns, which exceedingly terrified the People, eſpecially the Axes added again to the Rods, which Poplicola had laid aſide, and none of his Succeſſors the Conſuls uſed in the City. By this fear they ſought to procure themſelves ſecurity, each of them getting about him a company of ſtout young men, ſuch as were moſt addicted to him.

6. Some preferring their private commodity before the publick good flattered them, and even amongſt the Patritians themſelves thoſe were not wanting, who though Eminent both for Birth and Eſtate patiently bore the oppreſſion of their Country. The Decemviri indulging their pleaſures, exerciſed now their authority with all licentiouſneſs, nothing valuing the Roman Senate and people. Being both Legiſlators and Judges, many Citizens they unjuſtly put to death, and deprived others of their Eſtates, whoſe cauſes were all formally judged, that they might have ſome ſhew, and pretence of Juſtice, accuſers being ſuborned out of their Dependents, each one affording all aſſiſtance herein to his Collegue. Such private perſons as in their ſutes feared their cauſe were conſtrained to joyn themſelves to the party of their Judges; ſo as it came to paſs in a ſhort time that moſt of the Citizens were alſo corrupted. Such as were offended with the extravigancy of the ten retired themſelves, expecting the Comitia for the Creation of new Magiſtrates.

They add two Tables of Laws to the ten.

7. The Decemviri added two Tables of Laws to the ten that were made the year before. Amongſt theſe new Laws there was one which forbad marriage betwixt the Patritians and Plebeians, for no other cauſe as Dionyſius conjectureth, than leſt the families being joyned together, concord ſhould enſue betwixt the two orders. Theſe Laws thus by accident, ſaith (a) Pomponius, came to be called the Laws of the twelve Tables, being written by the Decemviri, through the perſwaſion of one Hermodorus an Epheſian, as ſome reported, then baniſhed into Italy, concerning which perſon (b) Cicero and others are to be conſulted. Theſe Laws being eſtabliſhed, it followed, that diſputations and controverſies of the Court ſhould be neceſſary, for as much as an interpretation was to be built upon the authority of the Learned. This diſputation, or this unwritten Law, framed by the Learned, was not called by any peculiar name, as all other parts, but by the common one of Jus Civile, or Civil Law only. Beſides, out of theſe Laws, at the ſame time almoſt, were compoſed certain caſes, wherein men conteſted one with another, which caſes, leſt the People ſhould make them at their pleaſure, were to be certain and ſolemn; and this part of Law was called Actiones Juris; or Caſes at Law. Thus almoſt at the ſame time theſe three ſorts of Laws aroſe, viz. the Laws of the twelve Tables; from theſe flowed the Civil Law: and from the ſame were were compoſed Caſes at Law. But the knowledg of expounding all theſe, and the Caſes themſelves, were kept by the College of Pontifices, who appointed yearly thoſe that judged Private Perſons, which cuſtom the People uſed almoſt one hundred years. Afterward, when Appius Claudius had propounded, and reduced theſe Caſes into form, (c) Gnæus Flavius his Scribe, and the ſon of a Libertine (or of one whoſe father was once a Slave) ſtole the Book, and gave it to the People, which accepted ſo thankfully of the gift, that he was made Tribune of the Commons, a Senator, and Ædilis curulis. This Book was called Jus Civile Flavianum, as the other Jus Civile Papirianum. Yet Flavius added nothing of his own to the Book. The City increaſing, and there being as yet wanting certain ſorts of Caſes, not long after Sextus Ælius compoſed other Caſes, and gave a Book to the People called Jus Ælianum.

The Original of the Civil Law.

(a) Lib. 2. Dig. de Origine Juris.

(b) Tuſculan. lib. 5. Plin. lib. 84. & Strabo lib. 14.

How the parts of it came in by degrees.

8. There being now in the City, the Lex or Law of the twelve Tables, the Jus Civile, or Civil Law, and the Caſes of Law, it came to paſs, that the Commons diſagreeing with and ſeperating from the Patritians, appointed Laws of their own making, called Plebiſcita. After their return there being a great controverſie about theſe, it was thought good to receive them alſo for Laws, and ſo it was enacted by a Law preferred by * Hortenſius the Dictator; ſo though there was a difference in the form of making a Law (called Lex) and a Plebiſcitum, yet the authority was the ſame. Then for that it was difficult for the People to meet, becauſe of its multitudes, neceſſity it ſelf devolved the care of the Commonwealth upon the Senate. So the Senate began to interpoſe, and whatſoever it reſolved was obſerved: and that Law was called Senatus Conſultum. At the ſame time the Magiſtrates alſo adminiſtred Juſtice, and that the People might know what they would determine concerning any thing, and to fore-arm themſelves, they publiſhed Edicts, which Edicts of the Prætors conſtituted the Jus Honorarium, ſo named from the honour and authority of the Prætor. Laſtly, as the courſe of affairs reduced the making of Laws to fewer faſhions, at length it came to paſs through ſeveral Factions, (viz. of Sylla, Marius, Pompey, and Cæſar) that there was neceſſity of the Commonwealth's being governed by a ſingle perſon. For the Senate not being able to govern all the Provinces, a Prince was ordained, and what he appointed was taken for Law. So that in the Commonwealth of Rome, all Law was either ſo conſtituted by a Law called Lex, as that of the twelve Tables; or properly called Jus Civile, which being unwritten, conſiſted in the interpretation of the Learned; or Caſes of Law, which contained the form of Pleas; or a Plebiſcitum made witout the authority of the Fathers: or the Edict of a Magiſtrate, called Jus Honorarium: or a Senatus Conſultum, which without a Law (Lex) was ordained by the ſole authority of the Senate: or Principalis conſtitutio, which the Prince himſelf enacted.

9. Theſe things are written by Pomponius in this narrative of the Original of Law; for the better underſtanding whereof, it is to be noted, that the word Jus ſignifieth all Law or Right in general, and is that Genus whereof Lex is but a ſpecies, being defined by (a) Juſtinian the Emperour to be that which the People of Rome upon the quæſtion put by a Senatorian Magiſtrate (for example a Conſul) did enact. As for the twelve Tables, they were furniſhed with Laws, partly borrowed from the Græcians, partly added at the diſcretion of the Lawmakers, and partly the ſame as formerly were in uſe. Of the firſt ſort were ſuch eſpecially as concerned private intereſts. Of the ſecond was that which forbad mariage betwixt the Nobility and Commons. And of the third, that Law which from Dionyſius we formerly mentioned to have been made by Romulus, giving power to a man to call together his Wives Kindred, and judge her for drinking Wine, or diſhoneſty: this is atteſted to have been taken into the twelve Tables by (b) Pliny; and (c) Gellius alſo hinteth as much. From (d) Auſonius is obſerved, that theſe twelve Tables were divided into three parts, whereof the firſt contained what belonged to the Religion of the Romans, the ſecond what concerned the publick, and the third the rights of private men. Great are the commendations which many give of them, but the moſt Eminent is Cicero's Encomium, that we name no more. Diſputing under the name of Craſſus, in (e) one place he thus ſpeaketh: If diverſity of Studies pleaſe any, in the twelve Tables there is a great Image of antiquity: becauſe the antient uſe of words is known, and certain kind of actions declare the Life and Cuſtom of our Anceſtors. If any look at Polity, you ſhall find it all in the twelve tables, which deſcribe all the intereſts and parts of the State:

or

(c) Conſule Valer. Max. l.2.c.5.exemp.2 A. Gellium Noct. Attic. l. 6. c. 9. & Cicero pro Murena.

* Vide Livium, lib. 3. A. Gellium l. 15. c. 26.

(a) Seu Tribonianus inſtitut. l. 1. Tit. 2.

(b) Lib. 14. cap. 13.

(c) Lib. 10. cap. 23.

(d) Jus triplex tabulæ quod ter Sanxere quaternæ Sacrum, Privatum, Populi commune quod uſquam eſt.

(e) Lib. 1. de Oratore.

Cicero his comendation of the 12 tables.

or if any one be taken with this glorious Philoſophy, I will ſpeak more boldly, theſe are the fountains of all his diſputes contained in the Civil Law (Jure Civili) and Laws (Legibus.) Though all be diſpleaſed, I will ſpeak what I think: that little Book of the twelve Tables alone, in my opinion excelleth the Libraries of all the Philoſophers (if one view the Fountains and heads of Laws) both in weight of authority and copiouſneſs of advantage. In another (f) place he writeth, that when he was a boy, they were wont to learn the twelve Tables as ſome neceſſary Poem. Laſtly, a Collection of the fragments of theſe Tables out of approved Authors (ſuch eſpecially as conduce to the explication of the Inſtitutions, and of Antient Law with deep Antiquities) hath been made by I. Criſpinus, to which the Reader is referred.

(f) De Legibus lib. 2.

The Decemviri retain their power.

10. But (to return) the Decemviri at the uſual time of the Comitia bidding farewel to the Cuſtoms of their Country, and the new Laws, neither regarding the approbation of Senate nor People, continued themſelves in power for the year following, which was the third of the Decemvirate, the firſt of the eighty third Olympiad, according to Dionyſius, wherein Criſo of Himera was Victor, Philiſcus being Archon at Athens. They ſo ordered the matter ſhortly, as even all the conſiderable part of the Citizens, (Patritians and others) they either killed, or forced to quit the City. This pleaſed them well enough, but the Sabines and Æqui thinking it a fit time to attempt ſome great matter againſt Rome, invaded the Territories thereof, and of the Latines. The Decemviri much troubled hereat, after a conſultation how to make reſiſtance ſeveral ways, found themſelves conſtrained to aſſemble the Senate, wherein Appius with a premeditated Oration propounded the matter of the War. L. Valerius Potitus, the Son of him that beſieged the Capitol, and Grandſon of Poplicola, firſt aroſe, and though he was commanded by Appius to forbear, flew high againſt the tyranny of the preſent Uſurpers. He being forced to ſilence, was ſeconded by Marcus Horatius Barbatus, great Grandſon of the Collegue of Poplicola, who having expreſſed great indignation, the Decemviri incenſed with his biting words, threatned to caſt him down headlong from the Rock. All the Senators at this cried out as at a breach of their privilege, and made a tumult, whereat the Ten repented of what they had ſaid, and excuſed themſelves, ſaying, they deprived none of the liberty of ſpeaking to the matter in hand, but interrupted Seditious Orations, which they might do by their power of Conſuls and Tribunes received from the People, not for a year only, nor any limited time, but till the work of Laws ſhould be finiſhed, untill which time they were reſolved to act, and then give an account of their adminiſtration. Appius having delivered this in the name of all, asked the opinion of C. Claudius his Uncle.

They aſſemble the Senate about War.

Stirs in the Senate.

11. Claudius beginning his Oration with the occaſion of their meeting, fitly ſhewed what was the occaſion of it. The War he demonſtrated to be begun by no other inducements than what the preſent diſtempers of the State afforded, which were bred by the arbitrary and tyrannical carriage of his Nephew, and his nine Companions. He made out what theſe diſtempers were, and by virtue of his relation to Appius, took upon him, after a ſharp reproof, by the nearneſs of their blood, their Anceſtors, and the Decemvir's Father with all that was dear ad religious to them both, to conjure him, that putting a ſtop to his ambitious courſe (deſtructive to himſelf as well as the publick) he would reſign his uſurped power, and reſtore the Commonwealth to its former government and liberty. Appius anſwered him not a word, which ſo moved him, that with tears he ſignified he would depart to Rhegillum, the ſeat of his Forefathers, and there continue till that fell upon the Decemvirate, which he gueſſed would happen in a ſhort time; for as much as he could not endure to behold his Nephew degenerate ſo much from the antient worth of their Family. As concerning the War, he adviſed the Fathers to reſolve nothing, till the accuſtomed Magiſtrates were firſt created. The graver and more eminent ſort of Senators that ſpake after, were all of this opinion, which made the Ten reſolve to ask none now according to their age, as the Cuſtom was, but M. Cornelius called upon his Brother Lucius to deliver his opinion. He attributed all that had been ſaid againſt the Decemviri to envy, ſaying, it was becauſe the ſpeakers themſelves could not compaſs the Office, and laboured to ſhew, that it was moſt fooliſh Counſel to reſolve upon new elections, which would require time, and defer the War that threatned ruine and deſolation. By preſſing the danger very cloſe, and urging what neceſſity there was of committing the War to the management of the Decemviri, he drew almoſt all the younger ſort to his party, there being many even in the Senate from whom fear wreſted compliance. After all theſe, the Decemviri gave Valerius leave to ſpeak, whom firſt of all they had interrupted. He profeſſed he was of Claudius his judgment as to the whole, and anſwered all the reaſons of Cornelius by one propoſal; that a Dictator might be inſtantly named, ſhewing, that if they miſſed of this opportunity, they could not expect again to be aſſembled by the Decemviri.

12. Few that delivered their opinions after him remained unconvinced, and many were changed from the ſenſe they had before delivered. He required then of the Ten, that the matter might be further conſidered of, and all might have liberty to recall their votes, which cauſed a great conteſt betwixt him and Cornelius, who deſiring that the Decemviri might have the command in the War, cried out, that the thing was already decided in a legal manner, and deſired the parties might be counted. Much heat being ſhewed by both, the Fathers were alſo divided, which advantage the Ten took to do what they pleaſed. Appius then formally declaring for what cauſe they had been aſſembled, told them they were divided according to the three ſeveral opinions of Claudius, Cornelius, and Valerius, every one having had liberty to ſpeak his mind freely: and ſeeing that moſt had approved of what Cornelius had propounded, he declared his party to have overcome. Then commanded he the Clerk to draw up a Senatus-Conſultum, whereby power of raiſing Forces, and commanding them, was given to the Decemviri; and therewith the Senate was diſmiſſed. They were by this kind of Victory rendred more confident, and imperious, as having now in their own thoughts eſtabliſhed themſelves, by having an Army at their command, which Valerius had adviſed the Fathers earneſtly to beware of. Horatius and Valerius made proviſion for their own defence, by gathering together their Clients and dependants, and Claudius, as he had ſaid, departed into the Country of the Sabines; whoſe example multitudes following, left their native ſeat, with their Wives and Children going into voluntary exile. The Decemviri troubled hereat, endeavoured at firſt to hinder them by ſhutting the Gates, but again fearing they might out of fury attempt ſome dangerous thing, they let them depart, but ſeized on ſuch goods as they left behind, having accuſed them of defection. Theſe things being added to the former miſcariages, incenſed much more both Patritians and Plebeians againſt them. Yet had they proceeded no further in ſuch like outrages, they might probably for a much more longer time have ſecured their power, through that influence which the mutual emulation of theſe orders afforded. For the Plebeians were glad to ſee the high ſpirits of the Patritians dejected, and the Senate void of all power: on the other ſide, the Nobility rejoyced that the Commons had loſt their former liberty, having not the leaſt help, becauſe the Tribunitial power was taken away. But they neither uſing moderation in War, nor temperance at home, conſtrained all to unite for their deſtruction, which followed certain hainous offences committed againſt the Commons.

They make uſe of the Senate to their own advantage.

They lead out an Army againſt the Sabines and Æqui.

13. They divided their Army into three parts, whereof one remained with Appius and Oppius in the City, the two other their Collegues led forth againſt the Sabines and Æqui. The later forced the Romans to forſake their Camp, and ſhamefully to fly, which cauſed great rejoycing in Rome amongſt the Enemies of the Decemviri, ſo that Appius fearing ſome attempt, wrote to his Collegues in the Army, by one means or other to deſtroy their known adverſaries, which was effected upon diverſe. But at Rome, Siccius Dentatus, the Roman Achilles as he was named, amongſt others ſpake much againſt the Captains as Cowards, and unskilful, which Appius underſtanding, with good words perſwaded him to go as Lieutenant or Legatus to the Army then lying at Cruſtumeria againſt the Sabines. He not ſuſpecting what was deſigned, undertook the employment, for that the Office of Legatus was moſt ſacred and honourable amongſt the Romans, having the authority and power of a General, and the inviolableneſs and veneration of a Prieſt. When he came to the Camp he was ſent out with one hundred men upon ſervice, who had order to kill him. He fought with them all, ſlew fifteen, and wounded twice as many, ſo that finding it too difficult a task to kill him by hand-ſtroaks, they threw Darts and Stones at him, and thereby at length, and at a diſtance, performed what was injoyned them. Though the murderers according to agreement gave out he fell by the Enemie's hand, yet the Soldiers fetching him off to give him honourable burial, by ſeveral circumſtances plainly perceived the truth, and demanding Juſtice againſt againſt the inſtruments, when that was put off, and they concealed, they eaſily underſtood who were the principal cauſe, and thought of nothing more than how to revolt.

Siccius Dentatus made away by them.

14. The Army lying at Cruſtumeria and Fidenæ being thus incenſed againſt the Decemviri, another wicked act of Appius cauſed the other which lay incamped at Algidum againſt the Æqui, not only to think of, but fully to effect a revolt. There was one L. Virginius a Plebeian, who had a Daughter the moſt Beautiful of all Roman Women. The Maid being but young and at School near the Forum, Appius as he paſſed that way fell in Love with her in ſuch a meaſure as by no means could he allay his brutiſh paſſion. Marry her he could not, being a Plebeian, neither could he hope to obtain her for his Concubine: there remained then no other way for him to enjoy her, than by procuring M. Claudius one of his Clients to challenge her as his Slave, ſo that the matter being brought before him to judgment, he might judge her ſo to be. Claudius laid his claim, by affirming ſhe was the true and natural Daughter of his Slave, and that the Wife of Virginius, now dead, her ſelf being Barren, procured the Child, and brought it up for her own; which though he and others knew well enough, yet being young, he had not opportunity till now to right himſelf. The pretence was ſo impudent, as raiſed the indignation of all perſons no otherwiſe concerned than as in the publick liberty. Numitor the Maid's Uncle by her mother, and Icilius the Son of Icilius one of the firſt Tribunes of the Commons, to whom ſhe was already contracted, ſufficiently evidenced the truth; but Appius being bent upon his luſtful deſign, would hear no reaſon, and had not a tumult hapned out of the indignation of the multitude, would have given her up in the hands of Claudius, till ſuch time as her Father could be ſent for from the Army to defend her cauſe. Being hardly drawn to put off the matter till the next day, and not giving any more time, wrote to Algidum to hinder Virginius from coming, bidding Antonius Commander of that Legion to confine him, leſt he ſhould hear any thing of his Daughter. But Numitor, and the brother of Icilius, prevented the Letters, and Virginius pretending the death of a near Relation, getting leave to depart, through by-ways returned to the City, fearing a purſuite after the arrival of the Letters, which accordingly hapned, but he thus evaded it.

Appius his abominable practices for Virginia.

15. Virginius then was preſent in the morning to the great aſtoniſhment of Appius, when his Daughter was commanded to be brought forth. He proved the Maid to be his own Daughter, and no ſuppoſitious Brood; but Appius, a man of no great natural abilities, beſides the brutiſh, corrupted by the greatneſs of his power, and inflamed with the exceſs of his paſſion, neither conſidered the defence of Virginius, nor was moved by the bitter tears of the Virgin, being angry at the pity of the ſtanders by, who apprehended the caſe of Father and Daughter no otherwiſe than as their own, as if he himſelf were more to be pitied, enduring more for her beauties ſake than ſhe herſelf. Interrupting thoſe that ſpake in her behalf, and commanding them ſilence, he told them, that this was not the firſt time he had had knowledge of this matter, for that Claudius his Father being a Client to their Family had committed him yet a Boy, when he died, to his protection. In the time of his Guardianſhip he ſaid it had been cleared to him how Numitoria had procured the Girl of Claudius his Slave, but he thought it more convenient to let the matter reſt till Claudius was grown up, either to take, or ſell her as he ſhould like beſt. Since he came into imployment he had not medled with his Clients affairs, but he himſelf it ſeemeth making an inventory of his goods, and having notice of this Slave, now challenged his right, and accordingly he both witneſſed, and judged him to be the right Lord and owner of her. Great out-cries and lamentation being made, as well by the by-ſtanders as the Virgin's relations, Appius commanded all to depart, and gave order to Claudius to take poſſeſſion of his Slave. Virginius, ſeeing there was no way but to yield to the Tyrant's luſt if his Daugher lived, deſired he might ſpeak with her a little aſide, as to take his farewell, which being granted, he drew her, hanging upon him, and pitifully bewailing her condition, towards a Butchers ſtall, whoſe knife taking into his hands, he ſaid, Daughter, I will ſend thee to our Anceſtors, both free, and of honeſt repute; for the Tyrant will not ſuffer thee to be either here; and therewith he ſtabbed, and diſpatch'd her.

16. With the bloody Knife in his hand he ran through the City, calling the People to their liberty, and coming to the Gate, rode Poſt to the Army; a company of four hundred Plebeians following after. In the ſame poſture he came to the Camp at Algidum, holding the knife, which together with his Cloaths was all bloody. Calling the Soldiers together, he took occaſion from his own misfortune to let them ſee in what condition their liberty ſtood, and with urgent reaſons perſwaded them to revolt from the ten, and redeem their country. They being conſcientious, as to their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had ſworn not to forſake their Leaders, but follow them whitherſoever, he told them they were diſcharged from any Obligation, becauſe the Law for the Oath ſuppoſed the Captains ſhould be created according to the Laws, which the ten were not, having uſurped the power ever ſince the laſt time for the Comitia. Being ſatisfied herewith, the Army departed, ſome few Centurions only remaining, and took up its ſtation in the Aventine Mount, and the next day fortifying the Camp choſe ten Captains, whereof M. Oppius was the Chief. Preſently there came a great party from Fidenæ, and joyned with them, being offended with the murder of Siccius, and they chuſing alſo ten men out of their Body, to the twenty the whole matter now contended for was referred. Appius in the mean while having gone by force to ſuppreſs the tumult he had raiſed in the City, was overpowered by the faction of Valerius and Horatius formerly mentioned, and now perceiving that moſt of the Odium lay upon himſelf as the principal cauſe, he kept himſelf in his houſe. Sp. Oppius therefore aſſembled the Fathers, at which time came the Captains from Fidenæ, requiring that the revolters might be puniſhed. L. Cornelius accordingly moved that they ſhould all be remanded back to their charges, which if they obeyed, the Ring-leaders only were to be puniſhed, but if they refuſed, the Senate then ſhould conſider how all thoſe might be dealt with, who had betrayed their truſt. But the Fathers were too ſenſible of preſent grievances, to hear the motion of ſuch corrupt intereſt, and were prevailed with by Valerius and Horatius, to make Peace with the Army (which by this time was departed to the Holy Mount) on condition that the ſame form of Government ſhould return, as was in being before the creation of the Decemviri.

Procureth the deſtruction of the Decemvirate.

The next Conſuls prefer Popular Laws.

17. Valerius Potitus, and M. Horatius Barbatus, both Inheritors of popularity, were created Conſuls in the Centuriate Comitia, who (according to their promiſe to the Commons when they procured them to lay down Arms, that they would by all means poſſible procure their benefit) preferred divers Laws to the regret of the Patritians. One was, that ſuch Laws as the Commons enacted ſhould paſs in the Comitia of the Curiæ, wherein they were more prevalent than the Patritians, as thoſe in the Centuriate, by reaſon of their influence upon the Equites, and the richer ſort of Plebeians, were ever too ſtrong for the multitude, by reaſon of the diſtribution of the ſeveral Claſſes into Centuries formerly ſhewn. After this the Tribunes, whereof Virginius was one, thought fit to call the Decemviri to an account. Virginius being appointed the accuſer of Appius, inſiſted moſt, ſaith Livy, upon that Law, which commanded the defendant to have liberty till ſuch time as his or her Slavery was proved, which Appius had gone about to violate in his Daughter's caſe. Before the Tryal, being committed to Priſon, for that no Bail would be taken, he was there found dead, as ſome thought ſecretly made away by the Tribunes, but as they and others gave out, having hanged himſelf. After him Sp. Oppius, as next to him in guilt, was accuſed, and being condemned, died the ſame day in Priſon by his own hands, ſaith Livy. The other eight baniſhed themſelves, and Claudius the pretended Maſter of Virginius was driven out after them: with which Juſtice the State was ſatisfied, and indemnity given to all others. Things thus ſeeming to be ſetled, the Conſuls took the Field againſt the Æqui, Volſci, and Sabines, againſt whom their ſucceſs was ſuch, as deſerved a Triumph, but the Senate gave them a repulſe, being grieved at the Laws they had made in behalf of the Commons. Claudius alſo the Uncle of Appius accuſed them of the murther of his Nephew, and other violent courſes taken againſt the Decemviri, and their party, whereas all ought to have been (according to agreement) buried in oblivion. The Conſuls appealed to the People, and complaining much of the Senate, procured by the help of the Tribunes a Law to paſs for their receiving the privilege of Triumph from the People.

18. The Commons by all the privileges already obtained, were but more inflamed with a deſire of greater, each morſel out of the prerogative of the Patritians, adding unto their appetite. After three years they required to be made partakers of

Yet the multitude being inſatiable and reſtleſs demand the Conſulſhip.

Publick buſineſs hereby hindred.

An exedient found out by Claudius.

of the Conſulſhip, which hitherto the other had enjoyed, being elected in the Centuriate Comitia, wherein they themſelves had the power. The Tribunes provided a bill for making the People free, and at their own choice, whether they would create Patritians or Plebeians at every election, which thing the Senators bearing moſt hainouſly, as ſeeing their privileges utterly ruined thereby, thought all things to be endured, rather than the Law ſhould paſs. The Allies of Rome now ſent for aid againſt the Æqui, and Sabines, who invaded them, and news was brought that the Veientes and Ardeates would revolt; but the Tribunes thoſe Popular Tyrants hindred all Levies, ſuffering none, that refuſed to be liſted, to receive puniſhment; neither could the Senate prevail with them, to defer the matter till the War ſhould be ended. The Conſuls in ſo difficult a time held a private conference of certain Senators, whereof Claudius, according to the genius of his Anceſtors, was all for reſiſtance, urging that nothing was in this matter to be yielded to the Commons, who went about to change the conſtitution of the State, and thereby were Enemies to it. But T. Quintius ſhewed what inconvenience force and Civil War might bring, and the rather, for that their Anceſtors had made the Tribunes inviolable, by a Curſe laid upon themſelves and Poſterity, in caſe their perſons were hurt, or the conditions then ſworn to in their behalf ſhould be broken. When the reſt were all of his opinion, Claudius propoſed an expedient as ſeaſonable in ſo great neceſſity. He adviſed by no means to ſuffer the Conſulſhip to come into the hands of Plebeians, but to create certain Governours in the room of Conſuls, ſix, or eight, whereof an equal number at leaſt ſhould be Patritians; for hereby they ſhould ſeem not to take too much power to themſelves, and yet not give up the other Office, wherein lay the ſecret of their prerogative, to be managed by baſe and unworthy men. When this project marvailouſly pleaſed all, that nothing might ſeem to be deſigned beforehand, he adviſed the Conſuls not to ask them the graver men their opinions firſt, as the cuſtom was, when the Senate ſhould meet, but the younger and moſt popular: and he appointed T. Genutius the Conſul's brother to propound this way of reconciliation at his private ſence.

The fickle and inconſtant humour of the multitude.

19. When the Senate was aſſembled, Canuleius the Tribune, who chiefly proſecuted the matter in hand, without preſſing it, inveighed againſt the Conſuls, as holding ſecret meetings, and hatching clandeſtine deſigns againſt the State: and thoſe Senators who had not been called took the thing in ſome diſdain. But the Conſuls proteſting their innocence by an Oath, ſaid they would alſo by deeds declare it, and therewith gave any of the younger ſort leave to ſpeak, and when none roſe up asked Valerius firſt of all his opinion. He adviſed the Fathers to favour the Commons, who had deſerved ſo well both in acquiring dominion, and in getting and preſerving liberty, and urged that the City could not be free if there were not an equality of right; yet for that the War was now urgent, he deſired the thing might at preſent be forborn till that was finiſhed, upon promiſe that then the Law ſhould be propounded. Horatius being asked next, and others, ſeconded him; and at length Claudius being deſired to ſpeak, that he might conceal the deſign, according to his own cuſtom, and that of his Family, flew out into invectives againſt the Commons, and adviſed that the Law might never paſs, neither then nor ever after. A greater tumult following, T. Genutius was asked his opinion, and as of himſelf propounded the expedient, that ſix Governours might be choſen, three out of each order, who having conſular power, when the time of their Magiſtracy ſhould be expired, then the Senate and People meeting together, might reſolve whether they would have the ſame Office or that of Conſuls for the following year; and what was concluded by moſt voices, ſhould prevail at the end of every year. This was gladly embraced, both by Senators and Tribunes, and leave given to any Plebeians to ſtand for the new Office. But ſo fickle a thing is deſire without reaſon, and ſo eaſily changing into the other extreme, eſpecially of the multitude, that thoſe who ſo earneſtly before ſought that the chiefeſt Magiſtracy might be communicated to their body, threatning elſe to leave the City as formerly, and take Arms, when they had their deſire, were glutted with it, and changed into the other extreme. For many Plebeians ſtanding for the Office, and uſing their utmoſt endeavours to be preferred, they thought none of them worthy of that honour, but beſtowed it upon eminent Patritians only, who appeared as Candidates.

20. This third change of the Government at Rome, happ'ned in the third year of

The third grand change of Government to the Tribuni Militum.

A. M. 3561. Ol. 84. an. 1. V. C. 310. Artax. Longim. 21.

L: 2. ff. de Orig. Juris.

Another change after 73 days to Conſuls again.

the eighty fourth Olympiad, as Dionyſius computeth, Diphilus being then Archon at Athens; but as others, in the firſt year of that Olympiad, which fell in with the three hundred and tenth year of the City, and the twenty firſt of Artaxerxes Longimanus, M. Genutius and C. Quintius according to him, but L. Papyrius and L. Sempronius according to them, being Conſuls. Theſe new Magiſtrates called Tribuni Militum, were A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Atilius Longus, and T. Clælius (or Cæcilius, as Livy hath it) Siculus. Thus at firſt they were but three in number, afterward it aroſe to ſix, and at length to eight. Pomponius the Lawyer writeth, that ſometimes there were twenty, and ſometimes more, which ſeemeth incredible, no other Author agreeing with him herein, ſo that Budæus with reaſon thinketh the place to be corrupted from Seni to Viceni. This number of Collegues, together with the mixture of Plebeians who afterwards preſſed in, procured, that although they had both the power and enſigns of Conſuls, yet their privilege and dignity ſeemed unlike, whence a Tribune in way of contempt called them a Proconſular Image, and P. Manlius the Dictator, ſhewing that a Maſter of horſ-men was inferior to a Conſul, compareth his power to that of theirs. Having been for ſome years created, and for others laid aſide, at length in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the City, they were quite caſt off, at what time Q. Sextius a Plebeian was admitted to the Conſulſhip. But theſe firſt Tribunes having held their Office ſeventy three days, then were conſtrained to lay it down, for that the Augures found ſome flaw in their election, and the Government returned into its former courſe, the Senate naming T. Quintius Barbatus, who in the Comitia created L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus, although it be doubtful, to ſay truth, whether there were Tribunes only, or Tribunes and Conſuls both for this year.

Conſuls.

The Cenſors. and here Dionyſius his hiſtory is broken off, the following part being loſt.

Its commendation.

21. But to be ſure, for the year following the People having it in their power whether to elect Tribunes or Conſuls, reſolved upon the later, and created in December, the Moon being then full, M. Geganius Macerinus the ſecond time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus the fifth. This year were the Cenſors made, Officers who being but contemptible at the beginning, roſe to great dignity and power. Their original and power might have been more clearly diſcovered, but that Dionyſius his Hiſtory is here in the beginning of this ſtory broken off, the remaining part being loſt, to the great dammage of the ſtudious in Antiquity. For not to ſpeak of his ſmooth ſtyle, and the Attick purity thereof, he hath therein delivered the Antiquities of Rome from the firſt Original, with ſuch diligence, that he ſeemeth in this reſpect to have excelled all Writers, both Greek and Roman. For what Latin Authors have neglected, as vulgarly known amongſt themſelves, as Sacrifices, Games, Triumphs, Enſigns of Magiſtrates, the univerſal diſcipline of the Roman Commonwealth, the Cenſus, Auſpicia, Comitia, that difficult diſtribution of the whole People into Curiæ, Claſſes, Centuries, and Tribes: further, the authority of the Senate, and Commons, with the power of Magiſtrates, he of all others hath delivered moſt accurately. That theſe things may be better underſtood, he compareth them with the Cuſtoms of Greece, as where he ſpeaketh of Clients, he occaſionally maketh mention of this relation amongſt the Athenians and Theſſalians, as Cæſar alſo writeth it to have been ordinary amongſt the Galls. He compareth the Roman Dictator with the Harmoſtes of the Lacedæmonians, the Archons of the Theſſalians, and the Æſymnetes of the Mitylenæans. The Laws of Romulus, Numa, and Servius, had periſhed but for him, as alſo the knowledge of the Original of Rome in a great meaſure: and ſo choice are all his Collections, that they tend, as to the inſtruction of the Reader in the depth of State Myſteries, ſo alſo to his acquiring or retaining a religious awe of Providence. Such is his Hiſtory (ſaith * one well able to judge) that if it had been kept intire (for it conſiſteth of twenty Books, as Photius informeth us) there would have been no cauſe of bewailing the loſs of Varro's treaſures, with whom he was very familiar, as well as Pompey the Great and Tubero; and from whom he ſeemeth to have derived his choiceſt Antiquities. Theſe things render a ſufficient account, why he is made uſe of in the Hiſtory of Roman matters, rather than any other.

22. Servius Tullius the ſixth King of Rome firſt inſtituted the Cenſus, as was ſhewn before, and did the work himſelf, without any peculiar Officer, as alſo did the Conſuls untill this time. But now in the ſixty ſixth year from the baniſhment of Tarquinius, and the three hundred and eleventh of the City, there having been no Cenſus for ſeventeen years, for that the Conſuls were neceſſarily diverted from that work by more

* Bodinus Method. Hiſtor. cap. 4.

more urgent buſineſs, the Senate procured out of their own order two peculiar Officers to be created, who were called Cenſores, becauſe according to their Cenſio or eſtimation the People was ceſſed, ſaith Varro, or becauſe every one accounted himſelf worth ſo much, quanti illi cenſuiſſent, as they judged, or eſtimated, according to Feſtus.

The duration of the Office of Cenſors.

23. At the beginning they were created for five [illegible]rs, becauſe according to Servius his conſtitution the People were to be ceſſed at ever Luſtrum, which conteined ſo many. But their dignity and power ſo increaſing, that they ſeemed of too long a continuance, nine years after, in the three hundred and twentieth of the City, by a Law which Mamercus Æmilius the Dictator preferred, the duration of their Office was confined within the term of one year and an half. Though their Office at firſt was only to take an eſtimate of mens Eſtates, and deſcribing all publick and private riches, to diſtribute the People according to their wealth into Claſſes and Centuries; yet within a while they came to have inſpection into manners alſo. For they upon miſdemeanour put out of the Senate, took away publick Horſes, and caſt out of the Tribes. The former kind of puniſhment was inflicted upon Senators, the ſecond upon Equites, and the laſt upon meer Plebeians. Their removing Senators, was by paſſing them by at the new election. For, ſuch Senators ſaith Feſtus, as were paſſed by in former times, were lyable to no diſgrace, becauſe as the Kings choſe and ſubſtituted whom they pleaſed, ſo after them the Conſuls and Tribunes Military, ſuch as they had greateſt intereſt in; firſt Patritians, and then after Plebeians, till by the Tribunitial Law of Ovinius, it was ordained, that the Cenſors out of every order or rank, ſhould (curiatim) elect the moſt worthy into the Senate, whence it came to paſs, that ſuch as were paſſed by or removed, were noted with ignominy. This note out of Feſtus hinteth to us the antient power of the Roman Kings in making Senators, one of the greateſt ſupporters of the Throne of their Empire.

Livius lib. 3.

Their power.

In voce Prateriti.

24. As for the diſgrace which they put upon Equites; It was the cuſtom for every Eques at the publick Cenſus to appear before the Cenſors with their Horſes in their hands. If they approved of them, they bade them paſs by and lead away the Horſe; if they determined otherwiſe, they took away the Horſe, and commanded him to be ſold. The third note of diſgrace concerned the Plebeians, whom they either removed from their own Tribe into another leſs honourable, according to Livy, or made them Ærarii, and regiſtred them in the Tables of the Cærites, whereby they were deprived of their Centurie, and remained Citizens only in this reſpect, ut pro capitibus ſuis tributi nomine æra ſolverent, as writeth Aſconius Pedianus upon the Oration of Cicero againſt Q. Cæcilius, called Divinatio, which diſputeth who ought to be admitted the Accuſer of Verres. Gellius telleth us what was meant by the Tabulæ Cæritum. The Cærites (inhabitants of Cære in Tuſcany, once called Agylla) we underſtand to have been firſt of all made Municipals, without any right of ſuffrage: and it was granted them that they might receive the honour of being free of Rome, without any trouble or burthen, for that they received the Sacra (or Idols) of the Romans, and preſerved them in the Gallick War; that is, when Rome was taken by the Galls, as Livy hath the ſtory alſo in his fourth Book. Hence were thoſe called Tabulæ Cæritum, vice verſa, wherein the Cenſors cauſed ſuch to be regiſtred as they deprived of the right of Suffrage. Although theſe ſeveral ſorts of puniſhment reſpected the ſeveral ranks of men, yet ſometimes thoſe of higher degree taſted of all or moſt of them, ſo that Senators might not only be paſſed by, and Equites deprived of their Horſes, but loſe their Tribes alſo, and be reduced to the condition of Ærarii.

Vide Plutarchum hiſtoriam narrantem in Pompeio.

Livium lib. 29.

Feſtum in voce cenſio.

*Lib.*16.cap. 13.

Livius lib. 4.

The effects of it.

25. This Office being committed to the prudent management of able perſons, became effectual to the repreſſion of ſuch vice, as fell not under the particular cogniſance of penal Laws. Private faults, and domeſtick miſcarriages were by them noted, with ſuch actions ſometimes as now would not ſimply incur the cenſure of preciſe illegality or indecency. Some of their queſtions upon Oath were ſuch as theſe: (a) Haſt thou a Wife according to thy mind! to which one once making a jeſting anſwer, was made an Ærarius. A certain man yawning before the Cenſors, had been puniſhed in that ſort, but that he ſwore he did it unwillingly, being troubled with that diſeaſe which the Romans called Oſcedo. P. Scipio Naſica and M. Pompilius being Cenſors, and finding a certain Knight very fat and compt, whoſe horſe was exceeding lean and ill favoured, they asked him the reaſon of that difference, to which he anſwered:

(a) Lege A. Gellium l. 4. cap. ult.

Becauſe he looked to himſelf, but Statius to his horſe; for which irreverent anſwer he was regiſtred amongſt the Ærarii according to the cuſtome. Now Statius was a ſervile name, given by the antients to moſt Slaves, whence Cæcilius the famous Writer of Tragedies was called Statius, though it was afterwards as it were turned into a ſirname,and he called Cæcilius Statius. They were wont alſo to take away horſes from very big and corpulent men, as unfit for ſervice, but (b) Gellius obſerveth, that this was no puniſhment, as ſome thought, but a taking away of the employment without ignominy. This Cenſus was was managed in the Campus Martius, and it being compleated, the Luſtrum was made, with prayers for the publick ſafety, and a ſacrifice of the Suovetaurilia formerly mentioned. Beſides theſe employments, the Cenſors (c) let to farm the cuſtomes, and ſent (d) out their conſtitutions throughout the Provinces, called Leges Cenſoriæ. They erected (e) publick buildings, made other publick works, and took care for their repair, as alſo of the high-wayes, in, and about the City more early; and in other places afterwards: they alſo provided for the expence of publick ſacrifices. But not onely were there Cenſors at Rome (as the Græcians alſo uſed the Cenſus) but the Colonies alſo had their Subcenſors, who gave account to the other, what numbers of men, and what wealth they found in the ſeveral places, which upon information was regiſtred in the publick Tables.

(b) Lib.7.c.22

(c) Liv. lib. 39. Cicero de Legib. l. 3.

(d) Idem ad Attic. Ep. & Jcti paſſim.

(c) Liv.lib.42. Feſtus in voce Produit. ubi meminit Legis cenſoriæ. vid.

26. The power of the Cenſorſhip remained untouched (although the power of the Cenſors was weakened by reſtraining their time to a year and a half, though they were named every fifth year) untill the Tribuneſhip of P. Clodius, who by a Law which he preferred (a) forbad any Senator to be paſſed by, or any of the other Ranks to be noted with ignominy, except lawfully accuſed, and condemned by ſentence of both the Cenſors. He took an advantage (as it ſeemeth from (b) Pedianus) at the hatred which had poſſeſſed the multitude againſt the ſeverity of the Office, which procured it to be intermitted for certain years. But afterwards (whether by reaſon of the corruption that was crept amongſt Judges, or for other reaſons) Metellus Scipio the Conſul procured Clodius his Law to be abrogated, and ſo the antient Vigour of this office returned. Lipſius writeth, that under the Emperours it was diminiſhed, and lay for dead till the time of Decius. But C. Cæſar the Dictator, that he might better execute the Cenſus, went to every ones houſe; and becauſe the principal part of the Office conſiſted in forming of manners, he called himſelf Magiſter Morum, not Cenſor. Then the form of the State being changed after the victory of Actium, Auguſtus having the care of manners committed to him by the Senate, looked to nothing more diligently than the Cenſus, for thrice he performed it, not onely in reverence to Roman Citizens, but all Subjects of the Empire, with ſuch care and diligence as none ever before him. Under Tiberius and Caligula the Cenſus was not obſerved, but under Claudius the ſeventy fourth Luſtrum was celebrated. Being intermitted during the reign of Nero, Veſpaſian renewed it, and celebrated the ſeventy fifth Cenſus. Domitian named himſelf amongſt his other titles Perpetual Cenſor, but made no Luſtrum, ſo that for an hundred and ſixty years the Cenſus was intermitted till Decius the Emp. created Valerian Cenſor with unlimited power. After this the Cenſorſhip was utterly omitted to the great detriment of the Roman Empire, which being at length broken into Eaſtern and Weſtern, the Emperours of the former (Greekiſh Emperours) made uſe of it, as others alſo of later times,and it appeareth that in the intermiſſion thereof, in the dayes of Trajan, particular Provinces and Towns had their Cenſors, who made choice of their Senators. Laſtly, the Cenſors during the popular Government were of Conſular dignity, ever after the ſecond Punick War, though it was otherwiſe ſometimes before. The ſame perſons were never created twice. And in caſe one of them died in his Office, his Collegue continued not therein, neither was any put into the place of the dead, becauſe in that year wherein Rome was taken by the Galls it had ſo hapned; whereupon it was counted ominous, and a Law made againſt it for the time to come. Their dignity was exceeding great, they being therein though not in power above the Conſuls, and having all other Enſigns the ſame with them except Lictors.

(a) Aſconius Pedianus in Orat. Ciceronis cont. L. Piſonem.

(b) In Divinat.

The various fortune of the Cenſorſhip.

Diod. lib.54. pag. 527.

Sueton. in Auguſto.

Idem in Domitiano.

Trebellius.

Conſule Bodinum de Repub. lib.6. cap. 1.

Liv. l. 5.

Lege Liv.l.4. Val. Max. lib.5. cap. 3. Exemp.2.& Lib.6. c. 3. Exemp. 1. Florum lib. 1. cap. ult. Ciceron. pro domo ſua & pro Milone.

27. The Fathers rejoyced they had got theſe Officers Created out of their own body, and the Tribunes counting that power inconſiderable, which at firſt was pretended to, gave way unto it. But the commons egged on by the continual complaints of the later, proceeded in their grudge againſt the Patritians, taking

it

Sp. Mælius his attempt for the Soverainty blaſted.

it in ill part that marriage was forbidden betwixt the two orders, and breathing after no leſs than equal power in the State. This animated Sp. Mælius, a rich Knight, by his large bounty towards the poorer ſort in time of a great dearth, to hunt after popularity, and through it to aſpire to the Soverainty. He was hereof accuſed by L. Minucius, to whom the care of proviſions was committed, and the Senate affrighted with the ſtrangeneſs of the matter, by the advice of T. Quinctius the Conſul, commanded a Dictator to be named. Quinctins Cincinnatus now eighty years old was the man, who choſe C. Servilius Ahala, for his Maſter of horſ-men. The Dictator ſummoning Mælius to appear, when he would not obey, Ahala killed him in the Forum, and was juſtified for ſo doing by Quintius, who commanded his goods to be ſold, and his houſe razed. It ſhould ſeem from Livy that Ahala eſcaped without puniſhment: But Cicero and Valerius on the contrary affirm, that he was baniſhed by the incenſed multitude. This hapned in the three hundred and fifteenth year of the City after Varro's account. Valerius and Livy ſay, that the Area of his houſe for a memorial of his puniſhment had the name of Æqui-Melium.

The Tribunes ſeek to revenge his death by bringing in Tribunes Military again. The ſecond Opima Spolia.

28. The Tribunes inraged about the death of Mælius, procured for the year following Tribunes Military with Conſular Power to be created now ſix years after their Inſtitution, hoping that into the number of ſix ſome Plebeian might creep, which thing would give them an opportunity to revenge the death of Melius: But three only were created, and their expectation unanſwered thereby. This year Fidenæ, a Roman Colony, gave up it ſelf to Tolumnius King of the Veientes, and by his Inſtigation murdered the Ambaſſadors ſent thither. For this War Mamercus Æmilius was named Dictator, who overcame the Enemies in battel, wherein Cornelius Coſſus a Tribune in the Army, ſlew, and ſpoiled Tolumnius, thereby obtaining Opima Spolia. Varro thought they were called Opima ab opibus for their riches; but Plutarch thinketh rather ab opere, becauſe the conſecration of them was granted to a Captain, who with his own hand ſlew the General of the Enemy. They were conſecrated to Jupiter Feretrius, ſo called, becauſe the Trophy was carried in a Feretrum, or certain little carriage, as ſome thought, at that time there being many Greek words in uſe with the Latines, or a Feriendo, from Jupiter his ſmiting with Thunder-bolts, or elſe from the blows given in battel. This honour of carrying in Triumph the Opima Spolia hath only thrice hapned to Roman Captains ſaith Plutarch untill our time. Firſt to Romulus, who ſlew Acron King of Cænina; ſecondly to Cornelius Coſſus, who killed Tolumnius, (the Etruſcan in one place he calleth him, and the Tyrrhenian in another) and thirdly to M. Marcellus, who ſo killed and ſpoiled Britomartus (in one place, but Virdumarus in another) King of the Galls. A controverſie there was of old, whether any but a General from a General could take Opima Spolia, which maketh Livy Apologize for what he writeth in honour of Coſſus; but Varro wrote, as (*) Feſtus witneſſeth, that a Manipular Soldier might rightly be ſaid to take them, ſo it were from a General of the Enemy.

In Romulo & Marcello.

* in Voc. Opima Spolia.

After four courſes of Conſuls Tribunes Military again.

29. Two years after this, Fidena was taken by another Dictator, A. Servilius, through the working of a Mine. But when the Conſuls had kept the power four years, they were forced to give way to the Tribunes Military, for the Creation whereof, though the Tribuni Plebis prevailed, yet the Chief of the Commons miſſing all this while of being joyned with the Nobility in the honour, were much offended. At the end of two years the Senate took occaſion from the War wherewith the Æqui and Volſci threatned Reme, to bring in Conſuls, which alſo gave way to a Dictator, A. Poſthumius Tubero, againſt their wills, through the power of the Tribunes. He finiſhing the War ſucceſfully, laid down his Office. And in this year wherein T. Quintius Cincinnatus the ſon of Lucius, and Cn. Julius Menio, were Conſuls, Livy by a groſs miſtake would have the Carthaginians to have paſſed over into Sicily the firſt time, by an occaſion of the diſagreement of the Iſlanders amongſt themſelves. After five years the Commons prevailed to have Tribunes Military created the fifth time, four in number, who ſhewed how unprofitable the equal command of many in an Army is, and gave occaſion to the making of a new Dictator. For, Fidena having now again revolted, and joyned with the Veientes, three of thoſe Tribunes were ſent againſt it and them, and the fourth left to Govern the City. When they came to ingage with the Enemy, One cried Fight, but another ſaid Stay, and each one being of a ſeveral mind, matters were at length brought to that paſs, that the Roman Army fled. The City was ſtruck Conſuls again.

Tribunes Military again.

A paſſage ſhewing the excellency of Monarchy.

with great amazement at the report, and was in an uproar, which cauſed Mamercus Æmilius the third time to be named Dictator, though the Cenſors had removed him from his Tribe, for that in his ſecond Office (to which he was called, becauſe of the ſtirs made by the Hetruſcans upon the taking of Fidenæ) he confined their Office to the term of one year and an half. Æmilius being named Dictator, appointed for his Maſter of Horſ-men A. Cornelius Coſſus, who obtained the Opima Spolia of Tolumnius King of the Veientes.

30. By the prudence and valour of theſe two Fidenæ was retaken, and ſacked after the Hetruſcans were overthrown; and the Dictator returning to Rome in Triumph, laid down his Office when he had held it ſeventeen days. For three years the Tribunes Military continued, at the end whereof the Senate took occaſion at the War which threatned from the Volſci, and at their abſence, to bring in the Conſuls again, notwithſtanding the Tribunes of the Commons oppoſed it. But C. Sempronius, one of theſe Conſuls, managing this War very careleſly, the Tribunnes thence took advantage, and the Tribunes Military again reſumed the Chief Power. This was for one year, at the end whereof the Senate again procured Conſuls to be made. When this year was exſpired, there was ſo great contention about two Quæſtors, which the Commons would have created out of their body, that the State fell into an Interregnum. L. Papirius Mugillanus being Interrex for a Compoſure procured the Tribunes Military to be again admitted, and four Quæſtors for the following year to be created, either out of Patritians or Plebeians, as the People ſhould think fit in their Comitia; but this ſatisfied not the Tribunes, nor the better ſort of Plebeians, not one of this order being preferred (though ſome ſtood) either as Tribune Military or Quæſtor. In the ſecond year after this, the Slaves conſpired to ſet fire on the City, and ſeize upon the Capitol; but the plot was timely diſcovered. The Tribunes Military held the Government for ſeven years, and then another Interregnum becauſe of the Contention following, Fabius Vibulanus the Interrex brought in Conſuls again.

Conſuls.

Tribunes Military.

Conſuls.

Tribnnes Military.

Conſuls.

31. The Tribuni Plebis according to their cuſtom made a bad conſtruction hereof, and having now and then mentioned the diviſion of publick grounds, preſſed it earneſtly with an extent now to all that at any time had been gotten by War. The Patritians no leſs vigorouſly oppoſed it, and the Tribunes hindred the Levies of Soldiers, ſo that with much ado, and upon extream neceſſity only could the Conſuls procure any to oppoſe the Æqui and Volſci, who now made incurſions. In the fifth year the Commons being croſſed in their intentions by the Senate, of reſuming the Tribunes Military, created three of the Quæſtors of their own rank, and the chief amongſt them deſigning to be created Tribune Military for the next year, ſtickled hard for that kind of Government. The Senate at length was conſtrained to yield; elſe no oppoſition could be made againſt the former Enemies, who now again made inroades into the Roman Territories, and by confederacies exceedingly ſtrengthned themſelves. For this cauſe alſo, though much againſt the mind of the Tribunes, a Dictator was named, who overthrowing the Enemy in one battel, waſted his Country and returned. In the third year after this, the two orders were ſomething reconciled, by the Plunder of a Town taken from the Volſci, and eſpecially by a Decree of the Senate for the publick pay of the Armies (with braſs money) before which time every one bore his own charges in the War. But ſuch was the contentious diſpoſition of the Tribunes, thoſe grand incendiaries, that they drew this into Odium, as grievous to ſuch who had formerly maintained themſelves in the Wars, and now were to pay others. They effected, that for a time the pay was denied, and after three years they procured a Plebeian (P. Licinius Calvus) to be choſen amongſt the Tribunes Military, wherein they mightily applauded themſelves, and readily permitted the pay of the Army to be gathered. Licinius carried himſelf ſo well in the Office, that for the year following all the Tribunes Military ſave one, were Plebeians.

Diſturbances made by the Tribuni Plebis, the Grand Popular Tyrants.

Tribunes Military.

The firſt Plebeian amongſt the Tribunes Military.

32. For theſe ſeveral years the War abroad was carried on with the Hetruſcans, with various ſucceſs, and Veii the principal of their Cities was beſieged, no leſs in compaſs than Athens, and exceeding wealthy, being within twenty miles of Rome. Its Inhabitants, called Veientes, had in behalf of the Fidenates, waged War with Romulus, afterwards being conquered, had ſeven times rebelled, and ever perfidious in time of Peace, always waſted the Roman Territories. They compelled the Fidenates alſo to rebel, perſwaded them to kill the Ambaſſadors, and the Romans thither ſent to inhabit, for, they vied with the

Romans

Furius Camillus.

Plutarch in Camillo.

Made Dictator.

Romans themſelves for power and riches. They had moreover injured the Roman Ambaſſadors, and not once procured Hetruria to riſe againſt the State; wherefore the People offended with ſo many injuries, reſolved utterly to deſtroy Veii. Whereas the Soldiers until this time, were wont in Summer only to be abroad in War, and Winter at home in the City, now were they conſtrained both Winter and Summer to continue the Siege. The ſeventh year thereof drawing towards an end, the Tribunes Military were blamed of remiſſneſs, ſo that for the following year new ones were created in their rooms. Amongſt them was Furius Camillus, who having got much credit in the battel fought with the Æqui and Volſci under Poſthumius Tubertus the Dictator, was honoured other ways, as by being created Cenſor; in which Office he cauſed the Batchellors to marry the Widdows of ſuch as had loſt their lives for their Country, and firſt of all others obliged Orphans to pay Tribute, for that the depending Wars, eſpecially the Siege of Veii, were very chargeable to the State. Being now Tribune Military the ſecond time, he did nothing againſt Veii, it having fallen to his lot to repreſs the Falerienſes and Capenates, who diſturbed the Romans in their enterprize. At length in the tenth year of the Siege, they created him Dictator, as the moſt fit perſon they had to finiſh it.

Surprizeth Veii.

Incurreth the diſpleaſure of the multitude, for hindring the ſeparation of Patricians and Plebeians, and otherwiſe.

33. Camillus appointed Cornelius Scipio to be his Maſter of Horſ-men, and firſt overthrowing in a great battel the Faliſci and Capenates, went againſt Veii. Finding it full of difficulty to take a place of ſuch ſtrength by ſtorm, he wrought a Mine up into it, through which his Soldiers iſſuing, he eaſily ſurprized it. Being elevated by ſo great an atchievement, whereby he had thus ſubdued the corrival of Rome, in the tenth year of the Siege, he triumphed in a Chariot drawn by four white Horſes, which his Country-men thinking proper only to the King and Father of their gods, were much offended at it: and indeed no man neither before nor after him (ſaith Plutarch) aſſumed to himſelf ſo much honour. Being offended with this carriage, they found themſelves as much concerned in another matter. The Tribunes of the Commons propoſed a Law for dividing aſunder the Senate and People, whereof the one ſhould ſtay at Rome, and the other remove to Veii; this parting as they thought, being a ready means for the enrichment of both, by the poſſeſſion of two ſuch conſiderable Cities. The Plebeians now many and rich vehemently preſſed it, and the Patritians judging it would prove the overthrow of the State, as earneſtly oppoſed the Law, betaking themſelves to Camillus, who put it off by diverting the multitude into other courſes. Having contracted an alienation of mind from them upon theſe accounts, another thing caſt him into an abſolute hatred, and that if not upon a juſt, yet a plauſible pretence. He had made a vow, that if he took Veii, he would dedicate the tenth part of the Plunder to Apollo, but when the City was taken, either becauſe he was unwilling to diſpleaſe the Soldiery, or forgot it, the thing was omitted. After he had laid down the Office of Dictator, he moved the People in it, and the Prieſts reported that the ſacrifices portended the anger of their gods, which muſt be appeaſed by gifts; ſo that the Soldiers who had already ſpent what they had got upon their neceſſary uſes, were forced upon oath to reſtore the tenth part, wherewith a preſent was made to Apollo. Becauſe there was little Gold in the City, the women contributed their ornaments, in way of requital whereof the Senate decreed, that at their burial they ſhould alſo be commended by funeral Orations, which before this had not been in uſe.

34. The Tribunes again moving for a ſeparation, the War with the Faliſci opportunely fell out to divert the multitude, for which Camillus was choſen Tribune Military with five others. He beſieging the Falerii, who inhabited a ſtrongly fortified City, the School-maſter thereof drew out his boyes into his Camp, and offered to give them up into his hands, which treachery he ſo far deteſted, as to cauſe the Pædagogue to be ſtripped, and put Rods into the hands of his boyes, wherewith they drove him back into the Town. Herewith the Falerii were ſo affected that they yielded, and the Senate referring them for conditions to Camillus, he only fined them a ſum of money, and received them with all the Faliſci into friendſhip. But the Soldiers who hoped to have enriched themſelves with the plunder of this place, enveighed grievouſly againſt him, and now the Tribunes preſſing again the Law for ſeperation, he uſed ſuch freedom in oppoſing it, that they out of revenge accuſed him of having pilfered the plunder in the Hetruſcan War, whereof ſome brazen dores had been, as they ſaid, ſeen in his houſe. The multitude now upon ſeveral accounts exaſperated againſt him, reſolved to ſhew their ſpleen. So that not having any way to evade their diſpleaſure, he went into exile, lifting up his hands towards the Capitol, and praying, that if he was unjuſtly and meerly by the luſt and malice of the multitude baniſhed, they might ſodainly repent it, and that it might appear to all men, how much the Romans ſtood in need of, and deſired his preſence. Being gone, he was fined fifteen thouſand Æra, which ſumm in ſilver made up one thouſand and five hundred Denarii. For Æs or braſs was then uſed for money, and Denarius thence had the name, for that it contained ten Aſſes thereof. But within a while it fell out, that Camillus was both miſſed and deſired according to his wiſh.

He goeth into exile.

35. Many thouſands of the Galles called Celtæ, finding their own Country too narrow for them, with their wives and children left it, to ſeek out new ſeats. Some of them paſſing over the Sea, pierced as far as the Riphæan mountains, and placed themſelves in the utmoſt limits of Europe; others took up their habitation betwixt the Pyrenæans and the Alps, near the Senones and Celtorii. Theſe a long time after having taſted of ſome Italian Wine, were furiouſly tranſported with a deſire of inhabiting ſo rare a Soil, as brought forth ſuch fruit, and paſſing over the Alps, got into their power all that Country once belonging to the Etruſcans, and which reached from the Alps to both the Seas: for, that the Etruſcans once inhabited all this Country, Plutarch proveth thence, that the Northern Sea was named Adriatick, from Adria, one of their Towns, and the Southern, Tyrrhenian, from the Tyrrheni the ſame with Hetruſci. At this time the poſterity of thoſe Galli Senones under the conduct of their King Brennus, beſieged Cluſium a City of Hetruria, whoſe inhabitants ſent to Rome, deſiring of that State to interpoſe, by ſending Ambaſſadors and Letters to their unjuſt oppreſſors. The Senate performing this neighbourly part, the Galles required part of the Territories of the Cluſini, who were, as they ſaid, unable to manage them all, and Brennus not condeſcending to any other conditions, the Ambaſſadors (all three of the Fabian Family) in great anger went into Cluſium, and cauſed the Inhabitants to make a ſally out againſt the beſiegers. It hapned, that in the fight Fabius Ambuſtus one of the three killing a Gall, whilſt he diſarmed him, was diſcovered; whereupon Brennus conceiving juſt indignation, broke up his Siege, and marched towards Rome.

The Galles beſiege Cluſium.

36. Yet becauſe he would not ſeem to proceed unjuſtly, he ſent thither, requiring that the Ambaſſadors might be given up to him, as having broken the Law of Nations. But favour ſo far prevailed above equity, that the matter being referred from the Senate to the People, no ſatiſfaction could be had from either: nay the Ambaſſadors on the contrary, were with three others created Tribunes Military, for carrying on the War. Brennus then continuing his march, and breathing revenge, was met by the Tribunes at the River Alia, eleven miles from the City, who ſcarcely ſtriking one ſtroak, quickly betook them to their heels, and their Army after them. The Galles purſued them, being amazed at the flight and cowardize of thoſe who had already obtained for their valour a great name in the World; but were aſtoniſhed when they found the gates of Rome open, and none upon the walls to make reſiſtance; for it had been reſolved to quit the City and ſecure the Capitol. The greater part of the People departed into the adjoyning Country; the reſt poſſeſſed themſelves of the Capitol, all but certain old men of Senatorian degree, who in their robes placed themſelves in the Forum, reſolving to take ſuch quarter, as the diſpoſition of the Enemy would afford them. Brennus at firſt fearing ſome ſtratagem, after he perceived all to be clear, entred the City. His Soldiers were amazed, to ſee the grave Senators ſitting without fear in the Forum, and hurt them not, till one handling the long beard of M. Papirius, the old man ſtruck him with his ſtaff upon the head, whereupon the Gall ſlew him, and then all the reſt were killed, with all of both Sexes and all Ages that were found about the City, which was alſo now burnt to the ground, and the Capitol cloſely beſieged.

Defeat the Romans at Alia.

Come to Rome which is forſaken all but the Capitol.

A. M. 3615.
Ol. 97. an. 3.
V. C. 364.
Artax. Mnem. 15.

37. While the Galls lay before the Capitol, they careleſly demeaned themſelves, as ſecure of any Enemy, and were ſcattered into the Country adjoyning. Camillus at this time living in exile at Ardea, procured the Inhabitants of that City to iſſue out upon them, and killed many; which the Romans, who lay at Veii, underſtanding, choſe him for their General, deſiring him to forget injuries, and ſuccour his diſtreſſed Country. He objected his condition of baniſhment, and refuſed to act, except by commiſſion from thoſe in the Capitol, whom he conſidered to be the body of the Roman State yet ſurviving. There was Camillus made Dictator.

one Pontius Cominius, who undertook to procure him leave from their friends in the Capitol, whither by a ſtrange adventure he got, paſſing by the Enemy, and ſwimming the River till he came to the Rock, which then he made a ſhift to climbe, and having procured the Senate to pronounce Camillus Dictator, returned in the ſame manner. By this time as well the beſiegers as beſieged were well wearied, both parties for want of proviſions, and the Galls by reaſon of a Plague which raged amongſt them; ſo as (having once attempted to ſurprize the Caſtel, by climbing up the Rock, they were diſcovered by the crying of the Geeſe, conſecrated to Juno, and repelled by the valour of one Manlius eſpecially) they agreed for fifty Pounds of Gold to ariſe and depart. Yet ſo covetous were they, that they took out the Gold as it was weighing, and added to the weight, which being complained of, Brennus caſt in his Sword alſo, crying Væ victis, which afterwards became a Proverb. But in the mean time came Camillus, and nulling this compact, as made without his conſent, who before was Dictator, and therefore alone had power of making Peace, overthrew them in fight, and did ſuch execution upon them in purſuite, as what remained of them, was overpowered and cut off by the Country. Thus Rome, which was unexpectedly taken by the Galls about the Ides of the month Quinctilis, was more unexpectedly recovered about the Ides of February, ſo that as Plutarch writeth, the Barbarians held it ſeven months, in the three hundred and ſixty fifth year of the City, and the ſixteenth of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Overthroweth them and reſcueth Rome.

Hindreth the multitude from departing to Veii.

38. The Tribunes now renewed their importunity about removing unto Veii, which cauſed the Senate to procure Camillus his holding of the Office of Dictator, though contrary to the cuſtom, for the whole year. He with gentle language appeaſed the multitude, ſhewing them, how unworthy a thing it was to forſake the ſeat of their Anceſtors, and of their Country rites (which were appropriate to the ſame place) for to inhabit a conquered and enſlaved City. Then was Rome rebuilt in great haſte, whereby afterwards it became rather an heap of houſes than a well ordered Town, and that the watercourſes formerly laid in the ſtreets, now ran for the moſt part under private houſes. Camillus having laid down his Office was forced the year following to reaſſume it, becauſe of the Volſci, who now took Arms, as alſo the Æqui and Etruſcans, all which he overthrew, and forced the Volſci to yield themſelves after the War had continued with them for ſeventy years. In the third year after this he overcame them again, and with them the Hernici and Latines, whereof the later had ever from the battel at Rhegillan Lake been truſty and faithful until now: and from the Etruſcans he recovered two Towns which they had taken from the Allies of Rome. This he did being Tribune Military, though envied by M. Manlius, who having done ſpecial ſervice in the Capitol, by repelling the Galls, obtained the Sirname of Capitollinus. Being naturally haughty and ambitious, he was herewith puffed up, ſo as to extenuate the deſerts of Camillus, and by ingratiating himſelf with the common ſort, through paying their debts, and railing againſt the great ones, plainly to aim at the Soveraignty. This together with the War depending with the Volſci, which was alſo aggravated by the defection of the Hernici and Latines, cauſed the Senate to reſolve that a Dictator ſhould be created.

Livius lib. 6.

39. This was A. Cornelius Coſſus, as Livy writeth, though Plutarch nameth Quinctius Capitolinus, whom the other reporteth to have been Maſter of the Horſ-men to Coſſus. He triumphing over the Enemies from without, called alſo by the help of the Tribunes Manlius to account, and ſhut him in priſon. The multitude much afflicted hereat, took mourning Garments, and made ſuch diſturbance, that after ſome time he was ſet at liberty. But holding private meetings in the night, and growing more bold in his deſign, the Senate committed it to the care of the Tribunes Military, whereof Camillus was one, (as afterward in caſes of great exigency to the Conſuls) to take care that the Commonwealth ſhould receive no dammage. Being then brought to his Trial again in that place, whence a view of the Capitol might be had, he would ever point to it, and put the People in mind of what he had done there for them; whereupon Camillus cauſed his Judges to remove without the gate, into the grove called Lucus Petelinus, where being no ſight of the Capitol, he was condemned. He was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian Rock, the place both of his honour and infamy: and it was decreed, that none of the Manlii ſhould afterward be called Marcus.

Plutarch in Camillo.

Manlius thrown from the Tarpeian Rock.

40. After theſe things the Latines rebelling, and the Volſci, were ſeverally overthrown without, and great tumults hapned within, by reaſon of the debts of the Commons, now again exceedingly increaſed. Their Tribunes incenſed them againſt the Patritians, and the conteſt was ſharpened by Fabius Ambuſtus one of this order, who having married one daughter to a Patritian and another to a Commoner, this took ſuch diſtaſte at her husbands condition, being void of honour, that Fabius told her he would ſo order the matter, that the ſame dignity ſhould be communicated to her houſe, as was to that of her Siſter. From this time he conſulted with Licinius Stolo her husband, and L. Seſtius, about the preferring of a Law, for making one Conſul out of the Commons. Theſe two being made Tribunes of the People, laboured ſo vigorouſly about it, that after long and great contention it came to that paſs, that for five years they ſuffered no Supreme Magiſtrates to be created. Nine years this diſpute continued, thoſe two continuing Tribunes ſtill, and the matter had come to another ſeparation or worſe, but that Camillus reconciled both parties. He was made Dictator the fourth time, ſaith Plutarch, for this purpoſe, but finding the multitude too ſtubborn, which threatned to Fine him except he complied, he again laid down his Office. The Senate then cauſed another Dictator to be named, and under him Licinius Stolo preferred a Law, which forbad any man to poſſeſs a bove five hundred Akers of ground, and afterwards being found himſelf to have above, was puniſhed by virtue of his own conſtitution. Whilſt the Contention was on foot about the Conſulſhip, news came that the Galls, many thouſands in number, were marching from the Adriatick-Sea towards Rome, which compoſed the difference for the preſent, and made them caſt their eyes upon Camillus as Dictator the fifth time. He being near eighty years of age refuſed not the employment in this time of great danger, and perceiving the Galles to fight with Swords, ſtriking at the heads and ſhoulders of their Enemies without any art or dexterity, he furniſhed his men with light iron Helmets, and bound their Targets about with braſs, teaching them how to fence, and receive the ſtroaks. By this device he rendred the ſwords of the Galles ſo unſerviceable, that giving them battel at the River Aniene, he eaſily overthrew them, in the twenty third year after he had recovered Rome from their Country-men.

Wonderful Sedition and confuſion about the Conſulſhip.

Camillus the fifth time Dictator again overthroweth the Galles at the River Aniene.

Unheard of Seditions.

Procure to the Commons the Conſulſhip, and the Offices of Prætor and Ædilis Curulis to the Patritians.

Lib. 3. cap. 18.

What the Curule Chair was.

41. After this Fight the Romans deſpiſed the Galles whom before they ſo exceedingly feared, that whereas by a Law immunity from War was granted to Prieſts, an exception and Proviſo was added as to that with the Galles. Camillus in his retreat had Velitræ given up into his hands; but having now finiſhed his warlike exploits, a very conſiderable one remained to be performed by him at home. For at his return he was received with fierce and impatient Conteſts betwixt the Senate and Commons about the Conſulſhip, and retaining his power, that thereby he might ſerve the intereſt of the Nobility, an Officer was ſent from the Tribunes to pull him down from his ſeat in the Forum, and bring him before them. His attendants repelling the man, ſuch a noiſe and tumult followed as never before had been known, the multitude crying out, pull him down. Yet he laid not down his Office, but departing to the Senate-houſe, had a ſerious debate with the Fathers about the matter, and after great and various Contention, that party prevailed which granted to the Commons that one of the Conſuls might be created out of their Body. For this they deſired, and obtained of the Commons, to have a Prætor created yearly out of the Patritian order for adminiſtration of Juſtice in the City. By this agreement a good underſtanding being revived betwixt the parties, for as long a time as the infirmity of the Government could bear, a Temple was dedicated to Concord, which Camillus had vowed, moreover a fourth day was added to the Latine Feriæ, and the greater ſort of Games were ſolemnized, which when the Ædiles of the Commons refuſed to manage, the young Patritians offered themſelves, and the Senate procured alſo of the People that two Patritians every year might be made Ædiles, who from the Chair called Cella Curulis, had the name of Ædiles Curules. What their Office was hath been ſhewn before. As for this Chair, Gellius writeth, that antiently ſuch Senators as had born a Curule Office, were for honour's ſake wont to be drawn to the houſe in a Chariot, wherein was a Chair in which they ſate, and which thence (from the Chariot or Currus) was called Curulis. But others think that both the Orthography of the word, and the diſmenſion of the thing croſſed this derivation, and that it was called Curulis from Cures, a Town of the Sabines. The form of it upon old Coins repreſents that of Spaniſh Chairs, uſed by Princes as Chairs of State: It had alſo crooked Feet, as Plutarch in the life of Marius deſcribeth it; ſeveral aſcents there were to it: it was covered with Ivory, as ſeveral Authors ſhew, and carved or ingraven, according to Ovid.

42. But as for the Prætor, there were two cauſes of the Creation of this Officer: Æmulation and Uſe. The former was wrought in the Patritians by the Commons, who now had wreſted into their own hands the Conſulſhip. The later was brought about by reaſon that the Conſuls were for the moſt part imployed abroad in Wars, and therefore there was a neceſſity of a Magiſtrate, whoſe peculiar work it ſhould be to adminiſter Juſtice in the Citie. The Prætor was ſo called a præeundo, as write both (a) Varro and (b) Cicero, and agreeable with this Etymology it was once the name of (c) Conſuls alſo, as we ſhewed before, and of all, or moſt other Magiſtrates, Civil or Military. It is probable, that this name, as the other of Dictator, Ædilis, and Duumvir, might come out of Hetruria, there being ſuch Officers there of old, as Spartianus ſeemeth to hint, and otherwiſe may be gathered. There being but one created at this time, viz. in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the Citie, afterward about the five hundred year another was added, who adminiſtred Juſtice unto ſtrangers, ſo that for diſtinction the one was called Prætor Urbanus, and the other Peregrinus, the former being in Dignity above the other, and his Conſtitutions called Jus Honorarium, as we ſhewed before out of Pomponius. This ſame Author (having ſhewn, that after the bringing in of this Prætor Peregrinus; the Decemviri for judging of Cauſes, the Triumviri for coyning of Braſs, Silver, and Gold, the Triumviri Capitales for keeping of Priſons, and the Quinqueviri for both ſides of Tiber for executing what belonged to Magiſtrates in the evenings (at which time they were not to be abroad) were created by degrees) writeth further, that Sardinia being made a Roman Province, after that Sicily, then Spain, and after Gallia Narbonenſis; ſo many Prætors were made as there were Provinces, who partly governed at home, and partly abroad. Lipſius more particularly affirmeth, that in the five hundred and twentyth year of the City, Sardinia and Sicily being both made Provinces, there were two added, who as the former two aſſiſted the Conſuls in adminiſtring of Juſtice, ſo theſe in the government of the Provinces. When Spain (Hiſpaniæ in the plural number) was ſubdued, in the year five hundred and fifty ſeven, two more were added. So there were in all ſix Prætors, whereof two onely remained in the Citie, and the other, aſſoon as declared, departed into the Provinces, as they fell to them by lot: this order continuing till the examinations called Quæſtiones Perpetuæ were appointed, at which time the Senate reſolved that all the Prætors for the year of their Office ſhould continue in the Citie, and judge ſome controverſies, either publick or private.

(a) Prætor dictus qui præiret jure & exercitu. A quo Lucilius, Ergo Prætorum eſt præire. De Ling. Lat. lib. 4. p. 22.

(b) Vide Cap. hujus Sect. 1. Paragr. 1.

(c) Veteres enim omnem Magiſtratum cui pareret exercitus Prætorem appellaverunt unde & Prætorium tabernaculum ejus dicitur, & in caſtris porta prætoria, & hodie quoque præfectus prætorio. Aſconius Pædianus in Verrem de Prætura urbis.

43. Pomponius proceedeth, ſaying, that Cornelius Sulla appointed other publick Examinations or Inquiſitions: As, for example, De falſo, De Paricidio, and de Sicariis, for which he added four Prætors more; but Lipſius ſaith he is miſtaken in the number, proving out of Cicero that he made but two. C. Julius Cæſar appointed other two, as alſo two Ædiles called Cereales, and afterward ſixteen Prætors, as appeareth from Dio, who alſo relateth the Triumviri with greater liberty to have made ſixty four. Auguſtus filled up the number to ſixteen, ſaith Pomponius, though firſt Lipſius will have him to have confined the number to twelve. Claudius added two, who were to judge onely concerning Fidei Commiſſa, as the Law term is. Titus took one from the number: but Nerva reſtored and appointed him to hear and determine Cauſes betwixt the Exchequer and private perſons. Another was appointed by M. Antonius Philoſophus, called Prætor Tutelaris. So, in all there were eighteen, till, as the Empire decreaſed, they decreaſed alſo in number, and at length were reduced to that of three by a Law of Valentinian and Marcian. As for the Office of Prætors, the Prætor Urbanus, who was alſo called Præfectus Urbi (though a Præfectus was afterward onely choſen for the Latine Feriæ) in the abſence of the Conſuls executed their Office in the Senate and Comitia. But three things eſpecially belonged to them: Games, Sacrifices, and Judicature. The former onely continued to them in a manner when the Empire decayed. Their Judicature was either in publick or private matters. Private cauſes concerning meum and tuum, two onely handled, viz. the Urbanus and Peregrinus; Publick or Criminal maters were managed by all the reſt, who yet had their ſeveral and diſtinct Crimes, one or two, which they judged; and yet ſometimes in their Provinces they managed Civil matters alſo. They had the ſame Ornaments and Enſigns of power as the Conſuls; onely but ſix Lictors apiece, whereas the other had twelve. In reſpect of their power and honour, as alſo becauſe they were created by the ſame Auſpicia, Livy calleth them the Collegues of Conſuls.

Liv. lib. 7.

44. The firſt Conſul out of the body of the Commons was L. Sextius, by whoſe Law the privilege was obtained; the firſt Prætor Sp. Furius, the ſon of Camillus, and the firſt Ædiles Curules were Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. To Sextius was given as Collegue from amongſt the Patritians L. Æmilius Mamercus, and ſo the Conſuls again returned after twenty three years, theſe being the eighty eighth pair as they are found in Livy, and the Tribunes Military were for ever laid aſide after fourty eight courſes of that Office, and fifteen changes from the Conſulſhip to it, and from it to the Conſulſhip. Beſides theſe changes of Government in Rome, there were the two Grand ones from Kings to Conſuls, and from Conſuls to the Decemviri; and to this time from the firſt of theſe alterations had intervened twenty Dictatorſhips, beſides the ſeveral Interregnums. The firſt Interregnum was extraordinary, being betwixt the reigns of Romulus and Numa, when the Senate governed for the ſpace of a year: the other were ordinary, and continued but for five days under particular men, at the end whereof another was elected, and called Interrex, having for that time the power of Conſuls. All theſe changes of Government, except the Interregnums betwixt the Reigns of the Kings (whereof none but one is conſiderable) hapned to the Commonwealth of Rome within the ſpace of one hundred and thirty four years, ſcarce ſo many having completely paſſed from the baniſhment of Tarquinius, to this alteration in the Conſulſhip, It is not in vain to have made theſe obſervations, that the Reader may plainly ſee the ridiculous fickleneſs, weakneſs, and danger of the Roman Government after that it came to be Antimonarchical.

The many alterations in the Roman Government.

45. In the beginning of the year, news came of the Galls their meeting together, who had before been diſperſed through Apulia, and of the intended revolt of the Hernici; but all preparations were deferred by the Senate, becauſe it troubled them that any thing ſhould be done by a Plebeian Conſul, and there was a great ſilence with a general intermiſſion of buſineſs as in ſome great Vacation. Only the Tribunes were not ſilent, becauſe that for one Plebeian Conſul the Nobility had got three Patritian Magiſtrates, who ſate as Conſuls in their Curule Chairs, and their Prætextæ: eſpecially were they concerned about the Prætor, who adminiſtred Juſtice, was a Collegue of the Conſuls, and created by the ſame Auſpicia. Modeſty therefore ſuffered not the Fathers to create both the Ædiles Curules out of their own body; ſo that it was agreed firſt that every other year they ſhould be choſen out of the Commons; but afterwards they were elected promiſcuouſly. The year following fell a grievous Plague upon the City, which took away, beſides great multitudes of the common ſort, One Cenſor, one Ædilis Curulis, and three Tribunes: And who was more than all, Camillus himſelf now died, having born the Office of Conſul more than once, been five times Dictator, having Triumphed four, and done ſuch things as he deſervedly was written the ſecond founder of Rome. The Plague raging both in this and the following year, gave place to no means that were uſed, ſo that all mens minds being ſuperſtitiouſly bent, the Stage-playes were brought up to appeaſe their impure gods. The Actors were ſent for out of Hetruria, in the language of which Countrey Hiſter ſignifying a Player, thence was derived the Roman word Hiſtrio: theſe Playes were very barbarous and antick at the firſt. Two years after this the ground cleaving aſunder in the Forum, M. Curtius is ſaid to have rode into the hole, and ſo being ſwallowed up, purchaſed conqueſt for his Country, according to the Declaration of their gods. After this there was action abroad with the Hernici and the Galls. One of theſe provoking any one Roman to a ſingle Combat, T. Manlius accepted of the challenge, and killing his Enemy took a Torques or Chain from his neck, whence he and his poſterity obtained the Sirname of Torquatus. In this fight the Galls had the worſt, ſo alſo three years after, and eight years after that, when M. Valerius a young man, and Tribune of the Soldiers, fighting with another Gall, as Manlius did, had the ſame ſucceſs. As he was fighting a Crow came, and ſitting upon his head, with beak and wings aſſiſted him in his Combat, whence he had the Sirname of Corvinus. At this time alſo were ſeveral Victories obtained againſt the Latines and Hetruſcans.

Camillus with many others dieth of the Plague.

M. Curtius.

Torquatus.

Corvinus.

46. But, (that we may joyn domeſtick affairs with thoſe of the Camp) after the Commons had enjoyed the Conſulſhip nine years, the Patritians took it from them again, out of diſdain that the year before C. Marcius Rutilius a Plebeian had been Dictator. Hereat the multitude was ſo inraged, that at the end of three years more, the Senate was forced to reſtore the Office, and becauſe Uſury again was grown exceeding burthenſom to the poorer ſort, they appointed five men to order the payment of debts out of the Treaſury. For the following year alſo one of the Cenſors was choſen out of the Plebeians. Hitherto were the Wars of the Romans as it were at their Gates: now they were removed further off, and henceforth continued longer: For in the four hundred and twelfth year from the founding of the City, and the fourty ſixth from its reſtauration, began the War with the Samnites, a People of Italy, * deſcended from the Sabines, from whom alſo they had their name, or from Saunia or Sannia, which in the Greek Tongue ſignifie Spears; or from the Hill Samnium, where, as they came from the Sabines, they ſeated themſelves according to Feſtus. They had the Sabines, Peligni, and Æqui on the Weſt, the Picentini and Apuli on the Eaſt, on the South the Campanians and Sidicini, and on the North the Marucini, Dauni, and Apuli, as is obſervable out of Hiſtory, ſaith * Joh. Stadius. It was the Cuſtom of the Romans by helping others to eſpouſe quarrels. The Samnites having unjuſtly moleſted the Sidicini with War, they betook themſelves to the Campanians for ſuccour. Theſe being luxurious and effeminate, were eaſily worſted, and ſent to Rome for aid, their Ambaſſadors imploring it with tears, and giving up themſelves and Country into the hands of the Senate and People. The Senate was at firſt unwilling to uſe any force, for that the Samnites were their friends in confederacy; but upon the importunate cries and prayers of the Ambaſſadors, and the ſcornful denial of the Samnites to abſtain from the Territories of Capua and Campania, their requeſt was granted, and the Conſuls ſent forth, the one to Capua, and the other into Samnium, where the Samnites were overthrown in both places, and many thouſands of them ſlain: For, in Campania, Valerius after a bloody Battel became Maſter of their Camp. In Samnium Cornelius having unwarily led his Army thither where they lay in wait for him, P. Decius a Tribune in the Army, poſſeſſed himſelf of an hill above the Enemy, who much wondring thereat, applied themſelves thither, and ſo gave liberty to the Conſul to draw forth his men into a more convenient place. Then brake he through, though beſieged, whereat the Enemy was ſo much aſtoniſhed, that the Conſul falling on obtained ſo great a Victory, that thirty thouſand of the Samnites were ſlain.

A Plebeian Dictator made which cauſeth great diſcontent.

The War with the Samnites.

Strabo l. 5. p. 228. c.

* In Florum l. 1. c. 16.

47. This defeat, together with the inroades made upon them the next year, drew them to a Peace, the Sidicini being left to their mercy. They deſired that the Latines and Campanians might be commanded not to aſſiſt the Sidicini; but becauſe the Senate would not deny that theſe Nations were under their command., and were alſo afraid to provoke them, ſo ambiguous an anſwer was made, that the Samnites being left but dubious, the Latines and the other thought themſelves ſo far diſobliged as to rebel. T. Manlius Torquatus now Conſul the third time, with Decius Mus his Collegue, was ſent to chaſtize the Latines. Upon dreams which they both had, that one General on the one part, and the Army on the other, belonged to the Dii Manes and Tellus Mater, they agreed, that in what part the Roman Army ſhould be diſtreſſed, he under whoſe command it was ſhould devote himſelf, and that ſtrict diſcipline ſhould be obſerved, ſo that all were forbidden to fight without orders. The Army being ſorely put to it in Decius his wing, he devoted himſelf, and ruſhing into the midſt of his Enemies, after great ſlaughter made loſt his life. L. Manlius the other Conſul's Son, paſſing with his Troop, before the battel, near the Camp of the Enemy, was challenged by Geminius Metius Captain of the Tuſculans, whom when he had ſlain and ſtripped, his Father for a reward cauſed him to be put to death; whence cruel Commands were wont to be called Manliana Dicta. Of the manner of the Combat * Aulus Gellius, or Agellius is to be conſulted. The Latines being overthrown were wholly ſubdued, and begged Peace; which being given to them, though not with the ſame conditions to all, Manlius returned, and was met by antient men only, the young ones refuſing to do him that honour, who ever after both hated and curſed him in reference to his ſon.

Decius Mus devoteth himſelf.

A. M. 3666.
Ol. 110. an. 2.
V. C. 415.
Ochi 23.
Philippi 22.

* Lib. 9. cap. 13.

48. After his return, the Antiates and Ardeates made incurſions into the Roman Territories. Being by ſickneſs rendred unfit for War, he named L.

Papyrius

The Latines overthrown.

The very conſtitution of the State changed.

Papyrius Craſſus for Dictator, who appointed L. Papyrius Curſor his Maſter of Horſ-men; but nothing memorable was done. The Conſuls for the following year, T. Æmilius Mamercus and Q. Publius Philo, overthrew the Latines, who had rebelled becauſe of the grounds taken from them. Publius, by whoſe conduct and auſpicium the Victory was obtained, receiving into amity ſuch Cities as had been worſted, Æmilius led the Army againſt Pedus, which received ſupplies from ſeveral places. Though he had the better in all skirmiſhes, yet the Town holding out, and he hearing that his Collegue was returned home to his decreed Triumph, he alſo left the Siege, and departed to demand that honour. The Senate was offended, and denied to permit him the honour, except Pedus was either taken, or ſurrendred, which cauſed him out of revenge all the year following to joyn with the Tribunes againſt the Fathers, his Collegue not oppoſing it, becauſe a Plebeian. The Senate having a deſire to be rid of them, commanded a Dictator to be named, but it belonging to Æmilius to name him, he whoſe were the Faſces for this month, named his Collegue, who appointed Junius Brutus his Maſter of Horſ-men. And his Dictatorſhip was very grievous to the Nobility, being full of invectives againſt them, and procured three Laws, whereof the firſt altered the very conſtitution of the State. This was, that the Plebiſcita ſhould bind all the Quirites, or the whole People compriſing all ranks, and degrees. The ſecond, that ſuch Laws as paſſed in the Centuriata Comitia, ſhould be propoſed by the Fathers before the Suffrage. The third, that one of the Cenſors at leaſt ſhould be a Plebeian, whereas now it was come to that paſs, that both might be ſuch. Thus did the Government of Rome devolve faſt to a Democratical temper, the intereſt of the Patritians being now quite broken by the force of the former Law (which proved as a Lex talionis to them, and as a puniſhment for their rebellion againſt their Kings) in the four hundred and ſixteenth year of the City, after Varro's account, which fell in with the firſt of Arſes King of Perſia, and the twenty third of Philip King of Macedonia.

All Latium ſubdued.

The Roſtra at Rome whence ſo called.

49. In the following year, wherein L. Furius Camillus and C. Mænius were Conſuls, Pedus was taken by ſtorm, and the Conſuls in purſuite of the Victory ſubdued all Latium, for which they triumphed, and had Statues on horſeback ſet up in the Forum; an honour but rare in thoſe days. The ſeveral People of Latium, had ſeveral conditions of Peace ſet them. To Antium was ſent a new Colony, and the old inhabitants were forbidden the Sea, had all their long-ſhips taken from them, had leave to enter themſelves in the Colony, and were made free of the City. The ſhips were partly brought into the Roman Arcenal, partly burnt, and with their Roſtra or beaks was the Gallery or Pulpit for Orations adorned, which was built in the Forum; whence that Temple was afterwards called Roſtra. The year following Minutia a Veſtal Nun was buried quick in the Campus Sceleratus, which I believe, ſaith Livy, had its name from Inceſt; for ſo the fault of incontinency in thoſe women was termed. And in this ſame year Q. Publius Philo was made the firſt Prætor out of the Commons; the Senate not regarding now what hapned in this kind, becauſe they had been overpowered in things of greateſt conſequence. Now alſo a War aroſe betwixt the Aurunci and Sidicini, whereof the former were conſtrained by the other to forſake their antient ſeat, and depart to Sueſſa, which was afterwards called Aurunca. The Aurunci had given up themſelves to the Romans, who thereupon ordered them relief, but the Conſuls deferring it, this fell out in the mean time. But the next year the Sidicini and the Auſones who inhabited Cales were overthrown, and Valerius Corvinus now the fourth time Conſul for the following year, and the greateſt Roman Captain of this time, took Cales alſo, where a Colony was placed. In the ſecond year after the taking of Cales, the Cenſus was ſolemnized, and two Tribes added, Metia and Scaptia, for the newly admitted Citizens: the Acerrani were alſo made free of the City, without the privilege of Suffrage, by a Law preferred by L. Papyrius the Prætor.

50. In the year following, above one hundred and ſeventy women were put to death for the art of poyſoning, being diſcovered by a ſhe Slave, whereas heretofore there had been no inquiſition made after this crime, which therefore was accounted ſuch a prodigy, that a Dictator was made for fixing of a nail, which they had read in their Annals to have been a remedy for the diſtempers of the State, when the Commons ſeperated from the Patritians. For the two ſucceeding ceeding years a War was managed againſt the Privernates, who were drawn into it by Vitruvius Vallus, a man of principal note amongſt the Fundani. In the firſt year they were overthrown, in the next he was either taken or delivered up, and Privernum either ſtormed or ſurrendred, both being affirmed by Writers, of whom Livy is to be conſulted: the principal actors were together with Vitruvius put to death, and the reſt of the Inhabitants made free of the City. The firſt year of this War fell in with the laſt of Darius Codomannus, the laſt King of Perſia, being the four hundred and twenty fourth of the City, when L. Papyrius Craſſus the ſecond time, and L. Plautius Venox (or Venno) were Conſuls.

War with the Privernates.

A. M. 3675.
Ol. 122. an. 3.
V. C. 424.
Darii 7.
Alexandri 7.

AN

UMI

A N
INSTITUTION
OF General Hiſtory.

The Firſt Part.

BOOK III.

Of the Empire of the Macedonians, and Affairs of the World Contemporary with it.

CHAP. I.

From the beginning of the Monarchy of Alexander to his Death, containing the ſpace of Six Years and Ten Months.

Alexander bewaileth Darius.

Curtius lib. 5. cap. 14. Diodorus ad Olymp. 112. ann. 3. & 4.

Marcheth into Hyrcania.

Curtius lib. 6. Cap. 2, 3.

A. M. 3676. Ol. 112. ann. 4. V. C. 425. Alexand. 8.

1. ALexander riding hard after Darius, came a little after he had expired, ſaw the Body, and bewailed his Death with tears: he caſt his own Garment over him, and ſent him to his Mother to be Royally Interred amongſt his Anceſtors. His Brother Oxyathres he received into the number of his own Friends, and maintained him in his former Dignity. Then did he begin to purſue Beſſus; but finding that he was fled far before into Bactria, he left off his Purſuit, and returned to Hecatompolis in Parthia, where his Soldiers being tickled with a Rumor that the Macedonians ſhould have leave to return home, rouzed him up from his Idleneſs and Luxury, to which now he began to give way after the Perſian faſhion: but they were at length quieted, and perſwaded by him to perfect the work thus far carried on in Aſia. Leaving then Craterus in this Country with ſome Forces, he marched into Hyrcania which Nabarzanes had ſeized on, who yielded it up, and himſelf to him. After this he Invaded the Mardi, a neighbouring People, who, not being wont to be thus provoked by any, made reſiſtance with 8000 Men, and intercepted Bucephalus his moſt beloved Horſe, which, being given him by Demaratus the Corinthian, when unſadled, would ſuffer none to come on his back, and when adorned, none but the King himſelf, whom to receive he bowed down. Alexander exceedingly moved with the loſs of him, after he had ſlain, and taken moſt of theſe Men, cut down all the Trees, and threatned the Nation with utter deſtruction in caſe they did not reſtore the Horſe; ſo that for fear they did it, and with him ſent their Preſents, and asked Pardon by 50 Meſſengers.

Whether the Queen of the Amazons ever came to him.

Conſule Plutarchum in Alexandro & Arrianum lib. 7.

He cometh into the Country of the Arii.

That of the Zarangæi.

2. Returning back, he received 1500 Men which had been ſent out of Greece to Darius with 90 Ambaſſadors. Over this Party he made Captain Andronicus, who brought them to him, and then went on to Zadracarta, the Principal City of Hyrcania, where he ſtaid 15 days. Hither Thaleſtris, Queen of the Amazons, is ſaid, with 300 Women, to have come to have Iſſue by him, which Story, though it be delivered for a truth by ſome, yet is there better ground to ſuſpect it, ſeeing that neither Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, who was then with him, and wrote his Acts, neither any other good Author of thoſe times approved of it: and Alexander himſelf in his Letters to Antipater, wherein he gave him an account of his Affairs, mentioned how the Scythian King offered to him his Daughter in Marriage, but not a word of this Matter. After this, he returned into Parthia, and purpoſing now to go againſt Beſſus (who in Bactria had taken upon him a Royal Robe, and the Name and Title of Artaxerxes King of Perſia) he thence removed into the Country of the Arii. Satibarzanes the Governor thereof meeting him at the City Suſia, he confirmed him in his Place, but after his departure he revolted from him, whereby the King was conſtrained to March back againſt him, which he hearing fled with 2000 Men towards Beſſus; ſo as Alexander following him ſome time, but in vain, reduced the Country to obedience, and returned to his former Expedition. Then came he into the Country of the Zarangæi, which was governed by one Barſaentes, who having had an hand in the Murder of Darius, now fled into India, whence he was afterwards ſent, and put to death. Here in this Land of the Zarangæi (or Drangæ) was a Conſpiracy againſt Alexander diſcovered; firſt by Dymnus to Nicomachus, who, though he ſwore ſecrecy, communicated it to Zeballinus his Brother. Zeballinus (or Ceballinus) acquainted with it Philotas the Son of Parmenio, who, delaying to tell it to the King, either through heedleſneſs, or on purpoſe, thereby procured the deſtruction of himſelf and family.

Philotas put to death for Treaſon,

And Parmenio his Father.

Lege Curtium lib. 6, & 7. Plutarch. & Diodorum ut prius. Arrianum lib. 3.

3. For, Ceballinus ſuſpecting him to be in the Plot, becauſe of his delay, diſcovered the matter to Metro a young Noble-man, and Maſter of the Armory, who acquainting the King therewith, he preſently cauſed them all to be apprehended. Dymnus knowing wherefore he was called, killed himſelf. Ceballinus caſt all the blame upon Philotas, who denied not that he had been told of ſuch a Buſineſs, but ſaid he revealed it not to the King only through neglect, and becauſe he eſteemed it of no Conſequence. Being brought to the Rack, he either confeſſed the thing as it was, or feigned a Story, and wrongfully accuſed himſelf to eſcape the extremity of Torment; after which he was put to death. Now was Parmenio his Father, a Man of 70 Years of Age, Governor of Media, one who had done eſpecial ſervice for the King, and his Father Philip. Alexander, either for that he feared he was privy to the Conſpiracy, or thought it not ſafe that he ſhould out-live his Son, ſent one away with ſpeed, who delivering a counterfeited Letter to him as from Philotas, ſlew him as he read it. Amongſt others that were put to death for this Conſpiracy, was Alexander Lynceſtes the Son-in-law of Antipater, who had conſpired the deſtruction both of Philip and Alexander, and for his Treaſon been kept in Durance now Three Years. This being done, the King proceeded in his Expedition againſt Beſſus.

Diodorus ut prius. Curtius lib. 7. cap. 3. Arrianus.

The King Marcheth againſt Beſſus.

4. Though the Soldiers condemned Parmenio, and his Son while living, yet they pityed them when dead, and conceived great Indignation againſt their Judges. Alexander underſtanding this, that he might know their ſeveral Minds, gave out, that he was ſending into Macedonia, and whoſoever would, might have an opportunity thereby to write to their Friends. By their Letters, all which he cauſed to be opened, he knew who were diſcontented and ready to Mutiny, and all thoſe he gathered into one company, leſt they ſhould corrupt the reſt, ſetting over them one Leonidas, an intimate friend of Parmenio. The King in his March came to the Country of the Arimaſpi, or Agriaſpæ, called alſo Euergetæ, ſay the Greeks, by Cyrus the Great; for that when he went againſt the Scythians, they furniſhed him with Proviſions in his great neceſſity. He uſed them very curteouſly, beſtowing upon them Money, and as much Ground as they would aſk, which was not much: And here he heard that Satibarzanes, being returned from Beſſus, had withdrawn the Arii from obedience. Againſt him he ſent 6000 Greekiſh Foot, and 600 Horſe, under the Command of Erygius and others, who joyning Battel with him, he pulled down his Helmet, and challenged any one to a ſingle Combate. Erygius accepting of the Challenge, ſlew him in the Place, and then his Soldiers, who had followed him rather by Conſtraint, than out of any good Will, yielded themſelves. Alexander having ſtaid among the Euergetæ 60 days, paſſed on, and in his way ſubdued the Gedroſians, the Drangi and Dragogi, as alſo Arachoſia, where he got that Army into his Power of which Parmenio had the Command, conſiſting of 6000 Macedonians, and 200 Gentlemen, beſides 5000 other Greeks, and 600 Horſe.

Paſſeth the Mountain Paropamiſus.

A. M. 3677. Ol. 113. an. 1. V. C. 426. Alexandri 9.

Invadeth Bactria.

Beſſus delivered up to him.

5. The next People he paſſed through were the Paropamiſadæ. This being in the Winter-ſeaſon, his Army ſuffered extreamly through the Coldneſs of the Climate: Thence he came to the Mountain Caucaſus or Paropamiſus, (as that part of it was called) which he paſſed in 17 days, and built ſome Cities about it. Beſſus had now in Bactria about 8000 of the Inhabitants up in Arms, who thinking that Alexander would rather turn towards India than come againſt them, kept with him, till they plainly perceived that the King Invaded their Country: Then they all betook them to their own Homes, and Beſſus with his other Followers paſſed over the River Oxus into the Country of the Sogdians, being ſtill accompanied with Spitamenes and Oxyartes, in whoſe fidelity he confided. But Alexander Invading Bactria, after he had taken divers Cities, had the whole Country yielded to him; after which he paſſed to the great River Oxus, but in his way was ſo diſtreſſed for Water, that his Army languiſhed; and when it came to the River, ſo many drunk intemperately, that he loſt more Men thereby, than he had formerly done in any Battel. E're he paſſed the River, he ſent home 900 Macedonians and Theſſalians, the former being Old and Wounded, and the latter the remnant of the Volunteers: thoſe he rewarded, and gave thanks to ſuch of the reſt that remained as were willing to ſerve in the Wars yet behind. He paſſed over the River upon Skins and Bladders joined together, wanting Materials to make a better Bridge, and came to the place where he heard Beſſus lay with all his Forces. Beſſus was now forſaken by his Friends, for Spitamenes conſpiring againſt him with Dataphernes and Catanes, ſnatched the Diadem from his Head, tore Darius his Robe from off his Back, and gave notice to Alexander, that if he would ſend any of his Captains with ſome Forces, they would deliver him up. Alexander ſent Ptolomie the Son of Lagus, and one of his Guard, who brought him to his Preſence in an Halter, whence he was delivered to Oxyartes the Brother of Darius, to be tormented to death in that Place where he had moſt wickedly ſlain his Sovereign, his Lord and Maſter.

Curtius l. 7. Strabo l. 11. & 14.

He deſtroyeth the Branchidæ.

Curtius & Arrianus.

Cometh to Maracanda.

4. About this time he utterly deſtroyed the City of the Branchidæ, with all its Inhabitants, in revenge for a fault committed 150 years before. For, Xerxes flying out of Greece, they betray'd the Treaſures of Didymæan Apollo into his hands; and for this, not daring to ſtay behind, they left Miletus and followed him, who gave them this place, where their Poſterity dearly paid for their fault. After this, he marche to the River Tanais, (another than that which ſevereth Europe from Aſia) falling down from the Mountain Caucaſus into the Hyrcanian Sea. Here ſome of his Soldiers going forth to gather Forage, were intercepted by the Enemy, which to the number of 20 or 30000 betook himſelf to an Hill, and thence was beaten down and waſted to 8000, yet with great difficulty, and hazard to the King himſelf, who received a Wound in his Thigh. Thence in four days he marched in a Litter to Maracanda, the chief City of Sogdiana, where leaving a Garriſon, he over-ran the neighbouring Territories; and ſhortly after came an Ambaſſage from the Scythians, called Abii, who thereby gave up themſelves into his power. But in the mean time the Barbarians of Maracanda ſlew the Garriſon of the Macedonians; being, together with the greateſt part of the Sogdians, drawn back by thoſe that took Beſſus, who alſo got to their Party ſome of the Bactrians and Suſians. Alexander ſent to ſuppreſs them Spitamenes and Catenes, who had delivered up Beſſus; but they confirmed them in their Rebellion, and became Leaders in the Revolt, giving out, that the Bactrian Horſe was ſent for by the King on purpoſe to be made away.

7. To reduce theſe Revolters, Alexander preſently ſent Craterus, who beſieged Cyropolis the chief City, ſo called, becauſe built by Cyrus the Great; and he himſelf beſieged another called Gaza, which he took, and put all of ripeneſs of Age to the Sword, for a terror to their Country-men. After this he reduced ſeveral other Cities, and then went to the Aſſiſtance of Craterus againſt Cyropolis, which was defended by 18000 Men. Here he loſt many a valiant Soldier, and by a ſtroak of a Stone on his Neck was fell'd down ſenſeleſs; but this excited his natural Vigor, ſo that out of Indignation he ſet furiouſly on, and preſently took the Place. Eight Thouſand of the Inhabitants were ſlain, and the reſt retiring into the Caſtle, ſhortly after yielded for want of Water; and then one City remaining only of Seven, whither the Barbarians had fled, he reduced that alſo in a ſhort time. Spitamenes now had ſhut himſelf up in Maracanda, where he beſieged the Macedonians in the Caſtle. Againſt him he ſent a Party; and began to build a City upon the River Tanais, which being raiſed in few days, with a Wall ſix Miles in compaſs, he called after himſelf Alexandria. His deſign was to have a convenient Fortreſs for the Invaſion of Scythia, which the Scythian King, inhabiting beyond the River, ſuſpecting, ſent his Brother with a Party of Horſe to beat away the Macedonian Forces, and demoliſh it. Coming to the narroweſt place of the River, they not only caſt over their Darts, but opprobrious Speeches, which ſo incenſed Alexander, as though he was extream ill, and for ſome time had not been able as much as to ſpeak to his Soldiers, yet he reſolved to paſs over againſt them.

Curtius ut ſuprà Juſtin. l. 12. Arrianus, l. 4.

Marcheth againſt the Scythians.

8. With admirable induſtry he got over his Men, partly in Boats, and partly upon Bladders, notwithſtanding the earneſt oppoſition of the Enemy, whom he put to the Rout, and, though he was very much indiſpos'd in his own perſon, purſued them 80 Furlongs, then fainting, he commanded his Men to follow the Chace as long as they day would permit. The want of Water in this Place was ſuch, that the Army was thereby exceedingly diſtreſs'd, and the King himſelf drinking of ſome that was corrupt, fell into a Diarrhea. But not long after the Scythians ſent to excuſe themſelves, denying that the War had been undertaken by their general conſent, but only by a certain Party that lived upon Robbery. Giving themſelves up into his hands, he diſmiſs'd the Amballadors curteouſly, and with them the Priſoners he had taken. By this time Spitamenes had cut off the Party ſent againſt him, which Alexander underſtanding, in three days time Marched 1500 Furlongs to Maracanda, whither he had notice that he was returned; but hearing of the Kings coming, he fled amain, and was purſued for ſome time, but to no purpoſe. Alexander then dividing his Forces, over-ran the Country which had revolted, and gave Command, that all of ripe Age ſhould be put to the Sword, for a terror to others, by which ſeverity fell 120000 of the Inhabitants of Sogdiana. Leaving Peucolaus there with 3000 Foot, he departed to Bactra, (a City ſo called from the River Bactrus, which runneth through it, being otherwiſe named Zartaſpa) where he cauſed Beſſus to be brought to the Head of his Army: Here he made his Noſe and Ears to be cut off, and then ſent him to Ecbatane to be Judged and Executed by Sentence of a Council of Medes and Perſians. Thus Diodorus relateth the Story; but Plutarch writeth, That by Alexanders Command, the Boughs of two Trees being firſt drawn together, aud he made faſt to them both, they then were ſuffered to return to their natural ſite, and he was thereby pulled aſunder.

Cometh to Bactra.

Beſſus puniſhed for his execrable Treaſon.

Arrianus.

9. Having much encreaſed his Forces by the coming in of freſh Supplies, he once more over-ran the Country of the Sogdians, as yet not fully ſubdued, and the five parts of his Army afterwards met and united at Maracanda, whence he ſent Hephæſtion to lead out Colonies into the Cities of Sogdiana, as Cænus and Artabazus againſt the Scythians, for to them he heard that Spitamenes was fled, who with a Company of Bactrians and Sogdians, and about 800 Horſe of the Maſſagetes, got a Caſtle near Bactra into his Hand, then came againſt Zariaſpa, or Bactra, and by an Ambuſh cut off many of the Defendants in their Sally out againſt him. Upon Cænus his Approach the Maſſagetes fled, but he purſued and killed many of them. Alexander having ſubdued more of the Sogdians, returned to Maracanda, whither the King of the Europæan Scythians inhabiting above Boſphorus, ſent to him, offering his Daughter in Marriage; or if this liked him not, he deſired, that the principal Macedonians about him might contract Affinity with his Nation; moreover he offered to come in Perſon and receive his Commands. After this, Alexander Hunted in the Forreſt of Bazaria, which had been untouched for four Ages. Herein a Lion coming upon him, Lyſimachus (who afterwards Reigned, and had ſlain a Lion e're this) went about to ſtave him off; but the King forbad him, and receiving the Beaſt, ſlew him at one ſtroak. Four Hundred Beaſts more being killed, he Feaſted his whole Army, and again repaired to Maracanda, where he ſlew Clytus.

Curtius lib. 8. cap. 1.

Alexander killeth a Lion.

Idem. ibid. Arrianus lib. 4. Cicero Tuſcul. Queſt. 4.

10. In a Feaſt (to which he had invited him) being heated with Wine, he fell of commending his own Acts, and therein ſoared ſo high, as to ſpeak ſcornfully of the things performed by his Father Philip. Clytus having alſo drunk ſufficiently, was netled with this, and defending Philip, in his Replies plainly reproached Alexander; who therefore ran him through, and killed him out-right, having a little before deſigned him to the Government of Sogdiana in the room of Artabazus, who excuſed himſelf by his Old Age; For being the Son of Dropis, and Brother to Hellanica Alexander's Nurſe, he had done good Service to both Kings, and was now an Old Soldier. Alexander, when he came to himſelf, conſidering what he had done, would have made way for following him by his own Hands, and when he was hindred by his Friends from violent Attempts, would have done it by faſting four days. On the fifth, his Killeth Clytus.

Atten-

Cometh to Xenippa.

A. M. 3678. Ol. 113. an. 2. V. c. 427. Alexand. 10.

Marrieth Roxane.

Attendants brake into his Tent, and comforting him, cauſed him to eat. The Macedonians judged Clytus rightfully put to death, and decreed he ſhould not be buried; but he commanded this laſt Office to be performed to him. Leaving a good Guard with Cænus to defend Sogdiana, and take Spitamenes if he ſhould come that way in Winter, he marched to Xenippa, where, after a ſharp Encounter, he received the Bactrian Exiles, who having revolted, had betaken themſelves to that Place, lying upon the Confines of Scythia. In the Spring following, being the Tenth Year of his Reign, he ſet upon a Fort in Sogdiana, ſituate upon a Rock, ſo ſtrong by Nature through its exceſſive heighth, that the Defendants counted it invincible, (many having fled thither out of the Country) and upon his Summons, Arimazes the Governor, who held it with Thirty Thouſand Armed Men, demanded if the Macedonians could flie? But he propoſed large Rewards to ſuch as would firſt mount it, whereby certain young Men being Animated, made a ſhift to climb and help one another up, and being got to the top, the Beſieged were amazed, and thinking their Number greater than it was, yielded the Place. In this Fort amongſt others was Oxyartes the Satrapa or Governour (who had revolted from Alexander) with his Wife and Children. Of his Daughter Roxane the King was ſo enamoured, as he ſhortly after Married her, and perſwaded the great ones about him to take them Wives out of that Place.

Arrianus. Curtius.

11. He thence departed into Naura (or Parataca) where he underſtood that many Barbarians had poſſeſſed themſelves of another Fortreſs, ſituate as the former, and Fortified moreover with an exceeding deep Ditch. This yielded to him through the perſwaſion of Oxyartes, and then with his Horſe he cleared the Country of the Revolters. About the ſame time Spitamenes coming into Sogdiana, was encountred by Cænus, who drew from him the Naturals of the Place, and the Bactrians, ſo that he had only left him a Company of Maſſagetes. Thoſe flying with him into the Wilderneſs, when they heard that Alexander purſued them, cut off their Captains Head, and ſent it to the King, though ſome write, that his own Wife cut it off, and preſented it to Alexander, who deteſting the Treaſon, commanded her to depart his Camp. After this the Dahæ, who had revolted by the procurement of Datophernes, delivered him up, and returned to obedience, and Craterus with Polyſperchon having finiſhed the War againſt the Revolters in a ſhort time, they all met at Bactra. Alexander was now ſo puffed up, as to require Divine Honours from his Followers; which Calliſthenes the Philoſopher ſtifly refuſing to give him, felt the effect of his Ambition.

Curtius ut ſupra. Plutarch in Alexand. Oroſius lib. 3. cap. 18. Arrianus lib. 4.

Calliſthenes put to death with others for Treaſon.

Valer Max. lib. 7. cap. 2.

12. It hap'ned that the King hunting on a time, one Hermolaus a Gentleman of his Guard, and Scholar to Caliſthenes, killed a wild Boar, which Alexander himſelf intended to have ſtruck, for which he was beaten by his Command. The Young Man bearing the diſgrace moſt heavily, as alſo Soſtratus his inward Friend, they conſpired with others of the Guard to kill the King, which to perform, they agreed, that one night they would all watch together. It was long e're they could ſo change their courſes as to bring this about, but at length having done it, it chanced that the King ſat up drinking all that night, ſo then the matter being fruſtrated, was revealed by one of them, and they were all ſtoned to death. Now whether any of them accuſed Calliſthenes, as ſome reported, or Alexander did it himſelf, he was made away, though as to the manner of his death, they who were preſent themſelves agreed not in their Relation. Calliſthenes was the Scholar of Ariſtotle, and the Son of his Couſin germane, of ſo ſevere a temper, that he could not order himſelf according to his Maſters directions, who when he ſent him to Alexander, adviſed him, Either very pleſantly, or very rarely, to converſe with him, that ſo he might be either more acceptable for his diſcourſe, or ſafe by his ſilence. Ariſtotle alſo himſelf ſeemeth to have been threatned in a Letter written by the King to Antipater in Macedonia.

Alexander marcheth for India.

13. Alexander had e're this time reſolved to make War upon India, and bound his Conqueſts with the Eaſt. That he might not leave any impediment at his back, he commanded 30000 Men to be raiſed out of the Provinces, that he might have them both as Soldiers and Hoſtages. Out of a conceit of the glory of the Expedition, he adorned the Shields of his Soldiers with Silver Plates, their Horſes with Golden Bridles, and their Armour was ſet out with Gold and Silver. Leaving then Amyntas in Bactriana with 3500 Horſe, and 10000 Foot, he ſet forwards in the Spring, leading an Army of 120000 Men. In ten days he paſſed over Caucaſus and came to Alexandria, which he had cauſed to be built in the Country of the Parapomiſadæ, whence he marched to the River Cophenes, and ſent to Taxiles to meet him, who came with ſuch Preſents as India afforded. Dividing now his Army, with one part of it he ſent Hæpheſtion and Perdiccas another way, with Command, that when they came at the River Indus, they ſhould provide things neceſſary for paſſing over it. He with the other invaded the Aſpians, Thyræans, and Araſacans; and croſſing the River Choe, the firſt City he came at oppoſed him. He himſelf and Ptolomy the Son of Lagus were wounded in the Storm, but he took the Place, and putting all the Inhabitants to the Sword, burnt it. In the Country of the Aſpians he got a Booty of 40000 Men, and 230000 head of Cattel, whence marching toward the Gruræans, with difficulty he paſſed over the River Gruræus. Invading the Aſſacenians he took the City Maſſaga, the King whereof being lately dead, his Mother Cleophis Reigned, and by the proſtitution of her Body to Alexander, procured a confirmation in the Kingdom.

Curtius Juſtin. lib. 12.

14. After this, he took Bazira, and Nora was forſaken by its Defendants, who betook themſelves to a ſtrong Rock called Aornos. This Place was exceedingly Fenced by its wonderful height, and the River Indus which ran by one ſide of it; as alſo by deep Pits and craggy Rocks, by reaſon whereof the report went, that Hercules himſelf attempted, but could not take it. The Story of Hercules inflamed the King with a deſire to maſter it, who having firſt taken ſeveral other Places, brought his Forces hither, and by means of an Old Man, who ſhewed him the only Paſſage, cloſely Beſieged it. By incredible diligence he filled up the Ditches, ſo as he could bring his Men to fight, but yet he was not able to ſtorm the Rock, and therefore reſolved to ſtarve them out, leaving a way for their Eſcape; and they ſeeing his Reſolution, took the advantage; but many were ſlain in the Purſuit. Taking order then for the full clearing of the Country, he paſſed on to the River Indus, near to which he hunted Elephants, and continuing in the Plains thirty days for the Refreſhment of his Army, Sacrificed to his gods, and Celebrated Games and Exerciſes. Now Hephæſtion and Perdiccas had finiſhed all things neceſſary for paſſing the River; and not of this only, but others alſo with one (almoſt) and the ſame labour. For, divers Rivers running through India (as beſides Cophenes, Coes, and Indus; Hydaſpes, Aceſines, Hyarotis, Hyparus, and Ganges) they ſo framed the Boats, as they might eaſily be taken in Pieces, and being conveyed in Carriages, be as eaſily, upon occaſion, again joyned together.

Croſſeth the River Indus.

A. M. 3679. Ol. 113. an. 3. V. C. 428. Alexand. 11.

15. In the Eleventh Year of his Reign, and the Fourth after the Death of Darius, in the Spring, Alexander paſſed over the River Indus, and was received above his Expectations. For, Omphis, or Mophis, King of the Country, had perſwaded his Father, when yet living, to ſubmit himſelf, and now having ſucceeded in the Kingdom, met him in the way, and gave it up into his Hands, who reſtored it to him, and permitted him to aſſume the Name of Taxiles, common to all Kings of that Country, of what Family ſoever. Coming to Taxila the Metropolis, he was ſumptuouſly entertained, and receiving great Gifts, gave alſo very liberally, to the diſdain of thoſe about him, of whom Meleager in his Cups congratulated with him, that at length in India he had found a Man worthy to receive from him in way of free Gift 1000 Talents. Alexander remembring how he had repented the killing of Clytus, contained himſelf, but not impertinently anſwered him, that Envious Men are nothing elſe than their own torment: The next day Abiſarus King of the Indians inhabiting the Mountains, and who together with Porus had Wars with Taxiles, by Ambaſſadors gave up himſelf and Kingdom. Alexander leaving a Garriſon in Taxila, marched towards the River Hydaſpes, beyond which Reigned Porus: Thinking by the terror of his Name to affright this Prince into obedience, he ſent to him before-hand, willing him to pay Tribute, and meet him on the Frontiers of his Kingdom, to which he anſwered, that he would do the latter only, and that Armed. Near unto Porus Reigned another of his Name, and his Nephew, who out of hatred to him, ſent Ambaſſadors, and gave up all he had into the hands of Alexander.

Curtius ut prius. Diodorus. Arrianus l. 4. Oroſius l. 3. c. 19. & Plutarch in Alexand.

16. The Boats formerly ſpoken of being conveyed from Indus to the River Hydaſpes, Alexander with Taxiles, ſeveral other great Perſons of the Country, and 5000 Indians more came thither: Barſaentes the Governor of the Drangæ being preſented to him in his way, whom he afterwards put to death for his Treaſon towards Darius. On the oppoſite Bank of the River lay Porus with an Army very great indeed, though the diſſention of Writers about the numbers almoſt equal the bigneſs of it. He had his Elephants ready to affright the Horſes, and keep the Army from landing; which Alexander perceiving, made as if he intended to paſs the River at the place over againſt which Porus ſtood, leaving ſome there to make a noiſe, as if he ſtill remained, and in a dark and rainy night got into a little Woody Iſland, which lay lower down the River, whence in the morning, though with much diffidifficulty (through the riſing of the Water by abundance of Rain) recovered the further Bank, where he defeated a Party led by Porus his Son, who by ſome is ſaid in this Ingagement to have loſt his Life. Porus, underſtanding this, drew down his Battel in the form of a City, whereof the Elephants, being many in Number, were as Walls. They grievouſly diſtreſſed the Macedonians for ſome time, and the Indians continually retired to them as a Bulwark; but at length being driven up cloſe together, they made great ſlaughter of the Indians themſelves, whom Alexander alſo encompaſſing with his Men, did great Execution upon them. Porus himſelf, a Perſon terrible to encounter (his height, as is ſaid, being five Cubits, and his bredth ſuch as his Armour extended it to the proportion of two luſty Men) fought himſelf moſt valiantly, and encountring Alexander hand to hand, ſlew his Horſe under him, ſo that he was ſaved meerly by the interpoſition of his Guard, many of his Men having faln at his ſide.

And Hydaſpes.

17. Porus gave not over as long as he had any to ſtand to him; when all had left him, he retreated on his Elephant moſt ſtately to behold. As many of the Indians were ſlain in the Chace as had been in the Battle, by reaſon that Craterus and others, who had been left behind, came in afreſh to the Purſuit. Alexander having a great deſire to ſave their King, out of reſpect to his great Valour, ſent after him Taxiles the Indian, whom perceiving to come towards him, he ran at him with his Lance as his Ancient Enemy. But others being ſtill ſent, and amongſt the reſt Meroes an Indian, Porus hearing his Voice, and being ſore diſtreſſed by thirſt, ſtood ſtill, and then alighted from his Elephant. Alexander coming on ſpake to him firſt, and asked him what the thing was which he deſired, to whom he anſwered, that he might be uſed like a King. The other replyed, that this ſhould be done for his own ſake, and bad him ask for his own Commodity what he pleaſed, to which he made anſwer, that all things were contained in his former demand. With this the Conqueror was ſo well pleaſed, that he received him into the number of his Friends, and reſtored to him his Kingdom, inlarged with new Territories. Alexander hoping that by his late Victory all India was laid open to him, intended to ſail into the Ocean; and perceiving there was in this Place much Wood, he cauſed ſuch a quantity to be cut down, as might ſuffice for the building of Ships. He gave order alſo for the building of two Cities: one in the place where the Battle was fought, which he called Nice, and another on the other ſide of the River, named Bucephalæa after his Horſe Bucephalus, who here died, being about thirty years old.

Overthroweth and taketh Porus.

18. Leaving Craterus to perfect theſe Cities upon the River Hydaſpes, he marched into the Country adjoyning to that of Porus, which having ſubdued, he beſtowed on him, and alſo the Kingdom of the younger Porus, who out of fear of his Uncle had now fled, with as many as he could draw after him to the Gangaridæ. After this he conquered ſeveral Nations beyond the River Hydraotes, and Invaded the Cuthæans, who together with the Oxydracæ and Malli oppoſed him, of whom in the Siege and Storming of the City Sangala periſhed 17000, and about 70000 were taken Captives. Theſe Cuthæans had a Cuſtome, that when any Man died, his Wife was to be buried with him, to which the wickedneſs of one Woman that poiſoned her Husband gave occaſion. The City Sangala was deſtroyed, and their Lands given to certain Indians, who lived in the form of a Common-wealth, and had formerly given themſelves up into the hands of the Conqueror. This ſeverity made other Cities without any reſiſtance ſurrender themſelves. Then advanced he into the Kingdom of Sopithes, who meeting him with his two Sons, with a Rod of Gold Adorned with Precious Stones, delivered up into his Hands himſelf, his Children, Kingdom, and all he had. Having received back his Kingdom, he magnificently entertained Alexander and his whole Army. Amongſt ſeveral other Preſents, he gave him 150 Dogs begotten of Tigers, as is reported, and of great ſtrength and activity, as appeared by four of them which were let out upon a Lion extraordinary for ſtrength and bigneſs.

Curtius lib. 9. cap. 1.

Sopithes yieldeth.

Ælian Hiſt. animal. l. 8. c. 1.

19. E're Alexander ſtirred from this Place, Hephæſtion returned to him from his Expedition, (having ſubdued India in a great compaſs that way he was ſent) whom he received with Honour ſuitable to his worth. Afterward he departed into the Kingdom of Phegeus, (or Phegelus) who alſo ſubmitted himſelf, and receiving the Conqueror, entertained him very magnificently. After two days he marched toward the River Hyphaſis (or Hyparis) taking Phegeus and Porus along with him. At the River ſide he enquired of Phegeus what Countries lay beyond it? He anſwered, That there was a vaſt Wilderneſs of 11 or 12 days journey, and next to that ran the River Ganges, beyond which inhabited, beſides others, the Gangaridæ, over whom Reigned Curtius lib. 9. Diodorus. Arrianus.

The River Hyphaſis the Eaſtern limit of his Expedition.

Agyrammes (or Xandrames) provided of 20000 Horſe, 200000 Foot, above 2000 Chariots, and about 4000 Elephants. Theſe things ſeeming incredible to the Macedonian, he aſked Porus of the truth of them, who confirmed what the other had ſaid as to the ſtrength of that King, but withall added, That being by a Barber begotten on the Queen, who had killed her Husband that he might Reign, he was for this cauſe deſpiſed by his People. Alexander now conſidered the labours and perils undergone by his Soldiers, who from the beginning of his Reign had followed him Eight Years; withall, how of late for 70 days together they had been ſorely diſtreſſed by Rain, Thunder, and Lightning; that he might oblige them, he gave them the Plunder of the Enemies Country, being very Rich; and in their abſence gratifi'd their Wives and Children. Then after their return to the Camp, with a premeditated Oration he laboured to perſwade them to undertake the War with him againſt the Gangaridæ, but in vain.

20. For, Cænus the Son of Polycrates, anſwered him in ſuch a manner, as he might eaſily perceive how contrary the affections of the Soldiers were to the Expedition. After which, as Arrianus writeth, he kept himſelf cloſe in his Pavilion for three days, and would admit none of his Friends to his Preſence. Then ſending for his Officers, he told them, That ſeeing the Minds of his Men were averſe from proceeding any further, he intended to return home; yet, e're this, he had Sacrifized for paſſing over the River, but finding thar the Intrals of the Beaſt were not lucky, he ſetled himſelf in a purpoſe to retreat. He cauſed twelve large Altars of fifty Cubits heighth, like to ſome Warlike Towers, to be erected near the River, whereon he Sacrifized according to the cuſtom of his Country, and he celebrated Games in the Grounds adjoyning. After this he cauſed to be made a Ditch 15 Foot broad and 10 Foot deep, whereon, of the Earth, he raiſed a conſiderable Wall, making the compaſs of his Camp ſeem three fold larger than indeed it was. He commanded the Foot, that each one in his Tent ſhould ſet two Bedſteads of five Cubits apiece, and the Horſemen to make theirs with the Mangers of their Horſes as big again as they were wont to be. He cauſed Arms, Bridles, and other things to be framed after the ſame proportion, to amuſe Poſterity with a falſe appearance of a Gigantick proportion of his own Perſon and his Followers.

He retreateth.

21. He returned the ſame way he came, ſetling the Government of the Provinces in his paſſage, till he arrived at the River Hydaſpes. Ever ſince his departure hence, the weather had been rainy, which ſpoiled much of his new City Bucephalæa; but he cauſed it to be repaired; and here died Cænus his truſty and faithful Friend, but one who had grieved him by his Anſwer to his late Oration. Down this River Hydaſpes he reſolved, according to his former purpoſe, to Sail into the Southern Ocean, and therefore providing for ſuch Places as he ſhould leave, he reconciled Porus and Taxiles by affinity contracted betwixt them, and made the former, King, not of that Country only lying betwixt Aceſines and Hydaſpes, which formerly he had given to him, but alſo of ſuch free Nations, as lying betwixt Aceſines and Hyphaſis he had lately ſubdued. Having increaſed his Army by a new ſupply ſent him out of the Weſt, he divided it into three Parts, whereof two he committed to Craterus and Hephæſtion, commanding them to march on either ſide the River, down which he ſailed with a third in a Fleet of 1000 Veſſels. Looſing from ſhoar about the beginning of November, he firſt landed upon the Coaſts of the Sibari, who being reported to be deſcended of thoſe Greeks that with Hercules attempted the Storming of the Rock Aornos, claimed Kindred of him, and ſubmitted themſelves. Making Excurſions into the neighbouring Countries, he deſtroyed many thouſands of the Inhabitants that would not yield; and then returning aboard, haſted againſt the Oxydracæ and Malli, who, as he heard, had carried their Wives into their ſtrong Towns, and intended reſiſtance.

He saileth down the River Hydaſpes.

22. Coming down thither where Hydaſpes and Aceſines meet, the Channel being narrow, and the Stream exceeding great, two of his talleſt Ships miſcarried, and he himſelf miſſed narrowly of being Shipwrack'd: Here his Soldiers alſo began to murmur that they ſhould begin a new War, but he quieted them eaſily by a Speech. The Indians having gathered together 80000 Foot and 10000 Horſe, ſhewed themſelves near the River, having choſen their General out of the Oxydracæ, who made many Fires, and uſed other vain attempts to affright the Macedonians; yet as ſoon as theſe began to Arm, either out of fear, or by reaſon of diſſention amongſt themſelves, away they fled to the craggy Mountains. Alexander then marched with all ſpeed, through a large, dry, and barren Country, againſt the Malli, to defeat them e're they ſhould join with the other; and coming unexpectedly upon them, Curtius & Diodorus ut priùs. Arrianus lib. 6. Plutarch ut ſuprà, & Oroſius.

He fighteth againſt the Malli and Oxydracæ.

them, many he ſlew, both in the Country, and thoſe ſtrong places which he ſtormed. After this he marched to the River Hydraotes, where he killed many of them, and thence to a City of the Brachmans, whither he heard that ſome of them had fled: This he took, with the Caſtle into which they retired, as alſo the chiefeſt City of the Malli, whence they fled beyond the River Hydraotes, on the Bank whereof they drew up into a Battalia. He followed, and with his Horſe skirmiſhed a little, not thinking it fit to engage with them in Battel, being 50000 in number, till the Foot came up. Then they betook themſelves to the next fortified Town, where by his hardineſs he ran into extream danger.

23. Demophoon his Prieſt acquainted him, how that by his art, great danger was portended to his Perſon, and therefore he adviſed him, either to omit, or at leaſt to defer the ſiege. But he rebuked the man, becauſe hereby he weakned the Valour of his Souldiers, and dividing them into two parts, ſet upon the Town, whereat the Defendants left it and fled into the Caſtle. The King with thoſe about him broke open a Gate, and entred firſt; Then he commanded Ladders to be ſet to the Caſtle-wall, which being but ſlowly performed, he took one from a Macedonian, and rearing it mounted himſelf: after him went up Peuceſtes, who bore uſually his Shield before him, (which being taken out of the Temple of Pallas at Ilium, he would always have ſo carried) and after him Leonatus by the ſame Ladder, and one Abreas by another. The Argyraſpides alſo, (or thoſe who uſed the ſilvered Shields) ſollicitous for the Kings ſafety, mounting haſtily broke the Ladders, and thereby hindred others as well as themſelves. The King upon the Wall was laid at with Darts on every ſide, and when his left arm was wearied with holding his Target, his Friends would have had him leap down again unto them, who were ready to receive him in their Arms. But by an unparallel'd attempt he leaped down on the other ſide into the Fort, where if he had not by good chance light upon his feet, he might preſently have been ſlain or taken. But caſting himſelf to fall upon them, and ſeeing a Tree hard by, he applied himſelf to it, ſo as he had it on his right hand, and the Wall on his left.

Caſteth himſelf into extream danger.

24. None of his enemies were ſo hardy as to come near him, only they plied it with Darts afar off, whereof the greateſt part being kept off by the Boughs and Leaves of the Tree, the reſt he received on his Target. But the Indians drawing nearer, threw ſhowers of Darts upon him, and with ſtones broke his Helmet. Being ſpent, and not longer able to ſtand, he fell upon his Knees, whereupon deſpiſing him they came to him; and yet he ſo received them with his Sword, as two fell down dead before him, and after this he killed their General who boldly ſet upon him; then none would venture to approach nearer, but plied it with Darts afar off. By this time thoſe three that mounted the Wall after him were got down, and fought ſtoutly for him, of whom Abreas was ſhot in the Face and fell; the King alſo in the Breaſt with an Arrow, which piercing through his Armour near his Pap, ſome affirmed, that Blood and Breath iſſued together out of the Wound, and he ſwooned, being covered by Peuceſtes with his Shield. Now the Macedonians brake into the Caſtle, and put all to the Sword, ſparing neither Sex nor Age. They carried their King out on a Target, not knowing whether he was alive or dead; but ſhortly after he came to himſelf, and his wound was dreſſed, (ſome ſay by Critobulus the Phyſician, others by Perdiccas) out of which much Blood iſſuing, he ſwooned again, and that very thing ſtaunched the bleeding. While he ſtayed a little in this place, a report flew to the Army then lying with the Fleet at the meeting of the two Rivers Hydraotes and Aceſines, that he was dead, and it gained ſuch belief, that the Letters he ſent were taken but as counterfeit. Therefore he haſted to the Camp, where he preſented himſelf to the view of them all there.

Saileth into Indus.

25. Having eſcaped this great danger amongſt the Malli, (for amongſt them it was, and not amongſt the Oxydracæ as ſome have miſtaken) and returned to his Fleet, he ſailed down the River, and on the fourth day came to a place forſaken of its Inhabitants, but convenient for to make ſome ſtay in. Here he reſted many days for the better curing of his Wounds, and employed his men this while in building of Ships. Hither the Malli and Oxydracæ ſent to ask pardon, and ſubmit themſelves. After which he ſailed further, and came to the confluence of Hydraotes and Aceſines, the former whereof loſeth it ſelf in the later. Proceeding further, he came through Aceſines into Indus, ſubduing a certain People in his way who lived in a Free State; and here he made Philip Governour of the Malli and Oxydracæ, with all the Country down to this place, wherein he alſo gave order for a City to be built. Following on his voyage, he arrived at the Country of the Sanbeſtæ, (or Sabracæ) who living alſo in a popular way of Government, were very populous and ſtrong, and hearing of his coming had got together 60000 Foot, and near 8000 Horſe, but upon a ſight of his Fleet they let fall their courage, and ſent fifty of their Principal men to ask Peace. From this place on the fourth day he came to the Seat of the Sogdæ, who alſo yielded themſelves; and here by the River Indus he cauſed to be built another Alexandria, which he furniſhed with convenient Havens and Arſenals. Thence he ſailed down with ſuch expedition into the Country of Muſicanus, that he was upon him before he heard of his coming; therefore the Indian met him with ſuch Gifts as his Country afforded, and gave up himſelf with all he had into his hands, acknowledging his fault that he had no ſooner done it.

Upon which he buildeth an Alexandria, and ſubdueth Muſicanus.

26. Having here commanded Teryeſtes, whom he had ſet over the Paropamiſadæ, to be put to death, for abuſing that People by a covetous and tyrannical Government, he cauſed a Fort to be raiſed in the chief City of Muſicanus, wherein he left a Garriſon, becauſe the place ſeemed very convenient for keeping the Neighbouring Nations in Obedience. Leaving Muſicanus in his former power, though not authority, he ſailed down to the Præſti, another Indian Nation, over which ruled Oxycanus. Here he ſtormed two Cities, in one whereof their King being retired into the Caſtle, ſent to him to beg pardon, but too late; for e're the Meſſengers could come at Alexander, two Towers fell down, which made way for the Macedonians, who entring, killed Oxycanus amongſt the reſt; which being reported to the other Cities, they all yielded themſelves. After this he came into the borders of the Brachmans, whoſe King Sabus (or Sambus) cauſed the Gates of his Principal City to be opened, but afterwards revolted at the inſtigation of his Subjects, ſome of whom paid dearly for it in a certain Town wherein they were taken, Sambus himſelf with thirty Elephants eſcaping. Some of them were upon pain of death to anſwer to certain hard Queſtions, which having done, they were diſmiſſed with rewards, as Plutarch informeth us. But ere this, Muſicanus had revolted, againſt whom Pithon was ſent, who overpowering him took him Priſoner. He was Crucified in his own Country by Alexander's Command, with all ſuch Brachmans as had drawn him to revolt.

and Oxycanus.

27. Returning to the River Indus, in the fourth day he came to a City of the Brachmans, called Hamatelia, the Inhabitants thereof hearing that he was invincible, poiſoned the Heads of the Arrows, truſting to their own valour, and the natural ſtrength of the Place. He ſent a party, which by approaching their Walls, and then retreating, drew them forth, by which ſtratagem, of 3000 he took 1000, and killed 600. Many of his own men died, and thoſe who ſurvived were brought into extream danger, amongſt whom was Ptolomy the Son of Lagus. He being almoſt ready to dye, the ſtory goeth, that Alexander in a Dream had an Herb ſhewed to him, which drunk, and outwardly applied, helped againſt the Poyſon; the truth being, that the virtue of this Plant was by ſome declared to him, and this ſtory feigned out of flattery. For all this, the beſieged yielding, had indemnity granted to them, and then came Mæris King of the Iſland Pattalena, which he gave up into the Conquerors Power. Alexander reſtored, and ſent him back, commanding him to provide all neceſſaries for his Army; but ſailing down thither he found that he had left the City, and retired to the Mountains, with all his Subjects, both of Town and Country. Alexander ſent ſome Horſemen to perſwade them to return, which accordingly diverſe did. Then did he order Hephæſtion to build a Fort in the City, and ſent a party to dig Wells in that Coaſt of the Country which wanted Water. The Enemy fell upon theſe men out of the Wilderneſs, and killed many of them, which forced the King to ſend others for a ſupply. Now had he almoſt ſailed 10 months when he came to Pattalena.

Strabo lib. 15.

He ſayleth to the Iſland Pattalena.

28. At this Iſland the River Indus parteth into two branches, whereof both retained the name as far as the Sea it ſelf. Alexander taking the right hand ſailed down that Channel, his Army being led according to the cuſtom, near the Rivers ſide. The next day aroſe ſuch a Tempeſt, as exceedingly diſtreſſed the Fleet, ſome Ships being driven ſo far as ſcarcely could they be recovered; whereupon for ſome time the King ſtayed here at a certain Iſland, and ſent men on ſhore to take up ſome Natives to be their Guides. Coming lower, where the Chanel was very broad, another Tempeſt forced them into a certain Creek, where as great a fear ſeized on them, and ſo much the greater, becauſe they were unacquainted with the occaſion of it. It hapned, that the Tide being exceeding high (as it is at this day at Cambaia, where the River Indus falls into the Sea) all the Grounds near the River were overflown, except certain Hills, which appearing like ſo many Iſlands to them, the Macedonians ſwom, and left their Boats. When the Water fell again, the Veſſels were left on the dry ground,ſome being overwhelmed, and others turned upon their ſides. But the River according to the courſe of the Tide overflowing again at the due time, ſuch Veſſels as ſtuck faſt in the Mud were lifted up unhurt, but thoſe that the Water found otherwiſe placed, were either daſhed againſt one another, or miſcarried after ſome other faſhion.

Is diſtreſſed upon the Water.

29. Repairing his Navy, as he could, he ſent before two Boats to make diſcovery of another Iſland below, by the Indians called Cilluta, but by him Scillaſtis, near which he muſt needs ſayl down into the Ocean. Hearing that it was large, and very Commodious to harbour in, he gave order for the Fleet to go thither, but he himſelf proceeded further, to ſearch whether there was an eaſie paſſage at the Rivers fall for the whole Navy into the Sea. Having paſſed ſome 200 furlongs, he diſcovered another Iſland, and then returned to the Fleet, where having ſacrifized to ſome gods, he went back, and performed this ſervice to others after another faſhion, ſaying, he was commanded ſo to do by the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon. Sayling out of Indus into the Ocean, he ſacrifized Bulls to Neptune, and after the burning of Incenſe caſt out a Golden Vial with Golden Cups, into the Sea, praying for a proſperous voyage to his Navy, (which he intended under command of Nearchus his Admiral ſhould ſayl through the Ocean into the Perſian Gulf, and ſo up Euphrates and Tigris) and that no mortal after him might paſs the bounds of his expedition. Then returned he up the River to Pattala, whither he found Pithon come with the Forces, and purpoſing to leave half the Fleet at the City (at this day called Pattala in Cambaia) he commanded Hephæſtion there to make a Haven, and proviſion for ſhipping. He himſelf ſayled down the ſtream on the left hand, which firſt led him to a Lake, where he left Leonnatus with moſt of the Souldiers, and with 20 Ships paſſed through this Mouth of Indus into the Ocean.

Paſſeth into the Ocean.

30. His deſign was to ſee whether the Fleet might not beſt ſail this way into the Sea; and he ſatisfied himſelf that it might. Then did he Travel up the ſhore, and cauſed Wells to be digged thereon to furniſh the Navy with Water. Returning then to Pattala, he ſent part of his Army to dig more, and going to the Lake, he cauſed Havens to be made, and proviſion for Shipping: he alſo left there a Garriſon with neceſſaries for 8 months. At this time the Eteſian winds in this Country blowing from the South (though in other places from other quarters) hindred Navigation, wherefore he was conſtrained to leave Nearchus at Pattala with the Fleet till they ſhould ceaſe. He journyed through the Country of the Arabitæ (or Arbitæ) to the River Arabius (or Arbis) digging Pits on the ſhore for the uſe of the Fleet in its paſſage by theſe Coaſts. Nearchus and his followers were two months after Alexander's departure driven out by the Inhabitants of Pattalena, and compelled to begin their Voyage e're the ſeaſon of the year well ſerved. Coming to the mouth of the River, they were forced to cut through a Rock (for ſome way) ſuch a Ditch as by the help of the Tide might convey their Ships ſafe into the Ocean. The Arabitæ hearing of Alexander's approach, fled into the Mountains,ſo that without oppoſition he paſſed over the River Arabius, and came into the Country of the Oritæ,of whom killing ſome, and taking others, (becauſe they had not ſubmitted themſelves) he thence marched into the Borders of the Gedroſij, with whom the Oritæ had joyned, but upon his approach ſent and begged peace, which he granted, on condition that they would depart to their dwellings. He ſet over them Apellophanes with whom he left Leonnatus one of the Keepers of his body, with a party of Horſe and Foot to expect the coming of the Fleet, and in the mean while to build a new City, and ſettle the affairs of the Country.

Nearchus the Admiral ſaileth the Ocean.

31. In this paſſage through the Country of the Gedroſij, greater loſs and damage hapned to him than in all his expedition through Aſia beſides; becauſe, what for want of Water, by exceſs of heat, ill diet and hunger, he carried not out the fourth part of thoſe Forces he brought into India. Yet was not this loſs ſuſtained through ignorance; for ſome tell us he knew of the danger very well; but hearing that this Country had been formerly invaded both by Semiramis and Cyrus, and that the former was forced to fly but with 30 Attendants, and the later with 7, he had an itching deſire to paſs through it, and in the glory of his adventure to excel them. After incredible trouble undergone, for 60 days, he came to Pura the chief City,where (as it was time) he refreſhed his Army, and thence marched towards the Borders of Caramania. Hither news came that Philip, Governour of the Oxydracæ, and of other Indians, was killed by the Mercenary Souldiers; but that his death was revenged upon them by the Macedonians; whereupon he wrote to Taxiles and Eudemus to take care of the Country, till ſuch time as he could ſend one to Alexander paſſeth the Countrey of the Gedroſians with incredible difficulty.

ſucceed Philip. Coming into Caramania not far from Perſia, he animadverted upon the Governor, as upon Cleander and Sitalces, who being ſent to kill Parmenio, had after his death committed grievous outrages upon the people in thoſe parts. He alſo puniſhed Ozines and Zariaſpes, who had ſolicited the Perſians to revolt, and Heracon, who had rifled the Temple at Suſa: here alſo he made Peuceſtes one of the Keepers of his Body, they being before this ſeaven in number. In the mean time Nearchus having paſſed the borders of the Arabii, Oritæ, Gedroſij, and Ichthyophagi, came into the Perſian Gulf, and arrived at Armuſia (now called Ormus) where underſtanding that his Maſter was but diſtant but five days journey, he went to him, and having made a report of his Voyage, returned preſently to the Fleet, with order to paſs up to the mouth of Euphrates, and thence row unto Babylon.

He cometh to Paſargadæ in Perſia.

To Perſepolis.

Curtius lib. 10. Diodorus, &c. A. M. 3680. Ol. 113. ann. 4. V. C. 429. Alexand. 12.

32. It being now very good ſayling, Alexander ſent Hæphæſtion by Sea into Perſia, with the greateſt part of his Army, and ſhortly after departed himſelf and came by Land to Paſargadæ, where he beſtowed mony on the women, according to the cuſtom of the Perſian Kings when they came thither. Here he much lamented the violation of Cyrus his Sepulchre, which ſince his former being here, had been robbed of all its riches, except a Litter, and a Golden Urn wherein had been the Body; and this alſo was cut and mangled, the cover being taken away, and the body caſt out. He commanded the Urn to be repaired as well as might be, and the reliques of Cyrus being therein depoſited, the Door-place to be walled up. From Paſargadæ, now called Chelquera, he came to Perſepolis, the ſeat of the Perſian Kings, where great complaints being made againſt Orxines (who being deſcended from Cyrus and the ſeven Conſpirators, had contained the Perſians in obedience after the death of the Governor Phraſortes) he was crucified through the malice of Bagoas the Eunuch, Alexander's minion, who hated him upon no other account, than for that beſtowing great gifts upon the Courtiers at their return, he neglected him. Phradates alſo, who had been Governor of the Madi, Hircanians, and Tapyri, was here put to death, for affecting Kingly power. But, Peuceſtes who protected the King among the Malli, and as a reward had been received amongſt the Keepers of his Body, was now further made Governor of Perſia, and thereupon fully conformed himſelf to the faſhions of the Country.

Arrianus lib. 7.

He marrieth Statira the Daughter of Darius.

33. Alexander had a great deſire to ſail through Euphrates and Tigris, into the Perſian Gulf, to compaſs about Arabia and Africk, and ſo to paſs through the Straights leading into the Mediterranean, (now called the Straigths of Gibraltar) for which purpoſe he commanded Wood to be cut down in Libanus, to be carried to Thapſacus in Syria, and being made into Ships, thence to be conveyed to Babylon. Not long after, Nearchus brought the Fleet up Paſitigris to a Bridge newly made for the paſſage of the Land-army, where for the meeting of both the Armies, after ſix months ſayl, Alexander ſacrifized, and celebrated Games. Thence marching to Suſæ: the Provinces by their Deputies there accuſed many of their Officers, beſides other Offences, of violating their Temples. He cauſed them all to be put to death, without reſpect to any former friendſhip, and with them Cleander, Sitalces, and Heracon, whom he had formerly condemned in Caramania. This ſeverity noiſed abroad, netled many that knew themſelves faulty; Some ſcraped together much mony and fled, and others that commanded the Mercenaries revolted, which cauſed him to ſend up and down Aſia to diſband the Stipendaries, who being thus put out of imployment, robbed all over, and at length met at Tenarus, a Promontory of Laconia in Greece, whither many of their Captains fled to them. Alexander now married Statira the Daughter of Darius, and gave her younger Siſter Drypetis to his beloved Hephæſtion, having a great deſire that his Children might be Couſins to him. To ſome 80 more of his Commanders he gave Wives of the Daughters of the chiefeſt Medes and Perſians, and to them aſſigned Dowers. He made one great Wedding-feaſt for himſelf and them all: and to the other Macedonians that had married Wives in Aſia he gave gifts.

34. Moreover he paid the debts they had contracted in Aſia, and becauſe they were unwilling by giving up their names to let him ſee how bad Huſbands they had been (for they ſuſpected him of ſuch an intention) he cauſed the mony to be given them, without taking account to whom, and this expence reached not fully 1000 Talents (as appeareth from Diodorus, Curtius and Plutarch; though Juſtin and Arrianus mention 20000) ſo that as Curtius obſerveth, this Army which had conquered ſo many Nations, brought more Victory than Booty out of Aſia. He alſo rewarded them ſeverally, as they had done him moſt eminent ſervice; and to Peuceſtes, Leonnatus, Nearchus, Oneſicratus, Hephæſtion, and other Keepers of his body, he gave Golden Crowns. But this did not ſatisfie the Macedonians, ſo as to keep them from mutining. For, having ſailed the River Eulæus to the Sea, thence to the mouth of Tigris, and up this River as far as Opis, he there calling them together, gave liberty to all who were rendred unfit for ſervice, either through age or being maimed, to return home, promiſing great rewards to ſuch as would voluntarily ſtay and finiſh the War with him. Though he intended hereby to gratifie them, yet they made a bad conſtruction of it, as proceeding from contempt of them and their ſervice, and counting them unfit for War. They called alſo to mind how he uſed the Perſian Habit and Cuſtoms, as did ſome of his Favourites; that the barbarous Nations were admitted amongſt that Troop called his Friends; and that he had lately cauſed 30 and more young men to be picked out of the Provinces, whom trained up in the Diſcipline of Macedonia, he called Epigoni, or his poſterity. Conſidering theſe things, and thinking that he now deſpiſed their Perſons, Faſhions and Country, they all deſired to be diſbanded, and bade him go alone to the Wars with his Father Hammon, ſeeing he ſet ſo light by his Souldiers.

The Macedonians mutinie.

35. The King inraged, preſently cauſed thirteen of the Ringleaders to be apprehended, and drowned in the River; and reviling the reſt, bade them all be gone home. Then entring his Palace, for that day and the next he would admit none to his preſence. On the third, having confined the Macedonians to their Tents, he called ſuch ſtrangers to him as followed his Camp. Their faithfulneſs to him and the former Kings he commended, he related what favours he had ſhewed them, and told them he now took them as fellow Citizens, gave them the Arms of the Macedonians, and would have the Kingdom of Europe and that of Aſia the ſame thing. Out of them he choſe 1000 young men, to whom he committed the charge of his Perſon in the Court; he beſtowed the commands of the Army amongſt them, and made choice of ſome, whome naming his Kinſfolk, he permitted to kiſs him. Theſe things cut the Macedonians to the heart, and made them ſeriouſly repent of their raſhneſs. Coming to the Palace, they caſt down their Arms at the Gate, and with great lamentation deſired to be admitted, offering to give up the Incendiaries, and deſiring him rather to kill than thus diſgrace them. He refuſed to admit them, but they continued ſtill two days, and as many nights before the Gates, profeſſing that they would not depart till he had compaſſion on them. On the third day perceiving them thus humbled, he came forth to them, and Callines after mutual weeping, told him, that it troubled them to know others received into his Kindred, and themſelves excluded from it. He anſwered, that he received them alſo, and ſo would call them thenceforth; then he offered himſelf to be kiſſed by as many as would. Being thus received again into favour, they returned with great joy to their Tents, and afterwards were feaſted by him, together with Perſians and others, to the number of 9000 Gueſts.

But having humbled themſelves he is reconciled.

36. He diſmiſſed now ſuch as were unſerviceable for the Wars (though ſome ſay it was not till a little before his death) to whom he paid not only their arrears, but gave them money to bear their Charges, and a Talent to every man beſides. He ſent home with them Craterus his beloved Friend to govern Greece and Macedonia in the room of Antipater, who was to bring over a ſupply of men. Then made he a progreſs through ſeveral places, and came to Ecbatane the chief ſeat of Media, where Hephæſtion by drinking got a Feaver, and then impatient of a ſtrict diet, died in ſeaven days. In the abſence of Glaucus his Phyſician (who was gone to the Theatre to behold the Sports) he eat his Dinner, and after it drank a Cup of cold Wine, which, as it was thought, increaſed the diſtemper. Alexander took his death moſt heavily, faſted three days, and refuſed to be comforted. He commanded the Phyſician to be Crucified, beſpoke an univerſal Mourning, wherein even the Cities ſhared by the removal of their Ornaments from the Walls. He ordered Perdiccas to convey the body to Babylon, where he intended him a moſt ſumptuous Monument, and refuſed to fill up his place of Captain of his thouſand Friends, leſt his name ſhould be forgotten, by which he would have the Company ſtill called. Then, for diverſion, he made War upon the Coſſai, a People bordering upon the Oxii, who having ſtood out againſt the Perſians, deſpiſed him alſo, becauſe of their valour, and the ſtrength of their Country, ſituate upon the Mountains of Media. Yet for all this, and the coldneſs of Winter, he brought them under within 40 days.

He cometh to Ecbatane in Media, where Hephæſtion dyeth.

37. Having a great deſire to ſail the Caſpian Sea, he ſent Heraclides with divers Ship-carpenters into Hyrcania to build Ships, and then he took his way towards Babylon. Being diſtant from the City two or three dayes journey, the Chaldæans ſent to warn him that he ſhould not come into the City, for they were told by

He cometh to Babylon.

by their god Belus, that if he did, it ſhould be fatal to him. He intended to follow their advice; but being perſwaded otherwiſe by Anaxarchus and other Græcians, at length he reſolved on the contrary. Then they deſired him that he would not enter with his Face upon the Weſt; but it being difficult not ſo to do, by reaſon of the Fens about the City, having ſlighted their former advice, he alſo rejected this. Being arrived, he gave audience to Ambaſſadors ſent to him now from all parts, not only out of Aſia, but from Africk and Europe alſo; Out of Africk, from the Nations ſituate upon the Sea-Coaſts as far as the Atlantick Ocean: from Europe, beſides the Græcians, Thracians, Illyrians and Scythians, from ſome Nations of Italy, as the Brutii, Lucani, Tuſci; from Sicilie, and Sardinia; as alſo from the Spaniards and Galls, then firſt known to the Macedonians; but as for the Romans, though ſome ranke them in the number, yet have we no reaſon to give credit to their report. At the celebration of the Olympick Games, he cauſed it to be proclaimed, that all Greek Exiles might return home, except ſuch as were baniſhed for Sacrilege or Murder, againſt which the Athenians and Ætolians only made reſiſtance. Then celebrated he the Funerals of Hephæſtion with vaſt magnificence, and ſacrificed to him as an Heroe. After this he made great preparations for Shipping, intending alſo to invade and conquer Arabia, which, hearing it was no leſs than India, he ſent ſome to diſcover.

A. M. 3681.
Ol. 114. an. 1.
Urbis conditæ 430.
Alexand. 13.

Where he falleth into a Feaver.

38. While theſe preparations were making, and an Haven digging at Babylon, he paſſed through Euphrates into Pallacopa, a River, which being ſupplied with Water from the former, thereby hindreth it from overflowing the Country. Here he opened the paſſages, made a new one towards the Lakes, and coming into the Borders of Arabia, built there a City. Then deriding the Chaldæans, for that he had both entred, and ſailed in ſafety from Babylon, he thither returned, and liking the City exceedingly, intended to make it the Seat of his Empire; though it was but for a ſhort ſpace, as it fell out. For, having ſet up feaſting and drinking very late one night, as he was departing to go to Bed, he was again invited by Medius a Theſſalian to another carowze, where challenging, and being challenged, he drank ſo much Wine as put him into a Feaver, whereof he died the eleventh day. Some have delivered that he was poyſoned by the procurement of Antipater, who ſuſpecting he was through the malice of Olympias called out of Macedonia for no good towards himſelf, ſent his Son Caſſander with Poyſon to be delivered to Iollas and his other Sons, that then waited on the King. Indeed Caſſander was not at all favourable, as he ought to have been, to the Intereſt of Alexander's Poſterity, as neither to his Reputation; and coming to him a little before his death, he did but little ſtrive to ſuit his humour. For ſeeing the Barbarians adore him, and unacquainted with ſuch a ſight, he burſt forth into laughing, for which Alexander caught him by the Hair, and knocked his Head ſoundly againſt the Wall, as Plutarch telleth us. But as for matter of Poyſon, the long lying of his Body in ſo hot a Country, during the contentions of his Captains, betrayed no ſymptoms thereof, and therefore others give no credit to the report. Moreover, the courſe of his ſickneſs preſenteth us with no ſuch ſymptomes, as it is deſcribed to us by Plutarch and Arrianus out of his Diaries.

Vide præter Plutarchum & Diodorum Senecæ Epiſt. 83. Athenæum l. 11. c. 17. Macrobium Saturnal. lib. 5. cap. 21.

39. On the 18th day of the (Macedonian) month Dæſius (May the 12) he ſlept in a Bath, becauſe of his Feaver. The day following he returned to his Bed-Chamber, and ſpent it with Medius at Dice: then being waſhed at night, and having finiſhed his devotions, he ſupped ſomething liberally, and all the night was much diſtempered. On the 20th day he waſhed, and having finiſhed a ſolemn ſacrifice, in the Bath heard Nearchus relate the ſtory of his Navigation, and of what he had ſeen in the Ocean. On the 21ſt having done the ſame thing his Feaver increaſed, and he had an ill Night. The day after he was held with a ſharp Feaver, and was removed near the great place for ſwimming, where he diſcourſed with his Officers about ſupplying Vacant places in the Army with the fitteſt perſons. On the 24th his Diſeaſe increaſing he ſacrificed, being borne out to the place, and commanded the principal of his Officers to ſtay in the Court, and the reſt to watch before the Gates. Being removed into the Inner Palace on the 25th day he reſted a little; but the Feaver abated not, and when the Captains came to ſee him he ſpake not a word. So he paſſed over the 26th day, whereupon the Macedonians thinking him to be dead, came with great noiſe to the Door, and compelled his Friends to let them in; ſo in their Coats every man of them paſſed by his Bed-ſide. The ſame day Pithon and Seleucus were ſent to the Temple of Serapis, to ask if he ſhould be removed thither, and received anſwer, that he ſhould continue where he was. On the 28th day towards the evening he expired. Though he fainted by the violence of his Diſeaſe; yet leaning on his Elbow, he reached out his Hand to all Souldiers that would touch it in their paſſage, and (which ſeemeth incredible) continued in the ſame poſture he had ſet himſelf, till the whole Army had ſaluted him.

Curtius lib. 10. cap. 7.

40. The Souldiers being all gone, he asked his friends about him, whether they thought they ſhould have ſuch another King. When all kept ſilence he ſaid, that as he was ignorant hereof, ſo he knew, could Propheſie, and almoſt ſee with his Eyes how much Blood Macedonia would ſhed in this Controverſie, with what ſlaughters and bloodſhed it would make him a Parentation when he was dead. At length he commanded his body to be buried in the Temple of Hammon, and when his friends asked him to whom he would leave his Kingdom, he anſwered, to the moſt Valiant. Yet having taken his Ring from his Finger, he gave it to Perdiccas: whereby all conjectured that he commended his Kingdom to him till his Children ſhould grow up. Again, Perdiccas demanding of him when he would have Divine Honours given to him, he replied, then, when they (his followers) were happy: which were his laſt words, and a little after he expired. He lived 32 years and eight months, reigned twelve, and alſo eight months. He died ſix years and ten months after the murder of Darius, in the firſt year of the 114 Olympiad, A. M. 3681, 322 years before the Æra of Chriſt. Siſygambis the Mother of Darius having with ſome patience born the loſs both of her Son's life and Empire, when ſhe heard of Alexander's death refuſed to live any longer. So, refraining from all ſuſtenance ſhe died the fifth day after.

Juſtin lib. 12. Corn. Nepos in Eumene. Curtius ut ſupra.

Of which he dieth the eleventh day.

Juſtin. Curtius Diodorus.

CHAP. II.

Of ſuch things as hapned after the Death of Alexander amongſt his Captains, till their Cantonizing of his Empire into their particular Kingdoms, and their taking the Stile and Title of Kings upon them, Containing the ſpace of 17 years.

1. SOme have written that Alexander by his Teſtament, diſtributed the Provinces amongſt his ſeveral Commanders. So the Author of the firſt Book of Machabees affirms, and the Excerpta Chronologica of an half Barbarian, as Valeſius terms him, publiſhed by Scaliger. Alexander, he ſaith, coming to die wrote his Teſtament, that every one of the Princes of Alexander might Reign, all of them in their own Provinces. But Quintus Curtius, Arrianus and Diodorus Siculus ſufficiently refute this Fable. Curtius writes expreſly, Some have believed that by the Teſtament of Alexander the Provinces were diſtributed; but we have found the fame of that thing, though it be delivered by Authors, to have been vain. Alexander, though he had taken ſeveral Wives, yet left but one Son already born of Barſine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian, and another in the Belly of Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyartes. His Son called Hercules was deſpiſed upon his Mothers account by the Captains, who much ſcorned the Conquered Nations. He had a Siſter named Cleopatra, Widow to the King of Epirus, and their Uncle, who was ſlain in Italy; and a baſe Brother called Aridæus (begotten on Philinna a woman of Lariſſa) who Married Eurydice the Daughter of Amyntas, whom being the right Heir, and his Nephew, Philip kept from the Kingdom of Macedonia, after he had exerciſed the Office of his Protector, and on him beſtowed a Daughter of his own in Marriage. This Amyntas bore patiently the want of the Kingdom all Philip's time, but in the beginning of Alexander's reign, with the loſs of his life, attempted ſomething. His Title through the proweſs of the two late Kings was utterly forgotten; Cleopatra (as a woman perhaps) was not thought of. Aridæus neither by birth, perſonage, or qualities was fitly endowed; yet upon him the election fell, for want of a better, becauſe the Captains were at a loſs what courſe to take.

Alexander's Iſſue and Linage.

2. For, Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus (as he was called; but reputed the Son of Philip, who, as it's ſaid, having uſed the company of Arſinoe his Mother, put her off in Marriage to Lagus, when great with Child), rejecting the Title of the half Perſi- Contention amongſt his Captains about the Succeſſion.

an Brood, though as Alexander's Children they ſhould have been conſidered, was for the Captains their taking the rule upon them, and deciding all things by Vote of the major part. But as he might think this courſe moſt likely to ſerve his own ambition, ſo Ariſtonus perhaps on the ſame grounds betook himſelf to the words of Alexander, which he interpreted as meant of Perdiccas, becauſe, ſaying, that he left his Kingdom to the worthieſt, at the point of death he delivered to him his Ring. He was ſeconded by many, who either bore good will to Perdiccas, or out of fear that he would carry it, would not venture to oppoſe him. But he would needs make a ſhew of modeſty, thinking thereby the more to indear himſelf, whereat Meleager an envious man, and one who bore to him a particular grudge, took advantage to inveigh againſt him, and diſturbed all Councils, by perſwading the Souldiers that whoſeſoever was the Empire, they had the beſt Title to the Treaſure. During the uproar Aridæus was mentioned, and his Name laid hold on by ſome peaceable Spirits, who labouring betwixt the Parties wrought a compoſure for the time, wherein yet Perdiccas had the better of his Adverſary. It was agreed, according to the deſire of the Infantry, that Aridæus, the baſe Son of Philip, ſhould be King, and foraſmuch as he was ſtupid and dull (rather through the practiſing of Olympias upon him, as ſome thought, than any Original indiſpoſition) Perdiccas was made his Protector, and Commander of his Forces, who hereby in effect was King for a time, though that Title, with Name of Philip, for a greater Grace was conferred upon the other.

Aridæus declared King.

A. M. 3682.
Ol. 114. ann. 2.
V. C. 431.
Ante Chriſtum 321.
Ptolom. 1.

3. Then did the Officers diſtribute the Provinces of the Empire amongſt themſelves. Macedonia and Greece were left to Antipater, Thrace with the neighbouring Countries was aſſigned to Lyſimachus; Ægypt, with all that which of Cyrene, Africk and Arabia had belonged to Alexander, was ſet over to Ptolomy the Son of Lagus. Syria and Phœnicia were committed to Laomedon; Armenia to Neoptolemus; Meſopotamia to Arceſilaus. In Aſia the leſs, Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, with the Countries thereto adjoyning, which Alexander had paſſed by in his Conqueſts, were aſſigned to Eumenes; Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, and the greater Phrygia to Antigonus; the leſſer Phrygia as far as the Helleſpont to Leonatus; Cilicia to Philotas, together with Iſauria; and Caria to Caſſander. Menander was confirmed in the Government of Lydia given him by Alexander. The Iſle of Cyprus remained in the Power of certain Governors to which he had granted it; and all that part of his Empire from Babylon Eaſtward, continued in the ſtate wherein he left it. Thus was his Dominions diſpoſed of otherwiſe than he intended, for one telleth us that he made a Will, which he delivered to the Rhodians, and another affirmeth, that thereby all was given to one only Succeſſor. After this his Funerals were thought of, his Body having lain ſeaven days neglected. Yet no corruption had ſeized on it, and it looked as freſh in the Face as though it had been living, which as it's ſaid made the Ægyptians and Chaldæans afraid to touch it; but having prayed that Mortals might lawfully do it, they embalmed, and after that adorned it with Royal Enſigns. The care of the Burial was committed to one Aridæus (not the King, though ſome have ſo miſtaken) another of the Captains, who ſpent two years in making preparation for it, which made Olympias tax the late ambition of her Son, and bewail his misfortune together in the ſame Speech, as Elian obſerveth. For, the Burial of Alexander was to be uſhered in by the Funerals of many of his Followers.

The Provinces diſtributed amongſt the Captains.

Diodorus l. 20. ad Ol. 118. ann. 4.
Ammianus Mar. l. 23.
Juſtin.
Curtius l. 10.
Diodorus ad Olymp. 114. ann. 2. & 3.
Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. c. 30.

4. Ptolomy got poſſeſſion of Ægypt without any trouble, and ſetled himſelf therein, partly by his fair carriage towards the Inhabitants, and partly by the power of an Army, which he raiſed by virtue of 8000 thouſand Talents. Hearing that Perdiccas had an intention to deprive him of his Government, he contracted affinity with Antipater, and making away Cleomenes his Lieutenant, becauſe he was much addicted to the Protector, fortified the Country. Antipater was now employed in the Lamian War againſt the Athenians and Ætolians, who refuſed to receive their Exiles, as was hinted before, and ſo diſtreſſed him in Battel, that he was forced to fly to Lamia, a City of Pthiotis. Here Leoſtenes the Athenian General beſieged him; but when he perceived him forſaken by the Ætolians, he iſſued out, and ſlew him in the charge, being an excellent Souldier, and one who had deſerved well of Greece. Leonatus Governour of the leſſer Phrygia, allured by promiſe of his Daughter, came over to help Antipater; but marching through Theſſaly was driven into a Fen by the Græcians, and there ſlain. At his miſhap Antipater (who coming thither the day after, united his Forces with his own) is ſaid to have rejoyced, becauſe he had determined to make himſelf Maſter of Macedonia. At this time Perdiccus taking the King along with him, went againſt Ariarathes of Cappadocia, whom getting into his hands, he Crucified, and ſubduing thoſe Countries which Alexander had paſſed by, gave Ptolomy getteth poſſeſſion of Egypt.

The Lamian War in Greece.

Perdiccas ſubdueth Cappadocia.

gave them to Eumenes, according to agreement. Craterus not long after paſſed over into Macedonia, to the aſſiſtance of Antipater, with 10000 Macedonians, and 150 Perſians, which Force united to the Army of Antipater, overpowered the joynt ſtrength of the Grecians.

A. M. 3683.
Ol. 114. an. 2.
V. C. 431.
Ptolom. 2.

Civil Wars amongſt the Captains.

Diod.

Arrianus.

Juſtin l. 13.

Perdiccas goeth againſt Ptolomy.

6. After this begun the Civil Wars betwixt the Captains themſelves. For, Perdiccas breathing after the Soveraignty, and knowing how able the other were to withſtand him, grudged Ptolomy exceedingly the poſſeſſion of Egypt, and through the perſwaſion of Eumenes procured much enmity, in that having married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, by his advice, he reſolved to put her away, and take Cleopatra to wife, the daughter of Philip, and ſiſter to Alexander. This being made known to Antigonus, he certified Antipater of it, and being calumniated by Perdiccas (who intended to make him away) he fled unto him, with Demetrius his ſon. Perdiccas conſulting with his Officers what in this caſe was to be done, reſolved firſt to ſet upon Egypt, leſt Ptolomy during his abſence in Greece, ſhould ſeize upon Aſia. And to keep Aſia againſt Antipater and Craterus, he left Eumenes with large power over the Provinces, joyning with him Alcetas his own brother, and Neoptolemus. Perdiccas taking along with him Aridæus the King, and young Alexander now born of Roxane (who was eight moneths gone with child of him when his Father died) for a more ſpecious pretence, marched againſt Ptolomy. Antipater, and Craterus, hearing how things went, clapped up a peace preſently with the Etolians, and leaving Polyſperchon to govern Macedonia and Greece, paſſed over the Helleſpont, and diſpatched away meſſengers to Ptolomy to enter into a league and ſociety with him.

A. M. 3684.
Ol. 114. an. 4.
V. C. 433.
Ptolom. 3.

Eumenes left by him in Aſia getteth the better.

Perdiccas ſlain.

Idem, Pauſan. in Atticis.

* Corn. Nepos in Eumene.

7. Alcetas, with thoſe Macedonians he commanded, flatly refuſed to fight againſt them; and Neoptolemus envying Eumenes the chief command, plainly revolted. After this, ſome were ſent to feel Eumenes, but he anſwered, that he would rather die than betray his truſt, whereupon Antipater and Craterus divided their Forces. Antipater marched towards Egypt to joyn with Ptolomy, and Craterus ſtaied to oppoſe Eumenes, with whom fighting in Cappadocia, his Horſe ſtumbled, and was run through with a Lance, and after the fight died of the wound: Neoptolemus alſo grapling with Eumenes was ſlain by him. By this time Perdiccas with the two Kings came to Peluſium in Egypt, where though Ptolomy purged himſelf of the crimes objected againſt him, yet he would purſue his enterprize, though contrary to the inclination of his Soldiers, his end being hereby to be brought about. Divers of his friends preſently forſook him; yet he ſet upon a Caſtel near the Nile, and not being able to gain it, marched away and came over againſt Memphis, where the River parting into two ſtreams, maketh an Iſland very convenient for the lodging of his Army. Endeavouring to bring his men into it, he loſt 200 in the Ford, for that thoſe who firſt waded over ſo removed the ſand at the bottom, that the River was too deep for ſuch as followed. Yet did he command thoſe who had got ſafe over to return; of whom part were drowned, ſome carried down the ſtream to the Enemy, and others being toſſed to and fro in the River were devoured by Crocodils. By this imprudent act the minds of his followers were ſo turned againſt him, that 100 of his chief Officers revolting, he was ſlain by certain Horſe-men, after he had continued in his power almoſt three years. * One reporteth, that he was ſlain at the River Nile by Seleucus and Antigonus.

Pithon and Aridæus choſen into his place.
And Eumenes declared an Enemy.
Pithon layeth down and Antipater choſen into his place.

8. Ptolomy came over to the Kings, whom with the Officers he magnificently entertained, and then an election being to be made of a new Governour for them in the room of Perdiccas, though he could eaſily have procured himſelf to be choſen, yet he got two others elected, viz. Pithon one of Alexander's moſt intimate friends, and Aridæus, who having the care of the funeral committed to him, had at the deſire of Ptolomy buried the Kings body at Memphis, againſt the will of Perdiccas. The Army now being diſpleaſed at the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes an Enemy, and choſe Antigonus together with Antipater Generals for the ſubduing of him. But Pithon and Aridæus held not their places long, for Euridice the wife of Aridæus the King, being a woman of a notable ſpirit, would have nothing done without her knowledge, and grew ſo intollerable, that Pithon therewith wearied, and ſeeing the Macedonians too much addicted to her, called the Souldiers together, and laid down his Protectorſhip. Into his room then Antipater was elected with full power.

A. M. 3685.
Ol. 115. an. 1.
V. C. 434.
Ptolom. 4.

9. Againſt him alſo Eurydice raiſed ſuch a Sedition in the Army, taking occaſion at the want of pay, that with much ado he eſcaped the danger of his life, by the means of Antigonus and Seleucus. After this, he anew divided ſuch Provinces as he ſaw convenient, placing and diſplacing Governours. He created Antigonus General againſt Eumenes, ſending his own ſon Caſſander as Collonel with him, by whom he might be certified, in caſe he attempted any thing for his own eſtabliſhment; and then with the two Kings he marched for Macedonia. Eumenes having intelligence concerning theſe Councils, made all preparations poſſible for reſiſtance. In the Spring Antigonus came againſt him into Cappadocia, where he firſt attempted by Libels thrown into his Camp, to draw his Soldiers from their obedience, offering a great reward for his head. Eumenes gave his Soldiers thanks for their fidelity, but told them, that theſe Libels were feigned by himſelf to try them, which was a notable device (and of ſuch he was full) to make them wary of giving credit to ſuch for the time to come. Yet ſome proved falſe to him, as one Perdiccas, who drew away a conſiderable party, but was purſued and taken, and being put to death, the Soldiers returned to obedience. But Apollonides his General of the Horſe did moſt miſchief; for being corrupted by Antigonus, when they came to joyn battel he paſſed over with his Troops to him, whereby Eumenes had the worſt of it, and loſt about 8000 men, with his Carriages.

He createth Antigonus General againſt Eumenes.

Eumenes worſted through treachery.

10. Apollonides the Traytor he caught and hanged: then, flying a private way, he returned to the Camp, and there buried his dead, to the wonder and amazement of the Enemy; after which he could have plundered the carriages of Antigonus but for burthening his Soldiers with the booty. Being driven to and fro in this flight, at length he betook himſelf to a Caſtle called Nora, ſituate in the Confines of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and diſmiſſed all his Army, except 500 Horſe-men, and 200 Foot, as alſo ſuch friends as were unwilling to undergo the hardſhip of a Siege. Antigonus before he would lay cloſe ſiege to the place, called him forth to a Treaty, requiring him to come to him a Superiour, to which he anſwered, that he accounted no man his ſuperiour ſo long as he had a Sword by his ſide. This parley, though managed with much reſpect, came to nothing, and Antigonus leaving a party ſufficient to carry on the Siege, marched againſt Alcetas and Attalus, two of Eumenes his confederates, whom he ſuppreſſed. About this time Antipater died in Macedonia, and at his death more ſwayed by the Publick good than any ſelfiſh reſpect, left Polyſpercon (who after himſelf was the oldeſt of Alexander's friends now living) Protector of the Kings, and Captain, with full authority. Caſſander his ſon ſtomached this very much, and conſulting how to advance himſelf to be chief, ſecretly entered into confederacy with divers Captains. Amongſt theſe was Ptolomy, whom he deſired that he would ſend him ſome ſhips out of Phœnicia (for all that Country, together with Judæa, he had now got into his power) into the Helleſpont. But the death of Antipater ſtrangely alſo made way for the inlargement of Eumenes.

Beſieged in Nora.

A. M. 3686. Ol. 115. an. 2. V. C. 435. Ptolom. 5.

Antipater dieth and leaveth his place to Polyſperchon.

11. For, Antigouus now being lef in Aſia, thought oft no leſs than getting it all into his power, and for that end ſtrove to ingratiate himſelf with the ſeveral Captains. Judging that the conjunction of Eumenes might be of great advantage to him, he ſent Hieronimus his Country-man (who being an * Hiſtorian, wrote of the acts of Alexander and his Succeſſors) to deſire him, that forgetting the fight in Cappadocia, he would enter into ſociety with him, and receive a larger Province. He required that he ſhould take an oath, which, ſlightly paſſing over the Kings, he had framed to his own advantage. Eumenes unwilling to ſwear fealty to him, with the aſſent of Hieronymus and the beſiegers, changed the form of the oath, and ſwore to have the ſame friends and enemies, not only with him, but with Olympias, and the Kings. Hereupon the ſiege was raiſed after a years continuance, which he had born with admirable chearfulneſs and prudence, and now being let looſe drew many followers after him, ſo that within a few dayes, beſides the 500 which had continued with him in the Caſtel, he had 2000 at his devotion. Antigonus was very angry that he had changed the form of the oath, and by Letters checked the beſiegers, for admitting of it, requiring them to beſiege him again; but it was too late. Thus, they were as far from cloſing as before; and ſtill were further ſet at diſtance by the affairs which now were on foot in Macedonia.

* Vide Voſſium de ſcript. Græcis. l. 1. c. 11.

His death procureth the inlargement of Eumenes.

12. Polyſperchon having ſucceeded Antipater (as was before ſaid) recalled Olympias out of Epyrus, whither her enmity with Antipater had driven her, inviting her to take the care of her young grand-ſon upon her. But Caſſander reſolving to venture for Macedonia, entred into confederacy with Ptolomy and Antigonus, the later whereof gladly promiſed him aſſiſtance, out of love to the memory of his father, as he pretended, but indeed deſirous that he ſhould be diverted by ſo great a War, whilſt he in the mean time might make ſure of Aſia. Polyſperchon to ſecure Greece, in the name of the Kings publiſhed an Edict for the aboliſhment of all ſuch Oligarchies as ſince ſince the paſſing of Alexander into Aſia, had been erected in any of the Cities, which by virtue hereof he reſtored to their former liberty, hereby to oblige, and keep them from yielding to Caſſander. In the ſame name he alſo wrote to Eumenes, upon whom he confirmed his former Government, and beſtowed more, beſeeching him, that together with himſelf, he would take upon him the protection of the Kings houſe; if he pleaſed, in Macedonia, but rather in Aſia againſt Antigonus, who now had viſibly revolted from it: Moreover, he wrote to the Treaſurers in Cilicia, to furniſh Eumenes with money, and to the Argyraſpidæ (or the old Soldiers with Silver Shields) to obey him in all things. Olympias alſo by letters deſired his help, owning him as the moſt faithful of thoſe remaining, who could aſſiſt againſt the ruine and deſolation of her Family.

A M. 3687. Ol. 115. an. 3. V. C. 436. Ptol. 6.

Caſſander laboureth for Macedonia, & Eumenes is ſtirred up to ſtand for the Kings intereſt.

13. Eumenes not able to ſtay any longer in Cappadocia, becauſe Menander was ſent from Antigonus againſt him, haſted into Cilicia, where the Argyraſpidæ being 3000 in number joyned with him. Fearing the envy of the Macedonians, for that he was but a Stranger of the Cherroneſus of Thrace, he carried it with great civility towards all, and made himſelf but equal to the other Captains. To contain them in order, he feigned that Alexander had appeared to him in a dream, ſitting upon his Throne, and commanding as formerly, in compliance wherewith, he cauſed a Throne to be erected in a Tent as for the King, whereon was alſo laid a Diadem and Scepter; and here the Council of Officers were alwaies to aſſemble: Then ſending his friends abroad he raiſed many men, the report of the largeneſs of his pay drawing Souldiers out of Greece it ſelf. Ptolomy and Antigonus ſent to take off the Argyraſpidæ, and Tentamus one of their Captains was perſwaded by them, but was reduced to his former reſolution by Antigenes his Collegue, and the common Soldiers were quieted by Eumenes, who came upon them while yet they were in fear of Antigonus, who threatned, that except they would deliver him up, he would come and deſtroy them with his Army. After this, Eumenes marched into Phœnicia, intending there to provide ſhipping, that if need were, he might have entercourſe with Polyſperchon. He alſo intended to reſcue Phœnicia out of Ptolomie's hands; but finding himſelf unable to accompliſh this deſign, he began his march through Cœleſyria, and paſſed on till he came to Carræ near Babylon, where he took up his Winter-quarters.

Diod.
Plutarch & Corn. Nepos in Eumene.
Polyænus Stratagem. l. 4.

Who marcheth to Carræ.

14. Antigonus having overthrown at Sea Polyſperchon's Navy, and attempted ſomething againſt the Governours near the Helleſpont, now haſted to make a full conqueſt of Aſia. He choſe out of all his Army 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horſe, wherewith, for expedition, he marched with ſpeed into Cilicia to ſuppreſs Eumenes his forces ere he could get them together, which cauſed the other ſooner to depart into Phœnicia, whence he marched to Carræ. While he here remained he ſent to Seleucus Governour of Babylon, and Pithon of Media, for aid againſt the enemies of the Kings; to which they anſwered, that they were ready to aſſiſt the Kings, but not him, who was condemned by a Council of the Macedonians, and they ſolicited the Captains of the Argyraſpidæ to forſake him; but in vain. After this he reſolved for Suſa, thinking to get aid out of the upper Provinces, and money out of the Treaſury, and thither he came with much difficulty, Seleucus having ſo drowned his Camp, that he was forced to get off his men with boats. It hapned that the Governours of the Provinces were at this time gathered together with many Forces againſt Pithon, who having ſlain Philotas, had placed his own brother Eudramus in his ſtead. Fearing the like might be attempted againſt themſelves, they armed, and having overthrown him in battel, drove him out of Parthia to Babylon, where he fled to Seleucus for relief. Eumenes formerly ſent them Letters from the Kings, now alſo ſolicited them for aid when thus met together, to which they agreed, and came down. Theſe were Peuceſtes Governour of Perſia, one of the Keepers of the late King's body, and now choſen by the reſt for their Generaliſſimo; Polemon of Caramania, Sibyrtius of Arachoſia, Staſander of Aria, and Drangiana; Andrabazus, who was ſent from Oxyartes Governour of the Parapomiſadæ, and Eudamus (or Eudæmon) Governour of the Oxydracæ and Malli, who brought with him out of India 120 Elephants (beſides other Forces) which he got into his hands after he had ſlain Porus the King. Their united Force conſiſted of above 18700 foot, and 4600 horſe, which being joyned to Eumenes his Army, made up a conſiderable body.

A. M. 3688.
Ol. 115. an. 4.
V. C. 437.
Ptolom. 7.

To Suſa.

The Governours of the upper Provinces joyn with him.

15. They had fallen out about chuſing a new General, had not Eumenes his former device of ſetting up Alexander's Pavilion and Throne prevented it, whither he perſwaded them to repair, and rule in common; after which he took as much money out of the Treaſury at Suſa as his wants required. In Spring Antigonus being come into Meſopotamia marched to Babylon, where joyning in Confederacy with Seleucus and Pithon, he received ſome Forces from them, and paſſed the River Tigris. Eumenes

Antigonus marcheth againſt him.

A. M. 3689.
Ol. 116. ann. 1.
V. C. 438.
Ptolomæi 8.

hearing of his coming went down to Paſitigris, where he fell upon ſuch of his Soldiers as were got over the River, which he filled alſo with Carkeiſes, and took 4000 Priſoners. Antigonus therefore bent his courſe another way to the City Radaca ſituate upon the River Eulæus, whence he journeyed through the Countrey of the Coſſæans with great difficulty, and hardſhip, into the habitable parts of Media, where he refreſhed, and quieted his men now ready to mutiny, by reaſon of their tedious journey. Eumenes marched into Perſia, where the whole army was Magnificently entertained by Peuceſtes the Satrapa, who now thought to eſtabliſh himſelf in the Chief power, but by the great cunning of Eumenes, together with the other Captains, was retained in his former condition, and brought to a greater obſervance of him. Antigonus, following him into Perſia, he returned to meet him, but feaſting his Army, he drunk ſo exceſſively, that a great diſtemper thereby contracted, ſtopped him for ſome dayes, and then was he carried in a Litter out of the noiſe, till ſuch time as the Front would not march without him in the head of them. He was therefore conſtrained to lead them, and ſhortly after to frame the battel in his Litter, which Antigonus ſaw, and laughed at.

They meet.

16. Four dayes were ſpent in light skirmiſhing, during which time Antigonus endeavoured to draw away Eumenes his men; but to no purpoſe; and afterwards reſolved to go 3 dayes journey off into Gabiene, for that the Armies were both much ſtraitned for neceſſaries. Eumenes hearing this, ſent ſome, who as Fugitives ſhould acquaint him how as that night he intended to fall in upon his Camp, which he believing, ſtayed, expecting him, and then did Eumenes make haſte to get into Gabiene before him. Antigonus ſeeing himſelf deluded, marched after with great expedition, and leaving behind the reſt of his Army, with a party got before him. He preſented then himſelf to his view upon the Mountains, which Eumenes ſeeing, and thinking he had all his Forces with him, made an halt, and ſo they mutually deceived each other. Here in the Countrey of the Paraetaceni they joyned battel, wherein Eumenes had the better, though the other got the advantage of ground; but then his Soldiers beginning to be refractory would needs depart to their baggage, and not ſtay to bury their dead. Whereupon Antigonus doing this firſt, the victory came to be controverted.

The victory controverted.

17. Antigonus finding himſelf to have had the worſt of it, went his way to Gamarga in Media, where was plenty of Proviſions, and then Eumenes finding his Army in no good caſe to purſue him, departed to Gabiene. Here he divided his Forces into their Winter quarters, not according to his own deſire, but the pleaſure of the Souldiers; for the old ones which had followed Alexander in his Conqueſts were grown ſo high, as they would rather give Laws to their Captains than receive them. Antigonus hearing this, thought to ſurprize them on a ſudden, and for that they ſhould know nothing of it, reſolved to take a by-way, which yet was declared to Eumenes, who not being able to call his Soldiers together ſo ſoon as was requiſite, betook himſelf to his ſeldom failing policy. He cauſed fires to be made on the Mountains where the Enemy was to paſs, which they beholding, thought he had there with him his whole Army, and ſo took the common way, after they were come into the midſt of their journey. Antigonus ſtayed one day to recruit his Army, and Eumenes gathered in the mean time his Forces together, which admired his prudence ſo much, as they ordered him to be Chief, and thus brought him into danger of life, divers of the great ones conſpiring againſt him, which made him ſay he was amongſt a company of wild beaſts; and cauſed him to make his Will, and tear his Letters, leſt any of them that had wrote unto him ſhould be troubled after his death. This as it was faithfully done to his friends, ſo was it alſo in good time, as it after fell out.

Diodorus ut ſuprà, Plutarch in Eumene, & Cornel. Nepos.

18. For ſhortly after, Antigonus and he came to a Pitch-battel, which decided the controverſie, though not for the Conquerour. Eumenes lead into the field 36700, foot, 6500 horſe, and 114 Elephants, Antigonus brought 22000 foot, 9000 horſe, and 65 Elephants. The Argyraſpides (or ſilver ſhields) got the victory, for they put all Antigonus his foot to flight, and killed 5000 of them, ſo that though Peuceſtes withdrew himſelf out of the fight with his own horſe, and 1500 more; yet Eumenes with the loſs of 700 on his ſide got the day. But neither valour nor wiſdom could befriend him, for the place where they fought being exceeding duſty, ſo as ones ſight was taken away at a little diſtance, Antigonus ſends a party of horſe to plunder the Enemies baggage, ſo that the Macedonians though Conquerors, after the battel fell into a deep melancholy for the loſs of their Wives and Children taken away, and Teutamus firſt without the knowledge of any one ſent to Antigonus, who Covenanted with him to reſtore him all, on condition Eumenes were delivered to him, and they would all paſs into his Camp, whereupon the Macedonians, the 1000 which Peuceſtes commanmanded, Eumenes getteth the better.

But is betrayed by his men, manded, and moſt of the other Captains revolted, and Eumenes having his hands tied behind him was delivered up; his Army ſhamefully following him to the Tents of Antigonus, paſſing it ſelf in triumph after him. Antigonus for ſhame would not ſee Eumenes his old fellow Soldier in that condition; but aſſigned him to Keepers, at firſt requiring he ſhould be ſtrictly looked to, but afterwards remitting that rigour till almoſt all perſwaded him to make an end of him. This he was loath to do, and took ſeven dayes to conſult in; but then fearing ſome Sedition might ariſe in the Army, he commanded his dayly allowance of meat ſhould be withdrawn, ſaying, he would never lay hands upon him. Two or three dayes he languiſhed in this condition, and then the Army being to march, one was ſent in, and killed him without the knowledge of Antigonus; ſo fell this brave man, who was excelled in Military glory but by few Captains, in the eighth year after the death of Alexander.

And killed.

Diodorus l. 18.

19. Caſſander having obtained of Antigonus 35 ſhips, and 6000 men, ſayled with them to Athens, which together with the Haven he had got into his power, by means of Nicanor, whom he had ſent before-hand for that purpoſe. Againſt him came Polyſperchon, intending to beſiege him, but his Proviſions failing, he left his ſon with a party in Attica, and with the greateſt part of the Army marched into Peloponneſus againſt the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, who only amongſt the Cities had refuſed to take away their Oligarchy, and had joyned with Caſſander. Here he had the worſt of it, and that brought him ſo into contempt, as moſt of the Greek Cities revolted from him to Caſſander, and the Athenians ſeeing they could not ſhake off his Garriſon, agreed with him that he ſhould retain the Fort Munychia, till the War was finiſhed with the Kings, but that the City ſhould be governed by one whom he appointed, which was Demetrius Phalereus the Philoſopher, Theophraſtus his Scholar, who Governed ſome years with moderation, and was honoured with 360 Statues. Then Caſſander making an expedition into Macedonia, found there many friends. The year after, Polyſperchon by the help of Æacida, King of the Moloſſians, reduced Olympias with Alexander the ſon of Rhoxane her Grand-Child into Macedonia, whereupon Euridice the Wife of Aridæus the King fortified herſelf, and ſent to Caſſander for aid, but the Macedonians fearing the Majeſty of Olympias fell away from her, and ſhe with her husband being both committed to priſon, he was firſt made away, and then Olympias ſent her a Sword, an Halter, and Poyſon, to chuſe which of them ſhe pleaſed; ſo ſhe praying the gods that ſhe might have at length ſuch gifts ſent unto her, hanged herſelf with her Garter. This hapned after Aridæus had enjoyed the title of King ſix years and fourmoneths.

Laertius in vita. Phocionis.

Olympias deſtroyeth Aridæus and his Wife.

Diodorus l. 19.

20. Olympias killed Nicanor the brother of Caſſander, and deſtroyed the Sepulchre of his other brother Iollas, and then chuſing out 100 of his chiefeſt friends put them to cruel deaths. But he hearing ſhe was arrived in Macedonia, marched out of Peloponneſus againſt her; whereupon ſhe made Ariſtonous her General, and commanded him to meet Caſſander, ſhe betaking herſelf, with Alexander her Grand-ſon, his Mother, and others, into Pydna, hoping ſhe ſhould have many aſſiſtants, but ſhe was deceived: For, Caſſander beſieged her by Land and Sea. Æacida was coming to aſſiſt her, but by his means his men fell away from him, and baniſhing him his Countrey, joyned themſelves and Kingdom to the other; others in Macedonia intended to aid her, but fearing Caſſander, fell off alſo to him, and as for Polyſperchon in whom reſted now all her hope, Callas being ſent againſt him corrupted alſo moſt of his Souldiers. The ſiege therefore laſted without any let, till famine ſo prevailed in the City, as many of the Defendants came out, and ſhe was then driven by neceſſity to yield, very hardly obtaining promiſe of ſafety to her perſon. Afterward he cauſed thoſe whoſe Kinsfolks ſhe had put to death to accuſe her to the Macedonians, who naturally hated, and now incenſed by them, condemned her. Then did he ſend ſome of her friends to her, willing her to fly, but ſhe denied it, and reſolved to plead her cauſe before the people; ſo that he fearing their affections might be moved towards her, ſent ſome Soldiers to kill her. They were ſo ſtruck with her Majeſty, that they returned without doing their errand; but then ſome, the friends of whom ſhe had made away came in, and ſlew her, not at all amazed, or behaving her ſelf otherwiſe than as the Mother of Alexander, whom ſhe had outlived eight years.

Killeth Nicanor & others.

A. M. 3690.
Ol. 116. ann. 2.
V. C. 439.
Ptolom. 9.

She is alſo murdered by Caſſander.

21. Pithon the Governour of Media, envying Antigonus his power, and greatneſs, laboured to draw moſt of the Souldiers now in their Winter quarters to his own party, intending to eſtabliſh himſelf, which Antigonus being aware of, gave out that he would commit the Eaſt unto him, and by divers friendly Letters drew him to him, after which he got him condemned in a Council of his Aſſociates, and put him to death. Then marched he into Perſia, being received by the Inhabitants as King, for that now Pithon put to death by Antigonus.

Who ordering matters as he pleaſeth in the Eaſt.

Seleucus flyeth into Ægypt.

now without controverſie he was Lord of Aſia. Here calling a Council, he confirmed divers in their Governments, and amongſt the reſt Sibyrtius of Aracoſia, to whom he delivered 1000 of the moſt turbulent Argyraſpides (who had delivered up Eumenes) under pretence to ſerve him in the Wars, but indeed to deſtroy them, giving him ſecret order to expoſe them to ruin, that ſo they might never ſee more Macedonia nor the Greek Sea. Perceiving Peuceſtes to be in great favour here, he removed him from the Government, to the great grief of the people, and then got the Treaſure at Suſa into his hands, out of which he made 25000 Talents. Thence he journyed to Babylon, where Seleucus the Governour royally entertained him, but offering to puniſh a certain Officer of the Army without his knowledge, he called him to an account for the revenues of the place. Seleucus denied to account, ſaying, that place was given him by the Macedonians for his faithful ſervice performed to Alexander; but the Conteſt grew ſharper every day, ſo as he remembring, and fearing the caſe of Pithon, with fifty horſe in his Company fled into Egypt. Antigonus was glad he had gotten Babylon, and that without any violence offered to his antient friend; but being told by the Chaldeans, that if he let him go he ſhould get all Aſia into his power, and he himſelf ſhould die in a battel againſt him, he ſent ſome to purſue him, but in vain.

Maketh the Captains combine againſt Antigonus.

22. Seleucus being courteouſly entertained by Ptolomy, ſent his friends into Europe to ſtir up Caſſander and Lyſimachus againſt Antigonus, who ſuſpecting ſome ſuch matter, ſent alſo to retain them in his friendſhip, but they entred into confederacy together with Ptolomy againſt him, and all three ſent their Ambaſſadors to him, as he was now marching tawards the upper Syria, to demand that Cappadocia and Lycia might be reſtored to Caſſander Governour of Caria; Phrygia upon the Helleſpont to Lyſimachus, all Syria to Ptolomy, and Babylon to Seleucus, and to divide all the treaſure he had got into his hands ſince the death of Eumenes, with them and the other Macedonians who had loſt their Governments. To this he anſwered ſharply, and that he was already preparing for Ptolomy, ſo that the Ambaſſadors returning without any effect, they made great preparations both by Sea and Land. He underſtanding how full his hands would be, ſent about to the chief States to retain them in friendſhip, and alſo to hire more Soldiers; he himſelf went into Phœnicia, where he beſieged Tyre, uſed great endeavour for the making of ſhips, and took in Joppe and Gaza. Ariſtodemus alſo he ſent into Laconia, who there by the permiſſion of the Lacedæmonians raiſed 8000 men, and joyned Polyſperchon and Alexander his ſon in confederacy with him, of whom the former was made general of Greece, and the later he deſired to go over to Antigonus, who going accordingly, in an aſſembly of the Army accuſed Caſſander, for that he had put Olympias to death, had committed Rhoxane and her ſon to cuſtody, married by force Theſſalonica the daughter of Philip and ſiſter of Alexander, and ſo evidently affected the Kingdom of Macedonia: moreover, that he had re-edified Thebes deſtroyed by Alexander, and reſtored the Olinthians; whereupon he was declared an Enemy, except he would amend what was amiſs, and obey Antigonus, and ſet all the Græcians at liberty, and ſo Alexander rewarded with 500 Talents was ſent back. But not long after he revolted to Caſſander, being for that declared General of Peloponneſus, and ſhortly after he was traiterouſly ſlain by the Sicionians.

Diodorus ut prius.

23. Seleucus in Cyprus proſpered againſt the party of Antigonus, and Polyclitus his Lieutenant overthrew Theodotus his Admiral both at Sea and Land, after which Ptolomy and Antigonus met and conferred together; but to no purpoſe. Caſſander ſhortly after fearing Antigonus might paſs over into Europe, to divert him, ſent an Army over into Caria to help thoſe Cities which were confederate with Seleucus and Ptolomy, Caſſander the Governour there joyning with him, which Antigonus fearing, left Demetrius his ſon in Syria, with order to entrap Ptolomie's forces if they ſhould march that way, and for that he was then but 22 years old, left four grave men his friends to counſel and direct him. Upon his coming to Caria, Caſſander the Governour having too great a burthen upon him, made a Peace, on condition to keep his place, and gave his brother for an Hoſtage, whom yet getting again out of his hands, he preſently revolted ,after which Antigonus got divers Cities into his Power, and reſtored the Mileſians to their liberty. At this time the inhabitants of Cyrene revolting, Ptolomy reduced them again to obedience by the means of Agis his General, and in Cyprus ſuppreſſed ſome of the Kings which were of the contrary faction. Returning home he was ſollicited by Seleucus to undertake an Expedition againſt Demetrius then in Cœleſyria, ſo that with 18000 Foot, and 4000 Horſe, he marched to Gaza, where Demetrius expected him. In the fight the Forces of Demetrius ſeemed rather to prevail, till his Elephants being wounded and taken, his Horſe out of fear ran away. He himſelf fled accompanied with many followers till he came near Gaza, but then ſo many forſook him and went in thither to fetch out their goods, that multitudes flocking to the gates, and they therefore being hindred from being ſhut, the enemies entred with them and took the Town. Ptolomy took Sidon alſo, and beſieged Tyre, whoſe Governour Andronicus upon ſummons refuſed to yield, and reviled him; yet he getting the place into his power through the ſedition of the Souldiers, when he looked for preſent death, not only forgave him, but entertained him courteouſly as his familiar friend.

A.M. 3693.
Ol. 117. an. 1.
V.C. 442.
Seleuci 1.
Ptolom. 12.

Seleucus recovereth Babylon and the Eaſtern parts.

24. Ptolomy making himſelf maſter of the places about Syria, returned into Egypt, being followed thither by many which were allured by his great courteſie. But Seleucus thinking this a good opportunity for him to return to his former Principality, obtained of him 800 Foot, and 200 Horſe, and with them marched for Babylon. In his way in Meſopotamia he procured, partly by fair means partly by foul, thoſe Macedonians which quartered at Carrhæ to joyn with him, and when he came to Babylon, the Inhabitants there willingly received him, and he ſhortly after ſtormed the Caſtle which was held by Antigonus his garriſon. Nicanor the Governour of Media hearing this, came againſt him with above 10000 Foot, and 7000 Horſe, whom he went out to meet with but few more than 3000 Foot, and 400 Horſe, and knowing himſelf too weak to engage in a ſet battel with him, he hid his men in the Fens till he was paſt with his Army, and then came upon him lying careleſly in the night without any ſtrict guards; ſo as the Perſians coming to fight, Euagrus their Captain was ſlain, with other Officers; at which being ſtruck, and alſo weary of Antigonus his government, they revolted; and Nicanor with a few at his heels eſcaped, being glad he was not delivered up. Seleucus by this means getting a ſtrong Army, eaſily made himſelf Maſter of Suſiana, Media, and the Countryes thereto adjoyning; ſo as getting hereby Royal Majeſty, and Glory ſuitable to his dignity, ſome have from this year fetched the riſe of that Æra, which afterwards was called that of the Seleucidæ, and of the Greeks; for that his Kingdom proved the moſt conſiderable; about the year of the World 3694, the firſt of the 117 Olympiad, 309 years before the Æra of Chriſt, and twelve years after the death of Alexander.

Euſebius in Chronico, alii.

Demetrius his attempts againſt him.

A.M. 3694.
Ol. 117. an. 2.
V.C. 443.
Seleuci 2.
Ptolom. 13.

An agreement betwixt Ptolomy, Caſſander, & Lyſimachus.

25. When Antigonus heard of it, he ſent his ſon Demetrius againſt him. Demetrius had now redeemed his credit by the overthrow of Cilles, ſent to expel him out of Syria by Ptolomy, and upon it called thither his Father, ſo as they recovered all that Country, and Phœnicia out of his hands, he not daring to ſtay and try a battel with Antigonus. Demetrius led with him an Army of 15000 Foot, and 4000 Horſe, and had order to recover the Principality of Babylon, and then go down to the Sea. Patrocles, whom Seleucus had left Governour of Babylon, hearing of his coming, adviſed the inhabitants to leave the City, and flie ſome into the Deſart, or over the River Tigris; he himſelf with a Band of men flew up and down, taking advantages at the Enemy, and ſent to Seleucus into Media for aid, ſo that Demetrius coming and finding the City forſaken, ſtormed one of the Forts therein, and for that his time was out, beyond which he could not ſtay, he left Archelaus with a ſtrong party to beſiege the other. Then giving leave to his Soldiers to plunder all they could light on, he departed according to his Father's orders to the Sea, where he beſieged Halicarnaſſus, but was beaten off by Ptolomy, and ſo as it were took his leave of that Province for ever, taking what he could get along with him, and perhaps for this reaſon the Chaldæans with the Author of the ſecond Book of the Machabees in this year (one after the other) fix the Æra of Seleucus. Not long after, Ptolomy, Caſſandar, and Lyſimachus, made a Peace with Antigonus on theſe terms: that Caſſander ſhould be Captain General of Europe; Lyſimachus ſhould retain Thrace, and Ptolomy Ægypt, and the reſt which he now enjoyed, until Alexander the ſon of Roxane ſhould come to age; and that Antigonus ſhould be over Aſia, and the Greeks live after their own Laws. This agreement was not kept long, each one ſeeking under any pretence to inlarge his Dominions, and indeed they might better do it, ſeeing that he for whom they pretended themſelves Adminiſtrators, and was their Soveraign Lord, was taken away. For Caſſander taking notice that young Alexander grew up, and that the People began to talk, that now he ought to be delivered out of cuſtody, and to enjoy his Fathers Kingdom, and he fearing his own intereſt, commanded ſecretly Glaucius his Keeper to kill him and his Mother, and concealing their bodies, to acquaint no perſon living with it. Thus he who was unborn when his Father died, died by the hands of violence and treaſon, thirteen years after his death.

The death of young Alexander.

Hercules his Brother

26. He had a brother yet living elder than himſelf, who being begotten of Barſines (never married to Alexander) was held as illegitimate by the Captains, though born before his Father's death. His name was Hercules, being now kept at Pergamus, whence he was called ſhortly after the death of the other, by Polyſperchon, who now being in Peloponneſus, and envying Caſſander the Principality of Macedonia, ſent about to his friends, intreating, that the youth being ſeventeen years old, might be brought, and eſtabliſhed in his Fathers Throne. The Etolians eſpecially, with others, imbraced the motion; ſo as he got together about twenty thouſand Foot,and one thouſand Horſe, in no great ſpace, and within a while after gathered up a numerous Army, with which he marched and came on his way to Stymphalia. Here Caſſander oppoſed him, and ſeeing that his Macedonians took well enough this reduction of their Prince, and fearing they might revolt to him, ſent to Polyſperchon, and with vaſt promiſes ſecretly perſwaded him to make away the young man, which accordingly was performed. About this time Demetrius overthrew Ptolomy his Lieutenants in Cilicia, and he to be revenged invaded Licia, where he took ſome Cities, after that ſailed into Greece, where he endeavoured in emulation to Antigonus to ſet the Cities at liberty; but the Greeks not keeping their promiſe of ſending money and corn, having received Sicyon and Corinth from the Widdow of Alexander the ſon of Ephæſtion (who had revenged ſtoutly her husbands death, and kept ſtill theſe places) he agreed with Caſſander that each ſhould retain ſuch places as he had in his power, and returned.

Made away.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 117.
Juſtin lib. 15.
A. M. 3696.
Ol. 117. an. 4.
V. C. 445.
Seleuc. 4.
Ptolom. 15.

27. Alexander the Great had yet a ſiſter living called Cleopatra, formerly the Widdow of Alexander King of Epirus (who making an Expedition into Italy, periſhed, againſt the Lucanians, as Livie tells us) and after that married to Perdiccas, whom alſo now being at Sardis, Antigonus ſeems to have wooed. But ſhe inclining rather to Ptolomy, ſtole out of Sardis to go to him, whereupon Antigonus took ſuch order by the Governour of the Town, that ſhe was not only ſtopped in her journey, but by means alſo of ſome women ſecretly made away; after which to colour the matter he put ſome of them to death, and buried her body with royal magnificence. Shortly after this, Demetrius was ſent into Greece to ſet the Cities at liberty, which he accompliſhed at this time for Athens; Demetrius Phalareus being driven out, and conducted to Thebes where he lived till Caſſander's death, and then fled to Ptolomy. Afterward Demetrius being recalled to make War in Cyprus, thither he paſſed, where he overthrew Menelaus, Ptolomy his brother and Governour there, and purſuing him to the City Salamine, ſlew three thouſand of his men, and took one thouſand, and then beſieged him in that place. Ptolomy hearing of the defeat of his men, came both with Sea and Land forces, and ingaged the beſiegers in battel, wherein though he overthrew that Wing againſt which he himſelf fought, yet the other prevailing, he was diſcomfited with the loſs of eight thouſand men, and all his ſhips ſave eight, with which he fled away, and Demetrius became Maſter of the Town and Iſland. Antigonus being elevated with this ſucceſs, received the title of King given him by his friends, and a Diadem ſet upon his head, which title and honour he alſo gave to his Son Demetrius. The Egyptians alſo hearing this, leſt they ſhould ſeem to be dejected for their loſs, gave the name of King to Ptolomy, who thenceforth in all his Letters ſtiled himſelf ſo. Neither now would the other great ones come behind theſe; for Seleucus, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus, after their example, took upon themſelves the ſame dignity and title, all the near relations of Alexander being quite extinct.

Diodorus l. 20. ad Olymp. 118.

And Cleopatra their Aunt.

Demetrius his Victories againſt Ptolomy whereupon Antigonus and then the reſt take the title of Kings.

Idem ibid.
Plutarch in Demetrio.
Juſtin lib. 15.
A. M. 3698.
Ol. 118. an. 2.
V. C. 447.
Seleuci 6.
Ptolom. 17.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

From Alexanders Captains taking the Title of Kings, to the death of Seleucus the Surviver of them, containing the ſpace of 24 years.

Diodorus ibid.

1. ANtigonus animated by his late ſucceſs againſt Ptolomy in Cyprus, now thought of no leſs than outing him alſo of Egypt it ſelf; wherefore recalling his ſon from the Iſland, he commanded all his Forces to meet at Antigonia a City newly built by him upon the River Orontes in Syria, as convenient againſt the upper Provinces and Egypt which afterwards Seleucus deſtroyed, and tranſlated the Inhabitants to his Seleucia. Leading the Land-forces himſelf, he committed the Fleet to his ſon, which was to ſayl along upon the Coaſts within ſight of the Army as it marched. Having good Proviſion both for men and beaſt, he marched through the deſert; His Navy ran great hazard at Sea, but the Tempeſt ceaſing in good time, they came all together unto the Nile. Ptolomy by this time had ſo fortified the ſeveral mouths of the River, as the Sea-forces could do no good, though they removed from one to another, and the Land-Army could not find any forage at that time of the year, the waters being very high: Moreover, many fell away to the Enemy, being allured with his promiſe of two pounds to every common Souldier, and a Talent to an Officer; ſo that Antigonus was fain to retreat into Syria. Ptolomy being exceeding glad hereof, ſent to his Confederates to acquaint them with his good ſucceſs; and now having thus defended his Kingdom, accounted himſelf rightly to enjoy it, and hereupon ſome have accounted the beginning of his reign from this very time, fixing it at nineteen years diſtance from the death of Alexander.

Antigonus his fruitleſs expedition againſt Ptolomy.

A. M. 3699.
Ol. 11. ann. 3.
V. C. 448.
Seleuci 7.
Ptolom. 18.
Ptolomæus in Regum Canone.

Diodorus ibid.

2. But this want of ſucceſs allayed not the ambition of Antigonus, He ſent his ſon Demetrius preſently againſt the Rhodians, who had formerly diſpleaſed him by a denial to ſend him aid, and ſhips. For, they endeavouring as near as they could to keep in with all theſe great ones; yet were drawn by their private intereſt, eſpecially to favour Ptolomy, from whoſe Kingdom they got the greateſt part of their livelyhood by way of Traffick. Demetrius according to his fathers command, went, and beſieged their City, lying before it well-nigh a whole year, during which time he made all ſorts of oppoſition he could, till ordered by his Father to make peace with them, which they were prone to accept of, though Ptolomy and others ſent them Proviſions, and ſupplies of men. Departing from Rhodes, Demetrius paſſed into Greece to reſtore the Cities which Caſſander and Polyſperchon had lately maſtered in the abſence of Antigonus his Forces. Chalcis he freed from a Garriſon of the Bœotians, whom he alſo withdrew from Caſſander's friendſhip, joyned in ſociety with the Ætolians, and afterwards reſtored Sicyon, Corinth, Athens, and ether places to their freedom. Caſſander ſeeing things by the help of Demetrius to go well with Greece, ſent over to Antigonus to deſire peace, but he refuſed it, except he would refer himſelf whole unto him. He being affrighted at this, ſent to Lyſimachus in Thrace, to come and Conſult with him, and then they both diſpatch away Meſſengers to Ptolomy and Seleucus, to let them ſee how they were concerned alſo to reſiſt Antigonus. They hearkned willingly to the offers made unto them, and joyned in Confederacy againſt him as their common Enemy, promiſing great ſupplies for carrying on the War.

And as fruitleſs againſt Rhodes.

A. M. 3700.
Ol. 118. ann. 4.
V. C. 449.
Seleuci 8.
Ptolom. 19.

A Combination againſt him.

3. Caſſander thinking it good policy not to ſtay for the Enemy, to come upon him, but invade him firſt, gave part of his Army to Lyſimachus to paſs over with it into Aſia, and with the reſt marched for Theſſaly, there to oppoſe Demetrius and the Greeks. There meeting, and incamping with vaſt Armies, neither of them would begin the battel, expecting how things went in Aſia, till Demetrius was recalled thither by his Father. Lyſimachus being landed there, the Inhabitants of Lampſachus ſubmitted to him, whom he reſtored to their liberty; ſtormed Sigeus, and placed a Garriſon there; then he taketh in Phrygia upon the Helleſpont, and divers other places, by the means of Docimus, an Officer of Antigonus, whom he had drawn over to him; Prepelaus alſo, whom he ſent with a party to ſubdue the Cities of Æolis and Ionia, took other Towns. Antigonus was at this time celebrating publick Games at Antigonia, when hearing this news, he preſently broke them off, and with all ſpeed marched againſt Lyſimachus, Whom he reached, and beſieged him in his Camp for ſome time, till taking the opportunity of a dark and rainy night he fled away: Then hearing that Seleucus was drawing down his Forces from the upper Provinces, he ſent for Demetrius to come over with all expedition. Seleucus had lately made peace with Sandrocottus (or Androcottus) who being a man of no quality, had ſollicited the Indians to revolt after the death of Alexander, and to kill his Officers, and thence took an occaſion to ſubdue them under himſelf. Bactria being ſubdued, Seleucus had waged War with him, but now for a Compoſure gave to him ſome Countries lying upon the River Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and received five hundred Elephants of him in exchange. Ptolomy with a compleat Army had come into Cæleſyria, where he reduced divers Cities; but as he was beſieging Sidon came a falſe report that Antigonus had overthrown Seleucus and Lyſimachus, and now was coming thitherward, wherefore he made a Truce with the Sidonians for five moneths, and returned, but not long after came up again to that fatal ingagement with Antigonus.

Stirs preceding the great battel.

4. The Forces of theſe ſeveral Princes were drawn down to be in readineſs againſt the Spring. Plutarch. in vita Demetrii. Appienus in Syriacis. Antigonus had an Army of ſeventy thouſand Foot, ten thouſand Horſe, and ſeventy five Elephants. And the contrary party had made up amongſt them ſixty four thouſand Foot, one thouſand five hundred Horſe, four hundred Elephants, and one hundred twenty Chariots. Antigonus bragged that he would ſcatter the meeting of theſe Kings together, as one might do the flocking of birds gathering Corn, with the throwing of a ſtone; but when they approached, he was more melancholick than uſual, and was ſeen to diſcourſe with his ſon in private in his Tent, which he never uſed to do; he commended him alſo to the Army as his Succeſſor. The battel was fought at Ipſus, a Town in Phrygia, in which Demetrius leading the beſt party of Horſe, ingaged with Antiochus the ſon (and afterwards Succeſſor) of Seleucus, whom he routed, and put to flight, but being too hot in the purſuit undid all: for retiring back he could not again joyn himſelf with the foot, by reaſon that the Elephants were got between them. Seleucus ſeeing this, made as if he would have faln upon the Infantry, thus deſtitute of the Horſe, wherein his expectation failed him not, for they fearing it, part Antigonus ſlain in it. revolted to him, and the reſt were broken, and put to flight. Antigonus ſtanding his ground, expected continually Demetrius to come to relieve him: but in that expectation ended his life by a multitude of Darts thrown upon him, being now ſomething above eighty years old. Demetrius his ſon with five thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe fled to Epheſus; but there fearing his Soldiers might be ſome way falſe to him, he ſayled to Salamine in Cyprus, which he then held. This fell out in the three thouſand ſeven hundred and fourth year of the World, the fourth of the one hundred and nineteenth Olympiad, twenty three years after the death of Alexander, and ſix after their taking the Title of Kings upon them. A. M. 3704. Ol. 119.*ann.*4. V.C. 453. Seleuci 12. Ptolom. 23.

5. The Conquerors parted his Dominions amongſt them, as we are told; but it ſeems to have been chiefly Seleucus and Ptolomy, Iidem. who did not well agree about their prey, and upon this account left a contention to their Succeſſors. Seleucus fell preſently upon building Cities, the firſt of which he called after himſelf Seleucia, and the later, to which he transferred the Inhabitants of Antigonia (to the number of three thouſand five hundred) as we ſaid before, he called Antiochia, either after his father or ſon's name; for both are affirmed, and this afterwards proved the Metropolis of Syria. Ptolomy after the death of Antigonus got Syria again, *Vide Uſſerium in prima parte Annal.pag.*461 with Cyprus, and afterwards Cyrene alſo into his power, and Married his daughter Arſinoe unto Lyſimachus, as, few years after, his other to Agathocles the ſon. Seleucus ſeeing that thus theſe two ſtrengthned themſelves in affinity, thought not amiſs The Alliances of the Kings. to joyn alſo with Demetrius, though gone down the wind; and accordingly ſent to him for his Daughter Stratonice. He receiving this unexſpected Meſſage, ſayled with her into Syria. Paſſing by Cilicia, which then Caſſander held, Pliſtarchus his Brother cried out that he would invade his Territories, and went ſtrait to Seleucus to expoſtulate with him his being reconciled to the common Enemy. But Demetrius landing went to Quinda, where finding yet two hundred Talents left in the Treaſury, he took them away, and ſo proceeded and met with Seleucus at Oroſſus, who taking his wife away with him to Antioch, Demetrius ſeized upon Cilicia, and ſent his wife Phila to Caſſander her brother, to purge him of thoſe things laid to his charge by Pliſtarchus.

6. Not-

Plutarch. Ibid.

A. M. 3707.
Ol. 120. ann. 3.
V. C. 456.
Seleuci 15.
Ptolom. 26.

Caſſander dieth

6. Notwithſtanding Caſſander he held Cilicia; but Seleucus his Son-in-Law required, that for a ſum of money he would give it up into his hands, which he refuſed, and then with ſome anger he demanded Tyre and Sidon of him, not being content, though he held all from the Syrian Sea, as far as India, that his Father-in-Law ſhould reſt quiet with it, though ſufficiently toſſed with adverſe fortune, but he as ſtoutly denyed this alſo, ſaying, that though he were a thouſand times more overcome, yet would he never purchaſe the affinity of Seleucus, and fortified the Cities with Garriſons. The next year Caſſander King of Macedonia died of a Dropſie (which was ſo loathſome, as Lice withal broke out of him) after he had ruled that Country nineteen years; twenty ſix after the death of Alexander; A. M. three thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeven.

Idem ibid. & in vita Pyrrhi.
Juſt. lib. 16.

Stirs betwixt his ſons about the Kingdom.

7. He left three Sons by Theſſalonice the Daughter of Philip, and Siſter to Alexander; Philip, Antipater, and Alexander. The firſt ſucceeded his Father, but died preſently of a Conſumption, Antipater coming after him killed his Mother, for that after her Husbands death ſhe ſeemed to favour his younger Brother Alexander more than him in the deviſion of the Kingdom; though ſhe beſought him by her breaſts that gave him ſuck to ſpare her life. After her death he endeavoured to expel his Brother out of Macedonia, who therefore craved aid of Demetrius, and Pyrrhus King of Epirus, who being expelled out of his Kingdom, had Married Ptolomy's Wives Daughter, and by him was reſtored. Demetrius being now employed otherways, the other came, and received ſome Countries in way of encouragement and reward for his ſervice, which he fortified with his own Garriſons. Antipater now had his recourſe to Lyſimachus his Father-in-Law, who being alſo hindred with other affairs, and fearing Demetrius his coming, adviſed him to make an agreement with his Brother; and for that he knew Pyrrhus would in any thing ſeek to gratifie Ptolomy, that he might take him off, he feigned a Letter to him from him, wherein he adviſed him for three hundred Talents received from Antipater to forſake the Enterprize. Pyrrhus as ſoon as he opened the Letter, eaſily diſcerned it to be counterfeit, for that it was not directed after the uſual manner, as from the Father to the Son, but as from the one King to the other.

Plutarch in Demetrio.
A. M. 3711.
Ol. 121. ann. 3.
V. C. 460.
Seleuci 18.
Ptol. 30.

Procureth the deſtruction of them all.

8. However, Lyſimachus his perſwaſion ſeems to have wrought ſo with the Elder Brother, together with the preſence of Pyrrhus, as they came near to an agreement; but the coming of Demetrius ſpoiled all. For, he having loſt Cyprus lately to Ptolomy (which forced him to quit Lacedæmon, after he had taken Athens, and now had almoſt taken it alſo) came into Macedonia to amend his fortunes. Alexander being troubled at his coming, ſeeing he knew the peace was partly made, went out to meet, and received him with great honour, but told him he now had no need of his help; but he either having, or pretending to have a ſuſpicion of him, procured him to be ſlain, telling the Macedonians a fair tale afterwards, who ſeeing the one of Caſſanders Sons thus dead, and hating the other for his impiety towards his Mother, received him as King; ſome have written that Alexander uſed Demetrius his help firſt, in killing his Brother Antipater, and ſo revenged the death of his Mother upon him. Others ſay that Lyſimachus after Alexanders death, for that he was imployed in a War with Dromichetis King of the Getes, delivered alſo up to Demetrius, that part which belonged to Antipater his Son-in-Law, and afterwards killed him alſo, when he complained to him that by his means he had loſt his Kingdom, and impriſoned Eurydice his Wife, his own Daughter, for partaking with him in the complaint. But thus (one way or other) Antipater was rewarded for his Mothers death; and ſo in a ſhort time fell the poſterity of Caſſander, by the juſt Judgment of God, as even Heathen Writers obſerve.

Pauſanias in Bœoticis.

Juſtin ut ſuprà.
Plutarch ibid.

Demetrius getting Macedonia aſpireth ſtill after his former height.

9. For ſome time Demetrius enjoyed Macedonia, during which he ſtill aſpired after his former height and power: for now having this Kingdom and Theſſalie in his hands, as alſo Athens and Megara, and the greater part of Peloponneſus, he ſubdued the Bœotians. Then hearing Lyſimachus to be taken Priſoner by the King of the Getes (who ſhortly after yet ſet him at liberty) he reſolved to return for Thrace; but the Bœotians revolting cauſed him to retreat, though on his march thither. Coming back he found that his Son Antigonus had overthrown the revolters in fight, but Thebes ſtill remained untaken, and whilſt he was going about that, Pyrrhus of Epirus (being now alienated from him ſince the death of Deidamia his Siſter which Demetrius had married) invaded Theſſaly from his own Frontiers, and pierced as far as the Straights of Thermopylæ. Demetrius hearing this, left his Son in the Siege, and haſted againſt him; but he ſtayed not his coming but retired, and then Demetrius fortifying Theſſalie returned to Thebes, where the inhabitants ſo ſtoutly defended themſelves, that he loſt many men, and himſelf was wounded in the neck; yet according to his skill and fortune in taking of Cities (whence he had the Sirname of Poliorcetes) he ſtormed the place, and though he pretended at firſt ſeverely to puniſh the Inhabitants, yet he ſatisfied himſelf with the death of ten or thirteen, and baniſhing a few, pardoned the reſt.

Plutarch.

10. Finding that his Macedonians were quiet when abroad, but ſeditious at home, he fell upon the Ætolians, to divert them. Waſting their borders there he left Pantaucus with ſome Forces, and with the reſt marched againſt Pyrrhus, who hearing it, came out to meet him, but they miſſed of each other, and went ſeveral ways; Demetrius into Epirus which he harraſed; Pyrrhus light upon Pantauchus, who challenging him to fight gave him a wound, but he received two for it himſelf, and thereupon falling he had been ſlain, but that his friends preſently reſcued him, after which his Army was put to flight, and five thouſand of them taken. After this, Demetrius fell ſick at Pella, and then Pyrrhus again invaded his Territories a great way, none reſiſting him, nay, he had ſuch an opportunity, as ſcarce could he have deſired a better, for ſeizing upon the whole Kingdom, many revolting to him, and Demetrius his Captains making but ſlow endeavours to hinder his progreſs. But he having his mind ſet more upon booty than any thing elſe, ſtayed not their coming, but fled away, loſing many of his men in the retreat. For all this Demetrius ſeeing him have a reſtleſs ſpirit, thought it not amiſs to reconcile him unto him; but eſpecially at this time, for now he reſolved to make for his Father's Kingdom with all the might he poſſibly could, and therefore leſt he ſhould leave an Enemy at his back, concluded a Peace, and entred into a league with him.

But labouring to get

11. Greater preparations he made than ever had been ſince Alexander his deceaſe. For he got together little leſs than one hundred thouſand Foot, and twelve thouſand Horſe, a Navie alſo of five hundred ſail; ſome ſhips whereof were of extraordinary bigneſs. Seleucus, Ptolomy, and Lyſimachus, being ſtartled hereat, combined together for reſiſtance, and joyntly ſent to Pyrrhus to move him to break the League which Demetrius had made with him, as they alledged, not to reſt in peace, but to make War upon whom he pleaſed. He believing as much, agreed with them, for that he hoped Demetrius might as eaſily loſe Macedonia as he had got it, and then Ptolomy ſailing into Greece, ſollicited there the Cities from their obedience. Lyſimachus from Thrace, and Pyrrhus from his borders made inroads into Macedonia. Demetrius firſt began to march againſt Lyſimachus, but afterwards hearing that Pyrrhus had gotten Berrhæa into his hands, returned and went againſt him thither, where when he was arrived, divers from the Town came into his Camp, and ſo extolled the valour and kindneſs of Pyrrhus, that the Macedonians, firſt in little Companies, and after all the Army revolted to him; ſo as Demetrius was very much deceived, who fearing they might do ſo to Lyſimachus, little ſuſpected this towards the other being a ſtranger. Pyrrhus thus obtaining all the Army without a ſtroak, was ſaluted King of Macedonia by the Souldiers; but Lyſimachus coming ſhortly after, alledged the endeavour of ſuppreſſing the Enemy to have been common to them both, and demanded the parting of the Kingdom; to whom he aſſented, for that he did not truſt the Macedonians, and ſo the Countreys and Cities, were divided betwixt them.

A. M. 3717.
Ol. 123. an. 1.
V.C. 466.
Seleuci 25.
Ptolom. Lagi 30.

Loſeth all.

Idem.

And flying up and down

12. Demetrius thus outed of his Kingdom fled to Caſſandria, and thence into Greece, where after a little time he got ſome Forces together and being angry with Athens, for that revolting from him, the Inhabitants had ſent for Pyrrhus, he beſieged it; but upon the entreaty of Crates the Philoſopher (whom being a man of great Authority they had ſent to him) he gathered together his ſhips and ſailed away into Aſia with eleven thouſand men. His deſign was to take if he could, Caria and Lydia from Lyſimachus, and he took divers Towns, and ſeized upon Sardis, but Agathocles, Lyſimachus his Son, coming down with an Army againſt him, he marched for Phrygia, with intention to paſs into Armenia and Media; and ſo attempt to make himſelf Maſter of ſome of the upper Provinces of Aſia, which at the worſt would afford retreating places enough, and other helps to a beaten party. In his way he was ſuperior to Agathocles who purſued him, but being brought into great diſtreſs for want of Proviſions, there fell withal ſuch a Plague upon his Army, that he loſt eight thouſand men, and ſo was forced to retreat, and came to Tarſus. This place being now again under Seleucus, he was very unwilling to endamage, for fear of giving him offence, but being forced by want, he wrote to him, whereby he excuſed himſelf, and ſadly lamented his condition. Seleucus, pitying him at firſt, commanded his Governours to uſe him and his Army with great reſpect; but Procles one of his moſt familiar friends, filled his head with ſuch ſuſpitions, that he led down an Army towards Cilicia againſt him, whereat he wondering retired to the moſt convenient place of the mountain Taurus, whence he ſent to him to give him leave to ſeize upon ſome Country of the Barbarians, that there he might put an end to his flight and wandrings, and ſpend the reſidue of his days.

Idem.

At length is forced to yield himſelf to Seleucus.

13. Seleucus making a bad interpretation of the meſſage, only would give way, that delivering up for Hoſtages the chiefeſt of his friends, he might quarter for two months in Catoania (a Country bordering upon Cappadocia) and ſecured the paſſage out into Syria. Here he was kept up as a wild beaſt, what by Seleucus on one ſide, and Agathocles on the other; ſo that he was conſtrained to betake himſelf to force, and waſting the Territories always had the better of Seleucus in their encounters, and got poſſeſſion of the Straights which led into Syria. This ſo encouraged him, that he thought now of giving battel to Seleucus, but fell into a ſickneſs whereby his affairs were ruined, his Soldiers going away from him to the Enemy; yet he recovered after forty days, and away he marched, and getting over the hill Amanus waſted the bordering Territories. Then Seleucus coming near him, he joyned and fought him, and overthrew one of his wings; but then all his Army revolted, and he with a very few fled into the Woods, whence endeavouring to paſs to the Sea through the mountains, his diſcovering there the Enemies fires prevented that attempt, and at laſt one ſaying he muſt yield himſelf, he drew his Sword and would therewith have ended his life, but being hindred by his friends, he ſent to Seleucus by their advice and yielded. Seleucus cauſed him to be royally received at firſt; but the great confluence thereupon to him, leſſened that reſpect he elſe would have paid him; ſo as ſending Pauſanias with one thouſand men, he cauſed him to be carryed ſtraight (without as much as ſeeing him) into a Peninſula of Syria. Here he wanted nothing deſirable, not only for neceſſity but pleaſure; only his liberty, which yet to comfort him there was hope given of, after that Antiochus ſhould come with his wife Stratonice, whom his Father Seleucus upon his paſſionately falling in love with her, had yielded to him. Antigonus his Son much interceded for him; ſo did divers Princes and States; only Lyſimachus offered two thouſand Talents to have him killed, which Seleucus abhorred. At firſt he exerciſed himſelf much with hunting and ſuch Exerciſes; but by little and little grew ſluggiſh, and, as if he had never been Demetrius Poliorcetes, gave up himſelf to drinking and dice, whereby he grew fat, and contracted a diſeaſe of which he died fifty four years old, after he had continued three of them in reſtraint.

And dieth after three years in reſtraint.

Idem.

Pauſan. in Atticis.
Juſtin lib. 17.
Appian in Syriacis.

Lyſimachus having expelled Pyrrhus out of Macedonia is ſlain in battel againſt Seleucus.

A. M. 3722.
Ol. 124. an. 2.
V. C. 471.
Seleuci 30.
Ptolom. Philadelphi, 2.

14. Lyſimachus and Pyrrhus, after his expulſion out of Macedonia, preſently fell out, for the former ſeeing Demetrius thus made ſure and captivated by Seleucus, grew ſecure of his condition, deſpiſed Pyrrhus, and upbraiding the Macedonians for ſuffering him (being an alien, whoſe Anceſtors always had ſerved them) now to reign over them, drew many from him, and afterwards overthrew him and Antigonus Son of Demetrius in a great battel, and ſo quite diſpoſſeſſed him of Macedonia. After this he killed his eldeſt Son Agathocles at the inſtigation of his Wife Arſinoe, who was ſollicitous for her own children, if they ſhould fall into their brothers hands after their Fathers death. Lyſandra the Widdow of Agathocles, and Siſter to Arſinoe, accompanied with Alexander another Son of Lyſimachus, fled to Seleucus, whom they deſired to make War againſt him; and after this he putting divers of his chief Subjects to death for bewailing the young man, many of his Captains and Governours followed, all earneſtly deſiring the ſame thing. Seleucus was eaſily perſwaded to it now, having the whole ſtrength of Aſia and Syria united into one Kingdom after the fall of Demetrius, which the other being aware of, thought it beſt firſt to begin with him, and ſo paſſed over the Helleſpont. Theſe two being now only alive of the thirty ſix Captains and fellow-Soldiers of Alexander, joyned in a great and bloody battel in Phrygia, where Lyſimachus, though fighting moſt valiantly, was overthrown and ſlain, having formerly loſt fifteen children divers ways, and now compleating the ruin of his Family, after he had lived eighty years, and held Macedonia four, A. M. three thouſand ſeven hundred twenty two, the ſecond of the one hundred twenty fourth Olympiad, and forty after the death of Alexander the Great.

15. Seleucus being exceedingly elevated with the thoughts of his Victory, and more with conſideration that he only ſurvived of Alexanders followers, reſolved to go into Macedonia and there to end his days, giving up Aſia to his Son Antiochus. He paſſed the Helleſpont, and journying towards Lyſimachia came to a place called called Argos, where his time being but to live ſeven moneths after Lyſimachus, he was ſlain by Ptolomy Sirnamed Ceraunus the Son of Ptolomy the firſt by Euridice daughter to Antipater, who having fled out of Ægypt, for that his Father had preferred his younger Brother before him, joyned himſelf firſt to Lyſimachus, who Marryed his Siſter, and afterwards to Seleucus, by whom he was lovingly entertained, though he thus requited him. Ptolomy, as ſoon as he had done his feat, poſted away to Lyſimachia, where putting on a Diadem, and taking a Company of Gallants along with him, he went to the Army, which received him as King, having all Seleucus his money given unto them. Antigonus Gonatas (ſo called it's probable, from a place in Perrhæbia, where he was born) Son of Demetrius Poliorcetes preſently after undertook an Expedition for the recovery of Macedonia, hoping to juſtle out Ptolomy ere he could be well ſetled; but he having notice of his coming, and enjoying Lyſimachus his Fleet, went and met him at Sea, where he overthrew him, and forcing him to retire into Bœotia, then confirmed himſelf in his Kingdom.

Who being the ſurviver of Alexander's Captains is ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus the ſame year.

Juſtin ut prius. Memnon apud Photium.

CHAP. IV.

The Macedonian Kingdom.

From the death of Seleucus to the Captivity of Perſeus, and the end of this Kingdom, containing the ſpace of 139 years.

Ptolomy Ceraunus King of Macedonia. maketh Alliances.

1. Ptolomy, that he might provide for the time to come, made Alliances with other Princes, as Antiochus of Aſia, and Pyrrhus of Epyrus, who now being about to paſs into Italy, made him Overſeer of his ſon, and Kingdom: he alſo wrote to his Brother Ptolomy Philadelphus, pretending to acquieſce in the miſſing of that his Fathers Kingdom, as ſufficiently ſatisfied with this that was taken from his fathers Enemy. Moreover, he counterfeited himſelf to be in love with his ſiſter Arſione, and married her, for that it was according to the cuſtom of Egypt, promiſing to adopt her Children, which he badly performed, for being received by her into Caſſandria, he cauſed them to be firſt killed in the boſom of their mother, and then thruſt her out of the City, from whence ſhe went to Samothracia. At this time the Galls being too numerous for their own Countrey, under three Captains went to ſeek their fortunes ſo many ſeveral wayes; ſome towards Thrace, under the conduct of Cerethrius; others to Pannonia under Brennus and Acichorius, and the reſt to Macedonia, being headed by Belgius or Bolgius. Theſe Ptolomy oppoſed with a ſtragling company, being more heady than wiſe, for he refuſed 20000 men offered him by the King of the Dardanians, and peace by the Galls, if he would but buy it, which he ſcornfully refuſed, and anſwered, he would not yield it to them, except they would give up the Chiefeſt amongſt them as Hoſtages, and deliver up their Arms. Joyning battel, his Army was overthrown, and he being ſore wounded was caſt by an Elephant on which he rode, and ſo taken alive by the Enemy. They tore him in pieces, and cutting off his head, put it upon a Lance, and carried it about to the terror of his followers, of which a few eſcaping, all the reſt were either taken or ſlain. To this end came Ptolomy, after he had held Macedonia ſcarce one year and a half.

Is ſlain by the Galls.

Porphyrius in Græcis Euſebii. Juſtin lib. 24.

2. Meleager his brother ſucceeded, but only for two moneths: for then the Macedonians caſt him out as unworthy of the Dignity, and in his room placed Antipater ſon to Philip, the brother of Caſſander, whom they ſirnamed afterwards Eteſia, becauſe he continued but 45 dayes, during which term the Eteſian winds blew. After this ſucceeded an Interregnum (if we look at the title of King;) for, Soſthenes, who gathering together a company of young men, and thereby reſtraining the pride and covetouſneſs of the Gauls, though he might have been preferred before divers of Royal Races; yet refuſed the name, and made the Soldiers ſwear to him only as General. But Brennus hearing of the good ſucceſs of Belgius, and what plunder he had got in the Eaſt, with one hundred and fifty thouſand foot, and fifteen thouſand horſe marched thitherwards; but twenty thouſand falling off from him by the way, and turning up for Thrace (where they brought under the Cities of the Propontis) he came into Macedonia, and here he made havock of all things. Belgius, as it ſeems, before his coming being repelled or gone, Soſthenes went, and met him with an Army: but carrying too few againſt ſo great a number, was eaſily overthrown; after which the Macedonians ſecuring themſelves in the Cities, Brennus wrought his pleaſure in the Country and Villages throughout the Land. When he had ſatisfied himſelf here, with an Army of one hundred and fity two thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand four hundred horſe, of Celtes (or Cimbres) and Illyrians together, he invaded Greece. Each horſeman had two ſervants followed him on horſe-back, who were if it happened to ſucceed their dead Maſters; which cuſtom they called Trimarkaſia, or Trimaraſia rather; for, Mare in the Teutonick ſignified the whole ſpecies, as alſo in our own Saxon tongue, and ſo furniſhed, they entred Theſſaly, and came to the Straights of Thermopylæ. Here they were oppoſed by the Greeks, ſo as they loſt many men, till being lead over the Mountains (the ſame way that in the expedition of Xerxes, Hydarnes paſſed, and getting over, came upon the backs of the Spartans) the Greeks then fled, and they went to Delphos to ſpoyl the Temple, where with Thunder and Lightning, Cold, falling of Rocks, and the oppoſition of the Enemy, moſt of them came to their ends. Brennus himſelf being wounded, and not willing (or not daring) to out live this ſhameful expedition of which he had been the Author at home, firſt drinking much Wine killed himſelf, the reſt flying were taken with a Pannick fear, and killed one another for Enemies; and what by this means, the rage of the Countreys through which they paſſed, and with hunger, and cold, ſcarcely any of them ever returned home.

Siſthenes overthrown by Brennus.

Who with his whole Army is deſtroyed.

3. During their ſtay in Greece, Soſthenes died after he had ruled two years, and then Antigonus Gonatus having made peace with Antiochus Soter, returned, and obtained his fathers Kingdom. Brennus departing into Greece, had left ſome Gaules to defend the borders, and they leſt they ſhould be idle, being with fifteen thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, firſt fell upon the Geta and Triballi, whom overcoming, they then ſent to Antigonus, offering him peace if he would purchaſe it with money; but eſpecially to ſpy his Camp. He entertained nobly the Ambaſſadors, and to deter them from any warlike attempts ſhewed them his ſtrength at Land and Sea; but they were ſo far from being afraid, as having an itching deſire after prey, they ſtirred up their Companions to endeavour the attaining of that which they ſaw, no way in words diminiſhing the goodlineſs of any thing. By night therefore they ſet upon his Camp, but he being aware of ſome ſuch thing, had withdrawn his Army and all things into the Wood; therefore they go and endeavour to plunder the Navy, but are repelled thence with ſuch ſlaughter, as the credit of the victory over them procured Antigonus his quiet, not only from them, but his Neighbours about him. About this time theſe Gaules, which parting at Dadania from Brennus, and going into Thrace, had at ſeveral places paſſed the Sea into Aſia, here uniting again under ſeventeen Captains (of which Lutatius and Leoporius were Chief) they helped Nicomedes againſt Zypæas, who held part of Bithynia, and after he was overcome, waſting the Countrey far and near, divided the Kingdom with him, and fixed themſelves about the River Halys, in that place which ſince has been known by the name of Gallogræcia or Galatia, A. M. 3727. the third year of the 125 Olympiad, the Romans being now engaged in the War with Pyrrhus.

Antigonus Gonatus.

Defeateth other Galls.

Euſeb.

Juſtin lib. 25.

Idem ibic. &c.
Livius lib. 38.

4. But Pyrrhus having finiſhed his fruitleſs expedition into Italy and Sicily after ſix years, and being returned home, now wanting money ſought an occaſion to divert and maintain his Army. He made therefore an excurſion into Macedonia (having ſtrengthned himſelf with a ſupply of ſome Gaules) where he took divers Towns, and two thouſand Soldiers revolted to him; then marching againſt Antigonus himſelf, joyned battel with him. The Gauls on Antigonus his part fought very valiantly; but thoſe which governed his Elephants being compaſſed in, yielded themſelves, and the beaſts; after which the foot being affrighted, Pyrrhus making ſign to them, and calling by name the Officers, drew them all over to his own party. Antigonus fled, but kept ſome of the Maritime Towns ſtill in his poſſeſſion, and Pyrrhus became Maſter of the upper part of Macedonia, and of Theſſaly. For all this, Antigonus gave not out but returning to Theſſalonica, there recruited himſelf with Mercenary Gauls, and then endeavouring to re-eſtabliſh himſelf, was again defeated by Ptolomy, the ſon of Pyrrhus; ſo that again retiring to hide himſelf, Plutarch. in Pyrrho.

Juſtin ut ſupra.

But is expelled by Pyrrhus.

Who endeavouring to reſtore Cleonymus.

Pyrrhus jeered him, and called him impudent, becauſe for all this he put not on a Coat but wore ſtill the Purple. He in way of return compared Pyrrhus to a Gameſter, which could throw the Dice well, but knew not how to improve his chance: for he knew how to conquer Kingdoms, and get Victories, but could not improve his Victory, nor retain what he had Conquered; as it had hapned as to this Kingdom before, and now alſo ſhortly followed.

M. M. 373.
Ol. 126. ann. 3.
V. C. 410.
Antioch. Soteris 9.
Ptolom. Philadelphi 11.

5. Scarcely two years did he hold Macedonia; for, Cleonymus the Spartan being rejected by his Citizens from being King in the room of his father, procured him to march down againſt his Enemies. He went down thither with an Army of twenty five thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, and waſting their Territories deferred the entring of the City till the next day, out of contempt of the ſmall number of the Defendants; who taking that occaſion, and making what means they could for reſiſtance, eſpecially the Women, hindred him a little from entring, and when entred, his horſe being killed under him, forced him notwithſtanding to retreat. During his abſence, Antigonus Gonatus recovered again the Cities of Macedonia, and taking it for granted, that after he had done his work in Laconia he would return again thither, thought it beſt to haſten into Peloponneſus, and prevent him. Being come to Argos, Pyrrhus provoked him to fight for the Kingdom, but Embaſſadors came to them both from the Town, deſiring they would depart from them, and not ſuffer it (which was obſervant of both) to come into the power of either. Antigonus obeyed, and ſent his ſon to them for an Hoſtage. Pyrrhus pretended he would, but entred the City in the night, being let in by Ariſteus; whereupon Antigonus was ſent for. He ſent in a ſtrong party, and Areus King of Sparta was at hand with a thouſand Cretians and other Lacedæmonians. Pyrrhus marched up into the Market-place, and there ſaw a Braſen Bull and a Wolf ſtanding in a fighting poſture, ſet there in memorial of Danaus his election, and ejection of Galenor, one thouſand two hundred years before, which ſtartled him ſore, for that it had been told him by an Oracle, that he ſhould die when he ſhould ſee a Wolf and a Bull fighting together. Hereupon he would have retreated, but fearing the ſtraitneſs of the Gates, ſent to his ſon Helenus to break down part of the Wall, and come in; but he miſtaking, brought his men and Elephants through the Gate, which ſtopped ſo up the way, that Pyrrhus in his coming back could not paſs, and that occaſioned his deſtruction.

Plutarch.

Is ſlain at Argos.

6. Being ſore crouded, what by them, thoſe at his heels, and the Enemy, and ſenſible of his danger, he endeavoured by force to remove the later. Then received he a wound through his Brigandine with a Lance, and turned himſelf againſt him that ran at him. This was the ſon of a poor Woman, who beholding the fight from the houſe, and ſeeing him ingaged thus with Pyrrhus, took up a ſtone with both her hands, and caſt it down upon the Kings head, which bruiſing the Vertebraes of his Neck, he fell down from his horſe, and his head was cut off by one Zopyrus. It being brought to Antigouus by Alcioneus his ſon, who rejoyced at the ſight of it, he checked him, and wept over it, and after cauſed it and the body to be magnificently burned: his bones being put in a Golden Urn, he delivered to his ſon Helenus to carry them to his brother Alexander in Epirus, and then receiving his Army, dealt very courteouſly with all his friends. After this the Cities of Peloponneſis were betrayed to Antigonus, which cauſed great ſtirs in that part of Greece; the Gauls revolting from him, he cut off at Megara, beſieged Athens, and notwithſtanding that Patroclus from Egypt, and Areus the King of Lacedæmon came to relieve them, yet he kept all proviſions from them, and after they had long ſtood out came to compoſition, whereby he placed a Garriſon in their Fort Muſeus, which yet not long after he drew forth again. Areus for want of neceſſaries was forc'd to return home; but they met again afterwards at Corinth, where Antigonus ſlew him, and not long after was forc'd to return home; for Alexander King of Epirus, to revenge his fathers death, had invaded Macedonia. Coming thither, his Army revolted from him, ſo that once more he loſt his Kingdom, and was compelled again to ſhift for himſelf: But his ſon Demetrius in his abſence gathering ſome forces together, ſo ordered the matter againſt Alexander, that he not only recovered his Fathers Kingdom, but ſpoiled him alſo for a time of his own. After this, nothing of great concernment occurs of Antigonus, who died after his firſt poſſeſſion of Macedonia 36 years, (having ruled in ſome Greek Cities ten years before) when he had lived above 80. A. M. 3762. in the ſecond of the 134 Olympiad.

A. M. 3733.
Ol. 127. ann. 1.
V. C. 482.
Antiochi Soteris 11.
Ptol. Philad. 13.
Juſtin. lib. 26.

Antigonus recovering Macedonia, preſently loſeth it again.

Demetrius his ſon again recovereth it.

7. Demetrius his ſon ſucceeded him, and hired Agron King of the Illyrians to relieve the Mydionians. Theſe the Ætolians had beſieged, and he performed it, though Polybius ad principium l. 2.

And ſucceedeth him.

A. M. 3762.
Ol. 134.an. 2.
V. C. 511.
Seleuci Callinici 4.
Ptolom. Euergetæ 4.

the beſiegers were before ready to fall out about their priſoners, whether the old or new Prætor ſhould have the honour to diſpoſe of them and their goods. When it was agreed that both in common ſhould do it, the Illyrians falling upon them, and killing many, forced them to break up their Siege, after which Agron poſſeſſed with incredible joy, gave himſelf up to ſurfetting and drunkenneſs, and thereby falling into a Pleuriſie ended his dayes, and was ſucceeded by his wife Tenta. She being elevated alſo with the former Victory, and not thinking of any thing from without, gave leave to her Subjects to invade all perſons in what place ſoever by Sea, whereupon they took Phœnice the wealthy City of Epirus, and injuring thoſe of Italy, drew upon themſelves the diſpleaſure of the People of Rome, which the raſhneſs of their Queen heightned to a War, as will be ſeen hereafter. But by this act, Demetrius ſo ſet the hearts of the Ætolians againſt him, that whereas before they took part with his Kingdom againſt the Achæans, now they joyned in league with them againſt him.

Plutarch in Arato.

Juſtin. l. 28.

Porphyr. in Græcis, Euſeb.

8. He holding yet the Piræus or Haven of Athens, Aratus the Prætor of the Achæans pretending a deſire to ſet the Athenians at liberty from that bondage which thence lay upon them, endeavoured to take it out of his hands, but was overthrown by Bithyes his General, whereupon a rumour aroſe that he was ſlain or taken. Diogenes the Governour of the Piræus hearing this, ſent word to Corinth to command all the Achæans there to depart the Town; and the Athenians to pleaſe him and his party very ſolemnly rejoyced, wearing Garlands. But Aratus himſelf then was at Corinth, and hindring Diogenes his deſign there, marched down to be revenged on the Athenians, and he came as far as the Acadæmy, but then being overcome by entreaty, did them no harm. Some years after this the Ætolians endeavoured to take away part of Acarnania from Epirus, which then Olympias ſiſter and wife of Alexander now dead, governing in right of her ſons Pyrrhus and Ptolomy, betook her ſelf to Demetrius, and gave him her daughter Othia in marriage. He had before this the ſiſter of Antiochus King of Syria to wife (Antiochus Hierax as it ſeemeth, who endeavouring to diſpoſſeſs his brother Seleucus of his Kingdom, is called King by Juſtine) who thereupon fled to her brother, and ſtirred him up to make War upon her Husband. The Acarnanians fled to the Romans for help againſt the Ætolians, who were then commanded to abſtain from their incurſions, but deſpiſing the Ambaſſage, harraſed both the borders of Acarnania and Epirus; and Olympias having deliverd up the Kingdom to her ſon, they all ſhortly after died. And Demetrius (whom we read * to have alſo enjoyed Cyrene and all Lybia, but know not how he got it) ſurvived not long after, dying when he had reigned ten years, and fifty after the death of Alexander the Great.

Plutarch in vita Æmilii, & Pauſan. in Achaicis. 5.

Antigonus Doſon.

Vide Polybium lib. 2.

A. M. 3772.
Ol. 136. an. 4.
V. C. 521.
Sel. Callinici 14. Ptolom. Euergetæ 14.

War betwixt the Ætolians and Achæans

9. He left behind him a ſon called Philip, who being very young, and the Princes of Macedonia fearing an Anarchy, they conſtituted Antigonus (the brother or Uncle of the deceaſed, for both are affirmed) his Tutor, giving his mother to him in marriage. At firſt he held the Office by the title of Captain General, but afterwards being found moderate and civil, he was ſaluted King, and Sirnamed Doſon, for that he promiſed more than he did perform. After the death of Demetrius, the Greek Cities begun to lift up their heads, and the ſeveral Tyrants, which, through the incouragement of him and his Predeceſſors, had got many places, for fear renounced their power, and joyned themſelves with the Achæans, who being much reverenced of a long time by all their neighbour Cities of Peloponneſus for their Juſtice and Prudence, had united themſelves together, in the 124 Olympiad, and drawn ſome others into a body againſt the Macedonians. Their affairs were mightily ſtrengthened by Aratus the Sicyonian who governing his own City, though but young, joyned it unto them, and afterward by his great wiſdom and induſtry ſecured and bettered their condition. The Athenians being incouraged at Demetrius his death, now thought again of recovering their liberty, and he having done what he might before to help them, though in vain, and they again imploring his aſſiſtance, though ſick, he made himſelf be carried thither; and whereas Diogenes held for the Macedonians, Piræus, Sunium, Munychia, and the Iſland Salamis, he perſwaded him for a reward of 150 Talents to deliver them all up, twenty of which Talents he preſented of his own money. Whilſt he thus laboured for the Publick good, eſpecially of the community of the Achæans, the Ætolians envying their condition raiſed a dangerous War againſt them, in which Antigonus Doſon came to be ingaged.

Idem ibid. Plutarch in vita Arati & Cleomenis.

10. The Ætolians though they had been helped by the Achæans againſt the houſe of Macedonia of late, being vexed about the buſineſs of Mydionia; yet now ſeeing their union, and the flouriſhing condition of their body, envying and alſo fearing it, reſolved to diſunite if poſſible, and withdraw the Cities one from another. At this time Cleomenes reigned at Lacedæmon, who reſolving to better the conſtitution of his Countrey by reducing it to it's ancient form, and taking away the Ephori thoſe impudent and raſcally Tyrants, ſought for an opportunity of War as moſt fit to bring about his purpoſe. Ever ſince the Victories of Lyſander, luxury and other vices had crept into Sparta, together with the uſe of riches. And the equality of poſſeſſions in Land was taken away by one Epitades an Ephorus, who having a ſon that diſpleaſed him, that he might diſinherit him, procured a law to be paſſed, that any one might diſpoſe of his Lands, either in his life time or at his death, to whom he pleaſed. Hereby it was come to that paſs, that there being ſeven hundred Citizens of Sparta and more, of thoſe not above one hundred poſſeſſed all the Lands and Eſtate, and the reſt being void both of wealth and honour lay idle at home, unwillingly ingaging in War, and expecting an occaſion of change. The Ephori tyrannized with unparallel'd impudence, domineering over the Kings, and ordering thoſe at their pleaſure, the ſervants of whom they had formerly been. Agis one of the Spartan Kings, of the family of Eurytion, the ſon of Eudamidas, and the ſixth from Ageſilaus, burned with a zeal to better the ſtate of affaires, and as a means unto it, endeavoured the reduction of Lycurgus his model for the equal diviſion of Lands; but Leonidas his Collegue being of a luxurious temper oppoſed him, and he was wickedly murdered by the hands of the Popular Villains the Ephori.

Wherein Cleomenes King of Sparta cometh to be engaged, and how.

Lege Plutarchum in Agide & Cleomene.

11. This noble ſpirited man being taken away, and his brother Archidamus deſtroyed, Cleomenes the ſon of Leonidas was King alone, and being of a far different temper from his Father, upon hearing what Agis had gallantly endeavoured, reſolved to purſue and accompliſh what he had attempted, and to take away utterly the power of thoſe Popular Tyrants, who uſurped the whole authority. Neither did theſe two Kings deſire to become aſſertors of Popular power by the reſtitution of the Lots of Lycurgus, but rather of Monarchy; for the reſtitution of thoſe Lots would not promote the power of the Commons who were ſtill to be kept under, as they were by the Laws of Lycurgus; but onely reduced them to that equality of wealth which might ſecure them from being inſulted over by their fellow Commoners, as they had been of late, by ſuch as had ingroſſed the riches of the State. As this might be intended by the two Kings, ſo it appeareth from Plutarch, that Agis attempted to get himſelf reputation, and Cleomenes for his preſervation, by gaining the good-will of the People, and making them ſure of their ſide when ſoever they ſhould be ready for the great deſign of deſtroying the Ephori. Now though Agis miſcarried in his attempt, yet Cleomenes perfected what he had intended. For he ſurprized the Ephori by his Mercenaries, killed four of the five, overthrew all their chairs except one, which he intended as a Chair of State for himſelf. Then reſtored he the Laws of Lycurgus, as to equal poſſeſſions and diſcipline, and for that there was none left of the family of Eurytion, made his own brother Leonidas King with him. But as was ſaid, perceiving this change would be better made in War than Peace, he cauſed the War betwixt the State, and the Achæans, and bribed the Ephori to ſend him forth in the Expedition.

Cleomenes killeth the Ephori, and reſtoreth Lycurgus his Laws.

12. To him therefore the Ætolians ſent, and ſtirred him up againſt the Achæans; and that they might ſtrengthen themſelves, and more eaſily ſuppreſs them, they made peace again with Macedonia, and without doubt had brought about their purpoſe, had they not had to do with Aratus, who undermined their Councils. They ſuffered Cleomenes to take in divers Towns which belonged unto themſelves, not onely not oppoſing but confirming him in the poſſeſſion of them, which Aratus knowing well enough to be intended onely to ſtrengthen him againſt his party, yet thought none were to be firſt Attaqued; but after that Cleomenes with great boldneſs had begun to build a Fort in the Territories of Megalopolis, then were the Lacedemonians declared Enemies. At firſt the Achæans undertook the Warre againſt them by themſelves; partly for that they thought it more honourable and ſafe to defend their own Eſtate, and partly for that they were loath to diſpleaſe Ptolomy (who had been formerly a good friend to them) by ſeeking for the patronage of any other; but the War going on (Cleomenes now having overthrown the Achæans in divers battels) Aratus thinking it a diſgrace for him to be worſted by the young Lacedæmonian, and being jealous ſtill of the knavery of the Ætolians, concluded it was high time to look about him; at leaſt for a ſupply.

13. Conſidering with himſelf the power of Antigonus King of Macedonia, and withall his faithfulneſs; and that he was prone to enter into Leagues and alliances, he reſolved to make a Confederacy with him; but that ſecretly, as well becauſe he knew the Ætolians would ſeek to prevent him, as for that his people would be diſcouraged at the thought of expecting help from an Enemy. Knowing therefore the Megalopolitans to be ſore preſſed with the War (having little help from the Achæans) and how good affection they bore to the Macedonian Court ever ſince the dayes of Philip the ſon of Amyntas, who deſerved very well of them, he ſent for two of friends thence (Nicophanes and Cercidas) and dealt privately with them to perſwade their Citizens to crave aid of Antigonus. Theſe two were therefore ſent to the Achæans, and to Macedouia if they ſhould think fit. They giving way to it, they came to the King, and according to the inſtructions from Aratus, propoſed to him to conſider, whither this conjunction of Cleomenes and the Ætolians would tend; and whether when the Achæans were eaten up, he himſelf would not be in danger, ſeeing the covetouſneſs of the Ætolians, and Cleomenes his ambition could not be contained in leſſer limits than thoſe of Greece. He anſwered, that if it ſhould ſeem good to the Achæans, he would ſend aid to thoſe of Megalopolis. They being at this much encouraged, laboured to perſwade them to give way to it, but Aratus then fearing, that if the coming down of Antigonus ſhould breed any inconvenience, the blame would fall all upon him, diſſwaded his People from receiving as yet any aid, and made them try firſt what they could do of themſelves, exhorting each particular City to fight ſtoutly for their liberty. Now Ptolomy finding the Lacedæmonians to be more for his purpoſe to withſtand the Macedonian, ſtirred up Cleomenes againſt him, and furniſhed him with money. He alſo brought the Achæans by divers ingagements to ſuch a low ebb, that they were now in great danger to loſe all, and therefore they implored aid of Antigonus, and Aratus ſent his ſon to confirm whatſoever had been offered on his part.

Who marcheth down. And alſo Antigonus.

14. He then marched down, though a great difficulty there was at firſt for this to be hoped for by the Achæans, by reaſon that the Caſtel of Corinth which they had taken out of the hands of the Macedonians together with the Town, and which would be now mighty convenient for the carrying on of the War, they knew not how to reſtore unto him. But Cleomenes proſpering exceedingly, and having reduced nine Cities into his power, the Corinthians ſent to him, offering him theirs, and commanded all the Achæans to be gone; ſo that at this Aratus taking occaſion (who before durſt not give them up into the hands of the Macedonians without their conſent) reſtored the Caſtle into the power of Antigonus. Cleomenes (who after his taking the nine Cities, went and ſate down before Sicyon) hearing the intention of the Achæans and the King, marched with great ſpeed to the Iſthmus, and then fortified the place between the Caſtle of Corinth and the Mountains Onii with a ditch and bulwark; and Antigonus with twenty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand four hundred Horſe, coming through Æubœa (for that the Ætolians had forbidden him at his peril to paſs through the Straights of Thermopylæ) found no little oppoſition from Cleomenes, till Argos revolting to Aratus (by the means of Ariſtotle his friend, who with help from Sicyon ſet upon the Caſtel, Megiſtonus who was ſent to relieve it being ſlain) for that he feared if this Fort ſhould be taken the Enemy might thereby ſtop up the paſſage, and at his eaſe invade Laconia, he drew down his forces from Corinth. Then Antigonus entering Peloponneſus took Corinth in his way, where placing a Garriſon he followed Cleomenes to Argos, who having by a wile entred the Town, laboured again to reduce it, and took ſome parts thereof, but ſeeing him come down from the Mountains againſt him, withdrew himſelf, and ſo by Mantinea returned to Lacedæmon. Antigonus coming to Argos commended and encouraged the Citizens, and thence marching preſently for Arcadia, reduced divers Forts, which he delivered into the hands of the Megalopolitans: after which coming to Ægium to the general meeting of the Achæans (where he held conſultations with them) he was declared general of all the Aſſociates, and took up Winter-quarters for his Army, at Sicyon and Corinth.

Is victorious.

Polybius ibid. Plutarch. in Arato.

15. At the beginning of Spring he gathered his forces together and beſieged Tegea, where the Achæans met him. Having this Town yielded to him, he thence marched ſpeedily into Laconia, where Cleomenes meeting him upon the borders there paſſed ſome light skirmiſhes betwixt them, and then he hearing that the Garriſon Soldiers at Orchomenus were coming to help the Enemy, departed ſuddenly thither, and ſtormed the place at the firſt onſet. Thence moving to Mantiuca, that Town preſently was taken, the chief of the Inhabitants whereof (becauſe though when Aratus took the City, he reſtored them to their former priviledges, yet they again revolted, and put all his Garriſon to the ſword,) for their ingratitude were ſlain; of the reſt, part were ſold, and part ſent into Macedonia, their wives and children made ſlaves; and their Town was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who thither reſolved to ſend out a Colony, and Aratus being made Prætor, made a Decree for changing the name of it into Antigonia. After this, Antigonus took Herea and Telphuſſa, and Winter then drawing on he went again to the General Aſſembly of the Achæans, ſending out his Souldiers to their quarters, which Cleomenes taking notice of, and that Megalopolis was three days march from Ægyum, and wanted a ſufficient Garriſon, he brake in thither ſecretly in the night, where though he found ſuch oppoſition as both he and his were brought into great danger, yet became he Maſter of the place, and ſo cruelly raged againſt it (as Polybius a Citizen thereof telleth us) that no hope then ſeemed to be left of Peopling it again. This City being taken, he marched away to Argos (where Antigonus wintered) to harraſe the Territories; a raſh enterpriſe as the Vulgar judged, but prudent enough of it ſelf, conſidering that the King's Army being at a great diſtance, and he thereby unable to reſiſt, the Argives would then murmur againſt him, and he thereby be brought into contempt. This hapned juſt as he imagined, but Antigonus though very much ſpent of the Ptiſick, lived to the next Summer to regain his credit.

He taketh Mantinea.

16. In the beginning of Summer he led towards Laconia an Army of twenty ſix thouſand eight hundred men (his own and of the aſſociates) which Cleomenes expecting fortiſied the paſſage betwixt the two mountains Eva and Olympus, placing his Brother at the former, and ſecuring the later himſelf, having in all about twenty thouſand in his Army. Antigonus wondering at his skill and induſtry in his fortification, pitcht his Tents upon the River Gorgylus, bethinking himſelf what he ſhould do; at laſt finding all paſſages made up, they both agreed to try the matter in battail. At the beginning of the fight thoſe of Cleomenes his party with the light Armour placed amongſt his Horſe, ſeeing the Illyrian cohorts not to be backed by the Achæans, fell upon their Reer, and had done great miſchief, but that Philopomenes a Megalopolitan (then but young) giving notice of it to the Officers, and they not regarding him, ſtirred up his fellow Citizens, and fell upon the Enemies horſe, which made the other return to their former place to help their Companions. After this the fortune of the day inclined to Antigonus his ſide, for Euclidas undid himſelf by the bad choice of his ground, receiving the Illyrians not on the ſide of the Hill, (whereby though he might have been repulſed, yet ſtill he might have had the advantage of being higher than the Enemy) but juſt on the top, ſo that being thence removed, and forced downwards on the other ſide, the Illyrians had the advantage of him. Cleomenes perceiving his brother overthrown, and the Horſe on the plain to have the worſt, for fear the Enemy ſhould compaſs him in, was forced to remove the Carriages from behind his Army, and draw it out as well as he could to prevent that. Then the Files coming to be ingaged, Antigonus preſſing upon the Macedonians in great violence with his doubled Files, put them to flight, and many being ſlain, Cleomenes eſcaped with a few in his Company and got to Sparta.

Defeateth Cleomenes.

17. Cleomenes coming to Sparta, adviſed the people which flocked about him to receive the Conquerour, and then by night getting to Gythium, thence went to Alexandria in Egypt, whereas if had either deferred the battel a little longer, or ſtayed at home, he might eaſily have recovered his former condition. For, Antigonus ſuddenly following him got Sparta, and very nobly, and with great humanity uſed the Citizens, reſtoring to them their antient liberties, but ſhortly after was conſtrained to leave that place, and Peloponneſus alſo, being called home by an invaſion of the Illyrians into Macedonia, where they made havock of all things. From Sparta he came to Tegea, which he again reſtored into the form of a Commonwealth, and thence to Argos, at the time of the Celebration of the Nemean Games, where by the Decree of the General aſſembly of the Achæans in common, and each of the Cities in particular, he had all poſſible honour given him. After this he marched with great ſpeed into Macedonia, where he overthrew the Illyrians in battel, but got his own death with the victory: for with exhorting his Soldiers, and ſhouting in the fight, he ſo ſtrained his Lungs that he ſpat bloud, and thereby his Conſumption was heightned, which in a ſhort time made an end of him, after he had diſcharged the Office of a faithful Guardian, a good King, and of an expert and valiant Captain ten years, A. M. 3782. in the ſecond of the one hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, one hundred years after the death of Alexander.

Polybius ut ſupra.

Dieth of a Conſumption.

18. Philip

Pauſan. in Achaicis.

*Polyb. lib.*4.

Philip ſucceedeth his Uncle, and cometh to be ingaged in the Social War of Greece.

18. Philip then ſucceeded this his Uncle, and once his Guardian, being ſixteen years old, in whom the Prediction of Sibylla was verified, that the Macedonian glory, as it began in a Philip, ſo it ſhould end in one of that name. Some three years after his coming to the Government he was alſo ingaged in the Social War of Greece, of which the Ætolians and Achæans were the chief parties. For now the Ætolians (who uſed to live by Pyracy and Robbing) being weary of peace, though awed by Antigonus as long as he lived, and having in contempt the youth of Philip, and judging themſelves ſtronger than the Achæans, they deſired occaſion to begin a War. The firſt occaſion was given by Dorimachus one of their body, who being ſent to Phigalea, a City of Peloponneſus in the Confines of Meſſena (under pretence of ſecuring it, and its Territories) to ſpy what was done in thoſe parts, and ſeeing the Meſſenians to live in ſecurity, and neglect of any martial Diſcipline, ever ſince the peace was made by Antigonus, being covetous gave leave to certain Pyrats to prey upon their grounds and drive their Cattel thence, though they were friends to the Ætolians. They complaining of this to him, he went to Meſſena, but in ſtead of giving them any relief, he derided, and threatned the Owners of the Cattel, and by the perſwaſion of Sciron, then Prætor of that City, he was ſecured. It ſo hapned, that at this time there was one Babyrta a filthy fellow, ſo like to this Dorimachus, that one could ſcarce know them aſunder had they been cloathed alike. As therefore on a time Dorimachus was malapertly inveighing againſt the Meſſenians, Sciron anſwered him, Doſt thou think, O Babyrta, that we either care for thee, or thy threats? This Jeer ſo affected him, as to be gone he reſtored them their goods; but getting him home, it ſat ſo deeply upon him, as by pretence of this injury alone did he ſtir up War againſt the Meſſenians.

A.M. 3782.
Ol. 139. ann. 2.
V. C. 531.
Antiochi Magn. 1.
Ptol. Euerget. 24.

The Original thereof.

19. He durſt not in publick Conventions perſwade the Ætolians to the War, for that his private grudge was ſufficiently known; but one Scopas being then Prætor, him he perſwaded to joyn with him in the invaſion of the Meſſenians. They two therefore, without any publick Decree, took the advantage of that time, wherein a few dayes onely were remaining to Timoxenus, the Prætor of the Achæans, to continue in his Office (during which time yet Aratus, who was to ſucceed him, could not execute it) and calling together the Ætolians to the Promontory of Ægium, ſayled over into Peloponneſus, and invading the Meſſenians (who being unable to reſiſt, had ſecured themſelves within their City Walls) waſted all with fire and ſword. Not onely the Meſſenians, but the Epirotes, Achæans, Acarnanians, and Macedonians alſo being declared Enemies by Scopas, they gave out Commiſſions to Pyrats to infeſt them by Sea. A Ship of the King of Macedonia was taken, and being brought into the Haven was ſold, with all the men, and things belonging to it; the Sea-Coaſts of Epirus were invaded; Thyreas a Town of Acarnania was ſet upon, and a band of men being ſent privately through Peloponneſus, a Caſtle there was ſeized on in the Territories of the Megalopolitans, which yet Timoxenus reduced by the help of Taurion, whom Antigonus had left to overſee his affairs in thoſe parts.

Idem ibid. & Plutarch. in Arato.

20. The Achæans meeting at Ægium, Decreed that aid ſhould be ſent to the Meſſenians; but Timoxenus whoſe time was not yet out, being ſlow in his preparations, Aratus who was to ſucceed him got the publick ſignet five dayes before the time, made Levies, and ſent to the Ætolians to draw away their Forces out of the Meſſenian Territories, and not to trouble Achaia upon pain of being proſecuted as Enemies. Scopas and Dorimachus hearing the Achæans were gathered together, marched towards the Eleans their Allies (with whom the Ætolians alwayes maintained friendſhip, that they might the better Prey upon Peloponneſus) ſo that Aratus hearing this, very indiſcreetly, and not like himſelf (as Polybius ſheweth) for that he thought they would retreat, diſmiſſed all his Soldiers except three thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe, with which, and Taurion his party, he marched after them. He conſtrained them to fight in a diſadvantageous place for himſelf, ſo that his forces were overthrown by them, and many being ſlain, the reſt ſecured themſelves in the Towns thereabouts, and the Ætolians paſſing without let or hinderance through Peloponneſus, attempted to take Pellene, and waſting the Territories of the Sicyonians, paſſed through the Iſthmus, and ſo returned home. After this the Achæans aſſembling together, Aratus was grievouſly accuſed for taking up the Office before his time, diſbanding the Army when he knew Scopas and Dorimachas were in Peloponneſus, fighting the Enemy with ſo few, when he might have eaſily had aid from the Towns thereabout, and, which was worſt of all, for ingaging not his beſt Soldiers in the plain, but onely skirmiſhing at the Roots of the Mountains, where the Enemy had the advantage of the ground, beſides their being the greater number. But as ſoon as Aratus appearing put them in mind of his former ſervices, anſwered to the things objected againſt him, and craved pardon in caſe he had failed of his duty in the fight, and deſired they would examine the caſe not maliciouſly, but with humanity, the people changed ſo in their affections, that they were angry a long time with his accuſers, and reſted upon his Counſels alone for the future.

Aratus is defeated by the Ætolians.

21. Theſe things having given the occaſion to the Social War, it preſently was decreed againſt the Ætolians. For, the Achæans meeting together, ordered that ſome ſhould be ſent to the Epirotes, Bœotians, Phocians, Acarnanians, and unto Philip, to acquaint them that they had broken the League now twice by the invaſion of Achaia, to deſire help againſt them, and to receive the Meſſenians into the alliance; moreover it was reſolved, that the Prætor ſhould agree with the Lacedæmonians and Meſſenians, what Forces ſhould be raiſed by their States. The Ætolians alſo aſſembling, that they might make a breach betwixt the Achæans and their aſſociates, reſolved to make peace with the Lacedæmonians and Meſſenians, but as for the Achæans themſelves, they abſurdly decreed, that on no other condition would they have Peace with them, except they forſook the ſociety of the Meſſenians. The Epirotes, and Philip, after audience given to the Embaſſadors, willingly received the Meſſenians into the alliance; but as for the Ætolians, not at all wondering at their carriage (for that it being but agreeable to their cuſtom of Piracy and robbing, their cuſtome ſomething excuſed the badneſs of the action) they reſolved ſtill to keep peace with them. But Scerdilaidas the General of the Illyrians making an agreement with the Ætolians about his part in the booty, with them invaded Achaia, and took the City of the Cynæthenſes, being betrayed by ſome Exiles, which their Citizens had lovingly received again; but to pay for their ingratitude, theſe Exiles were put to the ſword as well as the reſt, and their City was burnt down to the ground upon the report of the Macedonians coming into Peloponneſus. For, Aratus had ſent to Philip again for aid, who came preſently with an Army down to Corinth, where the Commiſſioners from the ſeveral aſſociated Cities met him, and unanimouſly decreed a War againſt the Ætolians, in the firſt year of the 140 Olympiad (as Polybius telleth us) and about that time that Hannibal took Saguntus.

A. M. 3785.
Ol. 140. an. 1.
V. C. 534.
Ant. Mag. 4.
Ptol. Philopat. 3.

Philip marching down the Social War is decreed againſt the Ætolians.

22. While Philip was about Corinth, great ſtirs hapned at Lacedæmon by reaſon of him. For ſuch as were his Enemies there, cauſed ſome of his party, leſt they ſhould tell how they ſtood affected, to be ſlain, and afterwards the Ephori (who had brought the People to decree a continuance in the League with him) to be murdered as they were ſacrifizing, and then joyned their State to the Ætolians, and after they had heard of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, made a new election of Kings (wherof one was Lycurgus, an obſcure man, and not of the Race of Hercules) having lived in way of a Free State about three years, ever ſince they were ſet free by Antigonus, till this time, when their liberty ſo called, had bred great ſtrife and emulation. Philip coming to Ægium to the general meeting, the Achæans renewed the leagues and confederacies formerly made with his Anceſtors, and then with a great deal of credit he returned into Macedonia, there to make proviſions for the War, where ſpending the Winter in levying Forces, and fortifying that countrey againſt forein attempts, he alſo ſo dealt with Scerdilaidas, as he drew him over from the Ætolians to his own party, by reaſon they had not made him partaker of the booty, as they had covenanted with him. During this time ſeveral aſſociates were ſent to for aſſiſtance in the War, and amongſt the reſt the Meſſenians, who though they gave the occaſion of it, yet anſwered, being overpoured by the Prætors of the Ætolians, that ſeeing Phygalea was ſituate in their borders and belonged unto them, they would not aſſiſt in the War, except it was firſt taken out of the hands of the Ætolians. Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian King getting ſome Forces together, invaded the borders of the Argives, and took ſeveral Towns, they not ſtanding at all upon their guard, expecting no acts of Hoſtility from their friends as they counted them, and then was War proclaimed by the Ætolians againſt the Achæans. They were much elevated being now in a flouriſhing condition, the other on the contrary were put to it, for that Philip in whom was their chiefeſt hope, was onely yet providing for the War: the Epirotes would do nothing till they ſaw him begin; and the Meſſenians remained neuters; but ſhortly after, the marching of Philip from Macedonia revived their hopes.

Changes at Lacedæmon.

23. For having got together an Army of fifteen thouſand Foot, and five hundred Polybius ut ſupra.

dred Horſe, he departed from Macedonia, for Theſſalia and Epirus, intending through them to invade Ætolia. Coming into Epirus, he was perſwaded there by the Inhabitants to ſet upon the City Ambracus and recover it, (which the Ætolians had gotten out of the hands of the Epirotes) to which he was ſo unwiſe as to agree, and thereby loſt the opportunity of finiſhing the Warr preſently, by neglecting to invade the inland Countries of Ætolia, and by harkening to the Epirotes, who more regarded their private profit then the publick good. In the mean time, in Peloponneſus things went on in favour of the Ætolians: for though they had been repulſed with ſome loſs from Ægira, a City of the Achæans, yet Euripidas the General of the Eleans made inrodes upon divers of the aſſociates, got much booty, and took divers Towns with the Caſtle of the Dimæans; Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian took Atheneus a Town belonging to the Megalopolitans; and Aratus ſon to the other the Captain of the Achæans could hire no Soldiers (becauſe behind already with much pay) and with fear and indiſcretion managed the buſineſs. Scopas the Prætor of the Ætolians through Theſſaly invaded Macedonia, where waſting all with fire and ſword about Pieria, he thence went to Dium, which the Inhabitants not ſtaying his coming, he burnt, and overthrew the Images of the Kings. Philip by this time had taken Ambracus in the ſpace of forty dayes, and thereby ſatisfied the greedy deſires of the Epirotes; then hearing what Scopas had done in Macedonia, he paſſed ſpeedily over the Bay of Ambracia, and through Acarnania invaded the Ætolians.

Scopas the Ætolian invadeth Macedonia

Idem ibid.

And Philip Ætolia.

24. Pitching his tents before Phæteas, after many ſharp skirmiſhes he received that town upon compoſition, and overthrew a party of five hundred Ætolians, who were coming to relieve it; after which, as he was waſting the Country, the Ambaſſadors of the Achæans came to him deſiring help. He promiſed to take their buſineſs into conſideration, and marched for Metropolis, the Inhabitants of which flying into the Caſtle, he burnt the Town, and thence moving towards Conope, ſome Horſe endeavoured to hinder him from paſſing the River, but finding it to be in vain, retired into the Town, and after this, none daring any more to ſhew themſelves, he paſſed unmoleſted through the Country, taking many Towns and Caſtles, the Walls of which he demoliſhed, onely Oeniadæ he reſolved to fortifie. While he thus imployed himſelf, news came from Macedonia, that the Dardanians had reſolved to make an invaſion; whereupon judging it requiſite to look home, he diſmiſſed the Achæan Ambaſſadors with this anſwer, that as ſoon as he had provided for the ſecurity of his own Kingdom, he would uſe his beſt endeavour to relieve them. Returning that way he came, with great journeys he paſſed through Epirus, and when he had arrived at Pella, the Dardanians hearing of his return disbanded their Army, and then he preſently marched back into Theſſaly, intending to paſs away the remaining of the Summer at Lariſſa, Dorimachus who being created Prætor of the Ætolians invaded Epirus, and harraſing the Country, robbed, and then deſtroyed the Dodonæan Temple; but Philip now in Winter, when it was little expected by any, leaveth Lariſſa, and paſſing over his Army from Theſſalie into Eubœa, marcheth through Bœotia, and the confines of Megaris, and about the Winter ſolſtice, cometh to Corinth, whither calling Aratus the elder to him to conſult of affaires, he writes to the Prætor, and ſeveral Cities of the Achæans, aſſigning them when and where to meet him.

Idem ibid.

And Peloponneſus.

His Exploits.

25. Having taken this order he departs from Corinth to Dioſcurium, a City of the Phliaſians, and thence to Caphyæ, where he had appointed the Achæans to meet him, lighting in his way upon a party which Euripidas was leading towards the Territories of the Sicyonians to waſte them, whereof two thouſand two hundred he took; the other being ſlain and periſhing amongſt the high Rocks, one hundred onely eſcaped with their Leader. This Victory got him abundance of honour (it being heard he was come, and had overcome alſo at the ſame time) which to maintain and increaſe, after he was come to Caphyæ, he joyned Aratus the younger to him with about ten thouſand men, and marched to Pſophis an ancient Town of Arcadia, ſituate in the middle of Peloponneſus, and vpon the confines of the Eleans, who then had it in their hands, and whither Euripidas their Captain had now withdrawn himſelf after his defeat. To this place Philip had a great mind, as very convenient for carrying on the War. He got the Town preſently, and after that had the Caſtle yielded to him, and ſtaying there ſome time gave up the place into the hands of the Achæans, as alſo Laſione ſhortly after, which upon his approaching was forſaken by a Garriſon of the Eleans. After this he came into the Country of the Eleans, which giving his Soldiers liberty to ſack and plunder, he paſſed the River

Alphæus, and came into Tryphalia including nine Towns ſituate betwixt Elea and Meſſena, which alſo the inhabitants of the former had got into their poſſeſſion a few years before, with Aliphira that belonged to Arcadia. Paſſing his men over by a bridge he cauſed to be made, he preſently took Aliphira, and within ſix dayes all Tryphalia, though Phylidas was ſent from the Ætolians to aid the Eleans with ſix hundred men, to whom were joyned five hundred Mercenaries, and one thouſand of the Inhabitans of Elea. Placing a Garriſon in the Caſtle of the Lepreatans, he came to Heræa, where dividing all the booty amongſt his Soldiers, and thence marching to Megalopolis, in the midſt of Winter, he afterward came to Argos, where he ſpent the remainder of that Seaſon. During theſe motions Chilon the Lacedemonian killed the Ephori who had made Lycurgus King; but the fact being not approved, he was glad to betake himſelf to his heels.

Apelles his plot againſt Aratus and others.

Polybius lib. 5.

26. Philip invaded again the Territories of the Ætolians, and thence took very much booty, and returning to Argos to winter, ſent his Army into Macedonia. At this time Apelles (who was one of them whom Antigonus had left his Guardians) much maligned Aratus, and joyning with Leontius Captain of the Cetrati (called ſo from the wearing of a ſhort buckler) and Megaleas the King's chief Secretary, reſolved to remove Taurion from the Government of Peloponneſus, and Alexander from his command of the Life-Guard; and had he not been hindered by Aratus, he had accompliſh't his purpoſe. He had procured alſo one Eparatus to be choſen Prætor in the room of Aratus the younger, and he managing his affairs very indiſcreetly, the King could get neither money nor proviſions, but was fain to flie to Aratus for relief; and now it being reſolved to carry on the War by Sea, he conſulting with his two creatures, determined to ſtop up proviſions from coming to the Army, and went to Chalcis for that purpoſe. He ſo managed his buſineſs, as he forced the King to pawn his plate, who now ſailed againſt the Cephalenians, whoſe ſhips the Ætolians conſtantly uſed in their invaſions of Peloponneſus, and coming to Patra, there drew up his Ships on ſhore. He laid ſiege to the City of the Patæenſians, and having undermined a piece of the Wall, ſent Leontius to take the place, but he remembring the conſpiracy of Apelles, Megaleas, and himſelf, to hinder the affairs of his Maſter, had corrupted the chiefeſt of the Officers, and ſuffered himſelf to be repulſed, ſo that Philip raiſed his Siege, and conſulted what was to be done. By this time Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian King had ivaded the Meſſenians, Dorimachus alſo the Ætolian had made an inroad into Theſſaly, ſo that from both parts came Ambaſſadors to crave aid. Leontius counſelled Phillip to go to Meſſenia; but Aratus to invade Ætolia again, to whom he agreed, having had experience of his wiſdom, and beginning now a little to miſtruſt the other.

27. Writing to the Prætor of the Achæans to relieve the Meſſenians, he invaded their Country, and taking Thermus, gave his Soldiers leave to plunder the Villages, in revenge for what the Ætolians had done at Dius in Macedonia, and rifled and burnt the Temple, for which he is grievouſly reprehended by Polybius. After this returning on ſhipboard, Leontius and Megaleas in their cups ſo abuſed Aratus, as to throw ſtones at him, for which the former eſcaping, the later was impriſoned and fined twenty Talents at a Council of War. Philip then ſailed to Corinth, whence ſending meſſengers to the aſſociated Cities to meet him at Tegea, he marched thither in two dayes, and getting ſome Forces together he invaded the Lacedæmonians, and waſted their territories far and wide, put to flight Lycurgus who came out of the City againſt him, and then returned again unto Corinth. While he prepared to attempt ſome notable thing upon Phocis; Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolomy, moved the Soldiers to ſedition, which though he knew very well, yet diſſembled he it at preſent, but Leontius ſent for Apelles from Chalcis, who there had very naughtily behaved himſelf, and now returning was not entertained by the King after the uſual manner, nor admitted to the Council. Megaleas hereat being affrighted fled, leaving Leontius behind him ingaged for the twenty Talents, whoſe Soldiers Philip ſent with Taurion into Thriphyllia as upon ſervice, and then caſt him into Priſon for the payment of the money, and not long after (the Soldiers malapertly interceding for him, that he ſhould not be tried till their return, otherwiſe they ſhould take it as a great affront) he put him to death. Then came he to Patra, where he had appointed the Deputies of the Cities to meet him about a Peace with the Ætolians, which the Rhodians and Chians had by Ambaſſadors moved both parties to. Here letters of Megaleas were brought to him, wherein he ſtirred up the Ætolians to proceed in the War, becauſe he would be in great ſtraights for proviſions; whereupon he judging Apelles to have been the chief cauſe of thoſe evils, clapt him up at Corinth, and ordered

The treaſon of him and his complices diſcovered.

Alexander to go to Thebes and purſue Megaleas. He hearing this killed himſelf, and Apelles died ſoon after.

28. The Ætolians hearing of theſe ſtirs in Philip's Court, and thinking thereby ſome great ſedition would be raiſed, put off their meeting at Rhium about the peace, which he was not at all ſorry for, but exhorted the Allies rather to bend their minds towards thoughts of War. Then, coming to Demetrias, there was condemned Ptolomy, Apelles his Companion, by the Macedonians, and put to death; and, for that Winter was now begun, having ſent his Army before, he himſelf followed into Macedonia. The next year he got Bylazora the chiefeſt Town of Pæonia into his hands, and Thebes Pthiotick alſo, which the Ætolians holding, much moleſted Theſſaly: but receiving news that Scerdilaida being revolted, made great waſte of all things about Malea, he returned into Peloponneſus at the time of the celebration of the Nemean Games. Here he received letters that Hannibal had overthrown the Romans at the Lake of Thraſymene; and Demetrius Pharius, who had waged War with the people of Rome, for the Illyrians, adviſed him to make peace with the Ætolians, and undertaking the affairs of Illyricum paſs thence into Italy, and think of no leſs than arriving at the Monarchy of the World. Being elevated with this fancy, he perſwaded the Achæans to agreement, and then ſending Taurion and Aratus to the Ætolians, who deſired a Treaty, at their requeſt he went alſo himſelf down to them, and made Peace on this condition, that all parties ſhould enjoy what now they held. Agelaus of Naupactus perſwaded the Greeks to imbrace amity, leſt cutting one anothers throats, they might be devoured by the Carthaginians or Romans. So all the Cities returned to their ancient Laws and Cuſtoms, and this Social War ended after it had continued four years, in the ſixth of the reign of Philip, the firſt of the 141 Olympiad. A. M. 3789.

Ptolomy put to death for treaſon.

Philip having vaſt things in deſign, putteth an end to the Social War.

A. M. 3789.
Ol. 141. ann. 1.
V. C. 538.
Antioch. M. 8.
Ptolom. Philop. 7.

29. Philip applied himſelf to the recovery of the Cities which had revolted from him, and then thought of nothing more than ſetling the affairs of Illyricum, neceſſary for the promoting of his deſigns, eſpecially the invaſion of Italy, upon which his mind was ſo ſetled, as ſleeping and waking his fancy ran wholly upon it, being ſpurred on by Demetrius Pharius, not ſo much for any great affection born to him, as for the others private intereſt, who thought hereby to recover the Iſland Pharus, which once he enjoyed; and out of hatred to the Romans, who having overthrown him in War, about this time ſent to demand him of Philip, to whom he had fled. After he had recovered the Cities, and ſent his Army to the Winter quarters, he bethought him that there would be need of Ships for the carrying on of his project; not for fighting with the Romans, but conveying of his men; ſo that he cauſed one hundred ſwift Barkes to be built, and yet in the Spring exerciſing his Soldiers a little in rowing, away he goes through Euripus near to Cephalenia, hearkening continually after the Roman Fleet. But the report of it's coming, after a ſhort time put his men into ſuch a pannick fear, that though he was going towards Apollonia, he tacked about, and in great diſorder after a day and a nights ſail came back again to Cephalenia. For all this he was not diſcouraged from his enterpriſe, but underſtanding how Hannibal proſpered in Italy, thought good to make him his friend, and thereby get an entrance in thither. And this year being the fourth of the ſecond Punick War, he ſent his Ambaſſadors to him.

Polyb. lib. 5.

Livius l. 22.

He ſendeth to Hannibal in Italy.

30. The Ambaſſadors landing near to the Temple of Juno Lucinia, went through Apulia towards Capua where Hannibal then lay; but in their way fell into the Roman Guards, by which they were brought to M. Valerius Lævinus the Prætor, then lying about Numeria. Being thus entangled, Xenophanes, one of them bolder and wiſer than the reſt, told the Prætor they were come from Philip to make a League and Alliance with the People of Rome; at which he rejoycing, that after the revolting of their Aſſociates in Italy ſo great a Prince ſhould deſire their friendſhip, entertained him and his fellows very lovingly, and ſent them away with ſome to conduct them, ſo that coming into Campania they preſently got to Hannibal. The alliance was made on theſe terms, that Philip with as great a Fleet as poſſible (two hundred ſhips he thought he could procure) ſhould paſs into Italy, waſte the Maritime parts thereof, and help to carry on the War both by Sea and Land: that Italy being Conquered ſhould all fall to Hannibal, and the Carthaginians with all the ſpoil; and then they ſhould paſs into Greece, and there make War upon what Princes or States Philip pleaſed, who ſhould enjoy what ever places could be got, either in the continent or Iſlands, he being willing to content himſelf with theſe conditions for a beginning. Things being thus concluded, the Ambaſſadors were diſpatched away, and with them ſome ſent from Hannibal, who ſhipping themſelves again where they landed before, were diſcovered by the Romans, who lay upon the Coaſts of Calabria, and taken. Xenophanes, having had ſuch good fortune before, with his skill attempted the ſame thing again, but the habit and language of the Carthaginians diſcovered them, and, the League being found about them, all was brought to light, and confeſſed; and then they were ſent to Gracus the Conſul to Cuma, and by him to the Senate.

Idem lib. 23.

The terms of their Alliance.

The Ambaſſadors taken by the Romans.

31. The Fathers entred into ſerious debate about it, being much troubled to find, that though they were ſcarce able to undergo the Carthaginian War, they ſhould be ingaged in another with the Macedonian King; yet notwithſtanding they were not diſmayed, but conſidered how they might make work for Philip at home, thereby to divert him from Italy. Having therefore impriſoned the Ambaſſadors, and ſold their followers, they gave order for fifty ſhips fitly furniſhed to hover about Italy, and if the Kings attempts ſhould appear anſwerable to the Ambaſſage, Marcus Valerius the Prætor was then to invade Macedonia. While theſe things were in hand, one of the ſlaves which being taken accompanied the Ambaſſadors to Rome, eſcaped, and acquainted Philip how things had paſſed, who then not knowing what was done or concluded betwixt Hannibal and himſelf, ſent Meſſengers, who diſpatched the buſineſs with better ſucceſs, but the Summer was too far ſpent for him to do any thing this year. Theſe high thoughts and deſigns he now had in his head did ſo puff him up, that from an excellent Prince as he was at the firſt, he turned tyrannical, ſo that he began to wax harſh againſt the Cities of Greece, being ſet on by Demetrius Pharius, who adviſed him to get Peloponneſus into his power, and for that purpoſe to ſeize on the two Horns of that beaſt, (as he accounted them) the Caſtle of Corinth, and that of the Meſſenians, who being now at odds amongſt themſelves, he laboured to increaſe their differences; and for that Aratus was diſpleaſed at it, and laboured to diſſwade him, he caſt him out of favour. The year after he had entered into a League with Hannibal, finding it yet not convenient to make for Italy, he took Oricus a Town of Illyricum, in order to the beſieging of Apollonia, both which had joyned themſelves in ſociety with the Romans fifteen years before. But when Lævinus the Prætor heard of it, leaving the Coaſt of Brunduſium to the care of P. Valerius, he haſted to Oricus, and preſently recovered it, and afterwards ſent a party under the Conduct of Nævius Criſpus, which getting into Apollonia, afterwards fell upon the Macedonians who lay ſo ſecurely in their Camp, that about one thouſand men entred the Trenches before it was perceived. Hereupon followed ſuch a Pannick fear, that no body endeavoured to repulſe the Enemy; and three thouſand men were ſlain or taken. The King getting out of his bed, fled half naked to the ſhips; which Lævinus being aware of, ſecured the mouth of the River; ſo that he was forced to fly with a poor unarmed Army by Land into Macedonia.

Others ſent with better ſucceſs.

Polybius ex lib.7.excerpt.3.

He is beaten at Apollonia, and driven home.

A.M. 3791.
Ol. 141. *an.*3.
V.C. 540.
Antioch Mag. 10.
*Ptol. Philop.*9.

32. About this time, being angry with Aratus, becauſe he was concerned at his ill uſage of the Meſſenians, he procured him to be poyſoned by the help of Taurion his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus. At the firſt the thing was not known, it being a ſlow working poyſon, but Aratus himſelf was not ignorant of it, yet ſhewed ſuch calmneſs of mind as he acquainted none with it, but Cephalo his neareſt attendant, who obſerving him to ſpit blood upon the Wall, he only ſaid, This reward O Cephalo have we for our friendſhip to Philip; but after his death he was honoured by all the Achæans as an Hero. Philip about this time caſting his thoughts upon Illyricum, got Lyſſus a ſtrong Town thereof, and Acrolyſſus its Caſtle into his power, having divided his Army into two parts, one whereof he hid on the Land-ſide, and drew the Defendants towards the Sea with the other, ſo as they in ambuſh entred the Caſtle without oppoſition (otherwiſe impregnable) after which he got the Town, though with much trouble, and then moſt of the Cities out of fear ſubmitted unto him. But the ſame year M. Valerius Lævinus withdrew the Ætolians from their ſociety and alliance with him, by ſhewing them the civility of the Romans towards their friends, and eſpecially by putting them in hopes to recover Acarnania again into their power, having Scopas the Prætor and Dorimacus to back him in this perſwaſion. And in this new League were to be included the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, Attalus King of Aſia the leſs, Pleuratus of Thrace, and Scerdilaidas of Illyricum, if they pleaſed. Lævinus took preſently Zacynthus an Iſland near to Ætolia, having a City in it of the ſame name, Oeniada alſo and Naſſus, Towns of Acarnania, all which he gave up to the Ætolians, and then judging he had made work enough for Philip to keep him at home, that he ſhould not think of the invaſion of Italy, or of Hannibal, or the Carthaginians, he departed to Corcyra.

Idem lib. 8. Excerpt. 9.

Poyſoneth Aratus.

Idem ibid. Excerpt. 10.

*Livius lib.*26.

Lævinus the Roman Prætor maketh him work enough.

13. He

Idem ibid.

Polybius lib. 10.

Idem lib. 27.

33. He was Wintring at Pella, when the news firſt came to him, and therefore as he had determined to paſs into Greece in the Spring, and firſt to invade, and awe the Illyrians, he now made incurſions thither, after that into Pelagonia, and then took a City of the Dardanians in the Borders of Macedonia, being as it were the Key into their Countrey. This done, he haſted into Theſſaly, where leaving Perſeus with a party to reſtrain the Ætolians, he thence marched towards Thrace againſt the Mædi, which were wont to make inroads into Macedonia when the King was abſent in the Wars; from them he took Jampharnia, and attempted other places. But the Ætolians now aiming at, and expecting great things, becauſe of their conjunction with their Romans, ſtruck terror into almoſt all the other Greeks; wherefore the Achæans, Bœotians, Eubœans, Epirotes, and Acarnanians implored his help, for all which he provided as well as he might, and ſent a party to defend Preparethus the Iſland, at which he heard that Attalus coming into Europe, arrived, being choſen by the Ætolians their Commander in Chief. Scopas the Ætolian hearing he was gone into Thrace, invaded Acarnania, the Inhabitants whereof conveying away their Wives, children, and Aged into Epyrus, vowed never to return except as Conquerors, reſolving never to be again enſlaved under the Ætolians. This the Enemy hearing, was ſomething amazed at their reſolution, and then knowing of Philip his coming, returned home, and he when he heard they had ſo done, returned alſo unto Pella. The year after he ſuccoured the Achæans ſore moleſted by Machanidas Tyrant of Sparta, and the Ætoliaus, and went againſt Lamia, a City of the Ætolians, who coming out to meet him, he overthrew them in two ſeveral ingagements, after which they ſhutting up themſelves in the Town, he drew down his Army to Phalara a Maritime City of Theſſaly, whither Ambaſſadors came from Ptolomy, the Rhodians, Chians, and Athenians, to compoſe the difference betwixt him and them. Though not ſo much out of love to the Ætolians, as for fear that Philip and his Kingdom ſhould grow too great, and become burdenſome to the liberty of Greece. The Treaty was put off to the meeting of the States-General of the Achæans, and a Truce made in the mean time for thirty dayes.

The Ætolians refuſe peace.

Philip again worſted by the Romans at Elis.

A. M. 3796.
Ol. 142. ann. 4.
V. C. 545.
Antioch. M. 15.
Ptolom. Philop. 14.

34. It was alſo begun with this deſign, to keep Attalus, or the Romans, from coming into Greece; but the Ætolians obſerving the Term of the Truce almoſt to be expired, and hearing that Attalus was come to Ægina, and the Roman Navy to Naupactus, hindred the concluſion; firſt complaining of ſome things done during the Truce, and then plainly refuſing to agree, except the Achæans would reſtore Pylas to the Meſſenians, and except the Romans, Athamanians, Scerdilaidas, and Pluratus were included in the peace. Philip holding it an unſeemly thing that thoſe who had the worſt of it in the War ſhould give Laws to the other, broke up the meeting, and leavying 4000 men for a defence to the Achæans, went to Argos. In the mean while P. Sulpicius coming with the Roman Fleet from Naupactus, landed betwixt Corinth and Sicyon, and waſted the Countrey; but Philip lighting upon his men drove them to their ſhips, and then going to Dymæ, caſt out thence the Garriſon of the Ætolians, called thither by the Eleans. Their Territories he alſo waſted (Cycliadas the General of the Achæans having united his Forces with his) and then went againſt the City Elis it ſelf. It hapned that Sulpicius was ſecretly got in thither with four thouſand men, which ſtruck a terrour into the beſiegers as ſoon as they eſpied the Roman colours, and Philip would fain have drawn off his men; but a skirmiſh being begun he was forced to charge the Roman Cohort with his horſe-men. His own horſe being ſhot under him, a ſharp conflict followed about his perſon now on foot, but he was reſcued by his followers, and mounting another fled away. Then pitched he his Tents five miles from Elis, and the next day marching to Pyrgus a Caſtle not far off, there took a multitude of Countrey people, which with their Cattel had fled thither for protection; but as he was dividing the plunder, a Meſſenger came out of Macedonia, and informed him, that a certain man of the Æropians had taken Lychnidus, and was raiſing the Dardanians; wherefore leaving two thouſand five hundred men under Government of Menippus and Polyphas, for a Guard to the Achæans, away he marched into Theſſaly, where he heard the Dardanians had invaded his Kingdom, and that he was reported to be ſlain. After his departure Sulpicius went and wint'red at Ægina with Attalus, and the Achæans fought proſperouſly againſt their Enemies.

His acts in Greece.

Livius lib. 28.

35. The year after, P. Sulpicius Galba the Proconſul, and Attalus departing from Ægina, with their Navies joyned together (which made up fifty ſayl) came into Æubœa, and there took Oreus through the treachery of Plator the Governour. Philip now being at Demetrias, great complaints came to him of the Ætolians, who being very high, troubled grievouſly the Aſſociates; the Achæans moreover being moleſted again by Machanidas Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and deſiring aid, he diſmiſſed the Meſſengers with promiſe to provide for the ſafety of all as near as he could, and appointed fires to be made on the tops of the Mountains, with a Watch-Tower, to give him warning if the Enemy invaded the Sea-Coaſts. The fires upon the coming of the Navy to Oreus were by the cunning of Plator made too late; but upon the ſign given he haſted with his Army (having beaten off the Ætolians who oppoſed him at the Straights of Thermopylæ) and came to Elatea a Town in Phocis. Attalus at this time, and the Proconſul having attempted Chalcis to no purpoſe, came to Opus, which being taken, the Kings Soldiers were to have the plunder of it, as the Romans had before of Oreus. Here he ſtaying too long to gather money, was almoſt ſurpriſed by Philip, and haſting to his Ships, had not got all his men aboard before he fell upon him; then departing to Oreus, he there received news that Pruſias King of Bithinia had invaded his Kingdom, ſo that he preſently returned home, and Sulpicius to Ægina. Philip chiding the Opuntians for yielding ſo ſoon, went, and took Thronium inhabited by them of Thebes Pthiotick, who being outed thence by him 8 years before, as we ſaid, the Ætolians had given them this Town to dwell in. After this returning to Elatia (where the Ambaſſadors of Ptolomy and the Rhodians ſtayed his coming to move him again about the peace) and hearing that Machanidas had determined to ſet upon the Eleans, he reſolved to prevent him. Machanidas hearing of his coming, retreated preſently to Sparta, and then went he to Ægium to the general Council of the Achæans, to whom he reſtored Heræa and Triphylia; and Aliphera to the Megalapolitans. He made ſome depredations upon the Ætolians, then returned to Oreus, and ſo to Demetrias, where he gave order for making of Ships; (things being quiet there after the departure of Attalus) and ſo into his own Kingdom againſt the Dardanians.

Idem lib. 29.

The Ætolians forced to make a peace with him.

36. The two years following, little or nothing was done by the Romans in Greece, ſo that the Ætolians being deſtitute of their aid (in which they moſt confided) were forc'd to make a Peace with him on his own terms. Scarce was it concluded, when Publius Sempronius the Proconſul was ſent to ſucceed Sulpicius (who careleſly managed his affairs) with ten thouſand Foot, one thouſand Horſe, and 35 Gallies, who coming to Dyrrhachium raiſed the Parthini, and ſet upon Damallum. Coming a little after to Apollonia, Philip having received the news of his arrival, marched down thither, and would have given him battel, but the Proconſul refuſing it, and he not daring to attempt the Town, as alſo becauſe he was now inclinable alſo to Peace, he returned again into his own Kingdom. Not long after the Epirotes bearing alſo the ſame mind, ſent to him, deſiring he would think of Peace, which they deſpaired not of, ſo he and Sempronius would but meet together. He condeſcended to go down into Epirus, and then came to an interview with the Proconſul at Phœnice, together with Aminander King of the Athamanians, and the Deputies of the Epirotes and Acarnanians, where it was agreed that the Parthini, the Cities Dimalum, Bargulum, and Eugenium, ſhould fall to the ſhare of the Romans, and the Atintanæ (becauſe they had deſired it from the Senate at Rome*) to* Philip: in the confederacy were included on the Kings part, Pruſias King of Bithinia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Theſſalonians, Acarnanians, and Epirotes, and on the Roman, the Inhabitants of Ilium, King Attalus, Plearatus, the Eleans, Meſſenians, and Athenians with Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, and ſucceſſor of Machanidas, ſlain in battel by Philopomenes, who now had begun to defend his Country from the Lacedæmonians and others. A truce was made for two moneths, to have the conſent of the People of Rome, who now having turned the War into Africk upon the Carthaginians, were glad to free themſelves from all other troubles, and therefore the Peace was confirmed by the ſuffrages of all the Tribes.

A general peace made betwixt him, the Romans, and others.

Polybius l. 11. excerpt. 7.

Plutarch in Philopomene.

37. But Philip's mind was ſo inured to action, that he could not but make himſelf work; for perceiving Philopomenes (now Prætor the ſecond time of the Achæans) to be in great reſpect for his Military skill and valour, he ſent to murder him at Megalopolis, which being diſcovered, he deſervedly incurred the diſpleaſure of all Greece. He kept ſome correſpondence (together with Antiochus the Great) with Ptolomy Philopater, when living; but after his death, they two conſulted together to deprive his young Son of his Kingdom, and might well have done it, (eſpecially ſeeing the Ægyptian Court was much vexed by the diſcord of the great ones) had they not both been diverted by the Romans, and puniſhed juſtly, as Polybius obſerveth. And though he had been reconciled to the Ætolians, and uſed them as his friends and allies, yet now without any pretence did he withdraw Lyſimachia from their ſociety, and

He incurreth odium ſeveral wayes.

Lib. 5. excerpt. 20. c. 1.

And having other enemies and joyned it to himſelf, after that Chalcedon; and to gratifie his Son in Law Pruſias of Bithinia, enſlaved the City of the Ciani, though the Ætolians had ſent them a Captain who commanded in chief, which cruelty ſo incenſed the Rhodians, as ever after they became his Enemies, and joyned with Attalus King of Aſia againſt him. Very ſtoutly did he deal with theſe his adverſaries, never being diſcouraged by any bad ſucceſs. He had the worſt of it in a battel at Sea near Chius, but driving Attalus on Land, and taking his Ship (though he had never loſt ſo many men in any battel whatever before) he aſcribed the Victory to himſelf. For all this War in which he was imployed by two powerful adverſaries, yet feared he not to undertake another with the People of Rome, which now a few moneths after the end of the ſecond Punick was decreed againſt him, about fourteen years after his entring into confederacy with Hannibal, of his own reign the 23, and the firſt of the 145 Olympiad. A. M. 3805.

Ibid. c. 2.

He ingageth againſt the Romans.

A. M. 3805.
Ol. 145. an. 1.
V. C. 554.
Ant. M. 24.
Ptol. Epiph. 4.

38. For though there had been a peace made, yet it was conceived he had broken it by his moleſting the Ætolians, and other aſſociates, and of late by ſending aid to Annibal in Africk, and the Carthaginians: The Athenians by their Ambaſſadors alſo called upon the Senate for help, whoſe Territories he had waſted, and forced them up into the City. The occaſion of the War betwixt him and them was from the Acarnanians; for two young men of that Nation coming to Athens, chanced to go into the Temple of Ceres with the other company at the Feaſt, being not initiated, and for that reaſon were put to death, as having committed an unpardonable offence, though ignorantly they did it; now this the Athamanians took ſo to heart, as they procured Philip to make War upon them. At the ſame time were come to Rome Ambaſſadors alſo from Attalus, and the Rhodians, complaining that the Cities of Aſia were alſo moleſted by him; ſo that now having little to do after the ending of the ſecond Punick War, the Senate unanimouſly made a Decree, by virtue whereof Marcus Levinus the Vice-prætor was ſent into Macedonia with thirty eight Ships brought out of Sicily by Cn. Octavius: afterwards came news further that he was about to take Athens, and then it being propoſed to the People, the War (through the perſwaſion of Publius Sulpicius Galba the Conſul, to whom it fell by lot) was decreed againſt him. He had not beſieged that City himſelf, but, ſending down Philocles one of his Captains thither, went and ſubdued the Cherſoneſus of Thrace. Onely the Inhabitants of Abydus ſtood out againſt him, and that with ſuch reſolution, as following the example of the Saguntines in Spain, they fought it out to the laſt, and made an end of themſelves, after he had denied to receive them upon any other terms than yielding to mercy. Yet Attalus and the Rhodians might have relieved them had they not loitered, Vide Livium lib. 31.

The grounds of the War on the Roman part.

Idem ibid. & Polyb. excerpt. lib. 16.

39. Sulpicius the Conſul coming to Apollonia, upon the deſire of the Athenians, ſent C. Claudius Cento with twenty Ships out of the Fleet which lay at Corcyra, furniſhed with Soldiers, to relieve their City. He hearing that Chalcis was badly looked to, though fortified with a Garriſon of the Macedonians, went thither, took it with eaſe, then plundering it ſet it on fire, and returned to the Piræus, or Haven of Athens. Philip was now come down to Demetrias, where hearing this news he paſſed over Euripus on a bridge, and through Bœotia haſted to Athens, thinking to ſurprize the Town; but the Inhabitants having got notice of his coming, ſtood upon their guard, and then he perceiving his craft failed him, betook himſelf to force; but this being to no purpoſe (the Romans coming in, and the Soldiers of Attalus from Ægina) waſting all about the Town, and not ſparing ſo much as the Sepulchers, he went to Eleuſine thinking there to get the Temple and Caſtle into his power; but the guards being ſtrong, and the Navy coming to help from the Piræus, he marched thence to Megara, and ſo to Corinth. Hearing now that the Achæans were met at Argos, to conſult how to reſiſt Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, he went down thither, and came upon them unawares, and promiſed he would make War upon him, on condition they would but find him Soldiers to keep Oreus, Chalcis, and Corinth. His deſign was to ingage them in the War againſt the Romans, which they very well underſtood, and therefore Cycliades the Prætor anſwered, that it was not lawful to propoſe any other matter than that for which they were aſſembled, and ſo a Decree being made for raiſing an Army againſt Nabis, he broke up the meeting.

Livius ibid.

Philip's fruitleſs Expedition againſt Athens.

40. Nothing yet was done by the Roman Conſul of himſelf, but encamping upon the River Apſus between Apollonia and Dyrrhachium, he ſent L. Apuſtius his Lieutenant with a party to harraſe the Enemies Country, who performed what he went about, taking divers Towns of Macedonia, and then returned with much booty.

He courteth the Ætolians.

But his bad ſucceſs againſt the Conſul maketh them joyn with the Romans.

booty. Philip being come home, made all proviſion poſſible for the War, and knowing the reſtleſsneſs of the Ætolians, for fear they might ſide with the Romans, (which yet they had not done) ſent his Ambaſſadors to the general meeting of them called the Panetolium, whither came alſo L. Furius Purpureo, ſent from the Conſul, and others from the Athenians. The Macedonian being firſt heard, adviſed them to remain in their ſociety with him; the Athenians inveyed bitterly againſt Philip, as having broken the Laws of humanity and Religion, in violating their Sepulchers, and Temple; then Purpureo ſheweth how the Romans had undertaken the War for them, though they formerly made Peace without them, and now how good an occaſion was offered them of being reſtored into their friendſhip and ſociety, except they would rather periſh with Philip. This inclined all their minds towards the Romans; but Democritus the Prætor thought the buſineſs was to be put off to the next Council. But not long after Philip fought twice with the Conſul, and that ſo unproſperouſly, as he had like to have been taken himſelf, and then they imbraced the ſociety of the Romans, and invading Macedonia, took and burnt Cercinium, after which going into Perrhæbia, Philip ſet upon them at unawares, and killing many, forced the reſt to flie for their ſafety under the conduct of Aminander into their own Country. This year the Roman Navy joyning to that of Attalus and the Rhodians, took the Iſland Andrus, and Oreus, the City we have often ſpoke of, in Eubœa.

Livius l. 32.

Tappulus the Conſul doth nothing.

Flamininus ſucceedeth,

With whom Philip hath a fruitleſs treaty.

41. Philip taking all care poſſible for the managing of his affaires, the next Spring ſent down his Auxiliaries and others through Epirus into Chaonia, to ſeize upon the Straights near Antigonia, and he himſelf following after with the ſtrength of his Army, fortified the Vally betwixt the Mountains, through which the River Aous runneth; Athenagoras his Lieutenant he commanded to look to the Mountain Aſnaus, and he himſelf pitched his Tents upon the Hill Æropus. To Sulpicius the Conſul ſucceeded P. Villius Tappulus, who coming late did nothing at all, for leading towards the Enemy, he with a few went to view the Moors, through which his neareſt way lay to him, and conſulting many dayes whether he ſhould paſs that way, or take the ſame Sulpicius went into Macedonia, before he could determine, news came to him, that his Succeſſor was already come to Corcyra. This was T. Quintius Flamininus, created Conſul ere he was thirty years old, who falling, this Province came ſooner then uſual, bringing over with him eight thouſand Foot, and eight hundred Horſe. Being arrived at the Camp, after ſome conſultation, he determined to ſet upon Philip's Army in the place where it yet lay; but how to do it was hard to be reſolved, and forty dayes were ſpent in this deliberation, which time Philip was content to make an opportunity to look after Peace, and attempt the procurement of it through the Epirotes. They met at the River Aous (or Apſus) but the Conſul demanded things ſeeming ſo hard to the other, that he asked him if he would impoſe more hard conditions upon one conquered? and ſo withdrew himſelf from the conference.

And is beaten by him.

The Conſul taketh in ſeveral places in Theſſaly.

42. The next day followed ſome light Skirmiſhes, neither part receiving either much good or dammage, but as they continued in this condition, came a certain Shepheard, ſent by Charops Prince of the Epirotes, undertaking to lead the Romans through the Mountains an eaſie way, and bring them upon the Enemies back. The Conſul glad of this opportunity, ſent a party with him, and then gave an Alarm with the whole Army to the Camp, which the Macedonians received willingly enough, and both Armies being greedy of fighting, they marched out of their Trenches to receive the battel; but then thoſe on their backs ſetting up a ſhout, ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that ſome of them ran away, others by reaſon of the difficulty of the place for fight were compaſſed in, and two thouſand ſlain. The King fled amain till he came five miles off, and then rallying his men upon an hill, with a great company went into Theſſaly. Where waſting divers Towns to deprive the Enemy of Proviſions, het hence paſſed into Macedonia. The Conſul following him into Theſſaly, laboured to get the good will of the Epirotes, and called to him Aminander King of the Athamanians to conduct him on his way; then took he Phaleria (where were in Garriſon two thouſand Macedonians) which he plundered and burnt, at which alſo others being affrighted yielded themſelves, and Philip not daring to oppoſe, but keeping within Tempe, ſent relief upon occaſion to ſuch places as wanted. At Rhaga the Conſul found ſuch oppoſition as he raiſed his ſiege, but thence departing took in divers Cities of Phocis, and beſieged Elatea, during which things the Navy under the conduct of L. Quintius his Brother, in Conjunction with Attalus and the Rhodians, took two of the moſt conſiderable of Eubœa, and then prepared to venture for Corinth; but by the Conſul's advice, they firſt ſent to the Achæans to ſee if they might draw them from Philip to their own party.

Towns

The Achæans joyn with the Roman party.

Another Treaty.

Polybius excerpt. è lib. 17.

43. Ariſtænus or Ariſtinetus (as he is called by Polybius) their Prætor, laboured to perſwade them by all means to imbrace the ſociety of the Romans, at which the Dymæans and Megalopolitans out of diſtaſte went out of the Council, as unwilling thus to betray Philip, and the reſt unanimouſly entered into Alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians, and for that they could not do as much with the Romans without conſent of the People at Rome, put it off onely till they might ſend their Ambaſſadors thither, and Decreed at the preſent to diſpatch away three to Lucius Quintius, and their Army alſo to Corinth before which he now lay. The Town was ſtoutly defended by the Inhabitants, and Androſthenes the Governour for the King, till ſuch time as Philocles came with 1500 freſh men to their relief, after which it ſeemed beſt both to Attalus and Quintius to raiſe their ſiege, and then Philocles had Argos betrayed to him. The Conſul in this mean time got Elatea, and then taking up his Winter quarters, news came that the Opuntians were at odds amongſt themſelves, ſome calling the Ætolians, and ſome the Romans, deſirous to give up their City to them. The ſtronger and richer part called the Conſul, but the Caſtle was ſtill held by the Macedonians, who could not be got out by any fair words or foul, and when it ſhould have been ſtormed came an Herauld from Philip, deſiring a time and place might be ſet for a meeting to treat again of Peace, which being granted, they met in the Bay near Nice at the day appointed, where Philip would not come aſhore, for fear as he pretended of the Ætolians. Much talk there was on both ſides, the treaty being put off from one day to another; but it being required of the King to quit all Greece, he refuſed to do it, having a great deſire to keep Corinth, Chalcis and Demetrias; and then at his requeſt he had leave given him to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Senate, and a Truce was made for two moneths.

He ſendeth Ambaſſadors to Rome,

44. The Greeks ſent their Ambaſſadors alſo, and all came to Rome, when the debate was about the Provinces of the new Conſuls, whether one of them ſhould have Macedonia, according to the cuſtom, or both ſtay, and carry on the War againſt the Gaules then depending: for the Tribunes of the people oppoſed the cuſtom, alledging that the reaſon why Wars were ſo lengthned was becauſe there was every year a new General according to the ſucceſſion of the Conſuls. This being referred to the Senate, it was thought fit to continue the Command to Quintius, and then had all the Ambaſſadors audience. The Greeks inveighed ſore againſt Philip, and earneſtly laboured that he ſhould not be allowed to hold Chalcis, Corinth, and Demetrias, for otherwiſe Greece could have no thoughts of liberty. They alledged it to his own ſaying, that theſe three were the Fetters of Greece, and that not without reaſon; for if he held Corinth, Peloponneſus could have no breathing time: if Chalcis, the Locrians, Bœotians, and Phocians durſt not mutter; and if Demetrias, the Theſſalians, and Magnetes ſhould not be able as much as to taſte of liberty: ſeeing therefore he pretended to be willing to quit all other places, this was but a ſhift for the preſent, ſeeing if he was maſter of theſe places he might recover what he had before; therefore they deſired he might either relinquiſh them or that the War might be carried on, ſeeing the greateſt part of it was finiſhed already. The Kings Ambaſſadors beginning a long Oration, were interrupted at the firſt, and asked whether their Maſter would be willing to leave the three Cities: they anſwered they had no Commiſſion to anſwer any thing to that point: and ſo being chidden by the Fathers they made an end, and the affairs of Greece were again left to the management of Quintius.

To no effect.

Livius ut ſupra.

Polybius excerpt. è lib. 17.

45. Philip ſeeing how things went, wrote to Philocles to deliver up Argos to Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, on condition if he proſpered he ſhould again reſtore it to him; but he preſently after his getting into the Town, ſent word to Quintius, who giving him a meeting, deſired he would make peace with the Achæans, and ſend aid againſt the King; the later of which he promiſed to perform, and as for the peace, granted a Truce for four moneths. Philip ſhortly after came down again into Theſſaly (it being no policy at all to expect the Enemy in his own Kingdom) which Quintius underſtanding marched thither, where wandring after each other, they both at length in a thick miſt came near to ſome Hills, from the likeneſs of the heads of Dogs, called Cynoſcephalæ. Here both their foreguard fixing came to the diſcovery of each other, and from the skirmiſhing, and ingagement of them, to a ſet battel, though the King at firſt did not intend it. The victory ſeemed at the

Is overthrown at Cynoſcephale

A. M. 3808. Ol. 145. ann. 4. V. C. 557. Antioch. Mag. 27. Ptolom. Epiphanis 7.

beginning to incline towards the Macedonians in one Wing; but the other being overpowred, they both at length were overthrown by the skill and valour of the Romans, eight thouſand periſhing, and five thouſand being taken priſoners: Of the Romans 700 were ſlain. Philip, when he ſaw how things went, fled towards Tempe; at the entry of which he ſtayed for ſuch as had eſcaped, and then paſſed through that Countrey into Macedonia. The Romans coming to plunder the Enemies Camp, found the Ætolians got thither before them, at which they ſore repined, and grumbled at their General, as if he expoſed them to danger, and granted the prey to others. Flaminius was ſore diſpleaſed to ſee the greedineſs of the Ætolians after Prey; and as this gave occaſion to that hatred, which afterwards manifeſted it ſelf, ſo it made him the more willing to agree with the Enemy, that he might not leave them maſters of Greece

Idem excerpt. Legation. 6.

46. Philip ſent preſently to the Roman General to deſire another Treaty about a peace, who receiving them in a Council of Officers, without calling the Ætolians, uſed them very reſpectively, and preſently granted a Truce for fifteen dayes. This ſeeming ſtrange to the Ætolians, they preſently concluded he was bribed to it by Philip, not accounting better of others than according to their own covetous humour; But he being diſpleaſed with them, not onely for the matter of the plunder, but alſo for that they gave out ſleighting words of the Roman valour (attributing the good ſucceſs to themſelves) hearing alſo that Antiochus King of Aſia was coming towards Europe, and ſo fearing Philip might joyn with him, and then a new Conſul coming might take the glory of concluding the War away from himſelf, he reſolved to make an end of the difference, and appointed a day and place to meet at, to which he ſummoned the Allies. Being met together he willed them to declare their minds concerning the peace, on what terms they would have it made. Aminander very modeſtly deſired Proviſions might be made for him, elſe he was like to undergo the malice of Philip, who would be able preſently to cruſh him. The Ætolians were point blank againſt the peace, ſaying, all would prove fruitleſs, except the Macedonian were outed his Kingdom, and that Quintius, except he did it, would neither anſwer the expectations of Greece, nor of thoſe that ſent him; to which he replied, that it was not the cuſtom of the People at Rome utterly to undo at once thoſe with whom they Warred, and that the liberty of Greece would better be provided for by the ſtanding of the Macedonian Kingdom, ſo weakned as it was like to be, than by the deſtruction of it; ſeeing then it would be obnoxious to the invaſion of the Thracians and Gauls. The day after arrived Philip himſelf, and the next, coming into a full Council there, very wiſely allayed the heats of all parties againſt him, offering to ratifie the former demands of the Romans, and for the reſt to ſubmit himſelf to the pleaſure of the Senate. Therefore four months Truce was granted to him, according to his deſire, and paying to Quintius four hundred Talents in ready money, and giving up Demetrius his Son, and others for Hoſtages, he had leave to ſend to Rome about the concluſion; but with this caution, that if the buſineſs ſhould not ſucceed, he was to have the Hoſtages and Money returned back unto him.

Obtaineth a Truce, and ſending again to Rome,

Procureth peace.

Idem excerpt. Legation. l. 7. & 9.

47. Both Senate and People admitted of peace, though Marcellus the new Conſul laboured againſt it, out of deſire to be ſent into Macedonia. Philip was enjoyned, beſides the ſetting of all Greece at liberty, before the celebration of the Iſthmian Games; to reſtore all Captives and Renegadoes; to give up all his covered Gallies except five, and one with ſixteen Oares on a ſide; to pay one thouſand Talents, half at preſent, and the other half in the ſpace of ten years, at ſo many payments. Into Greece were ſent ten men of the Chief, with whom Flamininus was joyned in commiſſion, to compoſe affairs, and reſtore liberty to the ſeveral States thereof, which exceedingly affected all with joy, except the Ætolians, who carped at the Decree, and affirmed that Greece had only changed its Lords; ſeeing the Romans had Corinth, Demetrias, and Chalcis. When the Commiſſioners came to ſit, ſome controverſie indeed aroſe about theſe Towns; for they having it in expreſs charge to ſet all others at liberty, theſe were left to their diſcretion becauſe of Antiochus, who, as all men thought, had intentions to attempt ſomething upon Europe: therefore Flamininus perſwaded them to give up Corinth into the hands of the Achæans, and keep that Caſtle, Demetrias and Chalcis in their own power. Then going to the ſolemnity of the Iſthmian Games he there pronounced liberty, in that great audience, unto all Greece, which ſo affected the hearers, as with admiration of the thing they were ſcarce themſelves.

Livius lib. 39

48. During the War between the Romans and Antiochus, which ſhortly followed, lowed, Philip behaved himſelf ſuitably enough to the expectation of the Conquerors: afterwards conſidering, and comparing his preſent condition with his former, he grew ſomething impatient, and eſpecially amongſt other things, this vexed him, that power of animadverting upon thoſe Macedonians who had revolted in the War, was taken from him; for after that Antiochus was overcome, and the War with the Ætolians was now in hand, Acilius the Conſul taking Heraclea, and Philip beſieging Lamia, when he was in a fair way of taking it, he was commanded to depart from it, that ſo it might be ſurrendered to the other. Acilius to pacifie him, gave him leave to make War upon Athamania, and to recover the Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Theſſalians; ſo that he preſently drove out Aminander from Athamania, recovered divers Cities, amongſt which was Demetrias, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the Countrey of the Magnetes, and ſome Cities in Thrace alſo. This pacified him for the preſent, yet did he not let fall his indignation, but in time of peace made all proviſion poſſible for another War, increaſing his Revenues not onely by Cuſtoms, but by renewing the works of the Mines, and digging others, as alſo taking care for encreaſing the number of his people now exhauſted. Whileſt he thus imployed himſelf, there wanted not an occaſion to inflame his mind anew; for the Theſſalians and Athamanians ſent to Rome to complain of him; Eumenes alſo about the Cities of Thrace. The Senate not being willing to judge the matter in his abſence, ſent three Commiſſioners into Greece to hear and determine it, who ſitting, and hearing all parties as Arbitrators, were ſomething provoked by ſome words he uttered, affirming, that as yet the Sun of all the dayes he had to live was not ſet: and all being heard, they Decreed he ſhould withdraw his Guards from all the Greek Cities, and that the Kingdom of Macedonia ſhould be terminated by its ancient limits. As for the Cities of Thrace, much being alledged pro and con, betwixt him and Eumenes; they kept the middle way, reſerving the deciſion of that to the Senate, and ordered in the mean time that his Garriſon-Soldiers ſhould be drawn out of them. The Senate reſolved he ſhould quit them, and all the Maritime Coaſts of Thrace; ſo that now being ſufficiently incenſed, he wanted but convenient Forces to make him revolt.

His diſſatisfaction after the War.

49. Being commanded to quit Ænus and Maronea, with all the Sea Coaſts of Thrace, he procured the principal of the Maronites who were ſtrongly bent againſt him, to be murdered in the night, and then the Romans complaining of it as an unworthy deed, he denied it, and when Onomaſtus and Caſſander the inſtruments of the fact were required to be ſent to Rome, the latter he gave way for to go, but then (it's thought) procured him to be poyſoned in the way, leſt he ſhould tell tales; and as yet his affairs not being ripe for a revolt, he ſent Demetrius his younger ſon to Rome, to purge himſelf, and deprecate the diſpleaſure of the Senate. Underhand he ſollicited the inhabitants upon the River Iſter to break into Italy. Demetrius had got heretofore ſo much good-will at Rome, as coming to have audience in the Senate, though he was abaſhed at that preſence, and the heavy loads of imputations laid upon his Father by the Ambaſſadors of his Enemies, Yet were his Fathers faults paſſed over at this time for his ſake, and ſo much ſignified to Philip by Q. Marcius, ſent into Macedonia to ſee whether he had done all that was injoyned him. Then did he quit all the Cities of Thrace inhabited by the Greeks, and performed all other things which the Romans required, that he might not give any ſuſpition, but get leiſure to provide for the intended War. With Demetrius his ſon he was not well pleaſed, for that the Senate making no account of himſelf, had given him the credit of deſerving only favour; but eſpecially Perſeus his elder ſon conceived great indignation and malice againſt him, not only for the credit he had at Rome, but being jealous he might deprive him thereby of his Father's Kingdom. Indeed the Macedonians looking upon Demetrius as one to whom they were obliged for ſaving them harmleſs from the Romans, deſigned the ſucceſſion to him, whom alſo they held legitimate, but not Perſeus, whoſe mother was no better than his Father's Concubine.

He is diſpleaſed at the favour of the Romans towards his younger ſon Demetrius.

50. Perſeus growing more and more ſenſible of the favour his brother was in both with the Romans and Macedonians, bent his mind to bring him into the jealouſie and hatred of his Father, and thereby to work his deſtruction. His viſit in way of merriment and jollity to him he repreſents as an opportunity taken to make him away, whereby the young man is called for by his angry Father, and is forced with tears to make an apology, to which credit is hardly enough given, ſuſpitions and jealouſies getting ground. At length Perſeus accuſeth him of having dealt with them at Rome underhand about the Kingdom and place of his Father, who ſends two

Which advantage Perſeus his eldeſt ſon improveth, thither to enquire of it, but ſuch as were Perſeus his creatures and partners in the plot. Philip having a mind to go up to the top of the Mountain Hæmus, for to have a view and proſpect of the Country round about, took with him his eldeſt, and ſendeth his youngeſt into Macedonia to look unto it, with whom he ſent one Didas Governour of Pæonia with a ſmall guard. He being alſo one of Perſeus his Complices, he gave him in charge to inſinuate into him, and thereby get out his moſt inward intentions, which he eaſily did, the poor young man being reſolved to flie to the Romans for ſhelter, and deſirous to uſe his help therein. This is preſently made known to Perſeus, and by him with improvement to Philip, who having wearied himſelf and Soldiers to little purpoſe, and being troubled with this report, returneth home, caſts Herodotus, Demetrius his chiefeſt friend into Priſon, and cauſeth him alſo to be narrowly looked to. Some moneths remained the King thus exceedinly troubled and anxious in himſelf till the Ambaſſadors returning from Rome, put an end within a ſhort time to his reſolutions.

Livie lib. 40.

And compaſſeth his brothers death by falſe accuſations.

51. Theſe men being returned, feigned grievous accuſations againſt Demetrius, and amongſt the reſt brought counterfeited letters as from Quintius, wherein he begs pardon of the King, if the young man had dealt with him in any kind out of his deſire to the Kingdom, but promiſeth he will do nothing againſt any one that belongs to him, for that he would not be accounted for the time to come, the author of any evil purpoſe. Credit being given hereunto, Herodotus is racked to death, confeſſing nothing, and Demetrius being again accuſed by his brother of intended flight, is deſtined to die, though for fear of giving any offence to the Romans, and diſcovering his intentions againſt them, it's reſolved to be done cunningly. Being ſent to Æſtræum a Town of Pæonia, and thence called to Heraclea, he is there firſt poyſoned by Didas, crying out againſt the cruelty of his Father, the parricide of his Brother, and wickedneſs of Didas. Being tormented with the working of the Poyſon, two luſty Ruffians were let into the room, who ſtifled him with the Tapeſtry, and ſo the innocent young man was murdered. His Father within a year or two fell into a ſad melancholy for the loſs of him, which being perceived by one Antigonus the ſon of Echecrates, and Nephew alſo to Antigonus who was Philips Father, he having been alwayes a faithful friend to the King, laboured to diſcover to him the whole device, and brought to him one Xyetius, who was privy to the whole deſign. He laid open the ſeries of all things to him. Hereupon Philocles one of the Ambaſſadors that were ſent to Rome being preſent, was put to death: Apelles the other, hearing the buſineſs was come out, fled into Italy, Perſeus onely kept him out of ſight, but his Father intending to fruſtrate his expectations of the Kingdom, which he ſo wickedly ſought after, declared Antigonus his heir and ſucceſſor, ſaying, he had rather his Kingdom ſhould be deſtroyed, than ever come into the hands of Perſeus. Not long after being ſpent with extreme grief and melancholy, and having commended Antigonus to the States of Macedonia, and uttered many a bitter curſe againſt Perſeus, he died at Amphipolis, after he had reigned 44 years. A. M. 3826, the ſecond of the 150 Olympiad, 146 years after the death of Alexander the Great.

A. M. 3824.
Ol. 149. an. 4.
V. C. 572.
Seleuci. Philop. 6.
Ptolom. Epiph. 22.

The device is diſcovered,

Whereat Philip laboureth to diſinherit Perſeus and dieth of Melancholy.

A. M. 3826.
Ol. 150. an. 2.
V. C. 575.
Seleuci. Philop. 9.
Ptol. Philom. 2.

Yet Perſeus getteth the Kingdom, and reſolveth to renew the War with the Romans.

52. Had Philip lived a little longer, Antigonus had got poſſeſſion of the Kingdom by his means; but things being not now ripe, he loſt it by the procurement of the Kings Phyſician, who when he ſaw there was no hopes of life, ſent and acquainted Perſeus with it, and kept cloſe his death till his arrival, ſo that then having opportunity to oppreſs his Enemies not once thinking of it, he obtained the Kingdom. Being a little ſetled therein, he cauſed Antigonus to be ſlain, and then ſent to Rome to renew the League made with his Father, and to deſire that he might be owned as King, doing this only to ſecure himſelf for the preſent, and intending as ſoon as his affairs would permit, to make uſe of the preparation his Father had made for another War; as it afterwards proved. His Father a little before his death had prevailed with the Baſtarnæ, who lived near the River Iſter, to leave their ancient ſeat, and come and live in the Countrey of the Dardanians, which he intended to give unto them, that there leaving their Wives and Children, they might together with the Scordiſci (who being ſome of thoſe Galls that invaded Thrace, had ſeated themſelves at the meeting of Danubius and Sabus, and ſo called themſelves) invade Italy. They re-entred Thrace again with quietneſs, but after Philips death falling out with the Inhabitants, and purſuing them to the Mountains, they were ſet upon with ſuch a Tempeſt as ſeized on the Galls at Delphi, and being preſſed alſo by the Thracians, onely thirty thouſand got into Dardania, the reſt of the Multidude returning back beyond Danubius. Thoſe that arrived in Dardania now did Perſeus

Livius lib. 41.

ſtir up againſt the Inhabitants as much as poſſible, which being diſtaſteful to the Romans, their Ambaſſadors alſo returning from Carthage, reported to the Senate that he held intelligence with them there; for his Ambaſſadors had private audience of them by night, and others were ſent by them into Macedonia.

Livius lib. 41.

53. About this time ſome of the Dolopians refuſing to obey him, and willing to ſubmit their cauſe to the Roman Senate, he went down, and by force brought all their Countrey into his power; he laboured then to curry favour with ſeveral Cities of Achaia and Theſſaly in his paſſage, and either ſent or wrote to ſeveral others in Greece; deſiring them that an end might be put to the ancient grudges betwixt his Father and them; the Achæans eſpecially. The Roman Senate upon the report of the ſtirs in Dardania, ſent three to ſee how matters went, but he refuſed to ſee them; it being alleged ſometimes that he was abſent, and otherwhiles that he was ſick; but it clearly appeared to them that he was providing for the War, and ſo much the more, for that the Ætolians were now ſo ſeditious, as though their commiſſions gave them power to take up the differences amongſt them, yet could they not prevail by their authority. Indeed now he was better provided to make War than the Romans to reſiſt, having thirty thouſand Foot, with five thouſand Horſe, in a readineſs, and proviſions too for ten years. Thrace was at Peace with him, and though he was ſo infamous for his cruelty, not onely in reſpect of his brother's death, but alſo the killing of Apelles, whom he uſed as an inſtrument in that buſineſs, and alſo for making away his Wife, and upon other accounts, yet either out of reverence to the Court of Macedonia, or by reaſon of their emulation againſt the Romans, were both the Greeks and Aſiaticks generally more favourable to him than to Eumenes the King of Pergamus, though of a clean contrary diſpoſition. Eumenes himſelf came to Rome to complain againſt him; to anſwer to whoſe accuſations he ſent Ambaſſadors, and with them the Rhodians, who inclined to his ſide, and as Eumenes returned home, he moſt baſely ſent ſome to murder him, whom though that King eſcaped as to his life, yet was he ſore wounded in the ſtraight paſſage to the Temple at Delphi: This as it loſt Perſeus much with his friends, ſo it made him be the ſooner declared an Enemy by the Romans.

His bad carriage towards Eumenes maketh him the ſooner be declared an Enemy.

54. It was thought good that ſome forces ſhould be raiſed to be in a readineſs, and that certain Commiſſioners ſhould be ſent into Greece to retain the States in their fidelity, with Soldiers alſo to put into ſuch places as wanted. He perceiving their reſolutions, began to repent himſelf and procured a truce, that he might ſend Ambaſſadors to Rome, the Commiſſioners giving way to it, for that they knew him in a good poſture for War, and themſelves unprovided as yet; but the Senate for all this would not grant him Peace, his faults being ſo aggravated againſt him, that the War was denounced. P. Licinius Craſſus the Conſul being ſent againſt him, he had the better of it in an ingagement; but yet his heart failed him, ſo contrary to his former humour, as that then he ſent and deſired Peace, offering to perform all his Father was tied to; but had anſwer by the ſtout Romans, that on no other terms could it be granted, except he abſolutely referr himſelf and Kingdom to the courteſie of the Senate, and caſt all into their hands. After this he ſent to Genthius King of the Illyrians, to draw him to his party, having taken divers Towns from him, and might have done himſelf good thereby had he not been beſotted; for that Prince was inclinable enough to him, onely he ſaid, he wanted money, which though he had enough by him, yet neglected he to ſend. He laboured alſo to draw into his aid Cotys King of Thrace, and ſubdued again the Dardanians, but Quem vult Jupiter perdere, dementat prius. Q. Marcius Philippus coming againſt him, by reaſon of the difficulty of the wayes, and want of proviſions, might eaſily have been utterly defeated; but he cried out he was conquered, without fighting ran away, left the Streights open for his Enemy, ſent to Theſſalonica to burn his Ships, to Pella to caſt his treaſures into the Sea, and then being angry with the Meſſengers, the one for that he had not obeyed him, the other for that he had, he put them both to death, and recovering moſt of his treaſure, by thoſe that dived, out of the water, onely ſatisfied himſelf for this madneſs, by recovering Dius which had been taken by the Enemy.

Idem lib. 42. 43, 44.

He deſireth Peace which will not now be granted.

His conſternation of mind.

A. M. 3836.
Ol. 152. an. 4.
V. C. 585.
Ant. Epiphanis 8.
Ptol. Philom. 12.

55. L. Paulus Æmelius the Conſul was at length ſent againſt him, who found ſome difficulty at firſt to come at him, having incamped himſelf near the Sea under the mountain Olympus; but Scipio Naſica getting over a Rock led the way, and then Perſeus retired, and pitched his Tents near to Pydna. The Conſul was warie of ingaging with him (who now had an Army of thirty nine thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe) his own men being tired; but the night before the fight, the Moon being eclypſed, ſo terrified the Macedonians, that they accounted it to preſage the Livius ibid.

Plutarch in Æmilio.

ruine

He is overthrown,

Yieldeth himſelf, and dieth in cuſtody after two years.

ruine of their Kingdom, which made the Romans (to whom it was foretold on purpoſe) more eagerly to begin the fight. Cato ſon to M. Cato, and ſon in Law to the Conſul, behaved himſelf ſo ſtoutly, as this encouraged the reſt, and thereby he was the means to gain the victory. Of the Macedonians were ſlain twenty thouſand, and ſix thouſand taken; of the Conquerours but one hundred loſt their lives. Perſeus fled to Amphipolis, and finding there no relief, ſayled to Samothrace, where hoping to be ſecure in that ſanctuary, Cn. Octavius the Admiral being ſent after him, promiſed by the voice of a Crier ſafety and freedom to all that would come in, whereby he was forſaken of almoſt all his followers, and Ion of Theſſalonica gave up his young children into the hands of the Romans. He thought now of eſcaping to Crete; but, being left thus, gave up himſelf and eldeſt ſon to Octavius, when he had reigned eleven years; and after being led in Triumph by the Conſul was caſt into Priſon at Alba, where for ſeven dayes he lay in a moſt ſad condition, till through the importunity of Æmilius it was changed into a better. Two years he thus continued, and then through the deſire of life and liberty, encouraging himſelf in new and vain hopes, ended his dayes, ſome ſay through the barbarouſneſs of his Keepers, who would not ſuffer him to take any reſt, but others, by courſe of nature in free cuſtody, having his Funeral diſcharged at the publick coſt. Thus ended this Macedonian Kingdom, being changed into a free State through the ſeeming bounty of the Conquerours, A. M. 3837. the firſt of the 153 Olympiad, 156 years after the death of Alexander the Great.

CHAP. V.

The Aſian and Syrian Kingdom.

From the death of Seleucus, to the reducing of Syria into the form of a Roman Province by Pompey, containing the ſpace of two hundred and twenty years.

Plutarch. in Demetrio. Valerius Maximus lib. 5. cap. 7. Appianus in Syriacis.

Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus falling in love with his Father's wife hath her granted to him.

I. FOur or five years after the death of Caſſander, it hapned that Antiochus the eldeſt ſon of Seleucus fell in love with Stratonice, daughter to Demetrius (which woman we ſaid before that Seleucus married, after her father was overthrown, and beaten out of Aſia) and for that he was aſhamed to reveal his affection, pined away, and reſolved to ſtarve himſelf, had not his diſeaſe been diſcovered by Eraſiſtratus the Phyſician, by the changing of his countenance when ſhe came in or out, and by other tokens. Seleucus, who was ready to redeem his ſons life with his own blood, preſently gave him her to wife, though he had a Child by her; and that the buſineſs might ſeem to proceed of himſelf, calling his Army together, he declared it to be his pleaſure to make them two King and Queen of all the upper Countreys, having married them together; and that he thought his ſon, who had hitherto been obedient to him in all other things, would alſo herein be ruled by him; but if his wife ſhould diſtaſte ſo unuſual a thing, he deſired his friends to ſhew and perſwade her, that whatſoever the King ſhould think fit, and the affairs of State required, that ſhe ought to account of as juſt, and fitting. After this he took Demetrius her father, and impriſoned him in the Cherſoneſus of Syria, where he died, after three years as was before ſaid, and within a year after his death fought his laſt (and the laſt of Alexanders Companions) battel with Lyſimachus, in which he being Conquerour, and his Enemy ſlain, left Aſia wholly to his ſon, having a deſire to go into Macedonia (where he had never been ſince he came over with Alexander) and end his dayes in his Native Countrey. But as he was journeying towards Lyſimachia, he was traiterouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus whom he had lovingly entertained, A. M. 3722. twenty three years after he had taken the title of King, being aged 73. and 42 after the death of Alexander. From his Conqueſts he was called Nicanor and Nicator, and is reported to have had the

A. M. 3712. Ol. 121. ann. 4. V. C. 461. Seleuci 20. Ptol. Lagi 31.

Vide Juſtin. lib. 25.

the print of an Anchor on his Thigh, and his poſterity alſo after him, as a note of their Original.

Appian in Syriacis. Memnon excerpt. cap. 16. &c.

Succeedeth his father.

2. Antiochus ſucceeded his father, and was ſirnamed Soter from repelling the Gauls, which in his time at the invitation of Mithridates King of Bithynia had ſeized on part of Aſia. Having with many battels recovered (though not all) his Fathers Kingdom from divers, which now begun ſeverally to pluck the parts of ſo great a body, he ſent over a ſtrong party under the command of Patrocles beyond Taurus, who took to himſelf Hermogenes for his Lieutenant. He intended amongſt other places to fall upon Heraclea a City of Pontus; but the Inhabitants coming out, and pacifying him, he made a League with them, and thence through Phrygia invaded Bithynia, where in an ambuſh laid for him he was cut off, though he fout ſtoutly with his whole Army, after which Zipætes the King built a City upon the Hill Lyperus, which being called after his own name became famous, and not long after he dying, left his Kingdom to Nicomedes his eldeſt ſon. Againſt hm Antiochus being about to undertake an Expedition, he craved help of thoſe of Heraclea, promiſing them to requite them with the like favour in their neceſſity, which they took as an occaſion to fall off again, and break the League made with Hermogenes; and partly by force, and partly by purchaſe recovered divers places taken from them, and attempting to do ſo by Ameſtris, which one Eumenes held, he choſe rather, out of anger, to deliver up the Town to Ariobarzanes the ſon of Mithridates, than to ſell it to them. Not long after Antiochus and Antigonus Gonatas being at difference, and preparing for the War on both ſides, Nicomedes joyned himſelf with Antigonus, againſt whom therefore the other thought firſt to try his ſtrength. Mithridates fortifying himſelf, procured 13 Gallies from Heraclea, which adding to his own Fleet, he went againſt that of Antiochus, but facing one another for ſome time, they departed at length without a fight.

A.M. 3728. Ol. 124. an. 3. V. C. 472. Ptol.Philad. 3.

His Wars.

Antigonus Gonatus maketh a League with him.

3. Antigonus Gonatas being reſolved to venture for Macedonia (where his father Demetrius Poliorcetes once reigned) though he had already been overthrown by Ptolomy Ceraunus, who now held that Kingdom, made a League with Antiochus. This Prince might be the more willing to imbrace it, by reaſon that the Gauls were now come into Aſia, brought by Nicomedes of Bithynia to help him againſt Zybæus (or Zipatus) the younger, who held from him (whether his brother or no is uncertain) the Maritime part of that Countrey. After they had helped him to recover Bithynia, they harraſed all the Countreys far and wide, and though they were but twenty thouſand, and of them but half fighting men, yet ſtruck they ſuch a Terrour into all Nations on this ſide Taurus, as moſt, though they had never ſeen them, ſubmitted unto them. But Antiochus, as we have it from Appian, repelled them from his Territories, and thence, for ſaving the Countrey harmleſs, had the name of Soter or Saviour, having before ſent as aid into Greece five hundred men againſt their Countrey-men, under the conduct of Teleſarchus the Syrian. After this having married his daughter Apame to Magas King of Cyrene, and brother to Ptolomy Philadelphus, he was perſwaded by his Son-in-Law to break the League which his father Seleucus had made with Ptolomy, and invade Egypt; but as he was about to do this, and was gathering forces for it, Ptolomy ſent ſeveral parties of Soldiers into all the Countreys over which he reigned, whereof ſome acting the parts of Robbers, and others of Enemies, diverted him from his purpoſe. The laſt ingagement he was in that we read of, was with Eumenes, the firſt King of Pergamus, near Sardis, from whom he received an overthrow.

He repelleth the Galls, and thence hath the name of Soter.

Pauſan. in Phocicis.

Idem in Atticis.

Strabo lib. 13.

The Original of the Kingdom of Pergamus.

Strabo ibid. &

4. For there was one Philetærus an Eunuch born at Tios in Paphlagonia, and belonging to Lyſimachus who made him Keeper of his Treaſure placed at Pergamus, which he built very ſtrong upon the Hill. He continued very faithful to him, till ſuch time as Arſione cauſed him to murder Agathocles his eldeſt Son, at which he being troubled, and thereupon ſhe accuſing him to her husband, he revolted from him, and ſending to Seleucus offered himſelf, and the money to him: then in the troubles betwixt them two ſo cunningly behaved himſelf, as he kept poſſeſſion, and alwayes fawning upon, and obliging the next, and moſt potent Prince, remained Maſter of the place and Treaſure for twenty years; For Seleucus being murdered by Ptolomy Ceraunus, he redeemed the body with a great ſum of Gold, and ſent the aſhes thereof to this Antiochus Soter his Son. This Philoterus had two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, the former of which had a Son of his own name, who ſucceeded his deceaſed Uncle, and having in his poſſeſſion the places lying about Pergamus, overthrew Antiochus (who now it ſeemeth counted him an incroaching neighbour) as we ſaid before. Antiochus alſo built a City in Syria, which he called by his wives

Pauſan. in Atticis.

name Apamea, and after that another of the ſame name called after his mother, who was the daughter of Artabazus; herein imitating his Father. At length having killed one Son, and nominated another his Succeſſor, he died, after he had reigned nineteen years, A. M. 3742. the ſecond of the one hundred twenty nine Olympiad.

Prolog. in Trogi Pomp. lib. 26.

Antiochus Theos from whom the Parthians revolt,

Appian in Syriacis.

* Lib. 41.

5. Antiochus his ſon ſucceeded him, ſirnamed Theos moſt prophanely by the Mileſians, becauſe he rid them of Timarchus their Tyrant. From him the Parthians firſt revolted, who being (as * Juſtin out of Trogus tells us) Exiles out of Scythia (in the language of which Countrey Parthus ſignifieth ſuch an one) were very obſcure under the Government of the Medes and Perſians, and being Conquered by Alexander, when none of his Captains after his death would accept of the Soveraignty over them, fell to the lot of Satagenor a ſtranger, but a friend to the Macedonians. They followed firſt Eumenes in the Civil Wars; after his death Antigonus, and then ſubmitted themſelves to Seleucus and his Succeſſors, till now they took occaſion to revolt at the inſtigation of Arſaces. We muſt know that Arſaces and Tiridates were two Brothers, the ſons of Arſaces and Grand-ſons of Phriapitus. The ſecond or Tiridates was attempted by Pherocles the Satrapa of Parthia to be carnally and filthily abuſed, and diſcovered the Villany to Arſaces his Brother. They taking to their aſſiſtance five other Conſpirators, ſet upon Pherocles, killed him, and then called on the Parthians to ſtand up for their liberty, and drove out the Macedonians. For this valiant Act performed the Parthians gave the title of King to Arſaces as to whoſe name all Writers agree, though not to that of the Perſian Satrapa, whom ſome call by that of Agathocles. At the ſame time Theodotus the Governour of the one thouſand Bactrian Cities revolted alſo, which the people of the Eaſt uſing for a pattern, in like manner fell off from Antiochus. He waged many Wars with Ptolomy Philadelphus, till ſuch time as both being weary they contracted an Alliance, Ptolomy giving his daughter Berenice to the other, who had two ſons already, Seleucus and Antiochus, by Laodice his former Wife. Herein that Prophecie of Daniel is taken to be fulfilled, which ſaith, that in the end of years they ſhall joyn themſelves together; for the Kings daughter of the South ſhall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement. But, as it followeth, ſhe ſhall not retain the power of the Arm, neither ſhall he ſtand nor his Arm, &c. For, Philadelphus dying ſhortly after, Antiochus took again his former Wife Laodice, who being ſenſible of the injury, and fearing her husbands inconſtancy, poyſoned him, after he had reigned 15 years.

Strabo lib. 11.

And the Eaſtern Provinces.

Cap. 11. verſ. 6

Appian in Syriacis.

Idem. ibid.

Juſtin lib. 27.

Seleucus ſirnamed Callinicus and Pogon.

6. Lacdice his wife kept his death cloſe, till ſuch time as ſhe had ſecured the Kingdom to Seleucus her eldeſt ſon, ſirnamed for his victories (though of none but one we read) Callinicus, and from his beard Pogon. The next thing ſhe went about was to make away Berenice, who underſtanding that ſome were ſent to kill her ſhut up her ſelf in Daphne, a Town near Antioch, and when ſhe was beſieged, news flying about the Cities of Aſia, they commiſerated her condition, and out of reſpect of her Fathers and Grandfathers Dignity, ſent men to her relief. But above all, her brother Ptolomy Euergetes being affrighted at her danger, haſtened out of his Kingdom with his whole power. Yet ere any relief could come ſhe was taken by treachery (promiſe of ſafety being made to her) and quickly ſlain; at which baſe and unworthy act the Cities conceiving great indignation, provided a great Fleet, and to revenge her death, gave up themſelves to Ptolomy, who invading Syria ſlew Laodice, ſeized upon Cæleſyria, with Seleucia, got into his hands Syria, Cilicia, and the upper Provinces beyond Euphrates, and almoſt all Aſia, even as far as Bactria. Without doubt he had conquered all Seleucus his Kingdom, had he not been forced by a Domeſtick Sedition to return, after whoſe departure Seleucus having prepared a great Fleet for the reducing of thoſe Cities which revolted from him, loſt it in a great Tempeſt, at the which they were ſo far from rejoycing, that pitying him for this Shipwrack, they voluntarily returned to obedience.

A. M. 3759.
Ol. 133. ann. 3.
V. C. 508.
Ptol. Euerget. 1.

Ptolomy Euergetes revengeth the death of his ſiſter Berenice.

Idem. ibid.

He invadeth Ptolomy and thence is caſt into great ſtreights.

7. Rejoycing that he fared ſo well by his ſhipwrack, he now made War upon Ptolomy, but being overthrown fled to Antioch in great fear, being as deſtitute as before, though he found not ſuch relief. For, writing to his younger brother Antiochus, he craved his help, offering him all Aſia within the Mountain Taurus for a reward, (who though he was but yet fourteen years old) being greedy of reigning imbraced this occaſion, and then behaved not himſelf not as an helper or brother, but like a Robber, intending to get the whole Kingdom. He ſhewed incredible boldneſs in invading and ſnatching, whence he had the Sirname of Hierax or Goſhauck.

Antiochus Hierax his brother rebelleth.

Arſaces perfecting his revolt eſtabliſheth his Parthian Kingdom.

Goſhauck. Ptolomy hearing of his aiding his Brother, leſt he ſhould have two to deal with at once, made peace with Seleucus for ten years; and then Antiochus hiring the Gauls, with them made War upon his Brother in the other's ſtead, in which he had the better of it, and they ſuppoſing Seleucus to be ſlain in the Battel (that cutting off all the Royal Race they might be Lords of Aſia) turned their force againſt him that hired them; ſo that Antiochus was glad to purchaſe his freedom with Gold, and enter into ſociety with his Mercenaries. The two Brothers being thus at odds, and every one gaping after Aſia, Eumenes of Bithinia puts in amongſt the reſt, and overthrowing the Gauls, and after them Antiochus, got a great part of it into his poſſeſſion. Now alſo Arſaces hearing of the diſtreſs of Seleucus, perfected the revolt of the Parthians; for, invading that Country with a Band of Robbers, he ſlew the Governour Andragorus, and invaded the Principality, and not long after ſeizing on the Kingdom of the Hyrcanians, ſo ſtrengthened himſelf thereby, that after ſome years he overthrew Seleucus, and eſtabliſhed his Kingdom. Hence a double Epoche is to be made of the Parthian Kingdom or Dominion. Of theſe the firſt is to be fetched from the Revolt of the Parthians from Antiochus Theos; and the ſecond from the famous Victory obtained over this Seleucus Callinicus; and ſo ſeveral diſſenting Writers may be reconciled. But hence the Parthians accounting ever after the day of this Victory as the day of their Liberty, conſtantly obſerved it, and Arſaces being no leſs memorable to them than Cyrus to the Perſians, Alexander to the Macedonians, or Romulus to the Romans; out of honour to him they called all their Kings by his name. This beginning of Arſaces fell out in the firſt of the 135 Olympiad, of the City 510, the ſecond of Seleucus, and the third of Ptolomy Energetes. A. M. 3761.

Idem lib. 41.

The two brothers renew the War and Dye.

8. Now underſtanding that Eumenes had got the greateſt part of Aſia into his power, and both the brothers had even loſt their Principalities, yet could they not agree, but in ſtead of oppoſing the foreign and common Enemies, ſought the deſtruction of each other, by renewing the War. In the next battle Antiochus was overthrown, and flying many dayes, and not knowing how to beſtow himſelf, at length being wearied he went to Artamenes King of Cappadocia his Father in Law, by whom at firſt being received very civilly, he afterwards underſtood there was a plot laid againſt him, and fled thence. Whereupon not knowing where to be ſecure, he betook himſelf to Ptolomy, judging he might rather truſt to him then his brother, being (as well he might be) mindful of what he would have done to him, or had deſerved of him. Ptolomy commanded him to be narrowly looked to; but by the help of a certain Harlot with whom he had been too familiar, he deceived his Keepers and got away. Yet as he was flying he was ſlain by thieves. Seleucus alſo almoſt at the ſame time, being outed of his Kingdom, and thrown by an horſe, ended his life, after he had reigned about twenty years. A. M. 3779, the third of the one hundred thirty eight Olympiad, 98 years after the death of Alexander.

Idem. lib. 27.

Antiochus the Great.

9. He left two ſons, Seleucus and Antiochus of which the former ſucceeded according to his birthright, in the ſeventh year of Antigonus Doſon King of Macedonia, and was Sirnamed Ceraunus. Eumenes King of Pergamus, who had got ſo much of Aſia into his power now being dead of Drunkenneſs, Attalus his younger brother's Son ſucceeded him, and had got all on this ſide Taurus into his power, which being underſtood by Seleucus Ceraunus, he thought it concern'd him to look about him, and with Achæus (whoſe Father Andromachus was brother to Laodice his wife) paſſed over Taurus with an Army againſt him: but then was poyſoned in Phrygia by the treachery of Apaturius a Galatian, and Nicanor, after he had reigned ſcarce three years. Achæus to revenge his death preſently ſlew the conſpirators, and then ordering the Army with great wiſdom and courage, recovered all on this ſide the Mountain Taurus, which had been loſt; inſomuch that the People admiring him would have accepted of him as King, if he would have taken this opportunity; but he refuſed it, and kept the Soveraignty for Antiochus brother to Seleucus, who afterwards was called the Great. He in his brothers time lived a private life in the upper Provinces, and now was called from Babylon by the Army into Syria, to take upon him the Government, being about fifteen years old; after which he entruſted Achæus with all that Region he had lately recovered, made Molon Governour of Media and his brother Alexander of the Country of Perſis.

Seleucus Ceraunus.

Polybius lib. 4
Appian in Syriacis.

A. M. 3779.
Ol. 138. an. 3.
V. C. 528.
Ptolom. Euergetæ 21.

10. He fell into great troubles immediately upon his firſt entrance upon the Kindom; for Molon and his brother conſidering his youth, and hoping that Achæus would joyn with them in their enterprize, eſpecially out of fear and hatred

Polyb. lib. 5.

of

Falleth immediately into great troubles by the means of Hermias, of one Hermias, who now ruled all at Court, conſpired together to withdraw all the upper Provinces from their allegiance. This Hermias a Carian by birth, had been left by Seleucus to look to his Kingdom when he took his Expedition over Taurus, and then being ſet in ſo high a place, began to envy the power of all others, grew proud and cruel, his malice above all others being againſt Epigenes, who had been Seleucus his General; for that he ſaw him to be a wiſe and prudent man, and the Army much at his devotion. A Council being called to conſult about the Rebellion, Epigenes adviſed that the King ſhould go in perſon to ſuppreſs it; for thereby the Rebels would either be terrified and deſiſt, or the Country at his preſence would be moved to croſs their deſigns, and deliver them up; but Hermias interrupting him, imputed this to a deſire that the Kingdom ſhould miſcarry, that thereby he might ſeize upon his eſtate, and prevailed that two others ſhould be ſent againſt Molo, and the King go againſt Ptolomy Philopater (who now thinking himſelf ſecure in the youth of Antiochus, and Philip of Macedonia, had given himſelf up to all luxury) hoping thereby to have an eaſie War of it, for that he was of a cowardly diſpoſition, and hoped by expoſing the young King to dangers and hazards, to eſcape the puniſhment due unto him, and maintain that power he already enjoyed. Antiochus being very young, was very earneſt to get Cæleſyria, and Hermias to prick him ſtill forward, framed a letter from Achæus, wherein he tells he is deſired by Ptolomy to take the Diadem and aſſume the title of King to himſelf, promiſing to ſend him ſhips,money, and all things neceſſary for that enterpriſe.

Who procureth him to march againſt Ptolomy, though Molon rebelled.

11. Having married firſt Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Cappadocia, he prepared for his Expedition, when news came that Molon went on with his deſign, and how the Captains ſent againſt him, out of fear had ſecured themſelves in Garriſons. Hereupon he bent his mind to go himſelf, but Hermias being tenacious of his purpoſe, again diverted him, telling him, it was fitter for Subjects to fight againſt ſuch, and Kings againſt their equals, and ſo ſending one Xinætas an Achæan againſt Molon, again turned his mind now obnoxious to him for want of years. Then marched they to Laodicea, and thence through the Deſart to the Valley called Marſya, lying between the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, where about the Straights he took in divers Towns; but the principal Fort held out and put him to a ſtand, which made him the more deſirous to go now againſt Molon; For Xinætas, who was ſent againſt him with full power,growing arrogant and careleſs,had raſhly ventured over the River Tigris,and then Molon making as if he fled ,came upon him in the night, and cut him off with moſt of his men, and thoſe that eſcaped the Sword taking the River, ſcarce any got to the other ſide. After this, Molon purſuing his Victory took Seleucia, all the upper Provinces, the Principality of Babylon, thoſe parts lying upon the Red Sea,all about Tigris as far as Europus, and Meſopotamia as far as Dura; onely the Caſtle at Suſa ſtood out, the Town being taken; Antiochus at this report called a Council to conſult what was to be done, where Epigenes expoſtulating that his former advice was not followed, moved the ſame again; but was taken up as before by Hermias, with foul language, who deſired the King he would not think of leaving Cæleſyria; but all being for going againſt Molon, it was concluded, and he was glad to comply for his own turn.

A. M. 3783.
Ol. 139. an. 3.
V.C. 532.
Antioch. M. 2.
Ptol.Philom. 1.

He is neceſſitated to go againſt Molon.

12. The Army before it ſtirred mutinied for pay, and then Hermias taking advantage at the Kings neceſſity; offered to lay down money, on condition Epigenes might be removed from his preſence, which having obtained, he procured the man to be murdered. The Army marched and came to Antioch in Mygdonia at the Winter ſolſtice, where ſtaying forty dayes till the extremity of the cold was over, after forty dayes it came to Liba, Molon then lying at hand about Babylon. Here a Conncil of War being called to conſult which way was to be taken, that they might not fail of Proviſions; Hermias was for going along by Tigris, that it, and two other Rivers, Lycus and Kapros, they might have for a defence; but Zeuxis, though fearful to ſpeak becauſe of him, ſhewed the danger of that advice, becauſe it would be a great compaſs, and after ſix dayes travel through a Deſart, they ſhould come to a place called The Kings Ditch, which if the Enemy got before them, they ſhould in no wiſe be able to paſs, and be reduced into great ſtraights for want of Victuals; but on the contrary, if they paſſed over Tigris, there was no doubt but the Inhabitants of the Countrey called Apolloniatis would return to obedience, obeying Molon at preſent out of neceſſity; further, in that plentiful Countrey they ſhould have plentiful of Victuals, and (what was moſt conſiderable) Molon would be hindered from retreating into Media, and thereby being ſtraightned, after that the place where he yet remained was emptied of proviſions, would be forced to fight, or if he durſt not do that, then his Soldiers would revolt to the King. This counſel being taken, all things fell out accordingly ; for Molon fearing his paſſage into Media might be ſtopped, little truſting thoſe parts in which he then was, determined to get if he could, to the hilly Country of Apolloniatis ; but it hapned that the Scouts of both parties met there, and skirmiſhing for ſome time, afterwards retreated to their ſeveral Bodies, and ſo gave occaſion to a total ingagement the day following.

13, Molon conſidering how dangerous it was to bring his Soldiers forth in open face againſt their King, thought it the beſt way to chuſe out the moſt ſtrong and valiant, and ſet upon his Camp in the night. Going about to do this, ten young men went over to the King and told him the deſign of the Rebels, ſo that Molon was glad to return, and put his other Army left behind him into ſuch an Alarm, for that they were ignorant of the enterpriſe, that much ado he had to quiet them. The King being provided to fight, drew out his men by break of day, and placed them in batalia ; Molon could but do it in great diſorder and confuſion, by reaſon of that conſternation which fell upon his men in the night. In the fight which preſently followed, the right Wing of his Army ſtood faſt to him, and fought very earneſtly, but the left as ſoon as it came in ſight all revolted, which he underſtanding, now compaſſed in with Enemies, and conſidering the torments he was likely to undergo if taken alive, killed himſelf, and ſo did all his companions in the conſpiracy, but his body being found was nailed, for an example, to a croſs in the higheſt parts of Media. After this Victory Antiochus ſetled the affairs of theſe Countries, dealing more mercifully with his Subjects than was deſired by Hermias, and then reſolved to invade the Territories of the Barbarians lying upon his borders, to terrifie them from aſſiſting his rebels for the time to come ; which Hermias diſliked for the danger of the War, his mind ſtill running upon Cæleſyria, but news being brought that a young ſon was born to the King, he was content he ſhould expoſe himſelf to this danger, hoping that in caſe he ſhould miſcarry he muſt be made Guardian and Protector of the infant, but he was ignorant that his juſt reward hung over his head. For one Artabazanes, his Country being invaded, being unfit for reſiſtance becauſe of old age, made Peace with Antiochus, ſubmitting to whatſoever he demanded, and at the ſame time Apollophanes the Phyſician to the King, and his great favourite, perceiving Hermias not able to bear that high condition to which he was advanced, any longer, being ſollicious for his Maſters ſafety, and much more for his own, ſo wrought the King (inclinable enough to it before) as being called to walk abroad one morning more early than uſual, before his return he was made away.

Molon and his Army deſtroyed.

And Hermias put to death.

14. Antiochus his mind was now turned towards Achæus, who, though at the firſt he had born himſelf very modeſtly, being elevated with ſucceſs, and thinking that the King in his expedition againſt Artabazanes might poſſibly miſcarry, or if he did not, yet hoping that he being at ſo great a diſtance, he might have opportunity enough to break into Syria, and have help to ſeize upon the Kingdom, marched with his whole Army from Lydia, and coming to Laodicea in Phrygia, then ſet the Diadem upon his head, and firſt took the Title of King upon him. He continued his march till he drew near to Lycaonia ; but there the Soldiers mutined, refuſing to fight againſt their natural King, ſo that ſeeing this, he ſtrove to perſwade them that he had no intention to invade Syria, and diverted his courſe to Piſidia, which haraſing, and increaſing the Army with booty thereby, he returned home again. The King not being ignorant of any of this, firſt expoſtulated it with him, and ſending him threatning meſſages, put off the reſt for this time, and ſet himſelf with all his might to prepare for the War againſt Ptolomy. Conſulting then what way to invade Syria, he was perſwaded firſt of all to attempt Seleucia (held by the Ptolomies ever ſince the Invaſion of Euergetes, to revenge the death of his Siſter Berenice) being the Chief Seat almoſt of the whole Empire, from whence would ariſe much trouble being thus in the Enemies hands, and very commodious by its ſituation for carrying on the War both by Land and Sea. He firſt then corrupted ſome of the Officers of the Garriſon within, who promiſed, that if he could but take part of the Suburbs, they would procure the whole Town to be yielded. This being done, the Conſpirators came to the Governour, and moved him to yield, as from the neceſſity of the thing, who being ſtruck at this conſternation, as it appeared, of the Soldiers, ſurrendred preſently the Town upon Compoſition.

Achæus traiterouſly aſſumeth the Diadem, and Title of King.

Yet Antiochus maketh War upon Ptolomy for Cæleſyria.

And getteth into Seleucia.

A. M. 3786.
Ol. 140.*ann.*2.
V. C. 535.
Ant. M. 5.
Ptol. Philopatris 4.

15. While he was employed about this Town, Letters came to him from one Theodotus, deſiring him with all ſpeed to come into Syria, ſignifying that he would betray

With ſeveral other places.

Is by the practices of Achæus recalled.

it all into his power; for he being an Ætolian born, had done the Kings of Egypt ſpecial ſervice, but was ſo well requited for it as he was brought into danger of life, and therefore at what time Antiochus went againſt Molon, looking upon Ptolomy as a deſpicable Creature, and diſtruſting his Courtiers, he had ſeized upon Ptolomais and Tyre and ſollicited him to come down. Now therefore Antiochus putting off the buſineſs of Achæus till another time, marched down to Marſyæ, the ſame Valley and Straights as before, where hearing Theodotus was beſieged in Ptolemais, he went, and relieved him, and then having that and Tyre delivered up unto him, and beating the Enemy out of the Straights, he had then determined to march towards Peluſium, but underſtanding that Ptolomey's Army was come thither, and all oppoſition poſſible making for hindering his paſſage, he went on in taking in the Towns thereabouts, divers whereof preſently ſubmitted, and others ſtood it out. Ptolomy himſelf being given wholly up to ſluggiſhneſs, though thus betrayed, took no order about his affairs; All the burthen of them lay upon Agathocles and Soſibius, then the greateſt Officers of State, who being able men, ſent up and down to raiſe Forces, and make all ſpeedy preparations for the War, though to divert Antiochus they ſent Ambaſſadors to him to treat of peace (as deſiring onely to go that way to work) and procured Embaſſies from the Rhodians, Byzantians, Ætolians, and them of Cyzicus, to mediate betwixt them, during which they gained time, and deceived the Enemy, carrying all things ſo cloſe as his Ambaſſadors could underſtand nothing of their Proviſions. A Truce was granted by Antiochus for four moneths, during which time he willed them to ſend to him to Seleucia, giving hopes to make up the difference, but contrary to his intentions: though now he was in a manner conſtrained to return into his own Kingdom, for that Achæus plotted againſt him, and held Intelligence with Ptolomy.

A Treaty betwixt him and the King of Egypt.

His plea for Cæleſyria.

The anſwer of Ptolomy's Commiſſioners, and the Treaty ends without effect.

16. The Commiſſioners coming to debate the particulars according to their inſtructions, Antiochus laboured to overcome them with his Arguments for the juſtneſs of his cauſe, as well as with his Weapons, pleading he had done Ptolomy no injury in making that invaſion, for that he had but recovered his right, alledging much the Conqueſts of thoſe parts by Antigonus Cocles, and the poſſeſſion of them by Seleucus, and that Ptolomy the firſt waged not War with Antigonus for his own particular, but to help Seleucus to the Soveraignty of that Province, but above all, he preſſed the common agreement of all the Kings, made at that time when Antigonus was overthrown, wherein by Lyſimachus and Caſſander, all Syria was decreed to Seleucus. On the contrary, Ptolomy's Commiſſioners aggravated the height of the injury offered to him, by the unworthineſs of cloſing with the treaſonable practices of Theodotus, and affirmed, that Ptolomy the Son of Lagus intended the Dominion of Syria to himſelf, and joyned with Seleucus on no other terms, than that indeed all Aſia ſhould be his, but Syria fall to his own ſhare. Such like objections and replies as theſe were made often to no purpoſe, but that which put the greateſt ſtop to the Treaty, was the comprehending of Achæus in the League, which Ptolomy ſtickled hard for, and the other as impatiently heard, crying out of the unworthineſs of the thing, that he ſhould protect, or make any mention of Rebels. Winter being thus ſpun out with theſe diſcourſes, and Spring drawing on, Antiochus intending to ſet upon the Enemy both by Sea and Land, drew together his Forces, to the taking in of what remained unconquered of Syria; and Nicolaus on the other part, as the Egyptian General, with Perigenes the Admiral, made all poſſible proviſion for reſiſtance.

Hoſtility thereupon in Spring is renewed, whereby Antiochus getteth much.

* Called by Joſephus Bethſan in the Tribe of Manaſſes, through whoſe grounds Jordan flows,

17. Antiochus going to Marathus, there entered into Confederacy with the Aradians; then entring Syria through Theu-proſopos came to Berytus, in his paſſage taking in Botris, and burning Trieres and Calamus. The Mountain Libanus ſtraightning much the paſſage betwixt it and the Sea, and almoſt making it impaſſible, Nicolaus with a party alſo placed himſelf in the ſtraights, not doubting but to ſtop Antiochus there: but he dividing his Forces, and having his Fleet conſtantly near him, cauſed it firſt to ingage with the Egyptian, in which fight both ſides came off on equal terms, but Theodotus beating back the Enemy upon the Mountain, got over, and then cleared the paſſage below for the King. He after this came near Sidon with his Army, but judging it to no purpoſe to ſet upon the Town very ſtrong with men, and full of Proviſions, he gave order to Diognetus his Admiral to go with the Fleet to Tyre, and marched to Philoteria ſituate upon the Sea of Tiberias, which he took, together with * Scythopolis. Now he conceived great hopes of the perfecting his work, being come into a Countrey plentiful of Proviſions, ſo that placing Garriſons in theſe two Cities he took in Atabyrium by a Stratagem, making as if he fled before the Inhabitants, but having men lying in wait who aroſe againſt them, and then the whole Army with ſuch violence, as put them into a great fear, and they yielded up the place. After this, Karæus, one of Ptolomies Chiefeſt of Officers revolted to him. Hippolochus the Theſſalian brought over with him four hundred horſe, and then the Arabians moved by his ſucceſs joyned themſelves to him. Shortly after he took in Galatis and Gadara beyond expectation, becauſe of the ſtrength thereof; but the Inhabitants terrified at his preparations yielded themſelves: then hearing that a great number of Enemies had met at Rabath-ben Amon, or Rabatana, a City in Arabia, and thence made incurſions into the Territories of his friends, he marched thither, and ſtriving by force in vain to be Maſter of the place, at length he effected it by ſtopping the courſe of Water, for want of which it was then ſurrendred. Then leaving a ſtrong Garriſon here, and ſending Hippolochus and Karæus to Govern the Coaſts of Samaria, he went to Ptolemais, and there took up his Winter quarters.

Ptolomy in the Spring following taketh the Field.

18. Ptolomy to give him a ſtop, prepared againſt the Spring a great Army, and then marched from Alexandria with ſeventy thouſand foot, five thouſand horſe, and ſeventy three Elephants, and came to Peluſium. Antiochus hearing this, gathered his Forces together, amounting to ſeventy two thouſand foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and one hundred and two Elephants. Ptolomy proceeding on his journey came to Gaza, and thence near to Ruphia (the firſt City of Syria, except Rhinocerus, as one cometh from Egypt) and Antiochus paſſing by that place ſhortly pitched his Tents at firſt within ten furlongs of the Enemy, and the next day, partly for the commodiouſneſs of the ground, and partly to embolden his Soldiers, approached within five furlongs of them. Being ſo near, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes fell out amongſt thoſe which on both ſides iſſued forth for proviſions, and Theodotus the Ætolian, after a moſt bold adventure taking but two in his company, for that he had been in Ptolomy's Court, and knew his manner of life, went out in the duſk of the evening, and not being known got into the Kings Tent where he uſed to give audience, and though he miſſed of him being in a more obſcure place, yet wounded he two which waited there, and killing out-right Andreas his principal Phyſitian, eſcaped back in ſafety to his own Camp; having onely failed of his purpoſe for want of informing himſelf when the King was wont to take his reſt. For five dayes continued theſe two Princes in this poſture, and then both reſolved to try the matter in a ſett battel.

A pitch't battel.

The manner of the fighting of Elephants.

19. Ptolomy firſt drew out his men, and then preſently Antiochus ranged his in battel aray againſt him. Each of the Armies had two wings, wherein the two Kings met each other, guarded with Elephants, betwixt which the fight was begun, after Antiochus had cauſed the charge to be ſounded; their manner being firſt with their Trunks to thruſt each other, and ſtrive for the ground, and then after that for the one by force to remove the other's Trunk, and to fall upon him like a Bull, and gore his ſides. Few of Ptolomies beaſts would fight at all, for that being Africans, they could neither endure the ſmell nor noiſe of thoſe of India, ſo that the ranks being diſordered by them, his left Wing was quite broke by the charge of the Enemy, and put to flight. Echecrates, who commanded in the right, ſtayed firſt for the ingagement of the former, then ſeeing that his Elephants would not fight, gave order to Phinidas Commander of the Mercenary Greeks to invade his oppoſites, and he himſelf alſo wheeling about to be out of the danger of the Beaſts, fell upon the Flanks and Rear of the Enemies Horſe; ſo that both together they made them all being Arabians and Medes to give ground, and put all the Wing to flight, thus being even with Antiochus. Then came the bodies themſelves to ingage: Antiochus was buſie in the purſuite of that Wing wherein he fought; but Ptolomy coming to his Army much encouraged the Soldiers, and diſheartned his adverſaries, who being charged by Andromachus and Soſibius, the Syrians for ſome time maintained their ground, but the reſt ſcarce fighting one ſtroak ſhifted for themſelves. Antiochus being yet unſkilful and young, was ſtill following the chace, (thinking becauſe he had the better of it in his Wing, that therefore his whole Army overcame) till admoniſhed by ſome one about him, he returned, and ſeeing things ſo contrary to his expectation, endeavoured to break in with his Guard, to the place where his Army ſtood, but finding all his men fled, retired alſo unto Raphia, being perſwaded that he had done as became him, however, by reaſon of the Cowardlyneſs of others the work had miſcarried. On his part were ſlain little leſs than ten thouſand Foot, about three hundred Horſe, and four thouſand taken priſoners; three of his Elephants were ſlain outright, and two afterwards died of their wounds.

Antiochus beaten.

A. M. 3788.
Ol. 140. ann. 4.
V. C. 537.
Antiochi Magni 7.

Ptol. Philop. 6.

Ptolomy loſt one thouſand five hundred Foot, and ſeven hundred Horſe, ſixteen Elephants were killed, and the reſt taken for the moſt part.

Deſireth peace and eaſily obtaineth it.

20. Antiochus had intended after the rallying of his men to have fortified himſelf without Raphia; but moſt of them being got into the Town, he deſired leave to bury his dead, and then returned into his own Kingdom. Ptolomy preſently received all Cœleſyria again into his power, the Inhabitants accomodating themſelves to his preſent condition (as indeed bearing alwaies great reverence to his family) and ſtriving who ſhould firſt yield themſelves. Antiochus coming to Antioch, preſently diſpatched Antipater his brother's Son, and Theodotus Herviolius in an Ambaſſage to him, fearing exceedingly he ſhould be proſecuted with War, diſtruſting his Subjects becauſe of his adverſe fortune, and ſuſpecting Achæus might make uſe of this opportunity againſt him. But Ptolomy thought of nothing leſs than moleſting him, being overjoyed that he had above all expectation recovered Cœleſyria, and deſiring exceedingly to be quiet, out of his ſluggiſh diſpoſition, and other vices familiar to him; wherefore at firſt receiving the Ambaſſadors with threatning language, and complaints of the injuries received from their Maſter, he preſently granted a Truce for a year, and then ſent Soſibius to confirm the League, wanting onely courage and reſolution to ſpoil Antiochus of his Kingdom.

Idem excerpt. lib. 7.

He beſiegeth Achæus in Sardis,

For whoſe ſafety Soſibius plotteth,

Idem excerpt. lib. 8.

21. Antiochus ſpent all the Winter in preparations, and in Spring marched over the Mountain Taurus againſt Achæus, whom he beſieged in the City Sardis. Above a year he lay before it, having onely ſometimes light ſkirmiſhes with the defendants, till Lagoras a Cretian, a man of great experience, obſerving that the ſtrongeſt Cities are many times taken at ſuch places as are by reaſon of their ſtrength leaſt looked to, and perceiving a piece of the wall, beyond which they uſed to throw carrion and filth into a pit, to be deſtitute of any watch, by the ſitting of fouls upon it, which came to feed on the carkeiſes, he took unto him Theodotus the Ætolian, and Dionyſius, with ſome Soldiers, and they made a ſhift to get over and open the gates; the King to divert the Enemy making as if he would give the onſet at another place, and ſo the Town was taken. Achæus and Aribazus the Governour got into the Caſtle, and then were ſtraitly beſieged again, till ſuch time as Soſibius the chief Miniſter of State in Ægypt, pitying the condition of the former, made means for his deliverance, which by the treachery of the inſtrument wrought his deſtruction. There was at that time in the Ægyptian Court one Bolis a Cretian, ſecond to no one Captain, as he was reputed, for prudence, extraordinary boldneſs, and military skill; with him Soſibius dealt, having obliged him by his favours, and aſſured him that nothing could he perform more acceptable to the King his Maſter, than ſome way or other to work the deliverance of Achæus. He asking ſome time to conſider of it, within two or three dayes took the buſineſs upon him, which to effect he had as he ſaid a good opportunity, for that Cambylus the Commander of the Cretians ſerving under Antiochus was not onely known to him, but his kinſman, and had the charge of a Fort behind the Caſtle, which, becauſe it could not be fortified with works, was kept by a continual Guard of Soldiers.

22. Being ſupplied with money largely by Soſibius, and loaded with promiſes, away he ſailed for Rhodes to Nichomachus, and thence for Epheſus, to Melancoma, his acquaintance, and friends of Achæus, with whom dealing about his buſineſs, he ſent one Arianus to Cambylus to let him know that he was ſent from Alexandria to raiſe Forces, and that he muſt needs ſpeak with him, deſiring he would appoint time and place for their meeting, without the privity of any. Having obtained this, and bethinking with himſelf what to do, he gave him a letter concerning which like Cretians they had a Cretian conference, as Polybius termeth it. For not reſpecting the ſafety of the beſieged, or their faith given to thoſe that employed them, but agreeing to divide the ten Talents already given in advance by Soſibius, they reſolved to acquaint Antiochus with the matter, and undertake upon promiſe of money in hand, and a good reward afterwards, to deliver Achæus into his power. This being with great earneſtneſs promiſed, Bolis prevails with Nicomachus and Melanchoma, wholly ignorant of his treacherous intent, to write letters in cipher to Achæus, which he ſent hy Arianus, for whom paſſage was procured into the Caſtle by means of Cambylis. Achæus being earneſtly adviſed by his two friends to truſt Bolis and Cambylus, and withall conſidering the difficulty from him to eſcape; hoping if he got out to paſs preſently into Syria whilſt Antiochus was yet at Sardis, and then to get all the parts about Antioch into his power, yielded to put himſelf into the hands of Bolis, who was ſent preſently by Melancomas with great entreaties and promiſes if he could accompliſh the buſineſs. Bolis ment to Cambylus at night, and ſtaying with him the next day to conſult of the buſineſs how it ſhould be managed, after he had been with Antiochns, and was much incouraged by him, he went up for Achæus into the Caſtle.

But he is betraied by the inſtrument into the hands of juſtice.

A. M. 3791. Ol. 141. an. 3. V. C. 540. Ant. Mag. 10. Ptol.Philom. 9.

23. Receiving Bolis with great reſpect, and after all his ſifting of him perceiving nothing diſagreeable to ſeriouſneſs, he much rejoyced; but bethinking himſelf how weighty a thing it was, and what a hazard he was like to run, he trembled again at the thought of it, and at firſt reſolved to ſend ſome before to Melancomas; but at length out he went of the Caſtle, and according to former agreement, Bolis coming behind him by a whiſtle gave a ſign to thoſe in Ambuſh, and held him by the clothes till he was taken. Being brought into Antiochus his Tent, who ſate late at night with a few attendants to ſee the iſſue of the project, the King was amazed, and could not forbear weeping to ſee him, ſo eminent a man, lye bound before him upon the ground in ſo ſad a condition; but a Council of War being called, after ſeveral wayes of puniſhment propoſed, at laſt it was agreed, that he ſhould have his outward members and limbs cut off, after that his head, and that being ſowed into an Aſſes bladder, his body ſhould be nailed to a croſs, which was executed accordingly. This end had he who was ſon to Andromachus the brother of Laodice Wife to Seleucus, who had married Laodice daughter to Mithridates, and had held all Aſia on this ſide Taurus, having recovered it by his own induſtry and valour: a man he was exceeding wiſe, and of great experience, yet left (as Polybius obſerveth for us) a double warning to poſterity, not to truſt any raſhly, and not to be puffed up with poſterity, or be ſecure of any thing incident to mankind, to which we may add another, viz. that none preſume to rebel againſt their Soveraigns, for puniſhment will overtake them. His death being known within, as they all firſt agreed in making lamentations for him, ſo ſhortly after they fell at odds, being divided into two factions, of which the one ſtuck to his Wife, and the other to Ariobazus the Governour; ſo that having ſuſpition of each other, both parties yielded themſelves and the place to Antiochus.

Polyb. lib. 10. excerpt. et Appian in Syriacis.

Antiochus maketh an Expedition into the Eaſt.

Polybius excerpt. lib. 11.

The fruits of it.

24. A year or two after, Antiochus undertook an Expedition into the Eaſt to reduce Media and Parthia which had revolted, and he paſſing through both, thereupon cauſed Arſaces to withdraw himſelf into Hyrcania, which he conſidering, and judging that he would not have forſaken this Countrey if he had been able to have defended it, reſolved to follow him, ſo that with great difficulty he paſſed over the hills, and entred alſo into that Region, where we finde that he took ſome Towns; but what further he did againſt Arſaces, or upon what terms he returned, if Polybius his Hiſtory had been kept entire, we might have known. After this he quieted the upper Aſia, and coming into Bactria for a good while endeavoured to drive out thence Euthydemus the King thereof, whom he defeated, and behaved himſelf moſt ſtoutly, whence he got great credit for his valour. At length Euthydemus complaining that he was injurious in oppoſing him thus who had not revolted from him, but cut off the poſterity of thoſe that had, beſeeching him alſo not to envy him the name of King, eſpecially conſidering that by this diſſention neither of their affaires could be ſecure, for that a number of the Scythian Nomades hovered at the borders, and were like to overrun the Country, Antiochus, who being tired with the tediouſneſs of the War, had ſought occaſion to make a Peace, not unwillingly now heard the overtures of it, eſpecially after that Euthydemus ſent his ſon Demetrius to him, with whom he was ſo taken for his perſon and parts, as thinking him worthy of a Kingdom, he firſt promiſed him one of his daughters, and then yielded that his Father ſhould take the title of King. Then the conditions of the league being written down, and ſworn to, and taking with him all the Elephants that Euthydemus had, he marched over Caucaſus, and renewed the confederacy with Sophagaſenus the Indian King; then taking with him more Elephants (of which he had now one hundred and fifty) and leaving Androſthenes of Cyzicus to bring the treaſure promiſed him, he came to Arachoſia, and ſo through Drangiana into Carmania, where he was forced to Winter, having received this fruit by this Expedition, that beſides the Countries recovered, and the maritime Cities and Dynaſties on this ſide Taurus added to his Dominions, he ſtruck ſuch an awe into his Subjects, as kept them more in order, and he was thought to be eſteemed as well by the People of Europe as thoſe of Aſia, worthy to govern.

A. M. 3803. Ol. 144 an. 3. V. C. 552.

25. Not long after this, Ptolomy Philopater dying and leaving a young ſon behind him but four years old, Philip of Macedonia and he (as we before hinted) made a wicked

Ant. Mag. 22. Ptol. Epiph. 2.

* Antiquit. l. 12. c. 3.

Livius l. 33.

He joyneth with Philip againſt Ptolomy, getteth Judæa, and preſently loſeth it again. Falling upon Attalus his Territories the Romans procure him to deſiſt.

wicked League for the outing him of his Kingdom, and dividing it amongſt them, wherefore he ſtriking again at Cœleſyria and Phœnicia, got Judæa into his power, which * as Joſephus telleth us, was toſſed betwixt theſe two Crowns as a ſhip with the waves. For Scopas the Ætolian recovered it again out of his hands for young Epiphanes, and yet again not long after loſt it with Cœleſyria, being overthrown by Antiochus (near the fountains or heads of Jordan) at the City Panæas, with whom the Jews then preſently joyned, but the Inhabitants of Gaza ſtanding ſtill out for Ptolomy, their City was taken and razed. In the mean time whilſt Scopas was recovering the Cities of Syria, Antiochus himſelf was buſie in invading the Kingdom of Attalus, who then being employed with the Romans in the Macedonian War againſt Philip, had left it naked of defence both by Land and Sea, but upon his complaint to the Roman Senate they ſent to Antiochus to tell him, that ſeeing Attalus was employed by them againſt Philip the common Enemy, he would do a thing very acceptable unto them to abſtain from his Territories, adding withall, that it was convenient for all the Kings which were the friends and allies of the People of Rome to be at peace amongſt themſelves; with the authority of which meſſage he was ſo moved, as he drew out his Army again from the borders. But this reſpect to the Romans continued not many years, he entering upon ſuch courſes as gave them offence, and proceeding therein at length to an open War.

A. M. 3807. Ol. 145. ann. 3. V. C. 556. Ant. M. 26. Ptol. Epiphanis 6.

Idem ibid.

Ye the miniſtreth occaſion for a War with them.

26. For having reduced all Cœleſyria into his power, and wintered at Antioch, the next Spring ſending before his two ſons Ardyes and Mithridates with the Army, and command to ſtay for him at Sardis, he himſelf followed with the Fleet to attempt the ſeveral maritime Towns of Cilicia and Caria, which were under Ptolomy, and alſo to help Philip both at Sea and Land, who now was buſie in the War with the Romans. Divers places by fair and foul means together he took in; yet Coraceſium ſtood out, and whilſt he lay before it came Ambaſſadors from the Rhodians to denounce War againſt him, in caſe he came within Nephelis the Promontory of Cilicia, not out of any hatred to him as they ſaid, but leſt joyning with Philip he ſhould hinder the Romans now active for the liberty of Greece. Though he heard this with much diſdain, yet thought he it wiſdom to give them good words for the preſent, and pleaſe them in this particular, but they, after all danger was over from Philip (who this Summer was beaten at Cynoſcephalæ) not tying themſelves with him to the former condition, ſent aid to the Cities their aſſociates, and preſerved ſeveral in their liberty. He took at length Caraceſium, and after it ſeveral others, and amongſt the reſt Epheſus, where wintering, he endeavoured to reduce alſo the Cities of Aſia, under the obedience they payed to his Anceſtors, and thinking it not difficult to be done by any of them, except two, viz. Smyrna in Æolis, and Lampſacus upon the Helleſpont, he ſent Forces to beſiege them both.

Antiochus the Great and the Romans grow jealous one of another.

Livius l. 33.

Appiam in Syriacis. Polybius excerp. Legat. 9. & Lib. 17.

27. Now the Romans, with all others, doubted not but his Army was for Europe, after his affairs had ſucceeded in Aſia, and they had the more cauſe to be jealous of him, for that Hannibal their old and ſworn Enemy had now been with him; therefore in the ſetting of the Greek Cities at liberty (after the overthrow of Philip King of Macedonia) the Senate had left it to the Commiſſioners appointed for that work, to deal as they ſhould think fit with Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth, the keys of the Country, and whether out of a deſire of the glory of ſetting all the Greeks at liberty, or to awe and affright him, they decreed, that all ſuch Cities, as well in Aſia as Europe, ſhould be freed. The ten Commiſſioners ſitting now in Greece about theſe affairs, they of Smyrna and Lampſacus (whom he had beſieged) ſent to them for relief, and Antiochus himſelf thinking fit not to anticipate his opportunities, ſent thither alſo his Ambaſſadors, to whom the Commiſſioners lay'd open the pleaſure of the Senate, and in caſe he contain not himſelf and Forces in Aſia, threaten him with War: and withall promiſe that ſome of their number ſhould come to him. Yet he in the beginning of Spring comes over into Europe, got a great part of the Cherſoneſus into his power, and then marching to Lyſimachia, there found the Commiſſioners, who preſſing him to the things formerly mentioned, he demanded by what right the Romans queſtioned with him about Aſia, ſeeing he medled with nothing done in Italy; and added, that the Greek Cities ſhould obtain their liberty, not by their commands, but his bounty. Now it was moved that thoſe of Smyrna and Lampſacus might be heard; which being obtained, and the Delegates uſing their liberty of ſpeech, he out of indignation, that he ſhould be forced to plead with them before thoſe Judges, interrupted them, ſaying the Rhodians (and not the Romans) ſhould have the hearing of the cauſe; and ſo the Treaty ended without any concluſion or agreement at all.

Livius & Appian ut ſupra.

Upon a falſe rumour of Ptolomie's death he reſolved to invade Ægypt.

Hannibal's advice to invade Italy.

Livius lib. 34. Appian ut prius

28. A rumour was ſpred abroad, during this Treaty, that Ptolomy the King of Ægypt was dead, which much affected both parties, yet ſtrove they to hide it from each other: Lucius Cornelius one of the ten, who was alſo ordered to endeavour the reconciliation of the two Kings, demanded a little time to go into Ægypt; and Antiochus being reſtleſs, out of an itching deſire to get that Country into his hands, ſailed with his Fleet back to Epheſus; whence ſending again his Ambaſſadors to treat with T. Flamininus chief of the Commiſſioners (on purpoſe to hold them a little in hand till he could bring about his deſign) came to Patara, where he heard that Ptolomy was alive. Now he changed his purpoſe of invading Ægypt; but withal reſolved for Cyprus, to attempt that Iſland; but ſuch a tempeſt fell upon him, that he almoſt loſt his whole Fleet. Not long after, Hannibal being driven from home (by the malice of ſuch as incenſed the Romans againſt him, whilſt he only endeavoured the Publick good) returned to Antiochus, who though before he did but fluctuate in his reſolutions for the War, yet was now confirmed by him ſo in his purpoſe, that henceforth he thought not ſo much of it, as of the reward of the Victory. Hannibal denied that the Romans could be overcome any where but in Italy, and deſired but one hundred Gallies, ſixteen thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe, with which he would firſt go to Carthage, hoping to draw his Countrymen to revolt, and though that ſhould not ſucceed, yet would he ſeize upon ſome part of Italy. The King cloſing with his propoſitions at this time, he went not himſelf, but ſent a certain Tyrian to Carthage, who under pretence of trading ſhould break the ice; but he being ſuſpected by Hannibal's adverſaries, was glad to ſhift for himſelf, and notice thereof was preſently given to the Romans. In the mean time Antiochus ſent three Ambaſſadors to Rome, who under colour of procuring a right underſtanding, ſhould feel how the Senate ſtood affected. They expoſtulating the matter, that their Maſter ſhould be forced to quit the Cities of Aſia, and forſake his ancient right in Thrace, were referred to the Commiſſioners in Greece for anſwer; to whom repairing, Flamininus and his Collegue, urged that the King ſhould either leave Europe, or the Romans have power to protect their friends in Aſia, and make as many more there as they could. The Ambaſſadors anſwer, they neither can, nor will conclude any thing to the prejudice of their Maſter's crown, and ſo the Peace was not nearer than before.

Livius lib. 35. Appian ibid.

Antiochus intending a War ſeeketh Confederates.

A. M. 3813.
Ol. 147. ann. 1.
V. C. 562.
Antioch. Mag. 32.
Ptol. Epiphan. 12.

29. Antiochus his reſolution being ſet therefore for the War, that he might prevent any thing that would divert or call him back, he reſolved to make alliances with his neighbours. To Ptolomy he married his Daughter Cleopatra (giving with her in portion all Cœleſyria, which before he had taken from him;) to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia another named Antiochis; and a third he offered to Eumenes of Pergamus, but he being acquainted with his deſign to make War upon the Romans, and by this affinity to oblige him to his party, conceiving it alſo his intereſt rather to ſtick to them whom he had ſome ground to think would prove victorious; he waved his offer. In Spring he ſet upon the Pyſidæ, a people inhabiting abut Selga, being deſirous firſt to bring all Aſia to his beck, and at the ſame time came Ambaſſadors from Rome to diſcover his deſigns and preparations, and either to take off the edge of Hannibals hatred, or at leaſt by their entercourſe with him to render him ſuſpected to the King. Viſiting Eumenes firſt, as they had it in charge, they were egged on by him to the War. Sulpitius one of them falling ſick, was forced to ſtay at Pergamus, but Villius hearing how Antiochus was employed, went to Epheſus where Hannibal then lay, and according to his inſtructions often met and diſcourſed with him. Thence he travelled to Apamea, where the King met him; but news coming that Antiochus his Son (whom he had lately ſent into Syria) was dead, it broke off the Treaty; ſo that Villius loath to be unſeaſonable returned to Pergamus, and the King breaking off the War, to Epheſus, where holding ſecret conſultation with one Minio, he gave way that the Ambaſſadors ſhould be called thither. When they had there arrived, they were referred to Minio, and both ſides arguing for themſelves as formerly, came to the ſame concluſion, and the Romans having ſcarcely obtained that they came for, returned home.

Livius & Appian ut prius.

30. The Ambaſſadors being departed, Antiochus then fell into another ſerious debate about the War, to which Hannibal being now ſuſpected was not called, till acquainting him how, when a Child, his Father had made him ſwear at the Altar never to be a friend to the people of Rome, all jealouſies were removed. About the ſame time came Thoas, and others from the Ætolians (who being falln out with

The Ætolians ſtir him up to the War, and he paſſeth over into Greece.

Livius lib. 36.

A. M. 3814.
Ol. 147.*ann.*2.
V. V. 563.
Antioch, Mag. 33.
Ptol. Epiphan. 13.

Marrieth an obſcure Girle at Chalcis.

the Romans about plunder, after the overthrow of Philip at Cynoſcephalæ, had ever ſince greatly grudged, and now ſtirred up the ſeveral Princes againſt them) offering him the Command of their Forces, and exhorting him to paſs over into Greece, where things were ripe enough for the War, and not expect the coming down of his Army from the Inland Countreys. They having gotten Demetrias (a Town of prime note) into their hands by a wile, in confidence of an opportunity thence ariſing, he came over with an Army of ten thouſand Foot, five hundred Horſe, and ſix Elephants, after which going to the general meeting, he was by a publick Decree received as General, and then ſending to ſummon Chalcis, had the Gates opened to him, and ſo eaſily became Maſter of all Eubœa. In the midſt of Winter holding another Council, he thought fit the Theſſalonians ſhould be, by all means, drawn in to joyn with them; but Hannibal preſſed above all things that Philip and the Macedonians might be dealt with; for then as he ſaid, the Theſſalians, and other Græcians (ſeeing themſelves invaded by the Romans) would eaſily return to their accuſtomed duty: he adviſed further, that the Forces with all ſpeed ſhould be ſent for out of Aſia; and this only was obſerved. Antiochus returning to Chalcis, fell in Love with an obſcure Girl, daughter to Cleoptolemus his Hoſt, with whom prevailing at length to marry her, he ſpent all the remaining of the Winter in feaſting and jollity, his Army for Company falling into idleneſs and all exceſs.

The preparations of the Romans reſolved on.

Glabrio the Conſul ſent over.

Overthroweth Antiochus at the Straights of Thermopylæ.

31. Hitherto the Romans had rather ſeverally, every man by himſelf, deſigned him an Enemy, than made any preparations againſt him. Italy was Decreed this year to both the Conſuls; only one of them, if need ſhould require, was to be in readineſs to march to any other place, and Attilius Serranus one of the Prætors, was ordered with his Fleet to go into Greece, and attend the affairs of the Confederates; and with him four Commiſſioners, men picked out, who by their authority might perſwade much. Moreover Marcus Bæbius was commanded to draw down the Legions towards Tarentum and Brunduſium, that thence, if need ſhould be, they might paſs over into Macedonia. But upon Antiochus his croſſing the Helleſpont, Eumenes King of Pergamus ſent his Brother Attalus to acquaint the Senate therewith, and that the Ætolians were preparing to joyn with him; whereupon Bæbius was then ordered, with all his Forces, to paſs over into Epirus, and hover about Apollonia. The next year came over M. Acilius Glabrio the Conſul, with ten thouſand Eoot, two thouſand Horſe, and fifteen Elephants; who taking in divers places held by Antiochus his Garriſons, marched towards the Bay of Malea, took Thaumacha, and waſted the Territories of Hypata. Antiochus ſomething herewith awakned, ſent to the Ætolians to have all their Forces in readineſs, and then came down with leſs then ten thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe; but fewer of the Ætolians came together than uſual, and his own Army, expected out of Aſia, loitered, ſo that wanting it, and forſaken of his Confederates, he fortified himſelf in the Straights of Thermopylæ, and ſent the Ætolians (whereof there were but four thouſand) to keep Heraclea and Hypata. Upon the approach of the Conſul, bethinking himſelf of the Mountains, which he knew had been formerly paſſed by ſome of Xerxes his Army, and fearing the Romans ſhould come over upon his back he procured ſome Ætolians to ſecure the paſſages. But Glabrio hearing of it, ſent M. Porcius Cato (then a Colonel in the Army) and L. Valerius Flaccus to beat them off, which being done by the former, he got over, and approaching the Enemies Camp, they at the firſt ſight ſuppoſed them to be friends; but then again underſtanding their error, caſt away their Arms and fled. But being cloſely purſued five hundred of them only eſcaped, though but fifty of the Romans were miſſing.

Antiochus his acts in Aſia.

32. Antiochus flying to Chalcis, paſſed thence with his new marryed wife unto Epheſus, after whoſe departure the Gates of Chalcis were preſently opened to the Conſul, who having taken in Phocis and Bœotia in his paſſage thither, all Eubœa preſently returned to obedience. Then fell he upon the Ætolians, whom (though not long before they had ſent to the King for aid, yet) now he forced to yield, and after he had uſed their Ambaſſadors ſomething roughly, and threatned to chaſtize them to purpoſe; through the interceſſion of T. Flamininus, gave them liberty to ſend their Ambaſſadors to Rome. Antiochus now lay at Epheſus altogether ſecure of the Romans; but Hannibal told him, he rather wondred they were not there already, than doubted at all of their coming, and procured the Forces to be ſent for out of the upper Provinces; and with thoſe ſhips which were ready the King ſayled into the Cherſoneſus of Thrace, fortifying it, and placed ſtronger Garriſons in Seſtus and Abydus, where the Romans were to paſs over the Helleſpont into Aſia. At this time Livius Salinator being ſent from Rome to ſucceed Attilius in the Government of the Fleet, came with it to Delus, which Antiochus hearing, haſted from Thrace to fight him before the Rhodes and Eumenes ſhould joyn with him; but they coming in in good time, his Fleet was worſted, and chaſed as far as Epheſus.

He is defeated at Sea.

Livius lib. 37.

33. After this defeat he ſet himſelf with all his might to repair his Navy, and left his Son Seleucus in Æolis to look to the Maritime Coaſts. Livius the Roman Admiral coming into the Helleſpont, took Seſtus, and had done the ſame by Abydus, had not Polyxenidas a Fugitive of Rhodes, deſtroyed by Treachery all the Fleet belonging to that Iſland; whereupon he raiſed his ſiege and departed. Seleucus fell upon the Territories of Pergamus, and then beſieged the City it ſelf (Attalus being unable to graple with him in the field) with whom alſo at length Antiochus himſelf joyned, till hearing that the Roman and Rhodian Fleets were coming to relieve the place; and, worſe than this, that Lucius Scipio the Conſul (together with his Brother the African) was already in his march as far as Macedonia, and preparing now to paſs the Helleſpont againſt him, he ſent to Æmylius Rhegillus who had ſucceeded Livius in the Fleet, to treat of a peace. He calling Eumenes from Pergamus, and the Officers of the Rhodians to conſult, theſe were content to Treat, but Eumenes being averſe to it, and urging that nothing could be concluded of, before the coming of the Conſul, an anſwer to that effect was returned to the King, who leaving his Son ſtill before Pergamus, harraſed the Territories of the Roman Confederates, and taking divers places, returned to Sardis. Seleucus was preſently beaten off, and forced to raiſe his ſiege, by one thouſand Foot, and one hundred Horſe, ſent to relieve the place by the Achæans, and Hannibal returning with ſhips from Syria, was met by the Rhodians, who put him to flight, and cauſed him to be blocked up in Pamphilia.

Hannibal worſted at Sea.

A. M. 3815.
Ol. 147. ann. 3.
V. C. 564.
Ant. Mag. 34.
Ptol. Epiphan. 14.

34. Antiochus from Sardis ſent to Pruſias King of Bithinia, to joyn in Confederacy with him againſt the Romans; but he (though he formerly hung in ſuſpenſe, yet) of late was fully drawn to their party by the Letters of the Scipio's, and an Ambaſſage ſent from Rome for the ſame purpoſe. Failing therefore in this enterprize, he went to Epheſus to his Navy, where (concluding that no other way could he hinder the Conſul's paſſing the Helleſpont than by being ſtrongeſt at Sea) he reſolved to try another battel, and ſo ſet upon the Maritime Town near to Epheſus, that the Romans coming in to ſuccour their friends, Polyxenidas his Admiral might have an opportunity to work ſome notable feat. But he engaging with ninety Gallies againſt Eumenes and the Rhodians, who made up a Fleet together of about eighty three, being overmatched both in the valour of his men, and the nimbleneſs of his Veſſels, he loſt forty two of his Navy (thirteen of which, together with the men, were taken) having broken but two of the Romans, and by meer chance carryed a Rhodian away with him to Epheſus. The King now terrified at the meſſage of this third overthrow, madly drew out his Garriſon from Lyſimachia (which might have given a ſtop to the paſſage of the Conſul) leſt it ſhould be cut off; and raiſing his ſiege from before Colophonia, departed to Sardis, whence he ſent into Cappadocia, to Ariarathes his Son-in-law, for aid, and all over elſe where he could bethink himſelf, he raiſed Forces, neglecting in the mean time his true opportunities. For, the Scipio's in the mean while came to Lyſimachia, where they were received with ſuch plenty of all things, as if Proviſion had been made for the Roman Army, and thence marched through the Cherſoneſus of Thrace to the Helleſpont, where all things being in readineſs through the care of Eumenes, they paſſed over without any diſturbance into Aſia.

And Polyxenidas defeated.

Antiochus his imprudence.

Polybius Legat. 23.

He ſendeth to the Conſul about a peace.

35. Antiochus being ſo beſotted as to lye ſtill, and ſuffer the Conſul quietly to come over, was now exceedingly diſcouraged, and ſent out of hand to him, and his Brother, to treat of peace; with order alſo to deal in private with the African about it, whoſe authority he knew would ſway his Brother to either ſide indifferently. The Ambaſſador being arrived at the Roman Camp, deferred the delivering of his meſſage till the African's coming, who was yet behind; but after his arrival, and audience given, had theſe conditions ſet him: To pay all the expences of the War, of which Antiochus had been the cauſe, and not only quit the Cities in Æolis and Ionia but all Aſia on this ſide the Mountain Taurus. Being no whit ſatisfied with the propoſals, he made no further overtures to the Conſul; but, according to his inſtructions, offered to his Brother (in caſe he would procure a peace on the terms propoſed by his Maſter) the reſtitution of his Son who had been taken Priſoner, as much Money as he would ask, and more than that, to be partaker of what the Kingdom it ſelf would amount to. The African anſwered, that the diſcharging of his Son would exceedingly oblige him, and as for the reſt, had he kept Lyſimachia in his hands, fortified the paſſage into the Cherſoneſus of Thrace; or at leaſt had he oppoſed them at the Helleſpont, and then offered theſe conditions, much might have been done for him. As things now ſtood, he adviſed to conſider into what eſtate he had brought himſelf, by all means to decline the War, and refuſe no conditions offered to him. But he thought no harſher terms could be impoſed upon one already Conquered, and therefore caſting off all thoughts of peace, made what Proviſion he could poſſible for a battel.

Rejecting the terms.

He prepareth for a battel.

36. The Conſul being deſirous to do ſomething before Winter (which now drew on) reſolved, if poſſible, to fight him, though, his Brother the African falling ſick, had departed to Elea, to whom Antiochus now to comfort him, reſtored his Son without any ranſom; which hapning as a Cordial to him in that condition, he adviſed him in way of requital (being able to do no more at preſent) that he ſhould not ingage in fight with his Brother, before his return to the Camp. Being much moved with his authority, he declined an ingagement to his utmoſt endeavour, but the Conſul ſtill dogging him from place to place, and being ready to ſtorm his Camp, for fear of utterly diſcouraging his men, he was forced to draw them out. (a) Some ſay he had ſeventy thouſand Foot, and about twelve thouſand Horſe, (though others (b) mention but ſeventy thouſand in all) with fifty four Elephants. The Conſul brought into the field but thirty thouſand, whereof two, being Macedonians, were left to keep the baggage; and ſixteen African beaſts placed in the rear for a reſerve, leſt (being worſted by the Indians) they ſhould break their ranks. The battel was fought near Magneſia a Town ſituate at the foot of the Hill Sipylus. It hapned then that ſuch a miſt fell as blinded ſo the Kings Army, that both the wings thereof could not be ſeen to one ſtanding ſtill in the ſame place; and their weapons were alſo ſpoiled with the wet. His Chariots armed with ſithes which he had placed in the front, proved his ruin: for the Horſes being gored with arrows (according to the direction of Eumenes) brake down all behind them, and ſo diſordered the ranks, that the Avxiliaries fled; which occaſion the Romans taking, preſſed hard upwards, and diſcomfited the whole left wing. In the right he had better fortune; for he put both Horſe and Foot to flight, and drove them to their Camp; but M. Æmilius Lepidus who was left there for the ſecurity of it, met them, and forced them to face about and to charge the purſuing Enemy, ſo that he and Attalus (the Brother of Eumenes, who came in in good time with two hundred Horſe) renewed the battel with ſuch earneſtneſs, that now the King (who ere while gave the charge) betook himſelf to his heels. The Roman Cavalrie, in the purſute, did great execution, and the rather, becauſe of the multitude of Chariots, and Camels, which blocked up the way; inſomuch as fifty four thouſand were ſlain, and one thouſand four hundred taken. Of the Romans fell but three hundred forty nine.

(a) Livius ut ſupra.
(b) Appian in Syriacis.

Wherein he is overthrown.

37. Antiochus, with a few about him, fled to Sardis, and thence to Apamea, making Zeno Governour of the former, and Timon of Lydia; but they were deſpiſed by the Soldiers and Townſmen that held the Caſtle, who gave up the places to the Conſul; which was followed as an example by divers Cities of Aſia. The Conſul being once arrived at Sardis (with his Brother now upon his recovery) the King preſently ſent and deſired ſafe conduct for ſome Commiſſioners to treat of Peace. This being granted, Zeuxis who had formerly governed Lydia, and Antipater the Kings Brothers Son, ſhortly after arrived, deſiring their Maſter might know upon what terms to purchaſe the friendſhip of the People of Rome. Publius Scipio the African, in the name of the reſt, anſwered, that the Romans uſed not to inſult over their conquered Enemies, and therefore nothing ſhould be required of him more than formerly; ſave only to pay fifteen thouſand Talents of Eubæa to defray the charges of the War, by certain portions; four hundred to Eumenes (together with ſuch Corn as was due to him, by virtue of an agreement made with his Father) to give up Hannibal, Thoas the Ætolian, and other incendiaries, and laſtly, to deliver for the performance of theſe conditions twenty Hoſtages. Theſe propoſals being accepted of, Ambaſſadors were out of hand diſpatched to Rome, to pray the confirmation of the Peace, which accordingly was ratified both by Senate and People; and for that Eumenes and the Ambaſſadors of Rhodes, differed about ſome Cities in Aſia, it was ordered by the Fathers, that the People inhabiting on this ſide Taurus, which before obeyed Livius & Appian ut prius. Polyb. Legat. 25.

And hath well nigh the ſame terms as formerly were ſet him.

obeyed Antiochus, ſhould now be ſubject to Eumenes, except Caria and Lydia as far as Mæander : and theſe ſhould be delivered up to the Rhodians. As for the Greek Cities, they which were formerly tributaries to Attalus, ſhould ſo remain under Eumenes his Succeſſor; but ſuch as had been under the juriſdiction of Antiochus, ſhould be left to their own Laws : and ten Commiſſioners were ſent to compoſe all differences riſen betwixt the ſeveral Cities and States.

Juſtin lib. 32. Valerius Maximus. l. 4. c. 1. Juſtin ibid. Strabo lib. 16. & Excerpt. Diodori.

38. Antiochus, unwilling to give up Hannibal, gave him notice of what was required, that he might ſhift for himſelf. The Province of Aſia being taken from him, he ſaid the Conquerors dealt bountifully with him therein; for now ſeeing his Kingdom was contained within moderate bounds, he was only diſcharged from too great a burthen of Government. Two or three years after, he got another Army together, and having declared his Son Seleucus his Succeſſor, made a progreſs into the upper Provinces; where (either for that he really wanted money to pay the Tribute impoſed on him, or took that occaſion to pretend poverty) hearing the Temple of Jupiter Belus in Elymais to be exceeding rich, he went with his Forces by night and ſpoiled it of a vaſt treaſure, making a ſhow as if War had been made upon him by the Inhabitants thereabouts, who getting knowledg of it, came upon him, and without the help of any other, deſtroyed him and his whole Army. This is the end which, by the conſent of Hiſtorians, hapned to him; though one there be * that telleth us, how after he was overcome and baniſhed beyond the Mountain Taurus, he was ſlain by his Companions, whom he had beaten in a drunken fit. He died when he had reigned thirty ſix years, A. M. 3818. in the ſecond of the one hundred forty eighth Olympiad, one hundred and eighty five years before the Æra of Chriſt : M. Æmilius Lepidus, and C. Flaminius being Conſuls.

He is ſlain in Elymais.

* Aurelius Victor de viris illuſtribus c. 4.

His ſon Seleucus ſirnamed Philopater ſucceedeth him.

39. Seleucus his Son ſucceeded him (whom he formerly declared his Succeſſor as was ſaid) in the thirty fifth year of Philip King of Macedonia. This Seleucus Sirnamed Philopater, was no ſtirring man, and might have an excuſe for it, being ſo weakned by that blow his Father received from the Romans. Once he got together a conſiderable force of men, and prepared to paſs over Taurus to the aid of Pharnaces King of Pontus (who now waged War with Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Eumenes of Pergamus) but bethinking himſelf that it was not lawful to do it, by virtue of the League which the People of Rome had made with his Father, he gave over his enterprize. He reverenced much at firſt the Temple of Hieruſalem, allowing out of his own revenues the charges of the publick Sacrifices; but afterwards his bounty was almoſt turned into rapacity by the means of Simon a Benjamite. This man being Captain of the Temple, and in contention with Onias the High Prieſt, when he could not have the better of him, told Apollonius Governor of Cœleſyria and Phœnicia, that in the treaſury there were great ſums of money, which the Prieſts having no need of, it might well enough be taken out into the Kings Coffers. Apollonius acquainting the King with this, he ſent Heliodorus his Treaſurer to ſeize upon the money, to whom Onias declared that it belonged to widows and orphans, that the ſum of it amounted but to four hundred talents of Silver, and two hundred of Gold, and that ſuch was the holineſs of the place, that it muſt not be violated. Heliodorus not being perſwaded by this, entered the Temple, and was ſmitten by an Angel dead for the preſent, but being reſtored by the prayers of Onias, returned to the King, declaring the holineſs of the place, and power of God. Simon after this calumniated Onias, as if he, who had well deſerved of his Nation, had been the cauſe of this evil, and being backed by Apollonius, in his fury proceeded to ſlaughters, ſo that Onias was forc'd to go to Seleucus, and, as ſome have it, got him baniſhed, though it ſeems not incredible that the King was dead ere he came to him, being ſlain by the treachery of Heliodorus after he had reigned twelve years.

A. M. 3818. Ol. 148. ann. 2. V. C. 567. Seleucidarum 126. Ptol. Epiphanis 17. Appian ibib. Excerpt. Diodor. per Valeſium. 2. Maccab. 3

The treachery of Simon a Benjamite againſt his religion and Country.

Seleucus is ſlain.

40. He left a ſon behind him named Demetrius, whom he ſent, being but young, to Rome, an Hoſtage in the room of Antiochus his younger brother; for that he was tyed by the agreement made with his Father, to change the Hoſtages at the pleaſure of the Romans. But when he dyed Antiochus was in his way home come as far as Athens. Eumenes therefore and Attalus, that they might bind him to them, being now a little offended at, and jealous of the Romans, drove out Heliodorus, who affected the Kingdom, and placed him in poſſeſſion of it. He was called by the Syrians Epiphanes or Illuſtrious, becauſe ſtrangers uſurping the Kingdom, he appeared the vindicator of the Dominion of his Anceſtors, though others accounted him rather Epimanes or Mad, becauſe of his Phanatick practices, and by the Angel he was termed a vile perſon. Being poſſeſſed of the Kingdom, he would ſlip privately out, with two other in his company, and wander about the City, keep company and drink with the meaneſt perſons, coming on a ſudden upon them with his cup and muſick. Laying off his robe he put on a gown, and according to the cuſtome of the Roman Candidates (who ſtood for Offices) took the people by the hand, deſiring their voices for the Ædileſhip or Tribuneſhip of the people. Having then obtained the Magiſtracy by the Suffrages of the people after the Roman manner, he ſate and gave Judgment out of an ivory chair with ſuch diligence, as the wiſeſt wondered what he meant, ſome attributing it to ſimplicity, ſome to imprudence, and others to madneſs it ſelf.

Appian in Syriacis. Excerpt. Diodor. Siculi per Valeſium.

Antiochus his brother ſucceedeth him, Sirnamed Epiphanes.

A. M. 3829.
Ol. 151. an. 1.
V. C. 578.
Ptolom. Philometoris 5.

41. In Syria he was not acknowledged at firſt by thoſe who favoured Ptolomy; but afterwards obtained it by a counterfeit clemency, and then having entered into League with Eumenes, ſetled himſelf ſtrongly enough. In the beginning of his reign Jaſon the brother of Onias the third, the High-prieſt of the Jews, purchaſed the Prieſthood of him for three hundred ſixty Talents of Silver, and another rent of eighty Talents; and not ſatisfying himſelf with wronging his brother, promiſed one hundred and fifty more for a Licence to ſet up in Jeruſalem a place of exerciſe for the training up of youth after the faſhion of the Heathen, whereby an inlet was made, as unto idolatry, and prophaneneſs, ſo unto that bloodſhed and cruelty which enſued from the wickedneſs of this Prince, his inſtruments and ſucceſſors. For three years only kept he this Office, being then ſerved in his own kind. For, ſending Menelaus the brother of that Simon whom we before mentioned, to the King, to carry the money promiſed, and ſollicit his affairs, he circumvented him after the ſame manner he had done his brother, promiſing for the Prieſthood, over and above what he payed, three hundred Talents; ſo that he had his deſire, and Jaſon was forced to flie into the Country of the Ammonites. Antiochus being ſeized of Cæleſyria, Ptolomy Philopater, who pretended it belonged to him being paſſed over to his father as his mothers portion, ſought to recover it out of his hands, whereupon he marched down to Ægypt, which, having overthrown his Enemies in battel betwixt Peluſium and the mountain Caſius, he eaſily got into his power, pretending friendſhip to the young King for all this, and a provident care for his affairs. Menelaus taking occaſion at his abſence, took divers Golden Veſſels out of the Temple at Jeruſalem, ſome of which he gave away, and others he ſold to Tyre, and other places, for which being accuſed of Sacrilege by Onias the lawful-High-prieſt, he procured him to be murdered. Going on in ſuch miſchiefs he was accuſed to the King; but bribing Ptolomy the ſon of Dorymenes, got off, and procured the death of his accuſers. At this time Antiochus went down the ſecond time with a great power into Ægypt, which he recovered again (the King thereof flying before him) and getting the fortified Towns into his hands, there ſtaied, till the ſons of the Jews procured his return to their deſtruction.

Hieronym. in Dan. cap. 11.
Appian ibid.

Jaſon the Jew having bought the High-Prieſthood out of his brothers hands, is ſerved in the ſame manner by Menelaus.

2 Maccab. 4.

Antiochus ſeizeth on Ægypt.

Again.

2 Maccab. 5.

42. A falſe rumour being ſpread abroad of his death, Jaſon having got one thouſand men at his heels, ſet upon Jeruſalem, and getting the City into his hands, forced Menelaus into the Caſtle, and then made ſlaughters, as if he had not been amongſt his Countrymen and kindred, but foreigners and Enemies, yet obtained he not the Prieſthood, but was forced to betake himſelf back into the Country of the Ammonites, where being accuſed to Aretas King of the Arabians, he fled from place to place like a Vagabond, hated of all men as a forſaker of the Laws, and as the publick Enemy of his Country, and died at length at Lacedæmon. Antiochus hearing in Ægypt that they at Hieruſalem rejoyced at the report of his death, and ſuſpecting becauſe of theſe ſtirs of Jaſon, that Judæa was about to rebel, in a great rage departed thence, and came and took the City by force, and giving no quarter for three days ſpace, put eighty thouſand to the Sword, and afterwards ſold as many. Yet not contenting himſelf with this, he prophanely entered the Temple, Menelaus that Traitor to his Country being his guide, and rifling it of the holy Veſſels, killed ſwine upon the Altar, and with the broath of the fleſh of them ſprinkled the place; then taking away with him one thouſand eight hundred Talents, he got him back to Antioch, leaving behind him to afflict ſtill the people at Jeruſalem Philip a Phrygian, and Andronicus in Samaria; and beſides them Menelaus more grievous to, and deſpightful againſt, his fellow Citizens, than the other. Two years alſo after this, he ſent Apollonius a cruel man with an Army of twenty two thouſand, commanding him to kill all that were arrived at ripeneſs of age, and ſell the women and children for ſlaves. He coming to Jeruſalem, kept himſelf ſtill until the Jaſon rageth at Jeruſalem againſt his Countrymen.

Antiochus his cruelty and prophaneneſs againſt Jews and Temple.

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 13.

the Sabbath, and then taking the opportunity of the ſolemnity of the day, ſet upon thoſe imployed therein, then running through the City ſlew a great multitude, plundering and ſetting it on fire, pulled down the houſes and walls round about, and led away many women and children into captivity, whilſt Antiochus his Maſter was buſie again in his attempts upon Ægypt.

Excerpt. Diodori per Val.

He getteth all Ægypt into his hands except Alexandria.

Juſtin lib. 24. Polybius Legat. 84. Livius l. 44, & 45.

43. For Ptolomy being ſtirred up by Æulaius the Eunuch to attempt again the recovery of Cæleſyria, to prevent that, he went down into Ægypt, where putting him again to flight, he might have deſtroyed all his men, but riding to and fro himſelf to forbid it, he thereby procured ſuch love, as he preſently got into his hands Peleuſium, and not long after all Egypt, except Alexandria. Ptolomy after this ſent his Ambaſſadors to him, with thoſe of the Achæans, Athenians, and others, to excuſe the matter, and lay all the blame upon the Eunuch; but getting no good thereby, after he had ſpent ſome time careleſly without any further proviſion for his affaires, he departed to his younger brother to Alexandria, whom the Citizens there had made King after his overthrow. The Alexandrians at firſt received him, and made him partaker with his brother, but afterwards for ſome diſtaſte baniſhed him again, at which Antiochus took an opportunity, as thinking it beſt to accompliſh his deſigns, by pretending to protect and reduce him into his Kingdom; wherefore he engaged at Peleuſium with Ptolomy the younger in a naval fight, and getting the better, on a ſudain laid a bridge over the Nile and beſieged Alexandria. Ptolomy and Cleopatra his ſiſter being in this danger, ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome to crave aid; but he attempting once the walls, and experiencing the ſtrength of the places, having ſent his Ambaſſadors alſo to Rome after the other, raiſed his ſiege. About this time came the Ambaſſadors of the Rhodians to him to intercede, whom he put off, ſaying, that his intent was onely to re-eſtabliſh the elder Ptolomy, which if the Alexandrians would admit of, all things with his conſent might be compoſed. Preſently after this, leaving at Memphis Ptolomy the elder, for whoſe ſake he pretended to wage this War, and giving up the reſt of Ægypt to him, he only left a ſtrong Garriſon at Peluſium, and ſo departed into Syria, concluding with himſelf, that keeping this in his power, the key of the Country, he might ſafely ſuffer the two brothers to try out the quarrel; for the Conqueror being wearied beforehand, would eaſily be brought under by him.

A. M. 3835
Ol. 152. an. 3.
V. C. 584.
Antioch. Epiphan. 6.
Ptolom. Philomet. 10.

Retreateth.

Idem ibid. Polyb. Legat. 89.

44. The Ambaſſadors of Ptolomy obtained their deſire, the Romans being jealous of the increaſing power of Antiochus. For, C. Popillius Lænas, with two others, were ſent with order firſt to go to Antiochus, after that to Ptolomy, and to denounce unto them, that except they gave over the War, him that was the hinderer of the Peace they would not account as their friend or allie. Whilſt they were on their way, Ptolomy the elder bethinking himſelf what little cauſe he had to truſt Antiochus, ſent to his brother, and through the mediation of Cleopatra was reconciled to him, and reigned with him, the Alexandrians being willing to receive him, becauſe their City was much ſtraightened for proviſions, by reaſon of the Warr. Antiochus hearing this, contrary to his former pretences, was grievouſly fretted, and then more eagerly than ever preparing for the War againſt them both, ſent a Fleet againſt Cyprus, where Ptolomie's Forces were worſted, and in the beginning of Spring marched down for Ægypt. In Cæleſyria the Ambaſſadors of Philometer met him, and gave him thanks in their Maſters name, for that by his means he had obtained the Kingdom, deſiring he would continue his friend, and protect what he had helped him to, and rather ſay what he would have done, than by force to attempt it as an Enemy; but he replied, he would neither withdraw his Fleet nor Army, except he had all Cyprus, Peluſium, and all the ground lying upon that Mouth of the Nile given up unto him, and he ſet a day whereon at furtheſt he would have an anſwer to theſe conditions. Popillius and his companions hearing of his deſign (Perſeus of Macedonia being now overthrown) made haſte to get to him before he reached Alexandria, and ſtaying ſome time at Rhodes, they came to him, when he was but four miles off from the City, upon the ſight of whom he reached out his hand to Popilius; but he being a ſevere man, reached him the Tables, wherein was written the Decree of the Senate, which commanded him to abſtain from War, bidding him firſt to read them. Having peruſed them, he ſaid he would conſider with his friends what was to be done, and then give an anſwer, but Popilius after a certain inſolent faſhion made a Circle round about him with his Rod, and commanded him to anſwer before he went out of it; at which the King being amazed, after a little pauſe, ſaid he would do whatſoever the people of Rome commanded; and ſo within a ſhort time prefixed, grievouſly unwilling, and ſorrowing, but judging

He returneth into Egypt.

Livius ibid. Polyb. Legat. 92. Valerius Maximus lib. 6. cap. 4. Appian ut prius.

But is taken off by the Romans from further attempts.

it fit for the preſent to yield to the time, he drew out his Forces from Egypt and Cyprus.

1 Maccab. 1. & 2 Maccab. 6.

He perſecuteth the Jews for their Religion.

45. After this he publiſhed an Edict, commanding all throughout his Dominions to obſerve one and the ſame Religion, and relinquiſhing their own and former Rites, to conform themſelves to the Religion of the Greeks under pain of death, ſending divers Overſeers who ſhould compel each people to the obſervation of his Order. Into Judæa he ſent an old man of Athens, with order to defile the Temple, and name it the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, as that at Gerizim the Temple of Jupiter Hoſpitalis; he commanded the ſacrifices to be left off, the Sabbath he prohibited, he commanded them to defile the Sanctuary, built up Altars, Groves, and Chappels to Idols, to Sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beaſts, not to Circumciſe their ſons, but to forget the Law: Moreover, an order was ſent to the Neighbouring Cities, that they ſhould force the Jews to partake of their ſacrifices, and kill thoſe which would not come over to their Rites, ſo that many by fear obeyed, the Temple was polluted by the dalliances of the Gentiles, the abomination of deſolation, viz. the abominable Idol of Jupitur Olympius was ſet up therein, the Scriptures burnt, and a Decree publiſhed, that with whomſoever they ſhould be found, or whoſoever ſhould approve them, ſhould be put to death. Many yet were they that ſtood out, contemned the Kings Edict, and defiled not themſelves, ſo that being inraged he cauſed divers to be brought before him to force them by Torments, but they ſtood out couragiouſly, and enduring the pains ſealed the truth with their blood; amongſt whom are very notable the Mother and her ſeven Sons, from the eldeſt of them called Maccabæans. The rage of this perſecution coming to Modin, a Town ſituate near to Dioſpolis found ſome oppoſition; for there Mattathias a Prieſt eminent in degree, eſpecially for his five Sons, not onely refuſed to ſacrifice, but killed a Jew at the Altar that was ſo doing, and after that the Kings Officer who was ſent to compel the people. Then exhorting all that were zealous for their Law to follow him, he fled with his Sons into the Mountain.

1 Maccab. 2.

Mattathias maketh oppoſition.

46. Many went out after him, and lived with their Wives, Children, and Cattel, in Dens, and Caves, which coming to the knowledge of Philip the Governour of Jeruſalem, the Garriſon Soldiers were preſently drawn out to purſue them, ſo that falling on them on the Sabbath, and they not at all reſiſting for the obſervance thereof, they caſt in fire, and burnt them to the number of one thouſand perſons. Mattathias, and they that were with him hearing this, reſolved for the time to come to repulſe the Enemy on the Sabbath, and then the Aſidæans, a ſort of religious men joyning with him, with ſuch as dayly fled out of the Country, he made up a little Army, and therewith proſecuted the wicked ones, and drove them to fly to the Nations about, pulled down the Altars, and Circumciſed ſuch Children as they found in the Coaſts of Iſrael; then after he had been Captain of this wandring Company the ſpace of a year, he died, leaving his ſon Simon for a Counſellor, and Judas ſirnamed Maccabæus for a Captain to them. This Mattathias was the Son of John, and Grand-ſon to Simeon, ſirnamed Aſmonæus. * Jacobus Cappellus thinketh that this Simeon was Simon the ſecond, ſon of Onias the ſecond, and Grand-ſon to Simon the firſt, ſirnamed Juſt. But Schinlerus thinketh this Simeon to have been the Son of Hiſmonæus. From the * words of Joſephus it ſhould ſeem that Mattathias was the Great-grand-ſon of Aſmonæus, ſo called, or Haſmon, from whom his poſterity were named Haſmonæans. * David uſeth the word Haſmanim to expreſs Ambaſſadors, Princes, or Great-men. It is alſo obſerved that the Jews in Italy call the Cardinals Haſmannim or Haſmonæans.

1 Maccab. 3.
* Ad A. M. 3832.
* Ματθιας ὗιος Ἰωάννȣ τȣ̃ Συμεῶνος τȣ̃ Ἀσσαμωναίȣ.
* Pſal. 68. 32.

And Judas his ſon after him.

47. Judas being aſſiſted by his brethren, and his Fathers followers, fell upon the Enemy, burnt divers of their Towns, and ſeized upon the Commodious places, coming uſually upon them in the night, ſo as he forced many of them to quit the Land; Apollonius the Governour of Samaria coming againſt him, he overthrew, and ſlew him, and getting his Sword, ever after uſed it in the Wars, and after him he overthrew alſo Seron, who governed Cæle-Syria. Antiochus in this mean while lying about Antioch, made there Magnificent Games and Shows, imploying the money he had got in Egypt, and out of the Temples he had rifled, to that end and purpoſe, and entertaining his Gueſts in a vile and ſervile kind of obſervance. This being ended, an Ambaſſador from Rome arrived at his Court, ſent on purpoſe to ſpy out his deſigns. Whom he received with ſuch courteſie, as overdoing in that point, he eaſily concealed the grudge he had conceived for his ſtop at Alexandria, and the bent of his mind which was ſufficiently alienated from the Romans. But hearing of the ſucceſs of Maccabæus, and the loſs of his Forces, he was exceedingly inraged, muſtered all his Army, to which he gave a years pay, and commanded they ſhould be ready at all occaſions.

Polyb. Legat. 101. & 109.

Which inrageth Antiochus.

1 Maccab. 3.

Who intending to go againſt him, yet changeth his mind and giveth order to Lyſias to deſtroy the Jews.

2 Maccab. 8.

He ſendeth ſeveral Captains into Judæa.

48. He purpoſed to march againſt Maccabæus, but ſeeing his Treaſury exhauſted by the pay of the Army (for that the Jews now being revolted, he thereby loſt his three hundred Talents of annual Tribute, and much alſo which he was wont to receive from other places, which being unwilling to quit their own religions as well as the other, were in combuſtions) and fearing he ſhould not have to ſatisfie for his gifts, wherein he took a pride to exceed all his anceſtors, he reſolved to make a progreſs into Perſia, and the upper Countries, to gather the Tributes thereof, and fill his Coffers. But before his departure, making Lyſias his Kinſman Governour of the Regions betwixt Euphrates and Egypt, to whoſe care he alſo committed his young ſon, he gave to him half his forces, and this in charge, to blot out the Nation of the Jews utterly, and to give their Country to ſtrangers to inhabit. Philip the Governour of Jeruſalem ſeeing to what an height Maccabæus was grown, wrote to Ptolomy the ſon of Dorymenes the Governour of Cœleſyria and Cilicia, who preſently diſpatched Nicanor one of his chiefeſt friends, and the ſon of Patroclus with twenty thouſand men, joyning Gorgias to him, a man of great experience; and not long after he himſelf was ſent by Lyſias with more aid, ſo that all three together made an Army of forty thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe. Antiochus at this time was behind hand in his Tribute to the Romans two thouſand Talents, therefore Nicanor reſolved to raiſe this money out of Jewiſh ſlaves, and ſent about for Chapmen for them, promiſing ninety perſons for a Talent; ſo that one thouſand Merchants came together with ready money into his Camp; more forces alſo from Syria and the Countrey of the Philiſtins came in to him.

1 Maccab. 4.

But they are defeated.

And Lyſias himſelf.

2 Maccab. 10.

49. Judas having kept a faſt at Morpah (becauſe the Heathen now held Jeruſalem, and the Temple was defiled) for his good ſucceſs againſt ſo great an Army, having himſelf but ſix or ſeven thouſand men, gave all the fearful, thoſe that had built Houſes, married Wives, or planted Vineyards leave to depart, according to the Law of Moſes; then marched down to Emmaus where the Enemy was incamped. That night Gorgias thinking to oppreſs the Jews, at unawares, came to their Tents with a party of five thouſand Foot and one thouſand Horſe; but Judas having notice thereof turned it to his own advantage, reſolving to go and fall upon Nicanor in the abſence of the other, whom he knew to be the more experienced Captain. Gorgias finding the Camp empty, thought the owners had fled for fear of him into the Mountains, and ſought for them there, but they being got to Nicanor ingaged with him in the morning, and routed his whole Army, laying above nine thouſand dead upon the place; ſo that he and his men perceiving preſently what was done by the ſmoke of their Camp now ſet on fire, fled amain, and the Jews coming to plunder the field found great Treaſure, of which part being ſet aſide for the infirm, Widows, and Orphans, the reſt the Soldiers divided amongſt them. After this, Judas overthrew Timotheus and Bachides, both of the Kings party, killing above twenty thouſand men, ſo that then they recovered many ſtrong holds, at which Lyſias was exceedingly troubled, things falling out ſo contrary to his expectations, and the next year invaded Judæa with an army of ſixty thouſand choice foot, and five thouſand horſe, but being met by Judas with ten thouſand men, he was received with ſuch reſolution that with the loſs of five thouſand he was glad to retreat to Antioch, intending greater preparations for his next expedition. Judas returning to Jeruſalem cleanſed the Temple, and offered ſacrifice upon a new Altar, after the Heathen had held it juſt three years; then kept they a feaſt for eight dayes, and ordered it to be obſerved to poſterity, which in the Goſpel is called the Feaſt of the Dedication.

Appian. in Syriacis.

Antiochus in the mean time proſpereth in the upper Countreys.

2 Maccab. 9.

50. Antiochus in the mean while waged War againſt Artaxias King of Armenia, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, as cutting off many of his men, he took him priſoner. Afterwards hearing that the City Elymais in Perſia was exceeding rich, and therein a Temple (of Venus, or Diana, both being aſſerted) wherein were laid up very rich Arms left by Alexander the Great, he being greedy of this prey, attempted to rifle them both, but the Inhabitants taking Arms, repelled, and cauſed him ſhamefully to retreat. Being come to Ecbatane, he there heard of the overthrow of Nicanor and Timotheus, and then journeying towards Babylon, in the Borders of Perſia, of the defeat given to that great Army of Lyſias, the throwing down the Idol of Jupiter Olympius, and the fortification of the Sanctuary, whereupon he fell into a great rage, reſolved to revenge himſelf upon the Jews for his ſhameful retreat, and commanded commanded his Chariot driver to make ſpeed, ſaying, he would make Jeruſalem the common burying place of them when he ſhould come thither. Scarce had he made an end of threatning, when he was ſuddenly ſtruck with exceeding torment in his bowels, which yet reduced him not to any good conſtitution of mind, he ſtill breathing fury and revenge againſt the Jews, and crying out to make haſte, but the Chariot being driven very faſt, he was ſhaken out of it, and by the fall ſo ſore bruiſed, that he was conſtrained to betake himſelf to his Litter, and then Worms crawled out of his body, the fleſh whereof rotted, and fell from him yet alive. None could endure to carry him for the ſtench thereof, which alſo offended his Army, wherefore being forced to ſtay his journey, he ſtayed at Taba, a Town in Perſia. Before his death he confeſſed this to have falln upon him for the injuries offered to the Jews, acknowledged the Soveraignty of God, and his own pride, vowed if God would reſtore him, to grant immunities to his people, to adorn his Temple, to turn Jew himſelf, and to travel through the habitable world to declare his ſtrength and power. And when he perceived his end to draw near, he wrote moſt kind Letters to the Jews, deſiring them to ſtand faithful to him, and his ſon after him, then conſtituting Philip, who had been brought up with him, the Protector and Guardian of his ſon, till he ſhould come to age, he died, after he had reigned twelve years, A. M. 3841. after the beginning of Seleucus the 149. the firſt of the 154 Olympiad.

And in his return hearing of the miſcarriage of Lyſias, and the reſt breathes revenge, but is preſently ſtruck with a foul diſeaſe.

A. M. 3841. Ol. 154. ann. 1. Seleucida 149. Ptol. Philomet. 17.

And dieth.

Antiochus Eupater.

51. Antiochus his Son, a Child of nine years old ſucceeded him, ſirnamed Eupator by the Syrians for his fathers virtue. Him Lyſias governed, who had brought him up; ſo that Philip his deſigned Guardian by his Father fled into Egypt, and Ptolomy the Son of Dorymenes, for that being convinced how the Jews were wronged, he went about to compoſe the difference with them, was forced to drink poyſon. Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus Philopater, whom we before ſaid to have been ſent Hoſtage to Rome, hearing there of his Uncles death, deſired of the Senate that he might be reſtored to his Fathers Kingdom, ſo long unjuſtly detained from him, affirming he eſteemed of Rome as his own Country, in which he had been brought up; of the ſons of Senators as his Brethren, and themſelves as ſo many Fathers; but they judging it more for their intereſt that the Kingdom of Syria ſhould be under a child than one of mans Eſtate (ſuch as he was, being now twenty three years old) reſolved it ſhould be ſecured to Antiochus, and preſently ordered three Commiſſioners to be ſent thither to ſettle the affairs thereof, according to inſtructions received from themſelves, which might now be done eaſily enough, the King himſelf being ſo young, and his Courtiers thinking they were well enough dealt withall, ſo Demetrius was not reſtored; but eſpecially they gave them in charge to burn all the Ships they ſhould find there, not allowed to Antiochus by the League, and hough the Legs of all the Elephants, and diminiſh the Kings ſtrength as much as poſſible. Theſe things being executed, provoked one Leptinus ſo far as he ſlew Cn. Octavius the chief Commiſſioner (and who firſt brought the Conſulſhip into his family, out of which Auguſtus Cæſar iſſued) whom Lyſias, though he was ſuſpected to incenſe the People againſt the Romans, honourably buried, and diſpatched quickly Ambaſſadors to Rome in the Kings name to diſclaim any conſciouſneſs to the fact.

Appian in Syriacis.

2 Maccab. 10.

Demetrius the Son of Seleucus Philopater and the right heir, deſireth of the Romans to reſtore him; but they out of policy refuſe it.

Polyb. Legat. 107.

52. Gorgias being Governour of the parts about Judæa, fomented a continual War with the Jews, and with him joyned the Idumeans, who received all runnagates, and gave them entertainment. Againſt thoſe therefore, Judas Maccabæus marched, took divers places, and put twenty thouſand to the Sword, after which turning upon the Ammonites, he overthrew them in divers ingagements, and taking Jazer with the Territories thereto belonging, returned again into Judæa. Timotheus the General of the Ammonites hereat inraged, and gathering many men out of Aſia, came as if he would devour Judæa; but Judas with his having humbled themſelves, and called upon the name of God, gave him battel, in which twenty thouſand five hundred Foot, and ſix hundred of his Horſe being ſlain, he fled to Gazara, a ſtrong Garriſon kept by his brother, but that being taken he was pulled out of a Cave where he had hid himſelf, and ſlain, together with the other. After this the Nations about Galaad and Galile afflicting ſore the Jews, Maccabæus divided his Army into three parts, one of which (viz. three thouſand men) he delivered to his brother Simon to relieve them of Galile, the ſecond to Joſeph the Son of Zechariah, to defend Judæa, giving it in charge not to fight with any Enemy till his return, with the other he marched himſelf to the ſuccour of them in Galaad. Simon fought many battels with the Enemy, and killed many of them, brought his Countreymen

2 Maccab. 10.

Gorgias fomenteth a War with the Jews.

1 Maccab. 5.

Judas is victorious.

men into Judæa with great gladneſs, and Judas had the like ſucceſs, taking many Towns, and putting many thouſands to the Sword; but thoſe that were left at home deſiring alſo upon the report hereof to atchieve ſome military glory, marched to Jamnia, whence Gorgias iſſuing out, put them to flight, and following the chaſe as far as the borders of Judæa, killed about two thouſand of them.

2 Maccab. 11. & 12.

53. Lyſias the King's Protector and chief Miniſter of State, was diſpleaſed at the report of Judas's ſucceſs, and taking eighty thouſand Foot with all the Horſe along with him, reſolved to make Jeruſalem an habitation for the Greeks, the Temple to pay tribute, and the Prieſthood thereof to ſet to ſale every year. He came and beſieged Bethſura nigh to Jeruſalem; but Maccabæus then meeting with him killed eleven thouſand of his Foot, with one thouſand ſix hundred Horſe-men, and forced him with the reſt (many of them wounded and diſarmed) to ſhift for themſelves. Conſidering this defeat, and that God fought for the Jews, he ſent to them to treat of Peace, and according to his promiſe brought the King to yield to ſuch reaſonable conditions as were offered by Maccabæus; but it was quickly broken by Timotheus, and other Captains, that governed the places adjoyning to Judæa, at which time they of Joppe alſo drawing two hundred Jews craftily on ſhipboard, drowned them in the Sea. Judas hearing this, went and burned all the Veſſels in the Haven at Joppe, and underſtanding that the inhabitants of Jamnia had alſo intended ſuch a thing againſt his Country-men, he did as much for them; then marching againſt Timotheus, the Arabian Nomades ſet upon him, being five thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, but were ſo entertained, as yielding themſelves, with a promiſe of giving up their Cattel, and being at his beck for the time to come, they obtained Peace. After this he ſtormed the City Caſpis (wherein was ſuch a ſlaughter made of the Inhabitants, that a Lake thereto adjoyning ſeemed to be full of blood) and then proceeding ſeven hundred and fifty Furlongs came to the Jews called Tubieni inhabiting the Land of Tob (concerning which mention is made in the Book of Judges) whence Timotheus was departed, but had left a ſtrong Garriſon, which being taken by Doſitheus and Soſipater two of Judas his Officers, they put to the ſword above ten thouſand men.

Lyſias again defeated.

And the Scythian Nomades.

Chap. 11.

1 Maccab. 5. & 2 Maccab. 12.

54. Timotheus gathered together from the Nations round about him and the Arabians a hundred and twenty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand five hundred Horſe, wherewith, putting up the women and children into a ſtrong Fort called Carnion, he came and pitched his Tents againſt Raphon beyond the brook; but his great multitude was ſo ſurprized with fear upon the approaching of Judas, that every man ſhifted for himſelf, and what by their running upon one anothers Swords, and the purſute which Maccabæus followed on with much earneſtneſs, thirty thouſand of them were ſlain, and he himſelf fell into the hands of Doſitheus and Soſipater, from whom he obtained his liberty, upon promiſe of diſmiſſing ſuch of their Country-men as he had taken. Judas then proceeding took Carnion, wherein twenty five thouſand were put to the Sword, after which he gathered all the Jews out of Galaad to bring them into Judæa, and for that the City Ephron, through which they muſt needs paſs, denyed them entrance, they took it by force, and deſtroying the Inhabitants, went through and came up to Jeruſalem to the Feaſt of Pentecoſt. The Feaſt being ended, he taking three thouſand Foot, and four hundred Horſe along with him, went and fought with Gorgias, whom one Doſitheus of Bacenor his Company had once taken, but holding him by the Cloak, a certain Thracian came and cut off his ſhoulder, ſo that the Priſoner eſcaped. After the Victory the Jews coming to ſtrip and bury ſuch of their own party as had faln that day, found under their coats certain things dedicated to the idols of Jamnia, ſo that it appearing that this being forbidden them by the Law was the cauſe of their death, they betook themſelves by Prayer to God, intreating that it might not be charged upon them all. After this Judas ſubdued the Edomites, and the Philiſtines, their idols he burnt, and overthrew their altars, and then returning into Judæa, for that he found the Kings Garriſon Souldiers which yet kept the Caſtle to ſtraighten and infeſt the Iſraelites about the Sanctuary, with all the People, he beſieged them cloſe, but ſome of them with certain Jewiſh fugitives getting out, went ſtraight to Antiochus, and perſwaded him with all expedition to come and give a check to the growing power of the Jews.

As alſo Timotheus.

And Gorgias.

The Edomites and Philiſtines ſubdued.

1 Maccab. 6.

Ibid. & 2 Maccab. 13.

55. Antiochus gathering together all his friends and Captains, and a great Army (concerning the number of which the two Books of Maccabees differ) in a great rage marched thither, intending to deal worſe with them than his father had done before him, and to him Menelaus joyned himſelf, hoping by his means to regain the Prieſthood.

Antiochus beſiegeth Bethſura,

Which being taken, he beſiegeth Jeruſalem,

But is called away by the motions of Philip.

Prieſthood. Paſſing through Idumæa he came and ſate down before Bethſura, where Judas by night with a choice party fell upon his Camp, and piercing as far as his own Tent ſlew four thouſand men, and the prime Elephant, with thoſe upon him, and giving an Alarm to the whole Army at break of the day, ſafely retreated, whereupon the King marched towards him the next day, and coming to an engagement loſt ſix hundred men more; but the Jews ſeeing themſelves overpowered, retreated. Then returned he to the ſiege, which Judas ſore moleſted, cutting off many of his men, and relieving the beſieged with proviſions, who being not provided within themſelves, becauſe this was the Sabbatical year, yielded up the Town upon compoſition. Antiochus having herein placed a Garriſon marched up to Jeruſalem, and there made all proviſion poſſible for gaining it, all manner of engines being raiſed for the caſting of fire and ſtones; which the beſieged reſiſted as well as they might by others of their own, but as for proviſions, were in no better condition than they of Bethſura had been, which gave opportunity enough to the King; but before he could perfect his work, came news that Philip, whom his Father had ordained to be his guardian, being returned out of Egypt, was coming with the Forces which Epiphanes had left in Perſia and Media to recover his right uſurped by Lyſias. Hereupon both he and his Captains were preſently perſwaded by Lyſias (becauſe their proviſions began to fail, the place was ſtrong, and the affairs of the Kingdom required it) to make Peace with the beſieged upon ſuch terms as they required.

A Temple built to God at Heliopolis by the procurement of Onias.

56. Going to the Temple he offered ſacrifice, and ſhewed civility and reſpect towards the place, but a little after conſidering the ſtrength thereof, cauſed the wall round about to be demoliſhed, contrary to his oath. Then returning to Ptolemais, the Inhabitants being great Enemies to the Jews, ſtickled hard to break the League, but Lyſias by his defence quieted their minds, and confirmed the Peace. The King haſting thence towards Antioch, Lyſias accuſed Menelaus the High-prieſt to him, as an incendiary, and he that had been the cauſe of the War, ſo that being thrown into a Tower full of aſhes, he there miſerably ended his life, and in his room was ſubſtituted one Alcimus of Aron's line, but not of the family of the Prieſts, through Lyſias his direction, which Onias the ſon of the laſt Onias the Prieſt underſtanding, went into Ægypt, where inſinuating himſelf into Ptolomy Philometor and Cleopatra, he obtained a Temple like that at Jeruſalem to be built in the Province of Heliopolis, and himſelf to be made Prieſt thereof. Antiochus coming to Alexandria, found Philip Maſter thereof, but ſetting upon it he took it by force, and taking him therein put him to death, and ſo quickly quieted theſe ſtirs, being reſerved with his Guardian, though but a little time, for others more dangerous. His Ambaſſadors now, which Lyſias had ſent about the death of Octavius, had been at Rome, where labouring to clear him of the fact, they were ſent back without anſwer, whereat Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus being much ſtartled, began to caſt again in his head how to obtain his freedom, and the Kingdom, according to his title, which was ſo clear and evident.

A. M. 3842.
Ol. 145. ann. 2.
Seleucidarnm 150.
Antiochi Eupatoris 2.
Ptolom. Philolemet. 18.
V. C. 591.
Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 15.

Polybius Legat. 114.
1 Maccab. 7. & 2 Maccab. 14.

Demetrius the right heir eſcapeth from Rome.

57. Conſulting with Polybius the Achæan and Hiſtorian, whether he ſhould not once more move the Senate in the buſineſs, he adviſed him not to daſh himſelf twice againſt the ſame Rock, but attempt ſomething of himſelf worthy of a Kingdom, hinting thereby what he would have him to do. But he being ruled by one Apollonius his intimate friend, but a young unexperienced man, requeſted the Fathers again, that at leaſt he might not be conſtrained to ſtay there as an Hoſtage, ſeeing they had ſecured the Kingdom of his Couſin Antiochus. They yet remained in the ſame opinion, and reſolved as formerly, ſo that then he conſulted how to eſcape, firſt with Diodorus a cunning man, who was come from Syria, and had belonged to him, and then with Polybius, who procured Menethyllus the Ægiptian Ambaſſador to hire a Carthaginian ſhip juſt then ſailing for Tyre; ſo that Diodorus being ſent before to feel the Peoples mind, and ſeek for advantages, he taking a few friends along with him ſupped at a friends houſe, whither, for fear he ſhould ſtay too long, Polybius ſent him a ſecret hint, not to let ſlip this opportunity; whereupon making as though he was ſick, he aroſe from the table, and came that night to Oſtia upon the mouth of Tyber. Menethyllus going before told the Maſter of the ſhip, that he had received orders from his Prince to reſide ſtill at Rome; but that he would ſend ſome young men of approved fidelity to him, to acquaint him with the affairs of his negotiation: So Demetrius and his followers going on ſhipboard, away they ſailed by break of day. At Rome nothing was known of his eſcape till the fourth day. On the fifth the Senate met about it; yet did not make any proviſion

A. M. 3843.
Ol. 154. ann. 3.
V. V. 592.
Seleucidarum 151.
Ptol. Philom. 19.

viſion for the purſuing of him, thinking it to be too late; but a few days after, they ſent three Commiſſioners into Greece, who viewing the affairs there, were commanded thence to paſs into Aſia, and amongſt other things have an eye to what he ſhould attempt.

58. Landing in Lycia, he thence wrote to the Senate, that he had no intentions to diſturb his Couſin Antiochus, but only revenge upon Lyſias the death of Octavius; then getting into his hands Tripolis, a Town of Phœnicia, as ſent by the Senate to poſſeſs the Kingdom, none gain-ſaid him; ſo that he ſeized alſo upon Sparnea. Thence, having gotten ſome forces together, he marched towards Antioch, out of which Antiochus, with Lyſias his Covernour (for that they thought he was ſent by the Romans, and therefore feared to oppoſe him) coming out to meet him in a friendly manner, was preſently made away, after he had reigned about two years. Demetrius having thus obtained the Kingdom, diſplaced Heraclides, whom Epiphanes his Uncle had made Treaſurer at Babylon, and his Brother Timarchus, whom he had alſo placed Governour there; for that he had badly behaved himſelf in his Office, whence from the Babylonians he got the ſirname of Soter, the next after Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus Nicator, as * Appian obſerveth. The Roman Commiſſioners being now come to Ariarathes into Cappadocia, he ſent Menocharis thither to them, to deal with them about his confirmation in the Kingdom; offered alſo to Ariarathes the Widow of Perſeus of Macedonia, and his ſiſter to wife; but he refuſed her for fear of giving offence to the Romans. After the return of Menocharis and his report, thinking it his main intereſt to obliege theſe men, he caſt off all other things, and labouring to pleaſe them, ſent firſt to them into Pamphylia, then to Rhodes, offering to do any thing whereby to purchaſe his being acknowledged King by the Romans, and Tiberius one of the Commiſſioners ſtood him in great ſtead for the obtaining of this his deſire. He ſhortly after ſent Menocharis, and others in Ambaſſage to Rome, and with them Leptines the murderer of Octavius (who offered himſelf to be ſent) and a Crown of Gold in token of his thankfulneſs for his good uſage all the time of his being an Hoſtage. The Senate long deliberating upon the buſineſs, reſolved at length not to receive Leptines, leſt they ſhould ſeem to be ſatisfied for the publick affront; but rather lay the blame upon all Syria, and reſerve to themſelves an occaſion of revenge, when, and as often as they ſhould ſee convenient: as for Demetrius himſelf, they beſtowed their friendſhip upon him, with this condition, if he would give ſufficient caution to be thenceforth as much in their power as formerly.

Zonarus ex Dione. Joſeph.lib. 12. cap. 16. Juſtin lib. 34. Lib. Maccab. ut ſuprà.

Getteth the Kingdom, and killeth Seleucus.

* In Syriacis. Polybius Legat. 120 & 122.

He courteth the Commiſſioners of Rome that he may be owned as King.

A. M. 3844. Ol. 154. ann. 4. V. C. 593. Seleucid. 152. Demet. Soter. 2. Ptol. Philom. 20.

59. Alcimus, who had procured from Eupator to be made high-Prieſt, and now was not received nor owned by the people, becauſe that in the days of Epiphanes he had defiled himſelf, came to Demetrius with other Apoſtates, and ſuch like as himſelf, and accuſed his Country-men, eſpecially the Haſmonæans (i. e. Judas and his brethren) that they had cut off, and baniſhed his friends; whereupon he ſent one Bachides a truſty friend with great Forces into Judæa, confirming the Prieſthood to Alcimus, whom he ſent back with him. All their deſign, being arrived there, was to get Judas into their hands; divers Scribes going out to them to ſollicit for peace, being confident becauſe the Prieſt was of the ſeed of Aaron, he moſt wickedly, and contrary to his Oath given, ſlew ſixty of them in one day; then Bachides going from Hieruſalem, ſent about, and cauſed divers that had fled from him, and many of the people whom being ſlain he caſt into a great pit, and ſo committing the Country to Alcimus (to the defence of which he left him ſome Forces) he returned unto his King. After his departure, Alcimus ſtriving to confirm himſelf in the Prieſthood, made great havock of the people, to reſtrain which, Judas went throughout the Country, and compelled his party to ſhut themſelves up within their holds, and growing ſtronger, he reſtrained their invaſions, ſo that Alcimus being afraid of him goes once more unto the King, carrying along with him a Crown of Gold, a Palm, and of the boughs which were uſed ſolemnly in the Temple; and ſeeing he could not have any more acceſs to the Holy Altar, taking a fit opportunity when he was asked of the affairs of his Country, accuſed the Aſidæans, and eſpecially Judas, as ſeditious, of depriving him of the Prieſthood (the honour as he ſaid of his Anceſtors) and plainly affirmed that as long as Maccabæus lived, the Kings affairs could not be ſecure. This being ſeconded by ſome ill-willers to the Jews, Demetrius was inflamed, and ſending for Nicanor one of his chiefeſt Princes, and a bitter Enemy to the Iſraelites, made him Captain over Judæa, and ſent him forth with a Command to ſlay Judas, to ſcatter them that were with him, and make Alcimus High-Prieſt of the great Temple.

1 Maccab. 7. 1 Mac. 14.

Bachides ſent by him againſt the Jews.

Leaveth Alcimus the High-Prieſt with ſome forces.

Who accuſing Judas, Nicanor is ſent againſt him.

Nicanor at firſt much loveth Maccabæus.

Then complained of by Alcimus ſeeketh his deſtruction.

His blaſphemous threats.

60. When he was come thither, and underſtood the courage and reſolution of Judas, his brethren and companions, for the defence of their Country, he feared to try the chance of War, and ſent to make peace with the people, who having agreed unto the Covenants, the two Captains came together to conſult about the League. Nicanor was ſo taken with Judas that he continued with him, loved him in his heart, and perſwaded him to marry, and beget Children; and ſo remained conſtant in his affection to him, till Alcimus perceiving it, and underſtanding the Covenants which were made betwixt them, took a third journey to the King, told him that Nicanor had taken ſtrange matters in hand, and appointed Judas, a Traitor to the Realm, to be his Succeſſor. Demetrius being hereat diſpleaſed, by Letters checked him for theſe things, and commanded him in all haſt to ſend Maccabæus bound in Chains unto Antioch, which grievouſly troubled him, that he, who had done no hurt, ſhould be thus uſed, but conceiving it neceſſary for him to comply with the pleaſure of the King, he waited for a convenient opportunity to accompliſh it. Behaving himſelf thenceforth more roughly to him, the other ſuſpected ſomething by the great change of his demeanour, and therefore gathering a few of his men, withdrew himſelf from him, but he followed him with a ſtrong power to Hieruſalem, and drawing him out to talk with him, had prepared ſome to ſeize on him; yet he having notice hereof got away, and would ſee him no more. Seeing his deſign to be diſcovered, he went and fought with him near Capharſalama, in which he loſt about five thouſand of his men, and the reſt fled into the City of David. After this he came up to Mount Sion, and ſome of the Prieſts with the Elders of the people went forth of the Sanctuary to ſalute him peaceably, and ſhew him the burnt-offering that was offered for the King; but he jearing hereat, demanded Judas to be delivered unto him, and they affirming with an Oath that they knew not where he was, he ſtretching out his hand againſt the Temple, ſwore that except Judas and his Forces were delivered up, he would when he ſhould return in peace, ſet the ſanctuary on fire, demoliſh the Altar, and build there a ſtately Temple to Bacchus. The Prieſts hearing this, went in, and ſtanding before the Altar, with tears begged of God that he would fruſtrate the mans intentions, and be avenged upon him and his Hoſt for his blaſphemous words.

1 Maccab. 7. & 2. 15.

He is ſlain in battel.

The end of the ſecond book of Maccabees.

1 Maccab. 8. & 9.

Bachides and Alcimus ſent into Judæa againſt Judas.

Maccabæus is ſlain.

61. Hearing that Judas was gone from Jeruſalem into Samaria, he went and pitched his Tents in Bethhoron, where new ſupplies from Syria came to him, the Enemy being in Hadaſa thirty Furlongs off, with no more than three thouſand men. He would fain have fought on the Sabbath day, which the Jews, who were conſtrained to follow, friendly dehorting him from, with great blaſphemy uttered againſt God, he refuſed to hear them, demanding if there were a living Lord in Heaven, who commanded that ſeventh day to be kept, and ſaying, he himſelf was mighty upon earth to command them to Arm themſelves, and to perform the Kings buſineſs. But coming to the ingagement, he himſelf was ſlain firſt, which when his Army ſaw, they caſt away their Arms and fled, and the Iſraelites following the chace ſlew thirty thouſand, ſo that not one of the Army was left remaining. Coming to the plunder of the field they cut off Nicanor's head and hands, and carryed them to Jeruſalem, where they were hung up before the Temple, his tongue being cut in pieces, and caſt unto the Fowls. Then they decreed, that the thirteenth day of the twelfth month Adar (as the Syrians call it) the day before Mardocheus his day, ſhould be obſerved every year, as the Author of the ſecond book of Maccabees tells us, who with this ſtory finiſheth his work, being the Epitome of the five books of Jaſon, a Jew of Cyrene. After Nicanor's death, Judæa was quiet for ſome time, and then Judas hearing of the power of the Romans, and their compaſſion of the diſtreſſed, and how much Demetrius ſtood in awe of them, ſent Eupolemus the ſon of John, and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazer on an Ambaſſage to the Senate, that entring into ſociety with them, the people might be freed from the yoak of Demetrius and the Greeks. But Demetrius hearing of the miſchance of Nicanor and his Forces, ſent Bachides and Alcimus again into Judæa with the greater part of his Forces, who coming to Jeruſalem to ſeek for Judas, marched thence with twenty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe againſt him, who had but three thouſand men in all. With theſe few he ſetting upon Bachides, all of them forſook him but eight hundred, with which yet he ſo charged him, as fighting from morning till night, he put to flight the right wing in which he ſtood, but they of the left perceiving this, followed him behind as he gave the charge, and compaſſing him in, ſlew him, all his men then ſhifting for themſelves. This hapned A. M. 3844. of the Greeks or Seleucidæ the 152. in the ſecond of Demetrius Soter, and after he led the People, from his Fathers death, ſix years

62. A

1 Maccab. 9.

Jonathan his brother choſen Captain in his room.

A. M. 3845.
Ol. 155. ann. 1.
V. C. 594.
Seleucid. 153.
Demetr. Sot. 3. Ptolom. Philomet. 21.

62. A great Famine then raging, almoſt all the Country ſubmitted to Bachides, that they might the more commodiouſly get bread, and he made ſuch wicked perſons Governors, as bringing to him the friends of Judas, he mocked them, and revenged himſelf upon them. But ſuch of them as remained, and could do it, aſſembled themſelves together, and choſe Jonathan (Sirnamed Apphus) their Captain in the room of Judas his brother, which Bachides hearing ſought to kill him, but he underſtanding thereof, fled into the Deſert Thecoa, having ſent his brother John (Sirnamed Gaddis) with a party to the Nabathæan Arabs, to deſire they might leave their baggage amongſt them. He going down with it, was met in the way by the children of Iambri from Medaba, who killing him and thoſe with him, ſeized upon the prey; but no great joy had they of their booty; for Jonathan and his brother Simon hearing that they were about to make a great marriage, and bring the bride from Medaba with great pomp, being the Daughter of one of the nobleſt Princes of Canaan, they went, and hiding themſelves under the covert of the Mountain, when the Bridegroom and his friends came forth with Timbrels and inſtruments of Muſick, roſe up out of the ambuſh, ſlew many of them, and took the ſpoil; ſo having revenged the death of their brother, they returned again unto Jordan. When Bachides heard this, he marched down, and came thither with a great Army upon the Sabbath day, and Jonathan being beſet behind and before with the Enemy, and on each ſide with the River and Mariſhes, encouraged yet his men to fight, and lifting up his hand ſtruck at Bachides; but he declined the blow. Then ſeeing himſelf too weak for the Enemy he leaped into the River after he had ſlain one thouſand of them, and ſwom over with his men to the further ſide. Bachides would not adventure to follow, but returning to Jeruſalem, built up the ſtrong Forts throughout the Land, and placed therein ſtrong Garriſons, that thence making excurſions, he might endamage the Jews. He fortified the Cities Bethſura and Gazara, with the Caſtle at Jeruſalem, where he placed Souldiers with proviſions, and taking the ſons of the chief of the Country for Hoſtages, he ſecured them in the later.

1 Maccab. 8.

Demetrius is forbidden by the Romans to hurt the Jews.

1 Maccab. 9.

Alcimus his ill end.

Bachides ſweareth never more to moleſt the Jews.

63. The Ambaſſadors ſent by Maccabæus to the Romans were well received, and entered into a League and ſociety with the Romans, which being written in Tables of braſs, contained an ingagement mutually to ſuccour and relieve each other. The Senate alſo wrote to Demetrius, charging him no more to hurt or indamage the Jews, being their confederates, under pain of being proſecuted with War both at Land and Sea. Not long after Alcimus the High-prieſt commanded the wall in the Temple, which ſevered the Court of the People from that of the Gentiles, to be pulled down, which had been built by Zorobabel, and the Prophets, whoſe monuments he began to pull down and deſtroy; but at the ſame time he was ſo ſmitten that he could not open his mouth, being taken with a Palſie, ſo as he could not ſpeak nor give order concerning his houſe, and died with great torment. When Bachides ſaw that he was dead, he returned unto the King. Two years then did the Land continue quiet, but at the end thereof, certain wicked perſons ſent for Bachides to return, telling him he might eaſily apprehend Jonathan and all his company in one night, at which meſſage he aroſe with great haſt, and ſent Letters privily to his adherents to take them, but they having notice of it, took fifty of theſe men, which had been the greateſt ſticklers, and ſlew them. Then Jonathan departing into the Wilderneſs, built up the walls of Bethbuſin, and fortified it, which Bachides having notice of went down thither, and cloſely beſieged it; but ſuch was his entertainment from the beſieged (who getting out killed his men, and burnt his engines,) that having lain before the place a long time to no purpoſe, and ſeeing his journey to be fruſtrate, he eaſed his ſtomack againſt thoſe that had been the cauſe of his Expedition, and putting to death many of them, reſolved to retreat into his own Country. Jonathan having notice of this, ſent to him to treat of Peace, and exchange the priſoners, which he gladly accepted of, and made an oath never more to diſturb him. Returning then home he never brake it; ſo that the War being removed, Jonathan dwelt at Machmas (or Michmaſh) in the Tribe of Benjamin, began to govern the People, and deſtroy the ungodly out of Iſrael.

Excerpt. Diodori Siculi & Polyb.

64. Ariarathes (the fifth of that name) King of Cappadocia, marryed (as we ſaid before) Antiochis the daughter of Antiochus the Great. She having no children by him at the firſt, introduced two ſuppoſitious boys, Ariarathes and Orophernes, he knowing nothing hereof; but a little after growing fruitful, ſhe brought forth two daughters, and a ſon called Mithridates, and then acquainting her huſband with what ſhe had formerly done, procured the two Counterfeits to be ſent, the one to Rome, and the other into Ionia, leſt they ſhould diſturb the true one in his ſucceſſion, who, being named Ariarathes, and being brought up in the faſhions and cuſtoms of the Greeks, obtained the Kingdom after his Fathers death. Orophernes afterwards reſolving to venture for it, came to Demetrius, complaining he was injuriouſly deprived of the Kingdom by his younger brother, and craved his aſſiſtance for the recovery of it. He being offended at Ariarathes for the refuſing the marriage of his ſiſter the widdow of Perſeus, bargained with Orophernes for one thouſand Talents, and expelled Ariarathes from Cappadocia, though he was helped by Eumenes King of Pergamus. Orophernes having thus invaded the Kingdom, behaved himſelf not like one who intended to ſecure it to himſelf in the love of his People, but raging againſt them with pillages and ſlaughters, and corrupting himſelf with the luxurie of Ionia (where he had been brought up) pulled upon him the hatred of all his Subjects, which he perceiving, made only as an occaſion further to proſecute his wicked and unſeaſonable deſigns. Ariarathes went ſtraight to Rome to crave aid; and the Ambaſſadors both of Demetrius and the other, followed to excuſe what was done, and recriminate him, which thoſe of Orophernes performed ſo dexterouſly, that no body being preſent that could confute their lies, they ſeemed to gain credit, and Ariarathes becauſe he had been the confederate of the Romans, was ordered to reign together with his brother. This was all he got at Rome; but ſhortly after Attalus the brother and Succeſſor of Eumenes expelled Orophernes and Demetrius quite out of Cappadocia, and reſtored him to the entire poſſeſſion of his Kingdom.

Orophernes one of ſuppoſititious brood getteth Cappadocia by the help of Demetrius.

Artaphernes the true heir reſtored by Attalus.

65. Not long after, Demetrius caſting in his head how to inlarge his Dominions, offered Archias, the Governour of Cyprus for Ptolomy Philometer, five hundred Talents to betray the Iſland into his hands; which the man conſented to, but being diſcovered and ſentenced, prevented the execution by hanging himſelf. Being thus fruſtrated in this deſign, he thenceforth giving himſelf up to idleneſs, having built a Caſtle fortified with four Towers not far from Antioch, wherein he paſſeth away the time without any any attendance of State affaires, out of the ſight of his Subjects. Hereby he contracted ſuch hatred, that the Antiochians revolted from him, and made choice of Orophernes, then living in exile at his Court, who ſo badly requited him for his former kindneſs, as to conſpire with them to rob him of his Kingdom and life. He getting knowledg of this, ſpared his life, leſt he ſhould free Ariarathes from the fear of a competitor, and cauſed him to be kept ſecurely at Seleucia; but the Antiochians not at all terrified from their attempt, went on in their Rebellion, to which Attalus of Aſia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Ptolomy lending their helping hand, they ſuborned a young man of the baſeſt condition (by one (a) called Prompalus, by others (b) Balas, and (c) Balles giving him the name of Alexander, and reporting him to be ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, to recover as it were his Fathers Kingdom by force. This youth, together with Laodice Antiochus his daughter, did (d) Heraclides (whom Demetrius caſt out, as we ſaid, of the Office of Treaſurer at Babylon) carry to Rome, where he brought him into the Senate, and cauſed him to deſire that he might be helped in the recovery of the Kingdom, at leaſt that he might not be hindered in his endeavour that way; then he ſeconding him inveighed againſt Demetrius, and heaped up the praiſes and merits of Antiochus ſo far, as though to all ſober minded men his impudence was diſtaſteful as well as his perſon, yet he ſo bewitched the generality of the Fathers, that a Decree was made, whereby power was given to them to return, and aid ordered them for the recovery of the Kingdom (being the children of their late friend and allie) as they had required.

Excerpt. Polybii per Valeſium.

One Balas ſuborned by ſeveral Princes for the ſon of Epiphanes.

(a) Juſtin. lib. 35.
(b) Strabo lib. 16.
(c) Joſephus lib. 13. c. 8.
(d) Polybius Legat. 140.

66. Heraclides having obtained this act of the Senate, preſently hired Souldiers, and getting many eminent men to joyn with him, went to Epheſus, where he made all poſſible preparation for the War. Not long after Alexander got Ptolemais a City of Phœnicia, being betrayed to him by the Garriſon Soldiers, which Demetrius hearing, gathered together his Forces to go and fight with him, but conſidering the uncertainty of the chance of War, ſent away his two Sons Demetrius and Antiochus unto Cnidus to be out of the danger, and be reſerved to revenge his death or deprivation if need ſhould require. He ſent alſo unto Jonathan the Captain of the Jews, to renew Peace with him, giving him power to raiſe Forces againſt Alexander, and commanding the Hoſtages kept in the Caſtle of Hieruſalem to be reſtored to him, which he uſing as a good opportunity, began to build Hieruſalem anew, and repair the walls, but Alexander having notice of Demetrius his meſſage, and the promiſes made by him, ſent to him in like manner, and amongſt many privileges

1 Maccab. 10

Juſtin ut prius Appian in Syriacis.

Contendeth for the Kingdom of Syria.

A. M. 3852.
Ol. 156.*ann.*4.
V. C. 601.
Seleucid. 160.
*Demet. Sot.*10.
Ptol. Philomet. 28.

ledges and immunities granted to the Nation, appointed him to be the High-Prieſt, ſending him Purple and a Crown of Gold. So, in the ſeventh moneth of the one hundred and ſixtieth year of the Seleucidæ, Jonathan put on the Holy Robe, in the ninth after the death of his brother Judas (the Prieſthood having been vacant ſeven years from the death of Alcimus) being the firſt of the Haſmonæans that arrived at this dignity, and of the Prieſtly Family, but not of the Pontificial, to which Onias (who now was in Ægypt) was next heir. Demetrius hearing of the agreement his Enemy had made with the Jews, was ſore troubled thereat, and laboured again by incredible promiſes to allure them to his own party; but they having had experience formerly how his affections ſtood towards them, refuſed to entertain his overtures. Balas gathering his Forces together, not onely, thoſe that revolted to him in Syria, but his Auxiliaries alſo ſent from Jonathan, Ariarathes, Attalus, and eſpecially from Ptolomy Philometer, gave battel to Demetrius, whoſe left wing put thoſe to flight which fought againſt it, but the right having the contrary fortune was forced to run, which yet he would not do, though in it, but fighting manfully, light with his Horſe into a bog, where he fought ſtoutly on his feet, till at laſt he was ſlain with many wounds, after he had reigned twelve years. A. M. 3854. the ſecond of the one hundred fifty ſeventh Olympiad, of the Seleucid the 161.

And Demetrius being ſlain in battel,

1 Maccab. 10.

Alexander Balas getteth the Kingdom and marrieth Ptolomies daughter.

Joſeph. lib. 13. cap. 8. & Livius lib. 50. & Juſtin. l. 35.

Demetrius the ſon of Demetrius Soter maketh for the Kingdom.

A. M. 3857.
Ol. 158.ann. 1.
V. C. 606.
Seleucid. 165.
Ptolom. Philomet. 33.

67. Alexander Balas obtained the Kingdom, and ſhortly after his poſſeſſion of it, remembring how much he was beholding to Ptolomy Philometor for it, ſent to him for his Daughter to Wife, which he willingly aſſenting to, brought her to Ptolemais, and married her to him with royal magnificence. Thither came down Jonathan from Hieruſalem, bringing preſents for both the Kings, but was followed by divers naughty perſons to accuſe him; Yet Alexander was ſo far from liſtning to any tales, that he cauſed him to be cloathed in purple, to ſit near him, and by proclamation commanded all his accuſers to forbear, at which they being diſcouraged, went their wayes. After this Alexander giving up himſelf to idleneſs, and luxury, and minding nothing elſe, the affairs of the State were wholly managed by one Ammonius, who made ſlaughter of all his friends, and amongſt the reſt ſlew Laodice the Daughter of Epiphanes. Which being heard by Demetrius the eldeſt Son of Demetrius Soter, he hired Soldiers in Crete, and came into Cilicia, at which the other being affrighted, haſted to Antioch to ſecure his eſtate before his coming, where he made Hierax, and Diodotus (or Tryphon) Governours. With Demetrius joyned Apollonius the Governour of Cœleſyria, who being ordered to fight againſt the Jews, who ſtill ſtood cloſe to Alexander, with great pride provoked Jonathan to fight with him, and he accordingly marched from Hieruſalem againſt him with ten thouſand men. In his way he took Joppe, which Apollonius underſtanding marched to Aſhdod, and left an Ambuſh in the way to intrap him, but he getting clear of the Ambuſh, put all his Forces to flight, whereof many men fled into the Temple of the Idol Dagon, which he ſet on fire, and what by this means and by the ſword periſhed about eight thouſand men. This coming to the ears of Alexander, he honoured Jonathan more than ever: he ſent him a button of Gold, wont to be given to the Kings kinſmen, and gave him Accaron a City of the Philiſtins with its Territories as an inheritance.

1 Maccab. 11.

Joſeph. & Juſtin ut ſupra.

Ptolomy aſſiſteth him in recovering his Fathers Kingdom.

Diod. Sicul. apud Photium.
A. M. 3858.
Seleucidarum 166.

Alexander ſlain,

68. Ptolomy Philometor with great forces both by Land and Sea, came out of Ægypt, under pretence of aiding his ſon in Law, bnt indeed with an intention to ſeize upon Syria, and accordingly all the Cities being commanded to receive him honourably, he placed therein Garriſons of his own. He got into his hands all the maritime Cities as far as Seleucia upon Orontes, and then being clear out of conceit with Alexander (for that he demanding Ammonius who had plotted his deſtruction, he would not deliver him up) he ſent and made an agreement with Demetrius, promiſing him to take away his daughter from Balas and give her to him, together with the recovery of his Fathers Kingdom. The Antiochians ſlew Ammonius, and let Ptolomy into their City, who there put two Diadems upon his head; but preſently brought them to receive Demetrius, promiſing them that this ſhould make amends for the injury formerly offered his Father, and then the Soldiers revolted alſo. Alexander being now in Cilicia conſulted with the Oracle of Apollo Sardonicus, from which he had anſwer, that he ſhould look to himſelf in that place which had brought forth a double formed ſpectacle, which ſeemed to point out the City Abas in Arabia, where a certain Woman named Herais, being married to one Samias turned to a man; and where he was ſlain not long after. For invading Syria with fire and ſword, Ptolomy with Demetrius his new ſon in Law met and overthrew

And Ptolomy dieth of his wounds.

overthrew him at the River Oenopara, and then he flying to Abas, his head was cut off by Zabd the Prince of the place, and ſent to Ptolomy, who though he received it with much joy, yet having in the fight received a great hurt in the head, upon the ſearching of the wound he died alſo the third day after. Such end had the ſtrange fortune of this counterfeit Alexander, after he had reigned about five years.

Appian in Syriacis. 1 Maccab. 11. Excerpt. Diod. Siculi.

69. Demetrius then according to his right obteined his Father's Kingdom, and for that he had ſubdued this counterfeitor of his Family had (the next after Seleucus the founder of the Race) the ſirname of Nicanor or Nicator. About this time Jonathan beſieged the Caſtle at Hieruſalem, and did all he could with his Engines to reduce it; but this being by ſome ill-willers made known to Demetrius, he wrote to him in anger, to raiſe his ſiege, and appear before him at Ptolemais, which he obeyed ſo far as to go to him; and partly by his preſents and otherwayes ſo appeaſed him, as rejecting his accuſers, he confirmed to him the Prieſthood, and upon promiſe of three hundred Talents granted him immunity from tribute, with the Principality of three other places. After this, ſeeing his Realm to be quiet on every ſide, Demetrius disbanded all his old Soldiers, retaining onely ſome Cretians and other Iſlanders, which ſo inraged them, being wont by the former Kings to be kept in pay, as an incouragement to them for the future ſervice, that they thenceforth became his Enemies, and ſhewed it upon occaſion which he alſo himſelf preſented them being wholly ruled by one Laſthenes, who had helped him in the recovery of the Kingdom. By this man's advice, thinking himſelf ſecure enough of his eſtate, he cruelly raged againſt ſuch as had been againſt him, and plunged himſelf into bad courſes; which (together with the alienation of the minds of the Soldiers) one Diodotus an Apamean, and one of Alexander Balas his Captains, conſidering, went to Elmalchueles the Arabian, with whom Antiochus the young ſon of that Alexander by Cleopatra was brought up, and acquainting him how things ſtood, at length obtained to have the boy delivered to him, to be reſtored to his Fathers Kingdom. Demetrius ſeeing his Soldiers alienated from him, deſired of Jonathan a ſupply, with great promiſes of reſpect and ſuccour. He ſent him three thouſand men, which ſtood him in good ſtead, for he going about to diſarm the Antiochians, they flatly refuſed it, and riſing, came many thouſands to Court to make an end of him, but theſe Jews ſo repelled them, as ſlaying a great number they ſet the City on fire, whereupon the Inhabitants were glad to ſubmit.

The Son of Balas ſet up againſt Demetrius by Diodotus or Tryphon.

A. M. 3860. Ol. 158. an. 4. V. C. 609. Seleucid. 168. Ptol. Phyſconis. 2. 1 Maccab. 11. Joſeph. l. 13. c. 9.

70. Diodotus, or Tryphon, took Antiochus the younger ſon of Balas, brought him out of Arabia into Syria, and there crowned him, giving him the ſirname of Theus. Hereupon all the disbanded Soldiers came over to him, ſo that Tryphon made open War againſt Demetrius, and overthrowing him in battel forced him to flie to Seleucia. Then ſent Antiochus to Jonathan meſſengers with preſents, and great promiſes, to draw him to his party, which he eaſily did, becauſe Demetrius had falſified his word, and proved very ingrateful towards him, who now therefore gathering his men together, reduced the Country beyond Jordan as far as Damaſcus, and overthrew a party which there met him, killing to the number of three thouſand men, after which he ſent an Ambaſſage to the Romans, to renew the alliance made with them by Judas. Triphon having brought his deſign thus far on, as to break the power of Demetrius, and having to that end deſired the friendſhip of Jonathan, yet now deſired his ruine above all things, as ſtanding in his way for the accompliſhment of his intended treaſon. He reſolved to ſeize upon the Kingdom himſelf; but fearing Jonathan might ſtand faſt to the intereſt of his young King, and oppoſe him, came down to Bethſan to ſee if he could apprehend him. Thither came Jonathan down with forty thouſand men to meet him, who entertained him with exceeding great reſpect, and adviſed him to diſmiſs all his Army, and with a few go along with him to Ptolemais, which he promiſed to put into his hands. He conſenting to this, ſent all his men back but one thouſand, which taking along with him, upon their entrance into the Town they were all cut off, he himſelf being kept priſoner. Then Tryphon invaded Judæa with a great Army, which to oppoſe, Simon the brother of Jonathan was choſen General in his ſtead by the People; ſo that he ſeeing the Jews prepared for reſiſtance, feigned as if Jonathan was onely detained for one hundred Talents of Silver which he was in arrear, which if they were ſent, together with his two ſons for Hoſtages, he promiſed he ſhould be releaſed. Simon, though he diſtruſted him, yet leſt it ſhould be ſaid that he neglected any thing for his brothers ſafety, ſent his Nephews with the money, which having received, he nevertheleſs ſlew Jonathan, and then returned into Syria.

Appian ut ſupra.

1 Maccab. 12. & 13.

Tryphon intending to ſet up for himſelf,

Circumventeth and killeth Jonathan.

17. He

Then killeth Antiochus his new made King. Seeketh friends in vain.

1 Maccab. 13. Strabo lib. 16. Livius lib. 55.

71. He preſently after made away young Antiochus, for giving out he was troubled with the ſtone, under pretence of cutting him for it, he cauſed the Phyſicians to kill him. Then after he had gotten the Kingdom, he laboured to confirm himſelf therein by the approbation of his moſt powerful Neighbours, ſending to Rome an Ambaſſador not empty-handed, but the Senate taking the preſent (a Golden Image of victory of great value) in ſtead of his name, ingraved that of his young King whom he had murdered. For all this he proceeded with great reſolution, and coyned money with his own Effigies and name, having taken that of Tryphon upon him. Simon being diſobliged, and accounting his acts to be but Robberies, ſent a Crown of Gold to make his peace again with Demetrius, who conſidering the reſpect the Romans had ſhewed his Nation, promiſed to bury all things in Oblivion, and confirmed the immunities formerly granted; ſo that the Yoke of the Gentiles being removed, the people began to date their inſtruments according to the years of their High-Prieſts. The year after he had the Caſtle of Hieruſalem ſurrendred to him, the Defendants being almoſt all conſumed with famine, which cleanſing and fortifying anew, together with the Hill of the Temple, he dwelt then in Hieruſalem, and after he had been High-Prieſt about three years, by a publick inſtrument of the Prieſts, Nobles, and the People (after a recapitulation of his merits and ſervices to his Nation, amongſt which an Ambaſſage lately ſent to Rome, and there well received, was a great inducement) he was made their Prince and High-Prieſt perpetually, till God ſhould raiſe up the true Prophet, and all Ornaments and Prerogatives of Majeſty were given to him. This being made in Braſs, was faſtened to the Wall that compaſſed the Sanctuary, in an open place, and a Copy thereof was laid up in the Treaſury, that Simon and his ſons might have it.

A.M. 3863. Ol. 159. ann. 3. V. C. 612. Seleucid. 171. Ptol. Phyſconis 5. Simonis 2.

1 Maccab. 14.

The Jews chuſe Simon for their Prince.

72. But the Cities all over revolting from Demetrius, who, we ſaid, was driven to Seleucia, that he might ſhake off ſuſpition of lazineſs, he reſolved to make War upon the Parthian, who had extended his Empire from the River Indus as far as Euphrates, and done no leſs things than the Great Arſaces himſelf. The Macedonians and Greeks not well bearing the Pride of their new Maſters, the Parthians, ſent to him often, with promiſe to revolt to him if he would but come up. He being tickled at this Meſſage, made haſte thither, not fearing but if he once were Maſter of theſe Provinces, with eaſe to drive Tryphon out of Syria; and being received with great alacrity, and ſtrengthned with the Auxiliaries of the Perſians, Bactrians, and Elymæans, he overthrew the Parthians in ſeveral battels, but at length being circumvented by the cunning of one of their Princes (ſent, under colour of treating of peace, to entrap him) having loſt his Army, he fell into their hands, and then being carried for a laughing ſtock up and down the revolted Countreys, was caſt into Priſon. Arſaces having ſo ſoon recovered all, raged not againſt the Revolters, but carried it towards his people with humility and reſpect, and not long after ſending Demetrius into Hyrcania, there maintained him with royal equipage, and not only ſo, but gave him his daughter in marriage, with promiſe alſo to reſtore him to his Kingdom. But whileſt Demetrius lived thus in exile Tryphon's Soldiers being weary of his conditions revolted to Cleopatra his Wife, who then lived in Seleucia with her Children, and now taking it in great diſdain that he had married Rhodoguna the Parthians daughter, ſent to his brother Antiochus (the ſecond Son of Demetrius Soter, whoſe ſirname he alſo obtained from the Jews) offering him marriage, and the Kingdom. He willingly accepting of the offer, took the name of King upon him, ſent into Judæa to Simon, offering him great privileges to joyn with him in Alliance, and returning into Syria preſently married Cleopatra.

Juſtin lib. 36. Joſeph. ut ſupra. 1 Maccab. 14. & 15. Excerpt. Diodori Siculi.

Demetrius taken by the Parthian.

Joſeph. lib. 13. cap. 12.

His brother Antiochus maketh for the Kingdom,

73. All the Army except a few revolted to Antiochus ſirnamed Sidetes, and Hunter, ſo that Tryphon ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken fled to Dora, a Maritime Town of Phœnicia, whither he was ſtrait purſued and blocked up both by Sea and Land: yet got he out on ſhipboard, and betook himſelf to Orthoſias, another Sea-Town of the ſame Tract, and afterwards to Apamea to his own Countrey-men, where ſome way or other (for 'tis uncertain how) he was ſlain. Whilſt Antiochus lay before Dora, Simon by virtue of their Alliance ſent him out of Judæa a party of two thouſand choice men, with ſilver and gold, and much furniture for the War; yet he would not receive them, but brake the League, and ſending Athenobius to him, complained of his holding Joppe, Gazara, and the Caſtle at Hieruſalem, his waſting the borders, and having the Government of divers places of his Kingdom, requiring him either to deliver up the Cities with the Tributes of ſuch places as were without

1 Maccab. 15.

And diſpoſſeſſeth Trypbon.

A. M. 3176. Ol. 160. ann. 3. V. C. 616. Seleucid. 175. Ptol. Phyſconis 9. Simonis 6.

Cendebæus ſent by Antiochus againſt the Jews, is defeated by John the ſon of Simon.

the borders of Judæa, or elſe to pay five hundred Talents for the Cities, and the harm he had done, and for the Tributes of the places other five hundred, upon pain of being proſecuted with War. To theſe things Simon anſwered, that he held no Towns belonging to any other, but had recovered his own by right of War; but as for Joppe and Gazara which had done great harm to his people, he offered to pay him one hundred Talents, at which the King was ſo diſpleaſed, that following at that time Tryphon to Orthoſias, he left Cendebæus to overſee the Sea-Coaſts, with order to build up Cedron, whence he might make war upon the Jews. He coming to Iamnia made inroads upon Judæa, and built up that Town according to order, which John the Son of Simon then lying at Gazara underſtanding, gave notice thereof to his Father, who now being decrepit, committed the War to him and his Brother Judas. He taking with him twenty thouſand Foot, and a party of Horſe, marched ſtraight down againſt Cendebæus, and then placing his Horſe in the midſt of the Foot, that it might protect, and be protected againſt the Cavalry of the Enemy, which was exceeding ſtrong, he overthrew him, and putting the whole Army to the rout, ſome betook themſelves into the Fort newly built, and others flying away, he purſued them as far as the Towers of Azotus, which having ſet on fire, and ſlain two thouſand men, he retreated ſafe into Judæa.

Simon and his two ſons murdered by his ſon-in-law.

Antiochus beſiegeth Jeruſalem.

Joſephus Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 16.

74. This ſucceſs of John ſufficiently moved Antiochus to puniſh Simon, but it was done to his hand by one who of all others might leaſt have done it. There was one Ptolomy the Son of Abubus, Son-in-law to Simon, and by him ſet over the Province of Jericho. He entertaining his Father-in-law as he went his Circuit about the Countrey, to take care for the Government thereof, ſlew him treacherouſly after a feaſt, together with his two ſons Mattathias and Judas, when he had governed the people eight years. His deſign was, being rich, to obtain the Principality of that Countrey where he lived, and therefore he preſently certified Antiochus of his feat, deſiring an Army of him, wherewith he might ſubdue the Cities of Judæa. He alſo ſent certain Cut-throats to murder John, Simons ſon; wrote to the Collonels of the Army to draw them over to him, and ſent others to ſeize upon Hieruſalem and the Temple; But John having timely notice of his Treachery, prevented his death by that of the Meſſengers, and was made High-Prieſt in the room of his father: and here the Author of the firſt books of Maccabees concludes his work, having therein delivered the Hiſtory of forty years. Antiochus taking the opportunity of Simons death, came into Judæa, which waſting round about, he drove up John (ſirnamed Hyrcanus) into Hieruſalem, to which he laid cloſe ſiege, his Army being divided into ſeven parts. The beſieged, being exceedingly helped by the ſtrength of the Walls, ſtood out manfully, ſo that he raiſed an hundred Turrets, from which he endeavoured to ſcale the Walls, and compaſſed in the Town with a double Trench, that none might eſcape, but they ſtill defending themſelves, ſometimes ſallied out, and did him harm. Hyrcanus ſeeing a great and uſeleſs multitude in the City, which conſumed the Victuals, put the more infirm out of the Walls, whence being hindred from going any further by the ſiege, they wandred about the Walls almoſt famiſhed, till at the feaſt of Tabernacles, out of pity, they were again admitted.

75. At this feaſt of Tabernacles, Hyrcanus ſent out to Antiochus to deſire a Truce for ſeven dayes, becauſe of the celebration thereof. He not only granted this, but ſent in alſo Bulls with gilded horns, Golden, and Slver Cups, with all ſorts of Spices, and beaſts for Sacrifice, and made a feaſt to the Army, by which the other taking notice of his great humanity (whence he was ſirnamed Pius, as alſo, uncertain for what other reaſon, Sidetes) withall, conſidering that the Sabbatical year being now at an end, and the people being hindred from ſowing, a famine was likely to inſue, he ſent out to him, deſiring that the Jews might be ſuffered to live according to their own Laws. Many about the King adviſed him utterly to deſtroy the City, to blot out the very name of the Jews from under Heaven, at leaſt to diſſolve their Laws, and change their courſe of life, ſo diverſe from, and diſagreeable to other Nations; but he being moved by a principle of magnanimity and bounty, rejected this counſel, and approving of the piety of the Jews, commanded them to deliver up their Arms, pull down their Walls, pay Tribute for Joppe and other Towns without Judæa, and receive a Garriſon, upon which conditions he offered them peace. They yielded to all but the laſt, becauſe they would not converſe with the Gentiles, yet in Lieu of it choſe to give Hoſtages (amongſt others Hyrcanus his own brother) and pay five hundred Talents, whereof three hundred at preſent; whereupon the ſiege was removed, and they were freed from any further incumbrance. Hyrcans canus opening the Sepulcher of David, who had been the richeſt of Kings, took out thence three thouſand Talents, wherewith filling his Coffers, he firſt liſted ſtrangers in his Militia, and entertained Antiochus and his Army in Hieruſalem very plentifully.

cans

Joh. Hyrcan. 1.

76. Antiochus Sidetes in the eighth year of his reign, three years after his departure from Hieruſalem, undertook an expedition againſt Phraates the Parthian, to fetch back his brother Demetrius ſtill kept there in free cuſtody, who had twice attempted an eſcape, but being retaken ſtill was ſent back to his Wife and Children, not ſo much out of any pity or reſpect of alliance, as becauſe that King having an itching deſire of getting Syria alſo into his power, preſerved him to uſe againſt his brother, as time and opportunity ſhould ſerve. Antiochus with a great (but extraordinarily effeminate) Army marched into Media, where many Eaſtern Princes met him, with all their hearts giving up themſelves and Countreys to him, and curſing the pride of the Parthians, whereby he got ſuch ſtrength, as overthrowing the Enemy in three ſeveral battels, he reduced him within the bounds of his own Countrey. But what he thus ſuddenly got, he almoſt as quickly loſt again; for upon the approach of Winter, quartering his Souldiers abroad in the Countrey, the people were ſo oppreſſed, what by the exaction of proviſions, and their inſolence, that they again revolted to the Parthian, and upon agreement, at one and the ſame time, ſet upon them as they were ſeverally diſpoſed of in their quarters. Antiochus hearing this, with that party which lay with him came in to relieve the next to him, and there met with Phraates himſelf, againſt whom he fought moſt couragiouſly; till being forſaken of his men he was ſlain, or elſe killed himſelf. Phraates had a little before this, to divert him from Parthia, ſent back his brother Demetrius with a Guard of Parthians to ſeize upon Syria; but now repenting him of that, ſent ſome to purſue him, and bring him back; but he fearing ſuch a thing, had by his ſpeed prevented it. Phraates finding a daughter of his, which her Uncle Antiochus had taken along with him in his expedition, fell ſo in love with her, that he married her out of hand.

Juſtin. lib. 38. Appian in Syriacis & Livius lib. 59.

Antiochus Sidetis Is ſlain by the Parthians.

A. M. 3877. Ol. 163. ann. 1 V. C. 626. Seleucid. 185. Ptol. Phyſc. 19. Hyrcani 8.

77. Demetrius then recovered all the Kingdom of Syria, though not long likely to hold it, by reaſon of that malice he contracted both from Soldiers and People. Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt and chief Magiſtrate of the Jews taking this occaſion, leads down an Army to the Cities of Syria, ſuppoſing indeed as it was, that he ſhould find them unmanned, took Medeba in the ſixth moneth, then Samega and Sicima the Metropolis of the Samaritans, and ſo to no King after Antiochus Sidetes were the Jews ſubject, but ſhook off the Yoak of the Syrian Kingdom. The Parthian King intended to make war upon him, but was hindered by the Scythians, whom having ſent for to aid him againſt Antiochus, becauſe they came ſomething too late, he denied them their pay, for which they harraſed his borders, and he oppoſing them with the Greeks, whom he had taken before in the War, and cruelly uſed, was betrayed by them, and ſo ſlain with the reſt of his Army. Demetrius being abſent in Ægypt, the Antiochians firſt, then other Cities revolted, not enduring his pride as they pretended, which he had increaſed by his durance in Parthia, ſo that he was forced to return; but they ſent to Ptolomy Phyſcon, deſiring him to ſend them ſome one of the poſterity of Seleucus to reign over them. He ſent them a young man an Ægyptian, the ſon of one Protarchus a Merchant. A fable was invented of his being adopted by Antiochus Balas, whereupon his name being Zabinas, (or Zabinæus) he was ſirnamed Alexander, and the Syrians being willing to have any rather than Demetrius, readily received him. Being come into Syria, it happened that the reliques of Antiochus Sidetes were ſent at the ſame time into Syria, which being received very ſolemnly by all the Cities, he alſo counterfeited a true mourner, and got himſelf thereby much favour from his new Subjects, not diſcovering his tears to be feigned. Not long after he fought with Demetrius near to Damaſcus, and overthrew him, who then fled to Cleopatra his Wife to Ptolemais; but being excluded by her and his ſons, with a few ſervants he went to Tyre, hoping to ſave himſelf there by the Religion of the Temple, and was ſlain by the procurement of his Wife, or Zabinas, in the one hundred eighty ninth year of the Seleucidæ, A. M. three thouſand eight hundred eighty one, the firſt of the one hundred ſixty four Olympiad.

Juſtin. ibid.

Joſephus Antiquit lib. 13. cap. 17.

Juſtin lib. 42.

Idem lib. 39. Joſephus ut prius.

Demetrius having recovered the Kingdom, is outed of it by his rebellious Subjects, and Zabinas a counterfeit, and is ſlain at Tyre.

78. Alexander Zabinas then, a counterfeit, ſucceeded Demetrius, by the favour of the People, though he left two Sons by Cleopatra, Seleucus and Antiochus ſirnamed Grypus from his hooked noſe. The former of theſe taking a Diadem upon him, at the years end his mother ſlew him with a dart by her own hands, becauſe Appian ut ſupra & Joſephus.

he did it without permiſſion, fearing perhaps he might revenge his Fathers death; or being carried out with that height of Spirit wherewith ſhe ordered (and ruined) all things. Alexander entered into a League and alliance with Hyrcanus of Judæa. Three of his greateſt Captains revolted from him, and ſeized upon Laodicea, but he reduced and yet pardoned them, being of a mild and pleaſing deportment, whereby he got the affections of all men. But him he alienated from him whom it moſt concern'd him ſtill to oblige, viz. Ptolomy, who of late had ſet him up. He deſpiſed him, now grown inſolent, as being able to ſtand on his own legs, which the other taking in great diſdain, that a creature whom he had raiſed out of the duſt ſhould ſo requite him, laboured faſter to pull him down than ever he had done for his advancement. He reconciled himſelf to his ſiſter Cleopatra, and for that Antiochus whom ſhe had by Demetrius was yet alive (on whom having beſtowed the title of King ſhe ruled all her ſelf) he ſent him great aid, and his daughter Tryphæna for a Wife, which the People ſeeing, began to revolt apace from Alexander. At length they ingaged in a battel, in which Alexander was overthrown, who then fled to Antioch, where wanting money to pay his Soldiers, he took out of the Temple of Jupiter an Image of Victory of maſſie Gold, jeſting it out, that Jupiter had lent him Victory. But a little after attempting to remove ſecretly and take away Jupiters Image it ſelf of an infinite weight, he was diſcovered, and forced to run away by the multitude, after which being oppreſſed with a grievous Tempeſt, and forſaken by his followers, he was taken by thieves, and by them brought to Antiochus Grypus was killed (though ſome give other accounts of his death) after he had reigned four years.

Excerpt. Diodori Siculi.

Juſtin lib. 42.

Antiochus Grypus ſon to Demetrius defeateth aud killeth Alexander Balas the uſurping counterfeit.

79. The mother was ſore grieved at her ſons Victory, thinking her dignity was leſſened by it, having an ambitious deſire of reigning her ſelf, with which ſhe was ſo far driven as to offer him a cup of poyſon, as he once came in from exerciſe, which he having knowledge of beforehand, refuſed as it were in civility, deſired her to do it her ſelf, and then urging her to it, at length producing witneſs of her wicked intent, told her there was no way to clear her ſelf but by drinking that which ſhe had prepared for her ſon; ſo that being forced to do it, her wickedneſs fell upon her own head. Being thus rid of his unnatural mother, he reigned ſecurely eight years, but then Antiochus his half brother, the ſon of Antiochus Sidetes (begot on his mother, and from Cyzicus the place where we was brought up under Craterus the Eunuch, called Cizycenus) began to be his emulator for the Kingdom, whom he then going about to poyſon, provoked him to a more ſpeedy attempt of what he had but before deſigned. At this time it hapned that Cleopatra the ſiſter and Wife of Ptolomy Lathurus, being divorced from him by the means of that notable woman her mother, came into Syria, and married with this Cyzicenus, and for that ſhe would not ſeem utterly to come without a dowry, brought over to him the Army of Cyprus, whereby thinking himſelf ſufficiently ſtrengthened againſt his brother, he joyned battel with him, but was forced to retire unto Antioch. Cleopatra continuing here was beſieged by Grypus and taken; and then Tryphæna his Wife and her Siſter required her to be delivered into her hands, that ſhe might put her to death as her enemy and emulator, and though he refuſed it utterly, as being againſt the cuſtom of Warriours to rage againſt the weaker Sex, eſpecially when allied in blood ſo near as ſhe was; and protected by the Religion of the Temple to which ſhe fled; yet ſhe being more hereat enflamed, as judging his anſwer to proceed from love rather than pity, ſent ſome Soldiers in, who murdered her imbracing the Image of the Goddeſs. This was not left long unrevenged, for Cyzicenus renewing the War, and giving battel again to his brother, now by the turning of the chance of War overthrew him, and taking Tryphæna, with her blood appeaſed the ghoſt of his Wife, and expelling Grypus out of Syria ſeized on the Kingdom.

Idem ibid. & Appian ut ſupra.

Is emulated by Antiochus Cyzicenus his half brother and couſin German.

And expelled out of Syria.

80. Antiochus Grypus fled to Aſpendium, whence he got the ſirname of Aſpendius; but the next year returning, ordered the matter ſo with his brother, that the Kingdom being divided, he made him be contented with Cœleſyria. Both of them after this time gave up themſelves to nothing but idleneſs and luxury, onely preying upon each other as their opportunities ſerved them, which difference of theirs mightily conduced to the ſettlement of the affairs of the Jews. Cyzicenus procuring from Ptolomy Lathurus ſix thouſand men, went to relieve Samaria, which Hyrcanus beſieged, by waſting his Territories, but to no purpoſe. Afterwards it happened that Lathurus being expelled Ægypt by his Mother, and ſhe fearing that by the help of Cyzicenus he might recover his Kingdom, ſent great ſupplies to Grypus, with Selene for a Wife (whom ſhe had taken from her ſon before his expulſion) to provoke him thereby Excerpt. Diodori Siculi. Joſephus lib. 13. cap. 17. & 18.

The two brothers reign together.

Juſtin ut prius

thereby againſt his brother, whence ſucceeded thoſe civil Wars betwixt them, concerning which we have only the title left unto us in the Epitome of the ſixty eight Book of Livie, who related the ſtory. Grypus died firſt, being ſlain by the treachery of one Heracleon; after he had lived forty five years, and reigned twenty ſix, whereof fifteen were in conjunction with his Brother. He left five ſons, whereof Seleucus his eldeſt and ſucceſſor made War upon his Uncle Cyzicenus for the Kingdom, and overthrew him in battel, after which the Horſe of Cyzicenus ran away with him into his Camp, wherein, when he was about to be taken, he killed himſelf, after he had reigned eighteen years. Seleucus after this, obtained Antioch, and the Kingdom, but againſt him aroſe Antiochus ſirnamed Euſebes, or Pius, the ſon of Cizycenus, who having avoided his ſnares by the help of a certain Courtizan that extremely loved him, went to Aradus, where taking a Diadem, he gathered forces, and in one battel clearly overthrew him. Seleucus then fled into Cilicia, where being received by the Mopſueſtians (as they are called) when he began to exact money of them, they ſet fire to the houſe wherein he lay, and he was burned quick with thoſe about him.

Joſeph. ut ſupra cap. 21.

Great ſtirs amongſt their ſons.

Porphyr. apud Euſebium.

81. Two twin brothers of Seleucus, Antiochus and Philip, carried down forces to Mopſueſtia, which having taken, in revenge for their brothers death, they levelled it with the ground; but Antiochus Pius coming preſently uqon them overthrew them in fight. Antiochus taking the River Orontes in his flight was drowned. Philip eſcaping carried the title of King, and gathering again conſiderable forces, ſtrugled hard with Antiochus for the whole Realm, till ſuch time as Ptolomy Lathurus calling from Cnidus his fourth brother Demetrius, made him King at Damaſcus, ſo that they joyning their forces together, they both oppoſed Antiochus, who though he manfully reſiſted, was put to the worſt, and glad at laſt to flie into Parthia; whence yet returning after two years he re-obtained Syria. Philip being thus deprived of that Kingdom, fell into conteſt with his other two brothers, Demetrius Eucærus and Antiochus ſirnamed Dionyſus for the Kingdom of Damaſcus, and being driven into Beræa, was there beſieged by Demetrius. Straton the Governour of Beræa being Philip's friend calls in Zius the Arabian Captain, and Mithridates Sinax, who coming with a great power overthrew Demetrius, raiſed his ſiege, and taking him priſoner ſent him into Parthia, where he was honourably treated till his death, and Philip marching to Antioch again, as it's ſaid, obtained the Kingdom of Syria, or (as is moſt probable) part of it. Antiochus Dionyſus the younger brother getting Damaſcus into his hands, made War againſt the Arabians, and was ſlain in a battel with their King Aretas, who then was choſen King by the inhabitants of Damaſcus, and thereby obtained the Kingdom of Cœleſyria. The Hiſtories which only give us hints of theſe things are ſo confounded, as no certain thing concerning the ends of Antiochus Pius or Philip can be aſſerted; yet this we find, that the Syrians taking occaſion at theſe diſſentions and Wars of the Seleucidæ amongſt themſelves, began to think of forein aides, and caſt their minds upon forein Kings. At length they all agreed to make choice of Tigranes King of Armenia, who being called in, held Syria for the ſpace of eighteen years, and by his dealing with them, made them know they had had no reaſon to rebel againſt their natural and rightful Princes.

Idem ibid.

Joſephus ibid.

Appian in Syriacis.

Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 22, & 23.

Tigranes getteth Syria.

Juſtin lib. 40.

82. Antiochus Pius being outed thus by Tigranes of all Syria, from Euphrates to the Sea, and alſo of part of Cilicia, lay hid in another corner of it, which neither the Armenian nor Roman as yet touched; and his Wife Selene with her two ſons reigned (as it's termed) in Phœnicia, with ſome part of the lower Syria, till being beſieged in Seleucia a City of Meſopotamia, or Ptolomais, ſhe was therein taken by Tigranes and killed, for that ſhe endeavoured to recover Syria, as juſtly ſhe might, out of his hands. For fourteen years Tigranes governed the Country by one Magadates, till ſuch time as ſiding with his Father-in-Law Mithridates the Great of Pontus, againſt the Romans, and overthrown by them, he was forced to recall him with his Army. Antiochus the ſon of Antiochus Pius, ſirnamed Aſiaticus, taking this opportunity, inſinuated himſelf into the Principality, the Syrians being not unwilling, out of reſpect to the dignity of his family; and Lucullus the Roman General (whoſe work it was to drive Tigranes out of his new acquired poſſeſſions) envying him not the inheritance of his Anceſtors. Four years he kept it, till ſuch time as Pompey the Great having finiſhed the War againſt Tigranes, reduced Syria into the form of a Roman Province, though he challenged it as his inheritance; But it being eaſie to deal with him as he liſted, who was utterly unarmed, he put it off, by affirming it to be unreaſonable, that after the Romans had been at Appian in Syriacis et Mithridaticis.

Juſtin lib. 40, Joſeph. lib. 13. cap. ult.

Appian in Syriacis.

Antiochus Aſiaticus recovering it.

Appian in Mithridaticis & Juſtin ibid.

all the coſt and pains to conquer Tigranes, the reward ſhould fall unto another, and with ſaying that he would not leave it to him, leſt he being unable to protect it, it ſhould be rendered obnoxious to the depredations of the Jews and Arabians. Thus Antiochus having never ill deſerved of the Romans, was commanded to contein himſelf within Comagena, whence his poſterity never ſtirred, and the Kingdom of Syria fell. A.M. three thouſand nine hundred forty two, the ſecond of the one hundred ſeventy ninth Olympiad, ſixty one years before the Æra of Chriſt, in the two hundred and fiftyth of the Seleucidæ, the two hundred and ſeventyth after the battel at Iſſus, after which it came under the power of Alexander the Great, M.Tullius Cicero, and C. Antonius Nepos being Conſuls.

Is untimely ſpoiled of it by Pompey.

A. M. 3942.
Ol. 179. an. 2.
V. C. 691.
Seleucid. 250.

CHAP. VI.

The Ægyptian Kingdom.

From the death of Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus, to the death of Cleopatra, and the reducing of Ægypt into the form of a Roman Province:

Containing the ſpace of two hundred fifty four years.

Paulan. in Atticis.
Juſtin lib. 16.

Ptolomy Philadelphus.

PTolomy the ſon of Lagus had ſeveral ſons by Euridice his Wife, the daughter of Antipater, and by Berenice, which Woman was ſent down by Antipater, onely to accompany her, with whom yet he fell ſo in Love, as marrying her he paſſionately affected her alwayes, and a year or two before his death made one of her ſons, called afterwards Ptolomy Philadelphus, his Copartner in the Kingdom, and more than that, ſerved him ſometimes as one of his attendants, ſaying it was more excellent than a Kingdom to be the ſon of a King. His eldeſt ſon by Eurydice ſeeing this, thought it was no ſtaying for him in Ægypt, but fled to Seleucus, by whom being honourably entertained, with ſome hopes of being ſetled in Ægypt after his fathers death, he ſo badly requited him, as he treacherouſly ſlew him, as we before ſhewed. Philadelphus, after his fathers death made away two of his brothers, the one as conſpiring againſt his life, and the other as ſuſpected to raiſe a Rebellion in Cyprus. In power and riches he ſurpaſſed his Father. Being learned himſelf above the common rate of Princes, he ſought to promote knowledge, by rewarding the moſt eminent and induſtrious (of which flouriſhed many in his time) and founding that his famous Library at Alexandria, conſiſting of two hundred thouſand Volumes. Demetrius Phalereus that noble Philoſopher, and ſometime Prince of Athens, being he that was imployed in the Collection, perſwaded him to ſend to Eleazar the High-Prieſt of the (a) Jews to deſire their Law, and that he might be the eaſilyer induced to ſend it, by the Council of Ariſteas (who wrote the ſtory) he purchaſed the liberty of all ſuch Jews as were ſlaves in Ægypt, to the number of about one hundred thouſand which coſt him more then four hundred and ſixty Talents. He alſo ſent extraordinary rich gifts to the Temple; and the High-Prieſt chuſing out ſeventy two men moſt eminent for birth, learning and experience, diſpatched them into Ægypt with the Law to be tranſlated by them into Greek. Being nobly entertained, and feaſted by him for ſeveral dayes, they were ſet to their work in the Iſland Pharos right over againſt Alexandria, which in ſeventy two dayes with admirabale agreement they are ſaid to have finiſhed, after which the King having exceedingly admired the wiſdom of the Law-giver, and commanded the book carefully to be kept, diſmiſſed them with great rewards to themſelves, and preſents to him that ſent them.

(a) Vide circa res Judæorum Joſephum contra Apionem lib. 2. Tertull. in Apolog. Joſephum Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 2. & Ariſteum de 70 Inter.

The Tranſlation of the Septuagint.

2. Here mentioning this Library of Ptolomy, and Alexandria where it was built, we cannot but now take further notice of this City, which by this time was grown to ſome perfection, though not near to that eminency at which it afterward arrived.

Alexandria its ſtate and condition.

Lib. 22. p. 234. Edit. Veleſian.

wards arrived. Concerning it's Original we have already ſpoken, but with ſuch brevity as fitted the celerity of Alexander's Conqueſt and paſſage. Ammianus Marcellinus it is who tells us, that being the chief of all Cities of that Countrey; it was ennobled by many things, particularly by the Magnificence of the greateſt Founder, and the eminent skill of Dinocrates the Architect, who for want of Chalke when he went about to delineate the Tract of the Walls, made uſe of Meale; and this in the opinion of men predicted the plenty of all things neceſſary for humane ſuſtenance. He adds, that here the Air was wholſome, quiet and milde: and that as experience for many ages together did demonſtrate; ſcarcely any day paſſed wherein the inhabitants did not ſee the Sun clear and Splendid. That the Sea-Coaſts on which it ſtood, might not as formerly, by fallacious and treacherous Acceſſes, as he phraſeth it, afflict Navigators with many miſcarriages; Cleopatra invented in the Haven an high Tower, called Pharos from the place it ſelf; whence lights by night ſhould be expoſed for direction to Saylors; whereas in former times ſuch as held their Voyages from the Parthenian or Lybian Seas, having no tokens nor Markes from any Mountains, by reaſon of the Champian Countrey, wear too often choaked up, and miſcarried in the Sands.

The Pharos when built.

Vide Valeſium in l. præcipuuè Strabonem Geogr. lib. 17. p. 791. D. qui obſervat hanc ἐπιγραφὴν ΣΩΣΤΡΑΤΟΣ ΚΝΙΔΙΟΣ ΔΕ ΞΙΦΑΝΟΥΣ, ΘΕΟΙΣ ΣΩΤΕΡΕΙΝ ΥΠΕΡ ΤΩΝ ΠΛΟΙΖΟΜΕΝΩΝ.

3. So Writes Ammianus who yet is not ſo to be credited, if he meant it, as if Cleopatra (the laſt Queen and Prince of this Race of Ptolomies) was the firſt Inventor or builder of the Pharos; for it was built long before her time, in the Reign of this our Ptolomy Philadelphus, by Soſtratus the Cnidian. But the Tower being demoliſhed by Julius Cæſar, in the Alexandrian War, as he himſelf and Strabo relates; it was afterward reedified by Cleopatra. And ſo ſhe repaired another work, which though Ammianus attributes to her invention, yet Cæſar aſcribes to the former Kings; and this was that called the Heptaſtadium. The Iſland Pharos lay off at the diſtance of a mile from Alexandria, and thereby made a convenient Haven and refuge for Ships. But this did not ſatisfie, they thought it convenient to joyn the Iſland and the Continent whereon the City ſtood together, and for that purpoſe made a Mole of ſeven Stadia or Furlongs in length, which by the intervenvention of a Bridge accompliſhed their deſigne, and made thereby two Havens; one called the Great, and the other the Haven of Euneſtus. This it ſeems Cleopatra repaired, when by age and waſhing of the Sea it was decayed, and upon this occaſion if Ammianus was rightly informed. The Iſland Pharos where Homer Fabled, Phocus with his Flocks of Sea Calves to lodge was obnoxious and tributary to the Rhodians. Their Officers demanding exceſſive Tolls; this crafty Woman invited them to a ſolemn Feaſt, and entertained them ſo long till in ſeven dayes ſhe cauſed a Mole to be made of ſo many Furlongs; and then paſſing upon it in her Chariot affirmed the Rhodians were miſtaken in asking of Tolls to be paid for Iſlands; for there were no ſuch things to be found in thoſe Quarters. Others write that this Queen when ſhe ſaw ſhe ſhould have a War with Auguſtus, cauſed a Mole to be made betwixt Pharos and Alexandria, and ſo joyned the Iſland to the Continent by the skill and induſtry of Dexiphanes a Mechanical Mathematician.

The Serapeum.

The Libraries.

4. But Ammianus proceeding in the deſcription of this City, mentions the lofty Temples therein to be ſeen, amongſt which was eminent that called Serapeum, or of Serapis, which though it might be leſſen'd with the ſlenderneſs of Expreſſions, yet was ſo illuſtrated by its Atria, adorned with moſt large Pillars and a multitude of other works; that after the Capitol, wherein venerable Rome for ever prided her ſelf, the whole world ſaw nothing more ſtately. In it were ineſtimable Libraries: and the faith of antient Monuments unanimouſly ſpeaks that ſeven hundred thouſand Volumes having been carefully got together by the Induſtry of the Ptolomies, were burnt when the City was plundered under Cæſar the Dictator. As for the Libraries, Epiphanius writes of two which were publick at Alexandria, the firſt was this of Philadelphus iu that part of the City called Bruchium, and the ſecond made long after in the Serapeum, and called the ſiſter of the former. This of Philadelphus contaied an hundred thouſand Books, as Euſebius writes in his Chronicon; and afterwards by the following Kings, it was inlarged, who in this matter of Collecting Books, contended with thoſe of Pergamus; ſo that the number of Volumes roſe to that of ſeven hundred thouſand, as ſeveral Authors relate. Livie and Oroſius wrote that four hundred thouſand Books were burnt in the Alexandrian War; neither is it probable that all miſcarried. But beſides theſe, ſome ſpeak of another Library, and that a publick one in the Caſtle of Alexandria; and others that Cleopatra repaired that which ſo miſcarried by Fire.

5. Certain it is from Strabo's account he gives us of this City that by reaſon Lib. 17. p. 792. of its ſituation, it flowed with the abundance of all things, and though near to it Healthfulneſs. adjoyned a Lake, yet, which was chiefeſt, it enjoyed an Aer very healthful. It was waſhed with two Seas, the Ægyptian from the North, and that from the South called the Lake of Mareia or Mareotis. The Lake was filled by the River Nile both from the upper Countries by Ditches and from other parts, through which many more things were imported than by Sea, whereby it came to paſs that the Haven of the Lake was more rich and frequented. And any one might eaſily perceive that this way more Merchandize was exported from Alexandria, than was imported from Italy, if he had been both at Alexandria and Puteoli, and had taken notice of the ſhips of burthen which had egreſs and regreſs from and into both ports. Beſides the wealth which flowed into it from both Havens, The clemency of the Air he thinks worthy to be mentioned, which thence happened becauſe the place was on both ſides watered, and the Nile conveniently had its Increaſes. For other Cities (in another place he excepts Ravenna) placed upon Lakes, in Summer heats have a thick heavey and Choaking Air, and by reaſon of vapors excited by the Sun, abundance of mud and filth lyes upon the edges, whence noxious ſteems ariſe which infect the Air and produce the peſtilence. But at Alexandria, when Summer begins, the Nile being increaſed fills the Lake, and leaves no mud or filth from which any malignant vapor may exhale. Beſides the Eteſian winds blow ſo from the North, and ſo great a Sea, that the Inhabitants with much eaſe paſs the Summer.

The ſhape of the City. 6. In the days of our Geographer the Figure of the City repreſented that of a Chlamys or Souldiers Coat, the ſides of which extending in length were compaſſed with water being about thirty furlongs in Diameter; The ſides ſtretching forth in breadth were ſtraitned with Iſthmi or Necks of Land of ſeven or eight furlongs being waſhed with the Sea and the Lake. It was alſo ſo divided into ſtreets and paſſages, that both Horſes and Chariots might be driven through them, but two were conſiderable for their largeneſs, and cut through each other at equal Angles. It had Temples and publick places moſt beautiful, and Royal Palaces which took up a fourth or a third part of its Circumference. For every one of the Kings had a mind to be adding to things Conſecrated to their Gods, ſo ſome thing of his own to the Palaces built by his Predeceſſors. All of them were near together and joyned to the Haven. Part of the Palaces was the Muſeum which had a walk, an Exedra, and a large Houſe wherein was the Refectory of thoſe who being Fellows The Muſeum or Colledge. of the Muſeum applyed themſelves to the ſtudy of good Letters. This Colledge was maintained at the publick charge, and had a Prieſt for its Governor formerly nominated by the Kings, and in the time of Strabo by the Emperor.

7. Another part of the Palaces was called Soma (or Body) being a place walled in, wherein were the Sepulchres of the Kings and of Alexander. For, Strabo The Soma or place of Sepulture. writes that Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus took the body of Alexander from Perdiccas, as he carryed it from Babylon, and turned off unto thoſe parts moved by Avarice and the deſign of getting Ægypt into his own power. He was killed by the Souldiers being ſurpriſed by Ptolomy in an Iſland, where they fell upon and murdered him with their Sariſſæ. The body of Alexander, Ptolomy brought to Alexandria and there buried it; and there, ſaith he it ſtill lies though not in the ſame cheſt or coffin. For now it is Glaſs whereas he had laid it in Gold; But the Golden one was taken away by Ptolomy Sirnamed Coccus and Subdititius coming thither from Syria; though he was preſently overthrown and received no benefit by his booty.

8. In the great Haven near the entrance at the right hand, was the Iſland and the Tower Pharos; at the left lay Rocks and Lochias the Promontory wherein there was alſo a Royal Palace. As one went further to the left were more houſes of the Kings joyning to that in Lochias having many and various Appartments and Groves. To them joyned an Haven or Creek private and ſhut up which belonged alſo to the Kings. Alſo an Iſland lay before the artificial Haven, having moreover its Palace and its Creek, and called Antirhodus, becauſe it did, as it were emulate Rhodes. Above it was a Theatre, and a place called Poſſideum, becauſe in it was a Temple of Neptune; there Antony made a further Mole into the great Haven and Timonium. built a palace he called Timonium; and he did it at the laſt, when being forſaken by his Friends, after the defeat of Actium he had retired to Alexandria, and bidding ding farewel to all his Acquaintance, purpoſed to lead there a ſolitary life, after the example of Timon.

Necropolis.

9. Next to them was the Cæſareum Emporium or Exchange, and the Apoſtaſes or Abſceſſes and then the Navalia, or ſtations for ſhips; as far as the Heptaſtadium. Beyond the Heptaſtadium lay the Haven of Eunoſtus, and above it was digged another Port called Cibotus or the Arke wherein were other Navalia. Within it was a Foſs or Ditch reaching as far as the Lake of Mæotis, and without lay a little part of the City. Then was to be ſeen Necropolis, or the City of dead bodies, and a Suburbe wherein were many Gardens, Monuments, and places for Embalming the dead. Within the Ditch ſtood the Serapium and ſome other old Temples almoſt ruinated, by reaſon of the building of the Temples at Nicopolis; for there was the Amphitheater and the Stadium, and the five years Games were there Celebrated: And ſuch things as were of old inſtituted became of no repute. In a word, ſaith he, the City is full of conſecrated and ſacred things, hath a beautiful Gymaſium (to which belongs Porticus's longer than a furlong) a Forum or place of Judicature, and Groves. There is alſo the Panium an high work raiſed with the hand, broad above, and ſmall beneath, like a Top, to which they mount by Stairs and thence they have a fair proſpect of the whole City.

Nicopolis.

10. From Necropolis ran one ſtreet by the Gymaſium as far as the Gate of Canopus; then the Cirque or Hippodrome, and others as far as the Ditch of it. Paſſing through the Hippodrome, one came to Nicopolis inhabited as far as the Sea, ſo as it ought not be eſteemed to be leſs than the City, being thirty Furlongs diſtant from Alexandria. This place Auguſtus Cæſar beautified, becauſe here he overthrew thoſe that ſided with Antony, and taking the City in his firſt attempt, Conſtrained him to kill himſelf, and got Cleopatra alive into his Power, who ſhortly after being in Cuſtody ſecretly made away her ſelf by the biting of an Aſp, or as others deliver, by a poyſoned ointment.

11. Ammianus tells you (that we may finiſh this ſhort Account of this famous City) that Alexandria being increaſed, not by degrees as others, but growing up “ at its firſt beginnings through ſpacious compaſſes, and being long and ſharply “ harraſed with internal ſeditions, at laſt after many years, in the Reign of the Em- “ peror Aurelian, Civil Conteſts proceeding to deadly blows, loſt its walls and with “ them the greateſt of its Regions called Bruchion the long abiding place of Ex- “ Famous men. cellent men. Here lived Ariſtarchus the Excellent Grammarian; Herodian the moſt Minute inquirer into Arts; Saccas Ammonius the Maſter of Plotinus, and “ many other writers of noble Learning; amongſt whom Chalcenterus Didymus “ was eminent, memorable for his Attempt of manifold knowledg, who, for the “ Silli Græcedicuntur Maledici & Satyrica carmina.
five Books wherein unskilfully he reprehends Tully, immitating the Silligraphi “ and Malevolent Authors, is accuſed in the judgment of Learned ears, as a whelp “ or ſneaking curr, barking and making a rotten noiſe about a roaring Lyon. “

12. And although he adds, many of the Ancients, beſides theſe I have mentio- “ ned, there did flouriſh; yet at this preſent time various ſorts of Learning are “ not ſilent in that City. For, the Maſters of Studies there in a meaſure take their “ breath, and whatſoever lyes hid, there is diſcovered by the frame of Geometry, “ neither hath Muſick amongſt them quite decayed, nor harmony been put to ſi- “ lence; the conſideration of the motion of the World and Stars grows warme in “ ſome men though they be rare; and not a few are learned in Numbers: beſides “ Arts profeſſed. this they are skilled in that Science which telleth Fortunes. Over and above, the Studies of Medicine, are daily ſo increaſed, that though the practice it “ ſelf do diſcover the skill ſufficiently, yet it abundantly ſufficeth for the “ Commendation of the Phyſitians Art if he ſay he learnt it at Alexandria. “
In Bruchion it was that Philadelphus made his Library, and credible it is that Learned men flocked to it, to whom he aſſigned Sallaries and maintenance from the publick. For, this our Philadelphus firſt inſtituted a Colledge of Learned men called Muſeum or the Temple of the Muſes, to whom he alſo inſtituted Games ſolemn and called Muſea; The Muſeum was part of the Palace, which as we have ſeen, took up the greateſt part of the City, and was moſt Fortified, ſo that in Aurelians ſiege it might very well make full reſiſtance as it did. But this and all together concerning this City. Now to return to our Ptolomy.

13. He got the ſirname of Philadelphus, not for any love ſhewed to his brothers (two of whom he put to death) but to his ſiſter Arſinoe, whom after an inceſtuous (though Ægyptian) faſhion he married, having Children before by another Arſinoe daughter to Lyſimachus; by his ſiſter he never had any, ſhe dying before ſhe was delivered, Demetrius Phalereus laboured to diſſwade his father from leaving him his ſucceſſor, rnd counſelled him to beſtow the Kingdom on ſome of Eurydice's ſons, for which he was now caſt out of favour, and dyed by the biting of an Aſp, which he put to his hand. He had a brother by his mothers ſide named Magas, whoſe father was one Philip a Macedonian, but of baſe Original. Him ſhe had procured to be made Governor of Cyrene, the Inhabitants of which he now raiſed, and cauſed them to revolt from him, and marched with an Army towards Ægypt; and Ptolomy ſecuring all the paſſages, went out to encounter him. But news coming in the way that the Marmaridæ, a people of the Lybian Nomades had rebelled, Magas retreated in all haſt back to Cyrene, and Ptolomy then intending to follow him, was hindred by the Galls in his Army, whom having hired amongſt others, he found to have plotted to ſeize upon Ægypt; but he brought them all to the number of four thouſand through the Nile to a deſert Iſland, where with famine, and other ways, they were made away. Magas after this having marryed Apame the daughter of Antiochus Soter, perſwaded him to break the League betwixt him and his brother, and invade Ægypt, which he prepared to do; but Ptolomy ſent ſeveral parties abroad into Syria, and found him ſo much work at home, that he could have no time to look abroad, and Magas before his death having a deſire to be friends with his brother, betrothed his daughter to his ſon. Betwixt this Ptolomy, and the next Antiochus ſirnamed Theos were continual Wars, till both being weary thereof entered into an Alliance, Ptolomy giving him in marriage his daughter Berenice, which proved but an occaſion of greater trouble, and the deſtruction of the Bride, though he lived not to ſee it. For he, notwithſtanding all his learning, gave himſelf up to luxury, and fondly dreaming he ſhould live always, and that by him alone was found out immortality, ſuddenly died, after he had Reigned thirty eight years alone, and one (with ſome odd months) together with his father, A. M. 3758. and the ſecond of the 133th Olympiad.

Pauſan. in Atticis.

Laertius in vita Demetrii.
Pauſan. ibid.

Magas his brother obtaineth Cyrene.

Juſtin. lib. 26.

Athenæus lib. 12. cap. 17.

14. Ptolomy his ſon by Arſinoe, the daughter of Lyſimachus, ſucceeded him, in the ſixteenth year of Antiochus Theos, and was ſirnamed Euergetes. As ſoon as he came to the Kingdom, he had work enough made him in Syria; for there Antiochus, who had put away his former wife (upon the marriage of Berenice his ſiſter) now overcome with Love, took her, and her Children, again into his Court, notwithſtanding which ſhe fearing yet his fickleneſs, and another diſgrace, to prevent it, procured him to be poyſoned, and conveyed his Kingdom to Seleucus Callinicus her eldeſt ſon. Berenice ſhe committed to two of the chief of Antioch to be made away, but the Lady, when ſhe heard that ſome were ſent to kill her, ſhut up her ſelf in Daphne, where being beſieged, the Cities of Aſia, moved with the remembrance of the Dignity of her family, ſent her aid, and Ptolomy her brother marched in all haſt poſſible to deliver her, but ere ſhe could be relieved ſhe was circumvented by thoſe that with an Oath promiſed her ſecurity, and ſlain together with her young ſon. Out of diſdain at this unworthy act the Cities revolted to Ptolomy, who entring Syria killed Laodice, paſſed to Babylon, and got almoſt all Aſia into his hands, at which time he viſited Jeruſalem alſo, where he offered many ſacrifices of praiſe to God, and dedicated gifts ſuitable to ſo great a victory. The Kingdom of Syria had become a Province to that of Ægypt, in all probability at this time, had he not been recalled by domeſtick troubles, which being very urgent, he left Cilicia to the Governance of Antiochus his great favourite, to Xanthippus another of his Captains the Provinces beyond Euphrates, and ſo plundring Seleucus's Kingdom of forty thouſand Talents of ſilver, he carryed down alſo many coſtly Veſſels and Images of Idols to the number of two thouſand five hundred, amongſt which were thoſe which Cambyſes had after his overthrow of Amaſis, vnd Pſammiticus, conveyed out of Ægypt: And therefore the Ægyptians, becauſe after ſo many years he had reſtored to them their gods, honoured him with the ſirname of Euergetes.

Juſtin lib 27.

Appian in Syriacis.

Hieronym. in Daniel.

Ptolomy Euergetes his Wars with Antiochus Theos.

Joſephus contra Apion. lib. 2.

15. Seleucus provided a Fleet for the recovery of the places revolted, but before he could come to uſe it, loſt it all by a Tempeſt, which yet proved the greateſt gain; for the Cities out of commiſeration of his eſtate, and as if he had already ſufficiently ſmarted for his paricide, returned again to their obedience. Being exceedingly encouraged, and animated herewith (as richer by his loſs) he then made War upon Ptolomy; but as if he had been born for a laughing ſtock to fortune, and not recovered the Kingdom for himſelf, he was overthrown again in battel, and as deſtitute of followers, as after the ſhipwrack, fled to Antioch, when applying a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe, he ſent to his brother Antiochus (from his ravenous diſpoſition ſirnamed Hierax) for aid; and ſo Ptolomy fearing himſelf not to be able to graple with both, made a Truce with him for ten years. Whilſt he was abroad in Aſia, his wife Berenice, daughter to his Uncle Magas, and betroathed to him, as we ſaid before, vowed to conſecrate her hair to the gods, in caſe he returned ſafe, and accordingly cutting it off, laid it up in a certain Chapel, whereupon Conon the Mathematician, who flouriſhed at this time, out of flattery to them both, feigned it to be taken up into Heaven, and invented that conſtellation which yet is known by the name of it. In his time a Phœnix is reported the third time after the days of Seſoſtris, and the next after them of Amaſis, to have flown (being a bird ſacred to the Sun) accompanied with a great number of other birds, admiring her new face, to the City Heliopolis, as Tacitus tells us, who reports that the ſame thing hapned afterwards in the Reign of Tiberius; Paulus Fabius, and L. Vitellius being Conſuls. To this Ptolomy fled Cleomenes the King of Sparta after his overthrow received from Antigonus Doſon of Macedonia, and the Achæans, who honourably receiving him, and prizing him very much for his worth, was much aſhamed that he had ſuffered ſuch a man to be defeated, and promiſed to re-eſtabliſh him; but he dyed before he could bring it about, after he had Reigned twenty four years, in the 139th Olympiad, within which Polybius * obſerves both Antigonus Doſon, and Seleucus Ceraunus, King of Macedonia, to have left the World, and their Kingdoms to their Succeſſors.

Juſtin ut prius.

with

His wife Bere-nice's hair gi-veth name to a Conſtella-tion.

Annal. lib. 6.

Polyb. lib. 5. & Plutarch in vita Cleomen.

* Sub finem lib. 2.

Ptolomy Philopator.

16. His ſon ſucceeded him, being ſirnamed Philopator, ironically, if we believe Juſtin, who out of Trogus accuſeth him of making away both father and mother. Certainly if we look at his general carriage and diſpoſition, he was like enough to do it, giving up himſelf to all luxury and effeminateneſs, and thereby neglecting his affairs, whence he obtained the name of Tryphon. Finding his brother Magas by his mothers means to be very great with the Army, he made them both away by the means of Soſibius, who was his greateſt Counſellor, and manager of his publick buſineſs. His lazineſs, and neglect, encouraged Antiochus the Great to make War upon him for Cœleſyria, in which, though he got the better, yet can it not be aſcribed to any thing of his, he thinking of nothing leſs than preparation for reſiſtance, and whereas he had opportunity enough after the battel to have outed his Enemy of Syria, yet being overjoyed that he had recovered Cœleſyria only, he ſent Soſibius to confirm the peace. In his return out of Syria he went to Jeruſalem, and would needs ſee the inward holy places of the Temple, but was ſmitten ſo with a blind horror, that he fell, and could ſcarcely be recovered to himſelf, but departing home raged againſt the Jews at Alexandria. Then with great earneſtneſs returning to his a little intermitted jollities he doted ſo upon Agathoclea his Concubine, that he killed his ſiſter and wife Eurydice, and forgetting all credit and Majeſty, ſpent the nights in filthineſs, and the days in feaſting. Theſe things are firſt privately acted within the Court Walls, but preſently ſhamed not at the publick view; the impudence of the Strumpet containing it ſelf in no bounds, being increaſed by the favour of her brother Agathocles, one of as filthy a life as her ſelf, and the Conjunction of her mother Euanthe, who ſpent high, and preſumed much on the ſcore of her Childrens great grace with the King. Henceforth theſe women not contenting themſelves with the King, poſſeſſed the Kingdom alſo, and ſhamed not to appear in publick in great equipage to be reverenced. As for Agathocles, he reigned, and not Ptolomy, by the direction and advice of his two Aſſiſtants, Mother and Siſter, diſpoſing of Offices and Commands in the Army at his pleaſure.

Lib. 29. & 30.

A. M. 3783.
Ol. 139. ann. 2.
V. C. 532.
Antioch. M. 2.
Polybius lib. 5.

Polybius ibid. & Plutarch in Cleomen.

17. Yet, had Ptolomy the ſtrange fortune to overcome all difficulties he met with. Cleomenes the Spartan entertained, as we ſaid, lovingly by his father, with promiſe to endeavour his reſtitution, now finding things to make for it at home, by the death of Antigonus, and the Conjunction of the Ætolians with them of Sparta againſt the Achæans, earneſtly deſired to be diſpatched away; but he minding nothing but his pleaſures, and buried in ſottiſhneſs, regarded him not at all. Soſibius indeed conſidered of the thing, and called his friends to adviſe about it; but upon mature deliberation concluded it not wiſdom to diſmiſs him provided of men and arms, leſt finding all clear abroad, his Enemies being now dead, or quiet, he, who knew ſufficiently the ſtate and condition of Ægypt under ſuch a Prince, might attempt ſomething rather beneficial for himſelf, than ſafe for it. Hereupon its reſolved he ſhall be retained ſtill, and after ſome time an occaſion was found to confine him. For one Nicagoras a Meſſenian, who ought him an injury, coming to Town, he not at all conſidering to whom he ſpake, jeered the King to him for his filthy manner of life; which he being glad of, as having an opportunity againſt him, acquainted Soſibius with his words, and they two plot together that Nicagoras at his departure Stirs about Cleomenes King of Sparta.

ſhould leave a Letter directed to the other, wherein he ſhould accuſe Cleomenes of an intention to make ſtirs in Ægypt, except he were ſent away according to the promiſe of Euergetes. This being laid to his charge by Soſibius, and ſoundly aggravated to the King, he was ſecured in free cuſtody, having a large houſe, but kept with a Guard, aſſigned to him; whereupon growing deſperate, one day when Ptolomy was gone out of Town, he made his Keepers drunk, and with his followers brake out into the ſtreets, and called the people to liberty. But none ſtirring, being all aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of the Enterprize, they made for the Caſtle, which finding to be ſtrongly defended, he and all with him, after a Laconian faſhion, as Polybius termeth it, killed themſelves. Such was the end of this famous man, who being indued with a ſingular dexterity and promptneſs of wit, had a genious ſuitable to great and weighty matters, and was fitted by gifts of nature as well as experiences, for the Offices either of a great Commander, or a Prince.

18. Though Cleomenes his ſuddain and unexpected attempt made no ſuch impreſſion upon the City, as that any inſurrections enſued thereupon; (and indeed the luxurie of the Court had infected it and the whole Land with the ſame diſtemper) yet the minds of the people being ſomething ſcoured by the Wars with Antiochus from this ruſt, and elevated upon their ſucceſs againſt him, after the battel at Raphia, and the recovery of Cœleſyria, they began to ſlight their lawful King, and then aroſe to ſuch an height, as they clearly revolted, intending to ſet up againſt him a Captain of their own making, which ſhortly after they did, and waged War with him; though in what manner, or with what end, we know not, further than thus, that, as it ſeemeth, he had the better of it, for he retained his dignity and power. About this time ſixty thouſand Jews are ſaid to have been ſlain in Ægypt, who ſeeing they amounted to ſuch a number, we may have ground to think that they took part with the people, and that his cruelty towards them enſued as a revenge hereupon, though others there be that judge the contrary, and deliver it as a thing not to be doubted of. This is certain, that about this time he grievouſly perſecuted thoſe of that Nation which lived at Alexandria; abuſing them firſt with libels, and ſeeking to withdraw them from their Religion. Thoſe that refuſed to turn, were either put to death, or being deprived of all dignity and liberty, were branded with the image of an Ivy leaf as the badge of Bacchus; and becauſe they were ſuſpected to withdraw others from their obedience to the King, all the Jews throughout the Land were in forty days ſpace gathered together, to be deſtroyed by five hundred Elephants, to which was given wine mingled with much frankincence to inrage them. But in the morning when Ptolomy ſhould have come out to the ſight, a ſluggiſh fit is ſaid to have detained him until dinner, and on the next day ſuch a forgetfulneſs to have ſeized on him, as he thought them mad which mentioned the thing to him; and then on the third, when the beaſts were ready to be let looſe, two terrible Angels appeared, which ſtruck King and People with extraordinary horror, and drove the Elephants upon thoſe who came to be ſpectators of the cruelty. Hereupon enſued ſuch a change of the Kings mind, as he diſmiſſed the Jews, after he had feaſted them ſeven days, and giving them leave to kill the Apoſtates, acknowledged God to be their protector. At length he dyed (leaving a child of five years old, and begotten of his ſiſter, behind him) after he had Reigned about eighteen years, A. M. three thouſand eight hundred and one, in the firſt of the one hundred forty fourth Olympiad.

Polyb. ut prius.

Euſebius in Chronico.
3. Maccab.
Uſſerius Annal. Vet. Teſt. pag. 510.

The Jews perſecuted.

A. M. 3789.
Ol. 141. an. 1.
V. C. 538.
Ant. Mag. 8.
Ptol. Philop. 7.

Ptolomy dyeth.

19. His ſon a child of five years ſucceeded him, being declared King by him before his death, in the twentieth year of Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, and was ſirnamed afterwards Epiphanes. The death of Philopator was for a long time kept cloſe, by Agathocles and his party, till his mother and ſiſter had rifled the Court, and he had found out ſuch a way as he thought moſt effectual for the eſtabliſhment of himſelf in that power he already enjoyed. Then brought he out the King to the Macedonians, and with great expreſſions of ſorrow for the death of his father, tells them the child was by him delivered into the arms of Agathoclea his ſiſter, inveighs bitterly againſt one Tlepolemus (who being a true Patriot was an eye-ſore to him) as if he intended to ſeize upon the Kingdom, labouring to impoſe upon the belief of the Souldiers, and ſecure himſelf by their ſtrength; but no man gave any credit to whatever he ſaid, ſo intirely was he hated by all. The remembrance of the former outrages committed by him and his, being more freſhly renewed by ſome other attempts of cruelty whilſt things ſtill hung in this condition, ſo inraged the multitude, that from all the quarters of the City flocking to the Court, they would not be ſatisfied, till having the young King firſt delivered to them, they broke open the

Juſtin lib. 30.

Polyb. lib. 15.

His ſon Ptolomy Epiphanes a child of five years ſucceedeth him.

A. M. 3801.
Ol. 144. an. 1.
V. C. 550.
Ant. Mag. 20.

the doors, and getting him, his ſiſter, mother, and other of his creatures into their hands, they put them to death, mangling their bodies afterwards; it being natural to that People to be cruel if once in choler. After this, ſuch as had an hand in the murder of Euridice the Queen were knocked in the head by her women. The infamy of the Nation being thus in ſome meaſure expiated by the ſlaughter of theſe miſcreants, Ariſtomenes an Acarnanian was made Protector of the King, his Realms and Dominions, who though for his own intereſt he beforetime temporized with Agathocles, yet now managed the affairs of his Prince with much honeſty and wiſdom. And indeed ſuch there was need he ſhould be at this time, when the King, being obnoxious by reaſon of his years to injury and wrong, was ſtruck at by two the greateſt Princes then living, viz. Antiochus King of Syria, and Philip King of Macedonia, who pretending fair things to his Father, and nothing towards him but kindneſs, now ſought to devour him, and make a prey of his Kingdom; Philip by laying hold upon Ægypt and Caria; and Antiochus on Cœleſyria and Phœnicia. The only remedy was to ſend to Rome to complain, and deſire aid; and an Ambaſſage was quickly diſpatched away for that purpoſe.

Antiochus and Philip gape after Ægypt.

Idem lib. 3.

20. The Ambaſſage was no whit diſpleaſing to the Romans, who ſought an occaſion againſt Philip, for his entering into alliance with Hannibal, and were ſeldom backward to meddle in the affairs of other Nations, eſpecially now fearing none of them after the overthrow of the Carthaginians. Ambaſſadors were ſent then to the Kings, to require them to abſtain from Ægypt, and M. Lepidus thither to be Governor and Protector of the young King, whoſe Father, at his death, left him to the tuition of the People of Rome; over and above that it was now deſired of his friends. But ere the Ambaſſadors could reach to him, Antiochus had got Phœnicia and other Cities belonging to Ptolomy into his power, and then deſpiſing their errand, went on in his conqueſts. Scopas the Ætolian a year or two after ſent into Cœleſyria, with a great Army, reduced many Cities thereof, with Judæa, to Ptolomie's obedience, but again quickly loſt all, being overthrown by Antiochus at the head of the River Jordan near to Paneæ, whence he fled to Tyre, where the King beſieged him with ten thouſand men; and though Æropus and Menocles, two famous Captains were ſent out of Ægypt to relieve him, yet was he forced for want of proviſion to yield the Town, and march thence without his Arms. Antiochus then in purſute of this Victory, beſides what he did in Cœleſyria, withdrew divers places in Cilicia and Caria from Ptolomy, concerning whom alſo a rumor being ſpread that he was dead, he made haſte to ſeize upon Cyprus. What Cities he had got in Aſia, the Romans divers times by Ambaſſadors demanded to be put into their hands, which being refuſed by him, this, with his ambition, and other things, miniſtred occaſion of a War betwixt them (as is ſhewed before) and that turned to the commodity of Ptolomy. For Antiochus being unwilling to have any Enemies at his back, ſought to enter into affinity with ſeveral Kings, and amongſt the reſt gave to him in marriage his daughter Cleopatra, and with her in Dowry all Cœleſyria and Judæa; having this alſo in his eye, by means of her to get ſome footing in Ægypt, though he was miſtaken. For Ptolomy his Officers underſtanding his cunning well enough, behaved themſelves more warily; and Cleopatra together with the man married his intereſt, and acted accordingly.

Juſtin lib. 30. & 31.

Antiochus his Conqueſts.

Joſephus Antiq lib. 12. c. 3. & Hieronymus in Daniel.

Appian in Syriacis.

He marrieth his daughter to Ptolomy.

21. Scopas the Ætolian, Ptolomy his General in Cœleſyria, returning to Alexandria after his overthrow, fell into diſcontent, and thence to plot againſt the King and State. Yet though he had many Souldiers at his command, had he no heart to ſtir, and though having a ſufficient opportunity in the minority of the King, he ſtill delayed to execute his deſigns, till he was prevented. For Ariſtomenes having diſcovered what he was about, juſt when he was plotting with his aſſociates, ſent for him to the Court, whither being conſtrained to come, he was accuſed by the King firſt now ſitting in Council, then by Polycrates the Governor of Cyprus, and laſtly by Ariſtomenes, who laboured to prove him guilty of what was alledged, for that he was found in conſultation with his friends, and refuſed to come unto the King when ſent for; and he confirmed the charge from the teſtimony of divers eminent Græcians, and the Ambaſſadors of the Ætolians, who were then ſent about a Peace. His anſwers were no whit ſatisfactory; ſo that being condemned not only by all the Council, but ſuch foreign miniſters as were preſent, and being ſecured that night, he was together with his complices the next day taken away by poyſon, being a man ſo extraordinarily covetous above all others, that having broke down the walls (as Polybius terms it) of the Kingdom, he had exhauſted it with rapines. With him fell Dicæarchus one of his companions, who being tortured to death, thereby (as the

Polyb. lib. 17.

Scopas the Ætolian plotteth againſt the King and receiveth his reward.

the Hiſtorian tells us) made ſatisfaction to all Greece, againſt which he was made Admiral of the Fleet by Philip of Macedonia, when he wickedly ſet upon the Iſlands Cyclades; and alſo to the gods, into whom as well as men he thought to ſtrike a terror, for caſting anchor in the Haven, he there erected two Altars, one to Impiety, and another to Iniquity, on which he ſacrifized to them as gods. This conſpiracy being thus ſuppreſſed, ſuch Ætolians as would, had leave to depart with all they had, and then the Country betook themſelves to prepare for the ſolemnity, conſtantly obſerved when any one was ſaluted King, termed Anacleteria; for though he was as yet ſomething too young, yet they thought that when it was known he was his own Maſter, and at his own diſpoſal, his Kingdom would be more quiet, and his affairs be more promoted.

A. M. 3809.
Ol. 146.ann. 1.
V. C. 558.
Ant. Mag. 28.
Ptolom. Epiphan. 8.

Excerp. Diodori Siculi.

Polybius Legat. 37, 40, & 57.

Ptolomy contracteth amity with the Achæans.

Hieronym. in Danel.

Is poyſoned.

22. He carryed himſelf exceedingly well for ſome time, and with great commendation, but afterwards was undone by flatterers, and ſo far corrupted, as he poyſoned Ariſtomenes, whom he had before conſtantly obſerved as a Father, and who had deſerved well of him and the Commonwealth. After this he degenerated more and more, whence he contracted ſuch hatred of his Subjects, as he well nigh had loſt his Kingdom. Towards his latter end, having ſome high deſigns in his head, he ſent Demetrius an Ambaſſador to the Achæans, to renew friendſhip and alliance with them, who gladly accepting of his offer, ſent back to him Lycortas Father to Polybius the Hiſtorian, Theodoridas and Rhoſiteles to confirm it by oath on their part, and to receive the like aſſurance from him, which they obtained with a great preſent of money and arms. Some ſix years after he ſent other Ambaſſadors to them, now having well nigh faln out with the Romans, offering them ten ſhips of fifty oares, ſufficiently manned and furniſhed for War, which as of concernment, amounting almoſt to ten Talents, they accepted of moſt gladly, and diſpatched back to him Lycortas again with Polybius his ſon (though he was too young by the Laws for ſuch an employment) and Aratus the ſon of famous Aratus the Sicyonian, to give him thanks for the former preſent, and fetch the ſhips into Peloponneſus; but he was dead ere they could get out of their own Country. For plotting now againſt Seleucus Philopator, who had ſucceeded Antiochus his Father in the Kingdom of Syria, and preparing an Army againſt him, when one of his Captains asked him where he would get money ſufficient for ſuch an enterprize, he anſwered, that his friends were riches to him, which being told abroad amongſt the People, his Officers fearing he would fleece them to ſupply himſelf, took him away by poyſon, after he had lived twenty ſeven years, and Reigned twenty four thereof. A. M. 3825, and the firſt of the 150 Olympiad.

Ptolomy Philometor

A. M. 3825.

Idem. ibid.

Prepareth for Cœleſyria.

Polyb. Legat. 81, 82.

But his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes preventeth him by getting all Ægypt into his hands.

23. He left two ſons and one daughter, all very young, of which the eldeſt ſon ſucceeded him, being ſirnamed Philometor, in the eighth year of Seleucus Philopator King of Syria. After his Anacleteria, his mother Cleopatra the daughter of Antiochus the Great being lately dead, through the perſwaſion of Eulaius the Eunuch, and Lenæus his principal Counſellors, he began to caſt his thoughts upon Cœleſyria, which being given to his mother as a portion, was unjuſtly kept from him as he conceived, by his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, who now had ſucceeded his elder brother in the Kingdom of Syria. Antiochus hearing of their preparations for the War at Alexandria, came down into Ægypt to prevent them, and overthrew the King ſeveral times as hath been ſaid, and got the whole Country, except that City, into his power; after which Ptolomy deliberating with Comanus and Cineas what was to be done, it was reſolved, that a Council of the moſt expert Captains ſhould be erected, by the advice whereof all things ſhould be managed. The firſt reſolve of this Council was, that ſuch Græcian Ambaſſadors as were preſent, ſhould be ſent to Antiochus about an agreement, with whom Ptolomy joyned of his own two others. The firſt day after their arrival, they were entertained very nobly, and on the next had audience, wherein they laid all the blame upon Eulaius the Eunuch, and urging the youth and kindred of the King to him, laboured to pacifie him. He after he had aſſented to them in theſe things, and ſpoken more to the ſame purpoſe, laboured with much earneſtneſs to demonſtrate, that Cœleſyria appertained to the Crown of Syria, alledging it to have belonged to Antigonus the firſt founder of that Kingdom, and he produced the conveiances of it to Seleucus after the death of the other, from the Macedonian Kings. Moreover calling to their remembrance, that Antiochus his Father had lately obtained it again by right of conqueſt, he flatly denyed that ever he paſſed it over as a portion with his daughter, to the late King of Ægypt, and ſo having diſcourſed on this ſubject to the ſatisfaction of all his hearers, he then departed to Naucratis, where friendly treating the Inhabitants, and giving a largeſs to ſuch Greeks as dwelt there, he thence departed for Alexandria, deferring to give any anſwer to thoſe that had been ſent to him, till ſuch time as Ariſtides and Theris were returned, ſaying, he would have all the publick miniſters of Greece to be conſcious to, and witneſſes of, all his intentions.

24. But no ſatisfactory anſwer (if any) was given, or any thing done for Philometor by Antiochus, ſo that being thus outed of his Kingdom after twelve years reign, and giving up himſelf for all that to nothing but ſluggiſhneſs and luxury, the Alexandrians took upon them to make his younger brother King, ſirnaming him Euergetes, (though the badneſs of his manners made them afterwards change it into Cacergetes) being alſo called Phyſcon from his extraordinary fat paunch. Philometor was forced at length to betake himſelf to the Alexandrians too, who receiving him, made him partaker with his brother in the Kingdom, but ſhortly after again expelled him; which thing Antiochus made uſe of, and under pretence of reſtoring him, continued the War, and overthrowing young Ptolomy in a Sea-fight, beſieged Alexandria; but ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe, aroſe and departed into Syria, leaving Philometor at Memphis, to whom he reſtored all Ægypt, except Peluſium, which he kept as the key of the Country in his own hands, not doubting but when one of the brothers had ruined the other, to come, and with eaſe enough devour the Conqueror. But though his two Nephews were otherwiſe ſottiſh enough, yet in this they ſhewed prudence, to diſappoint him, for the elder ſeriouſly conſidering how little he ought to truſt him, ſent to Cleopatra his ſiſter, and ſhe ſeconding him to her brother, both of them by advice and entreaty, procured a peace to be made with conſent of both their friends, the Citizens of Alexandria giving way the more readily, becauſe of the dearth which troubled them, by reaſon of the War, as well when they were at liberty as beſieged. This drew off the Vizard from Antiochus, who, whereas he ought to have rejoyced, if he really intended the reſtitution of Philometor, fretted exceedingly hereat, and nothing would ſerve him, but needs he muſt come down again into Ægypt, and had laid ſiege to Alexandria the ſecond time, had not the Roman Ambaſſadors terrified him from his purpoſe (as we ſhewed in its more proper place) and forced him to quit both Ægypt and Cyprus.

Porphyr. in Græcis Euſeb.

Athenæus lib. 12. cap. 17.

Ptolomy Phyſcon made King.

Polyb. Legat. 83, & 84.

Livius l. 45.

A. M. 3837.
Ol. 153. ann. 1.
V. C. 586.
Ant. Epiphan. 9
Ptol. Philom. 13.

The two brothers agree, and are ſaved harmleſs from their Uncle by the Romans.

25. The Roman Ambaſſadors took ſome pains by their Authority to make them two friends, not being throughly reconciled before, and ſo they continued for ſix years peaceably together. But then differences betwixt them aroſe ſo high, that the Senate at Rome wrote to their Ambaſſadors, ſent into Syria after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, by all means to reconcile them, of which mediation we yet hear of no fruit at all, for preſently the younger expelled his elder brother. Philometor being thus ſpoyled of his Kingdom, with a very few attendants, and in a pitiful habit, came to Rome for help, making his Inn the houſe of an Alexandrian Painter; which when the Senate underſtood, they ſent for him, and made as formal an excuſe as poſſible, that they had neither ſent a Quæſtor to meet him (after the faſhion of the receiving perſons of his quality) nor entertained him at the publick charge, which hapned not by any neglect on their part, but by reaſon of his ſudden and ſecret arrival. Then was he conducted from the Court to the publick Houſe of entertainment, and deſired, that laying off his unſeemly habit, he would move for audience, and a Quæſtor was appointed to make him preſents every day. At length, according to his deſire, Canuceius and Quintus were ſent back with him to Alexandria, who reſtored him to the Kingdom, and made the two brothers aſſent to a diviſion of it, whereby Philometor was to hold Ægypt and Cyprus, and Euergetes poſſeſs Cyrene, the Covenant being moſt ſolemnly confirmed. But Euergetes not being at all ſatisfied in his part, haſted to Rome to reverſe the agreement, alledging that he gave not his conſent freely but out of neceſſity of yielding to the times; wherefore he deſired of the Senate that Cyprus might be alſo adjudged to him, with the addition of which his part would yet be far inferior to his brothers. Menethyllus being ſent after him by Philometor, replyed, that he ought not only Cyrene, but his life alſo to his brother, ſo great hatred had he contracted from their ſubjects, that with the wonder of all, and beyond his hopes was that Kingdom beſtowed on him, and urged the agreement moſt religiouſly made and confirmed, with faith given on both ſides. But Ptolomy denying ſtifly all this, the Senate, for that it ſeemed to them that the parting of the Kingdom was not yet fully concluded, and eſpecially thinking it to be for their intereſt that the diviſion ſhould be equal, aſſented to his requeſt, and ordered T. Torquatus, and Cn. Merula to go with him, and put Cyprus into his hands. For the Romans underſtanding now fully the ſtrength of

Idem ibid.

Porphyrius ut prius.

Polybius Legat. 107.

Valerius Max. Lib. 5. cap. 1. Exemp. 1.

Philometor being expelled by his rebellious brother is reſtored by the Romans, and Euergetes or Phyſcon complaining, they alſo give him relief.

Polybius Legat. 113.

of Ægypt, and conſidering what it might aſpire to if united, wiſely made uſe of this difference, and gratified the two brothers one after the other in their ambitious (but imprudent) deſires.

Polyb. Legat. 115. 16. 17.

26. Departing out of Italy into Greece, he there hired a ſtrong band of men, intending to ſayl with them for Cyprus; but the Roman Commiſſioners calling to mind the Decree of the Senate, which was, that they ſhould reduce him without force, perſwaded him again to diſmiſs them, and paſs over to Cyrene, and they in the mean time going to Alexandria, would endeavour to perſwade his brother to comply with the Senate, and bringing him along with them meet him in the Confines of both Kingdoms. He accordingly went to Crete, where hiring nine thouſand Souldiers, he paſſed over to Libyna, where he expected to hear from Alexandria; but the Romans there treating with his brother about a reconciliation, and the yielding of Cyprus up to him, ſomething he aſſented to, and put off others, on purpoſe drawing out the time in length. Forty days with extraordinary entertainment he detained them at Alexandria, during which time news came to Euergetes that the Cyrenians had revolted from him, who underſtanding well the mind of his brother from his preſent carriage, and ſeeing nothing ſuitable to royalty in Euergetes, he acting all things aſter a Tyrannical manner, could not bring themſelves to ſubmit any longer to his Government. Hearing this, he ſailed to Catabathmus, thence to make for Cyrene, in which place he found the Straights kept againſt him, but ſending ſome about to come upon the Defendants on their backs, ſet upon them alſo himſelf, and cleared the paſſage, but coming to Cyrene, and ingaging with the Natives, was worſted by them. Whether he recruited himſelf again, and recovered his Soveraignty here or no, we have nothing from Hiſtory to ſpeak expreſly; but not long after he was in a capacity to attempt Cyprus (being encouraged by the Senates renouncing their friendſhip with his brother upon his account) where he was alſo overthrown by his brother, and then beſieged, and taken in the City Lapithus. Yet did Philometor ſpare him, what for his innate clemency and brotherly affection, and for fear of the Romans; and not only ſo, but made a Covenant with him when Conquered, wherein he reſtored him Cyrene, and for Cyprus certain Cities with a quantity of Corn yearly, and promiſed him his daughter in marriage, worſe than this being not accounted inceſt in that Country.

Polyb. Legat. 132.

27. Not long did they accord, for Euergetes, ſome two or three years after, being incouraged by his former ſucceſs, made another journey to Rome, where in the Senate he made another loud complaint againſt his brother, accuſing him of plotting againſt his life, for a witneſs of which deſign he ſhewed skars upon his body, and aggravating the thing with all his might, endeavoured to move the minds of all the beholders to compaſſion. Two Ambaſſadors were preſent from Philometor to anſwer to whatſoever he ſhould accuſe him of, but all mens ears were ſo filled with the accuſation, that no place would be found for their defence; ſo that they were inſtantly commanded to be gone, and five Commiſſioners were appointed (furniſhed all with Gallies) to go, and bring him into poſſeſſion of Cyprus; the Allies alſo, both in Greece and Aſia, being written to, and leave given to as many as would to aſſiſt him in the recovery of it. What was done as to the recovery of it, through defect of Hiſtory, we are ignorant, though ſome grounds we have to think he did not obtain the Iſland, and no more do we hear of him till his brothers death. In the days of this Philometor, Onias the ſon of Onias the third, High-Prieſt of the Jews, ſeeing the Prieſthood to be alienated from his family into that of the Haſmonæans, living in Ægypt, and having well deſerved of the King in his Wars, that he might eternize his memory, petitioned him for leave to build a Temple in the Province of Heliopolis, after the faſhion of that at Jeruſalem, ſignifying that thereby would be better provided for the quiet of his Kingdom, now when the Jews badly agreeed amongſt themſelves through the variety of their places of worſhip in that Country, and miſapplyed the Prophecy of Iſaiah, concerning the ſpiritual Prieſthood, and reign of Chriſt, to this his Ambitions and unlawful deſign. His Petition was granted, and in that Country built he a Temple reſembling the true, and lawful one; one hundred eighty furlongs diſtant from Memphis; only he put therein no Candleſtick, but hung up a Lamp in a Golden ſtring, which caſt a light about it like to the Sunbeams.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 6.

Onias the Jew buildeth a Temple in Egypt.

Chap. 19.
A. M. 3853.
Ol. 157. ann. 1.
V. C. 602.
Demet. Soteris. 11.
Ptol. Philom. 29.

Joſephus ibid.

28. In the time of this Philometor, the Jews and Samaritans inhabiting Alexandria fell out about their way of Worſhip, they contending earneſtly that the Temple of Jeruſalem, thoſe that at Gerizim was founded moſt according to the preſcript of Moſes, and ſo earneſt was the diſpute, that both parties appealed to him and his Council Diſſention betwixt the Jews and Samaritans.

Council for a deciſion of the controverſie, who being to judge according to evidence produced out of the Law , was to put to death thoſe pleaders that could not make good their cauſe. For the Jews appeared Andronicus the ſon of Meſſalani, for the Samaritans Sabbæus, and Theodoſius, who being heard by Ptolomy in a full Aſſembly, all were ſo well ſatisfied in the proofs brought by Andronicus, as the King gave ſentence on his ſide, and condemned Sabbæus and Theodoſius. Philometer about this time was deeply ingaged in the affairs of Syria; for, Demetrius Soter having moleſted him much with War, together with Attalus King of Aſia, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia, all theſe agreed to ſuborn a young man of baſe condition, who counterfeiting himſelf the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, ſpoiled Demetrius both of his Kingdom and Life. This Alexander (as he is called) being eſpecially beholden to Ptolomy for this change of his condition, deſired of him his daughter in marriage; which he readily agreed to, and brought her (named Cleopatra) to him to Ptolemais, where the nuptials were ſolemnized with great ſtate. Afterwards Alexander giving up himſelf to cruelty and luxury, Demetrius, the ſon of Demetrius Soter, having hired Souldiers in Crete, attempted the recovery of his Fathers Kingdom. Ptolomy with great Forces both by Land and Sea, came then into Syria, under pretence of helping his ſon-in-law; but getting a great part of the Country into his hands, as far as the River Orontes, and the City Seleucia, he had other intentions, having conceived great prejudice in his mind againſt Alexander, the ſpecial occaſion of which was, that whereas one Ammonius, a great Officer of his had conſpired againſt his life at Ptolemais, he refuſed to give him up to him upon his demand. Wherefore, though he went to Antioch, and there ſet two Diadems on his head, the one for Syria, and the other for Ægypt, yet perſwaded he the Antiochians to receive Demetrius for their King, and taking away his daughter from Alexander, gave her to him; Alexander was overthrown, after which he fled into Arabia (as we ſaid) and there was made away. But in the fight it hapned that Ptolomy his Horſe being affrighted at the noiſe of an Elephant, threw him, which his Enemies perceiving came upon him, and gave him ſuch a wound in his head, that for four days he lay ſenceleſs, and though coming to himſelf, on the next, he was mightily pleaſed with the ſight of the head of Alexander Balas, which was ſent him; yet proved it not ſuch a Cordial, but the third day after, as his Phyſicians were buſie in dreſſing his own he dyed, after he had reigned thirty four years, A. M. 3859. in the third of the 158 Olympiad.

Juſtin lib. 35.

1 Maccab. 10. & 11.

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 8.

Ptolomy fighting againſt Alexander King of Syria, whom he had formerly ſet up, received a wound and dieth.

A. M. 3859. Ol. 158. ann. 3. V. C. 608.

Livius Epit. lib. 52.

27. After his death the order of ſucceſſion was firſt changed in this Kingdom. For whereas hitherto the ſon had continually followed his Father, and now Cleopatra his wife with the help of the Princes, endeavoured to have it ſo, in his ſon and hers; yet his brother Euergetes the ſecond, or Phyſcon, then reigning in Cyrene, withſtood her purpoſe, and forced her, for to put an end to the controverſie, to marry him. Coming to Alexandria, he firſt cauſed the favourers of the Child to be ſlain, and then the boy himſelf in the arms of his mother on their wedding day, and amidſt the ſolemnities; according to which beginning he proceeded, being nothing milder towards thoſe that had ſent for him. For, giving liberty to the outlandiſh Souldiers to kill, and rifle, he filled all places with ſlaughters; many being accuſed, as though they had plotted againſt him, were made away with cruel torments, others under ſome pretence or other baniſhed, and their goods confiſcate. Having a ſon born of this his ſiſter, he named him Memphitis, after the place of his birth, but whilſt he was keeping his birth-day, that he might alſo feed his cruel humour, he put to death divers Cyrenæans, who brought him into Ægypt, for taxing him ſomewhat liberally for his too much familiarity with Irene his Concubine. As his cruelty, ſo alſo his luſt knew no bounds; for raviſhing firſt his wives daughter, and his own Niece, both by Father and Mother, he put away his wife and married her; whereat the Inhabitants of Alexandria being affrighted, for fear of death quit their habitations, ſo that being left alone as a King of houſes, and not of men, by Proclamation he called, and gave leave to ſtrangers to inhabit them. It hapned that at ſuch time as they flocked thither came alſo P. Scipio Africanus the younger, Sp. Mummius, and L. Metellus, ſent from Rome to viſit the Kingdoms and States of the Eaſt, and compoſe their differences. Scipio being landed, and having his face covered, the People flocked about him, and deſired him to uncover himſelf, which he granting, they out of the great pleaſure conceived at the ſight of ſuch a perſon, gave a ſhout. Phyſcon himſelf coming out to meet them, was exceedingly ridiculous to them, being a man otherwiſe ſufficiently deformed, of a low ſtature, and ſuch corpulence, as his belly reſembled rather that of a beaſt than a Juſtin lib. 38. Valerius Max. lib. 9. cap. 1. Extr. Exemp. 5

Excerpt. Diodori Siculi.

Ptolomy Phyſcon unjuſtly obtaining the Kingdom his cruelty.

Val. Max. ibid.

Cicero in ſomnio Scipionis. A. M. 3875. Ol. 162. an. 3. V. C. 624. Ptol. Phyſ. 17. Joh. Hyrcani 6.

man. He provided magnificent entertainment, but they deſpiſing his dainties (as corrupting the manners of men) ate very ſparingly, only minded that they came about, and travelled into the Country, where viewing the ſeveral places thereof, conſidering the populouſneſs, ſtrength, and convenience of their ſituation, they concluded Ægypt a convenient ſeat for the greateſt Empire, if it had but Lords that knew how to make uſe of it, and ſo departed to Cyprus, and thence into Syria.

Excerpt. Diodori.

28. After ſome time he became ſo odious to the new inhabitants alſo for his cruelty, that they ſet fire to his Palace, and he was driven with his wife and ſon to get away to Cyprus, after which they reſtored the Kingdom to Cleopatra his ſiſter, whom he had put away. Hereupon he raiſed an Army, and made War upon her and them, and fearing that they might ſend for his eldeſt ſon from Cyrene, and make him King, to prevent that, he murdered him; which being known, they caſt down his ſtatues and images. He taking this to be done as well in favour of his ſiſter Cleopatra, as in deſpight of himſelf, to be revenged ſufficiently on her, commanded their ſon Memphites a comely and towardly child to be killed in his preſence, and then his head, hands, and feet to be cut off, and being ſent to Alexandria to be preſented her, as ſhe was feaſting at the celebration of her own birth day. This ſtruck not only her but all the City into exceeding horror and amazement, and the ſad ſpectacle was ſhewed to the People, to let them know what they might expect from ſuch a King. He notwithſtanding all this, yet went on in his own way; for conſidering how he was hated by his People, that he might reign more ſecurely, as he thought in their weakneſs, he cauſed a place of publick meeting full of youth to be ſet on fire, and deſtroyed all therein either with fire or ſword. Cleopatra having put an end to mourning for her ſon, and ſeeing her ſelf preſſed with War by her brother, ſent to Demetrius Nicator King of Syria, and her ſon in Law, for aid, offering him the Kingdom for his pains in ſecuring it. He gladly accepting the offer, came down, and waged War with Phyſcon for ſome time, but his People revolting from him at home, was forced to return, ſo that ſhe being then in a manner deſtitute, was glad to follow him into Syria. Phyſcon then re-entering, and being ſeized anew of the Kingdom, the Antiochians knowing his prejudice againſt Demetrius, ſent to him for one of the poſterity of Seleucus to reign over them, whereupon he ſuborned a young man and ſon of a Merchant, to mend the matter, giving out, that Alexander Balas was his Father. The counterfeit by his help outed Demetrius of his Kingdom; but then not being able to bear ſo high a condition, for which he was never bred, grew proud, and deſpiſed him. Therefore to be revenged on him, being now reconciled to his ſiſter, he pulled him down again, by ſending aid, and his daughter for a wife to Antiochus Grypus the ſon of Demetrius. Not long after Phyſcon died, after he had reigned (from his brothers death) twenty nine years. A. M. 3888, and the laſt of the 165 Olympiad.

Juſtin ut prius.
Livius Epit. lib. 59.
Val. Max. l. 9. c. 2. exter. exempl. 5.

A. M. 3876.
Ol. 162. an. 4.
V. C. 625.
Ptol. Phyſcon. 18.
Joh. Hyrcani 7.

Juſtin Lib. 39.
Vide Hegelochum apud uſſerium. p. 118.

He ſuborneth one againſt Demetrius Nicator.

Porphyr. apud Euſeb.
A. M. 3888.
Ol. 165. an. 4.
V. C. 637.

Dieth.

29. He left three ſons and as many daughters behind him. One of his ſons being baſe born, and called Ptolomy Apion, he left King of Cyrene by his will; as for Ægypt he left that to his wife, and to either of her ſons which ſhe ſhould chuſe, judging that the State of Ægypt would be better ſetled than the Kingdom of Syria, when the mother making choice of one ſon, ſhould make the other her Enemy. She thinking that her youngeſt named Alexander would be more pliable and obſervant of her, laboured with the People to accept of him for their King; but they not at all yielding to this, ſhe was forced to call home the elder, Lathurus (or Lathyrus) from Cyprus, whither ſhe had procured his Father to baniſh him; but before ſhe gave him the Kingdom ſhe took away his beloved wife Cleopatra, and commanded him to marry his younger ſiſter Selene. Cleopatra being thus divorced by her Mother, rather than forſaken of her husband, married to Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria (as we before ſaid) and carryed away with her the Army in Cyprus for a portion. The Queen Mother, that ſhe might be the more awful to Lathurus her ſon, in the ſecond year of their reign made Alexander King of Cyprus, and ſent him thither, and then at the end of other ſix, took away from him, his wife Selene, though ſhe had brought him two ſons; and again to compleat her malice, ſtirred up the People againſt him. For taking ſuch of her Eunuchs as were moſt faithful to her, ſhe brought them wounded into the publick, accuſing him of having endeavoured to make her away, and of ſo uſing thoſe that were true to their truſt in her defence: at which the Alexandrians being much moved, came ſo upon him, that he narrowly eſcaped with his life, and then ſent they for Alexander from Cyprus, and made him King.

Idem. & Pauſan. in Atticis

He leaveth Ægypt to his wives diſpoſal.

Who firſt taketh to her one ſon and then another.

30. La-

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 13. c. 20, 21.

30. Lathurus made but an exchange with his brother, as it fell out, making himſelf Maſter of Cyprus, whither yet his Mother followed him with her hatred, and War the effect thereof. Here he lay not idle, for Alexander Jannæus at this time King of the Jews beſieging Ptolemais, the inhabitants thereof ſent to him for aid, and though they repented them of the bargain made with him, and ſent to ſtop his journey, yet he came on, and at his approach the ſiege was raiſed. Then invaded he Judæa, and overthrowing Jannæus in a great and bloody battel, haraſed the Country. Cleopatra his Mother was ſtartled at this his power and proſperity, and reſolved he was to be brought down, elſe her affairs were but in a tottering condition; therefore ſending a good part of her treaſure with her Nephews and teſtament to the Iſland Cous, She came her ſelf into Phœnicia, beſieged Ptolemais, and perſecuted him into Cœleſyria. He having ſome hopes to get Ægypt into his hands in her abſence, marched in all haſt down thither; but being diſappointed, and purſued by a party ſent by her, he was forced to return and winter at Gaza. She in the mean time took Ptolemais, whither Jannæus came to her, with whom a little after ſhe renewed the League at Seythopolis, and then he proſpering much in Cœleſyria, Lathurus was forced to return to Cyprus, and his Mother ſeeing that, departed alſo into Ægypt. During theſe Wars betwixt the Mother and ſon, it happned, that he was once taken by her General, but diſmiſſed again, whereat ſhe was ſo inraged, as ſhe put to death her Commander. Her ſon Alexander being afraid, that at length her cruelty might extend to him alſo, withdrew himſelf from her, preferring a ſecure, though obſcure eſtate, before a dangerous reign. She notwithſtanding went on in her way, not neglecting her affairs, and fearing her elder ſon might be helped by Antiochus Cyzicenus, ſent great ſupplies to Grypus his half brother and rival, with Selene for a wife, taken formerly from Lathurus, and by meſſengers prevailed with Alexander to return. Divers years then they lived and reigned together, but at length ſhe really plotted his deſtruction, and being caught in the manner, was according to her deſerts (though perhaps not his duty) put to death, after ſhe had domineered over him, and expelled his brother eighteen years.

Lathurus invadeth Judæa but his Mother marcheth againſt him and ſpoileth all his projects.

Juſtin ut prius & Porphyr. ibid.

She is killed by Alexander her ſon.

Juſtin ibid.

31. Alexander being known to the People to have killed his Mother, ſuch a Sedition was thence moved, as glad he was to flie for his life; and thence they recalled his elder brother Lathurus from Cyprus, and reſtored him his Kingdom ſo many years after his expulſion, being now (if we may believe Juſtin) ſo ſatisfied with his preſent condition, as of himſelf, he would never have made War upon his Mother, nor thereby ſought to recover out of his brothers hands what he had formerly enjoyed. About this time his baſe brother Apion of Cyrene dyed, and left the People of Rome his heir, which thereupon left the Country to its own freedom; but after ten years was it ſore ſhaken, and almoſt rent in pieces by Wars and Tyranny, which fell on it being deſtitute of a Royal Monarch. Lucullus going thither compoſed the differences, and ſetled the Commonwealth as he thought, which after other ten years came to be reduced out of neceſſity to a Roman Province. From Cyrene Lucullus returned through Ægypt, and in his paſſage being ſet upon by Pyrats, loſt almoſt all his Veſſels; yet eſcaped he ſafe to Alexandria, the Kings Fleet being ſent out to meet him, where Lathurus entertained him with great magnificence, lodged him in his own Court (which favour had never before been beſtowed on any ſtranger) and preſented him with gifts to the value of eighty Talents. But he only received what was neceſſary, and neither viſiting Memphis, nor ſeeing any of the rarities of Ægypt, being called away by his occaſions, returned through Cyprus unto Sylla, whoſe Lieutenant then he was in the War againſt Mithridates King of Pontus. After this the Inhabitants of Thebes revolted from Lathurus, but in the third year he reduced them again to obedience, which is not to be underſtood of Thebes in Bœotia, ſeeing he had nothing there to do, but of the City ſo called in his own Country. Not long after he dyed, thirty ſeven years (wanting ſome months) after the death of his Father Phyſcon, A. M. 3925, and the firſt of the 175 Olympiad.

Who being thereupon expelled Lathurus is reſtored.

Livius Epitom. lib. 70.

Plutarch in Lucullo.

He entertaineth Lucullus the Roman.

Pauſan. in Atticis.

32. It's difficult to tell certainly who ſucceeded him. (a) Some ſay Cleopatra his daughter, and wife to his brother Alexander; others, that Alexander's ſon being received into familiarity with Sylla the Roman Dictator, was by him placed in the Kingdom, then deſtitute of iſſue male. They may be reconciled, by that which is further affirmed by the former ſort, viz. that he married Cleopatra then Queen. Apian ſaith, that being ſeized on the Kingdom, the Alexandrians not enduring his inſolence, on the nineteenth day drew him out of the Court and killed him; but

(a) Porphyr. in Græcis Euſeb.
(b) Apian de bello civ. lib. 1.

Alexander the ſecond.

Porphyrie reporteth him to have ſlain her nineteen dayes after he had married her. Certainly though his reign be accounted no longer, and that of Auletes to begin here, yet cannot be rejected that which is produced to the contrary. For, Suetonius reporteth, that Julius Cæſar in his younger dayes having ingratiated himſelf with the People, attempted by their Tribunes that Ægypt might be aſſigned him as a Province, having gotten an opportunity of extraordinary command, for that the Alexandrians had expelled their King, on whom the Senate had beſtowed the title of friend and Allie. This can in no wiſe be meant of Auletes, for when he was expelled and came to Rome, Cæſar was then above ſuch a condition, having ſpent ſome years in the Wars of Gall. And that King of Ægypt mentioned by Cicero to have dyed at Tyre, and reported to have left the People of Rome his heir in his Conſulſhip, can be meant of none but of this Alexander the Second, who being expelled rebelliouſly by his Subjects, lived and died there in exile; ſo that we muſt neceſſarily aſſign him (counting from the death of Lathurus to the Conſulſhip of Cicero) about fifteen years; during which time of his life, he is to be ſuppoſed to have reigned longer than onely ſo many dayes, contrary to the vulgar opinion.

In Julio c. 11.

In Orat. 1 a. & 2*a Agraria.*

Auletes ſucceedeth Alexander.

33. Alexander being expelled by the Alexandrians, they immediately ſet up in his room, the ſon of Lathurus, ſirnamed Dionyſius and Auletes, becauſe he was too much addicted to the rites of Bacchus, and dancing to the ſound of Cymbals and Pipes. He was baſe born, as appeareth by the Prologue to the thirty ninth book of Trogus, and ſo was alſo his brother the King of Cyprus, if that be true which Pauſanias ſpeaketh of his Fathers having no legitimate iſſue, except one daughter. After ſome years, they that ſet him up pulled him down; for his brother of Cyprus being moſt unjuſtly ſpoiled of his Kingdom by the Romans, through the malice of Clodius Tribune of the People; they preſſed him ſore, either to demand Cyprus of the Romans, or renounce their friendſhip. Being unwilling to do this, and by reaſon of his great exactions which he made for paying of his debts (contracted by his purchaſe of the Roman alliance) he incurred their hatred, and whereas he could neither quiet the tumults by fair means nor foul, was glad to withdraw himſelf out of the way, and went to Rome. At Rhodes he met with Cato, who was ſent by Clodius out of the way, under colour of doing him honour, to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Roman Province, who adviſed him to ruturn, and be reconciled to his Subjects, rather than leaving his former happy condition to expoſe himſelf to danger, and the avarice of the Roman Officers, which Ægypt it ſelf could not be able to ſatisfie. Being by the counſel of this grave and wiſe perſon reduced as into his wits, he was minded to follow his advice; but was preſently again turned by his friends, and haſted to the City, where he had time and cauſe enough to repent of his deſpiſing the Oracle (as then he accounted it) of ſo great a man.

Jod. lib. 39.

Plutarch in Catone Minore.

Is compelled by his rebellious Subjects, and betaketh himſelf to Rome.

A. M. 3948.
Ol. 180. ann. 1.
V. C. 697.
Hyrcani 7.

34. At Rome, he created the Senate much trouble, being commended to it by Pompey, whom ſome reported to have been the cauſe of his leaving Ægypt, more than any injury offered him by his Subjects, that ſo he might afford matter for new Wars. He deſired he might be reduced into his Kingdom by Cornelius Lentulus the Conſul, to whom Cilicia was decreed for a Province: and upon the reporting of the matter, an order was made; Lentulus to ſtop Pompeys mouth, procuring him to have the charge of Proviſions (in that time of dearth) throughout the Empire. The Alexandrians in the mean while ignorant of his Voyage into Italy, and thinking he had ſome wayes miſcarried, ſet over the Kingdom Berenice his legitimate daughter, together with Tryphæna her eldeſt ſiſter called alſo Cleopatra the elder) and ſent into Syria to Antiochus Aſiaticus to come and reign with the Women, and afterwards he dying, to Philip Euergetes the ſon of Antiochus Grypus by Tryphæna, daughter to Lathurus late King of Ægypt, but he was alſo hindered by Gabinius, the Roman Preſident in Syria. But hearing at length how things went at Rome, they ſent one hundred of their Countrey-men thither, to make their defence, and recriminate their lawful King, which he underſtanding, procured moſt of the Meſſengers to be made away in their journey, and the reſt coming to the City, he either took away, or deterred, or elſe perſwaded them to hold their peace. The Senate hearing of this was grievouſly moved, and the rather, becauſe that divers publick Miniſters of others their Confederates had been made away with the reſt; as alſo for that it appeared, that there was much corruption amongſt themſelves. They ſent therefore for Dion the Chief of the Embaſſie, but Ptolomy his money had ſuch influence upon him, that he appeared not, and not long after his was alſo diſpatch-

Strabo lib. 17.

Plutarch in Pompeio.
Dio ibid.
Cicero Familiar.
Epiſt. lib. 1.
Epiſt. 1.
Strabo & Dio ut prius.
Porphyrius in Græcis Euſebii.

diſpatched out of the way. Pompey harboured the King all this time in his own houſe, being yet deſirous to reſtore him himſelf as Cicero ſignifieth to Lentulus then the Pro-Conſul of Cilicia, who ſtill waited alſo for the employment. At length Sibylla's books being conſulted, were reported to forwarn the people of Rome never to reduce him by force, and therefore to that purpoſe another Decree was made in the Senate. A great debate then enſued how the thing ſhould be done, ſome propoſing one way, and ſome another, till at length Auletes perceiving it was neither likely to be effected by Pompey nor Lentulus, deſpairing of his return, and getting him into Aſia, expected at Epheſus in the Temple of Diana, a better advantage for the recovery of his right out of the hands of the imperious Rebels.

Where getting no relief he departeth to Epheſus.

Dio lib. 39.

Joſeph. de bello Judaico lib. 1. cap. 6.

Appian in Parthicis.

Hireth Gabinius to reſtore him.

35. And he had not been long there, when a convenient opportunity preſented it ſelf. For Gabinius the Preſident of Syria having grievouſly afflicted his Province by oppreſſion, not thinking that ſufficient, but hearing the Parthians to be exceeding rich, ſet his reſolution ſtrongly to invade them. When he had paſſed the River Euphrates, Ptolomy came to him with Letters from Pompey, and offered him ten thouſand Talents (beſides a great ſum of money to the Soldiers, part whereof they ſhould have in hand) to reſtore him. Moſt of the Officers were againſt the thing, and Gabinius himſelf ſomething ſtuck at it, but being ſtirred up to it by Antonius (who then commanded the Horſe under him) and eſpecially bewitched by the money, notwithſtanding it was not lawful for a Preſident to ſtir out of his Province, nor undertake wars at his pleaſure, and the people at Rome out of reſpect to the Verſes of Sibylla had forbidden Auletes to be reſtored (at leaſt ſuch a way) yet he onely made the difficulty of the thing a means to inhance the price of it, and omitting the Parthian War, undertook that againſt the Ægyptians. Berenice had about this time called one Seleucus out of Syria, who vaunted himſelf of the Blood Royal of that Nation, and made him partaker of the Kingdom, marrying her ſelf unto him; but finding him to be of a ſordid, and baſe condition, made him away after a little while. Then an husband of a Royal ſtock being enquired out for her, Archelaus the ſon of Archelaus (General to Mithridates the great King of Pontus) and who had been made by Pompey Prieſt of the Tomani, counterfeiting himſelf the ſon of the King, procured by his friends to be received on the ſame terms with the other, and reigned with her ſix moneths.

Dio & Strabo ut ſupra.

Plutrch. in Antonio. Dio & Strabo ut ſu-

A. M. 3950.
Ol. 181. an. 2.
V.C. 699.
Hyrcani 9.
Cn. Pompeio Mag. 2.
M. Licinio Craſſo 2. Coſſ.

36. But Gabinius leaving Syria to the tuition of a Child, his ſon, marched for Ægypt through Paleſtine, and coming to the ſandy deſart, ſent Antonius before with the Horſe to ſecure the Straights at the entry of the Countrey; which he not onely bravely performed, but took alſo Peluſium, thereby gaining entrance for the whole Army, which preſently put to flight the Ægyptians. Archelaus himſelf was now taken; but Gabinius conſidering that perhaps Ptolomy would be unwilling to give him ſo much money as he expected, if with ſo ſmall ado he ſhould compleat the work; being alſo ſoundly bribed by Archelaus, he diſmiſſed him under pretence of an eſcape. A little after, the Ægyptians (more earneſt alwayes in rebellions than Wars) were utterly diſcomfited, Archelaus was ſlain, and all Ægypt recovered, and reſtored to Auletes, who preſently put to death his daughter, and the richeſt of the Nobility, as they deſerved, ſtanding then in great need of money. Gabinius leaving a Guard of Soldiers behind him for Ptolomy's ſecurity (who ſtayed at Alexandria, married, and begot Children, giving up themſelves to the luxury of the place) went back into Syria, and thence to Rome, where his great gifts meeting with the corruption of the times, onely purchaſed him his life, being fined for his bribery and diſobedient carriage. As for Auletes we hear no more of him, but that he died four years after his reſtitution. In the year of the World three thouſand nine hundred fifty four, and the ſecond of the one hundred and eighty ſecond Olympiad.

Dieth.

A. M. 3954.
Ol. 182. an. 2.
V.C. 703.

His eldeſt ſon and eldeſt daughter ſucceeding him, ſhe is driven away.

37. He left two Sons, and as many daughters behind him, of which the eldeſt of either Sex he ordered ſhould ſucceed him by his laſt Will and Teſtament; which he conjured the People of Rome, (under whoſe tuition he left his Children) by all the gods, and the Leagues he had made with them, ſhould be obſerved; and one of the Tables of which were brought to Rome to be laid up in the Treaſury; but this being hindered by publick buſineſs, it was left with Pompey, who was alſo appointed Guardian to the young King in this his nonage. After three years the boy, or rather Pothinus (not Photinus, as he is corruptly called in Cæſar's Commentaries) the Eunuch who managed his affairs, expelled Cleopatra his ſiſter, and fellow both in marriage and the Kingdom; ſo that ſhe was forced to withdraw into Syria, there to make proviſion for her re-eſtabliſhment by force. Not long it was ere ſhe returned, having furniſhed her ſelf; which her brother being aware of, went, and pitched his Tents near to the Mountain Caſius, at the Peluſian mouth of the Nile; where lying incamped, Pompey being then beaten by Cæſar at the battel at Pharſalum, fled to him for defence and ſafeguard, chuſing rather to venture upon Ægypt than any other place, both for its nearneſs and ſtrength, and hoping upon the account of his Guardianſhip to be lovingly received. The King then a very boy (about thirteen years old) gave no anſwer to his meſſage; but thoſe moſt potent about him conſulting of it, were perſwaded by Theodotus his School-maſter to receive him, but then, that they might curry favour with Cæſar, to make him away; ſo that being received with ſmall civility into a little boat, he was ſlain ere he got to the other ſide, as is more largely expreſſed in the Roman ſtory. His head was reſerved as a preſent for Cæſar, who coming to Alexandria, though at the firſt he was very welcom, and got much reſpect for his frequenting the publick readings of Philoſophers, yet exacting the debt owing by Auletes, and not abſtaining from the Treaſure of the Temples for the payment of his Army, he thereby incurred the great diſpleaſure of the Towns-men, all things being made worſe by Pothinus, who to his utmoſt ability incenſed the ſuperſtitious multitude. Cæſar alſo accounting it to belong to himſelf as Conſul, and ſhortly after, as Dictator, to compoſe the differences of the Confederates of the people of Rome, took upon him to judge the cauſe of the King and his Siſter, which bred ſuch diſturbance, as thereupon enſued a troubleſome War.

Appian de bello civili lib. 2. Cæſar. lib. 3. Plutarch. in Pompeio & Dio lib. 42.

Pompey flying to him for ſuccour is ſlain.

A. M. 3957. Ol. 183. ann. 1. V. C. 706. Hyrcani 16. C. Julio Cæſare 2. P. Servilio Iſaurico, Coſſ.

38. There were ſecret plots laid for his life, which he being aware of, was glad to ſpend whole nights in feaſting to prevent them, and gave way to Cleopatra to come to him, who knowing he was no hater of Women, had ſent to him to complain and deſire a conference. At the ſight of her he became her very ſlave, and turned from being her Judge to be her Advocate, which thing ſo inraged the King, perceiving her now to be got into the Palace, that he ruſhed out to the People, crying he was betrayed, and pulling his Diadem from his head, caſt it on the ground. A great ſtir ariſing hereupon, he was caught by Cæſars Souldiers, and brought back into the houſe, which the multitude thereat inraged now beſieged, and Cæſar with promiſe to do whatſoever they would, ſcarce appeaſed the tumult; his men being unprovided for reſiſtance, having not expected any ſuch occaſion from thoſe they accounted their friends. Then taking Ptolomy and Cleopatra along with him, he read over their Fathers Will in publick audience, which ſubjecting them to the tuition of the People of Rome (whoſe Supream and abſolute Magiſtrate he then was) in execution of the ſaid Will he gave to them two as Husband and Wife the Kingdom of Ægypt, and to their younger brother and ſiſter that of Cyprus, not leaving any thing to himſelf, but willing rather to add ſomething of his own; ſuch a fear at this time had ſeized on him. The people hereby was quieted for a time, until Pothinus, fearing he might be called to account for what had already paſſed, kindled a new flame to divert it. He firſt objected, as well he might, what an unworthy thing it was that the King ſhould be called to anſwer, and then added, there was reaſon to ſuſpect, that whatſoever Cæſar might pretend, yet at length he would put all into the hands of Cleopatra. He ſent to Achillas General of all the Forces then lying at Peluſium, alluring him by great promiſes in the Kings name to draw down the army privily to Alexandria; and he, being not backward to cloſe with him, marched down with twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Cæſar had not ſtrength enough to go out and meet him, and therefore contained himſelf in the City, yet commanded his men to be in readineſs, and kept the King with him; whoſe name he knew to be of great force amongſt his people, and that thereby this undertaking might appear rather to be the enterprize of a few diſſolute, and factious perſons, than any thing backed by his conſent, or Warrant.

Plutarch. in Cæſare. Dio & Cæſar ut prius.

Cæſar going about to reconcile brother and ſiſter, a War is thence raiſed by Pothinus the Eunuch.

A. M. 358. Q. Fuſio Caleno Publio Vatinio Coſſ.

39. Achillas (a) deſpiſing the number of Cæſar's Soldiers, after he had entred the City, thought preſently to have broken in upon him, but he prevented this by blocking up the wayes, and fortifying his houſe. Then followed a ſharp contention at the Haven, the Alexandrians endeavouring to become maſters of the Fleet, and thereby to cut off all Proviſions and ſupplies from coming to him; but he made a ſhift to burn all the Gallies, from which the fire ſeizing upon the houſes adjoyning, conſumed to aſhes moſt part of that famous (b) Library Collected by the care and diligence of the former Kings. After this exploit ſo happily performed,

The Alexandrian War.

(a) Idem ibid.

(b) Plutarch. in Cæſare. Oroſius lib. 6. cap. 15.

med, he placed a Garriſon in (c) Pharus and after a few skirmiſhes, ſent about into Syria, Cilicia, and other places for aid. Arſinoe the Kings younger ſiſter got out to Achillas, and joyntly with him managed the War; yet with ſuch contention for the Chief command, as proved onely beneficial to the Soldiers; whom both by gifts ſought to oblige; for the conteſt at length arrived at ſuch (d) height, that lying in wait for the life of each other, he was ſlain by the help of one Ganymedes, who having helped her in the eſcape, was now preferred to be their General. Pothinus all this while was not backward, but out of the Court ſent Meſſengers to Achillas, to encourage him in his work, which being diſcovered coſt him his life, and cauſed the King to be more nearly looked to. Ganymedes at his entrance upon the Generalſhip, ſtopped up the channels which brought freſh-water into that part of the City, where Cæſar lay, and with engines conveyed ſalt from the Sea into the room of it, thinking thereby to diſcourage the Enemy, and force him out of his hold; but Cæſar (though his Soldiers were at firſt daunted at it) prevented the deſign by ſinking of Wells, which abundantly ſupplied their neceſſities, to the wonder of the Ægyptians, who had no ſuch invention. By this time a legion ſhipped by Domitius Calvinus, with proviſions and arms from Syria, landed on the African ſhoar, a little above Alexandria; which Cæſar underſtanding, went with his Fleet unmanned to fetch them in, and the enemy having notice of it, drew out alſo againſt him. He receiving the men aboard, had no mind to ingage, becauſe it grew towards night; but a Rhodian Gally, not keeping up with the reſt of the Fleet, was ſet upon, whereby he was conſtrained to go in to the reſcue, and ſo carried himſelf, that day-light onely was wanting to his compleating of the Victory, by utterly deſtroying the whole Navy of the Alexandrians.

(c) Cæſar ut p ius.

(d) Hurtius de bello Alexandrino.

Achillas the General is ſlain, and Pothinus put to death by Cæſar.

Cæſar defeateth the Alexandrians at ſea.

40. They notwithſtanding this defeat, in which and other wayes, of late, they had loſt no fewer than one hundred and ten Veſſels (yet being incouraged thereto by Ganimedes) ſet themſelves to the rigging of another Fleet, which being in a readineſs, Cæſar brought his about the Iſland Pharos, and ſet it in order againſt them. Both ſides being ready to ingage, yet a narrow paſſage lying betwixt them, each expected till the other ſhould enter firſt, as then having a better advantage, until the Rhodians deſired of Cæſar leave to enter the Streight. This once granted and done, they were preſently ſet upon and then relieved, till a total engagement enſued, in which the Ægyptians were worſted (not a ſhip of Cæſars receiving any hurt) and in their flight took into Pharos, where they were received by their friends, and kept off the Romans for ſome time, but at length were forced to quit the Iſland with great loſs. This being joyned to the main by two Bridges, one of them in like manner was forſaken by the Towns-men; but the Romans attempting to gain the other, through the raſhneſs of ſome in their company, were beaten off, and forced tumultuouſly to betake themſelves to their Ships. Cæſar himſelf in the hurry was glad to leap into the Sea, and the Enemy following, to dive under water, and take breath now and then as he could; till (having ſwom almoſt a quarter of a mile) he was taken up into a ſhip. He loſt four hundred of his Legionary Soldiers in this skirmiſh, as many Ship-men and rowers, yet neither he nor his Army were diſcouraged at all, but were rather incited to redeem their loſs by ſome other exploit, which the Alexandrians taking notice of, ſent to him deſiring he would diſmiſs their King, whom now they profeſſed they were ready to obey, and if he ſhould command them to be friends with him they would preſently yield. He knew there was neither any truſting of him nor them; but conſidering that if he diſmiſſed him, they would be nothing the ſtronger, and if he ſhould become the head of their party, the War would be more honourable, he gravely admoniſhed him to act nothing contrary to the intereſt of his People, or his confederacy with Rome, and then gave him leave to depart, though he pretended an unwillingneſs to leave him, and notably counterfeited ſincere friendſhip with feigned tears.

Idem ibid.

Again.

Appian de bello civili lib. 2.

He caſteth himſelf into danger.

Letteth the King go.

41. Though the King being returned was very earneſt for carrying on the War, yet they ſeeing themſelves nothing amended by the acceſſion of his name or preſence (which the Romans deſpiſed) and that they profited nothing by any of their attempts, were greatly diſcouraged, yet underſtanding that great ſupplies of men and proviſions were coming to Cæſar, they reſolved once more to take the Sea, and cut them off: and they did much hurt to thoſe that came by water, till he ſent out his Fleet under the command of Tiberius Nero, and reſtrained them. But by Land came Mithridates of Pergamus from Syria, accompanied with Antipater the Governour of Judæa, and Father to Herod the Great, bringing down with him a great Hirtius ibid.

Joſephus Antiquit. l. 14. cap. 14, & 15. & de bello l. 1. cap. 7.

Aid ſent to Cæſar.

a great power of men, and pierced as far as Peluſium, which alſo was taken, with great pains and induſtry by aſſault. Thence marching down for Alexandria he took in the Countrey in his way, the Jews inhabiting thoſe parts (though at firſt they made reſiſtance, yet) being brought over by Antipater upon the producing of the Letters of Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt. When Ptolomy heard this, and that he had nigh already reached Delta, a place not far diſtant from Alexandria; knowing he muſt needs paſs the River, he ſent out a party to oppoſe him there, which he received prudently after the Roman faſhion, being intrenched in his Camp, and eaſily ſuſtained it's violence; till ſeeing them very diſorderly, and with great boldneſs to aſſaile his fortifications, he iſſued out, and killing a great number, had utterly defeated the reſt, but that by their knowledge of the Countrey, and by the Veſſels which had tranſported them, they ſecured themſelves. Whereupon rallying again they once more charged him, and a fight enſued in that place called The Camp of the Jews, in which engagement the wing commanded by Mithridates himſelf, was ſorely oppreſſed, and had been totally overthrown; but that Antipater (who led the other) came in good time to the reſcue, put to flight the Ægyptians, and took their Camp; which Mithridates confeſſed by letters to Cæſar, acknowledging Antipater to have been the Author, both of his ſafety, and the Victory. But now by this time was Ptolomy himſelf coming againſt Mithridates, and Cæſar alſo to fetch him off.

Being oppoſed overcometh.

42. Both went by Sea, but Cæſar firſt got to him, and took him in with his victorious Army. Ptolomy and Cæſar encamped then ſeven miles aſunder, the former in a high and moſt fortified place by nature, having a narrow River with exceeding high and precipitous banks betwixt him and the Enemy, which though the Alexandrians defended, yet Cæſar's men got over (the Horſe by paſſing the Foard, and the foot by laying over a bridge made of long trees) ſo that Cæſar ſat down, not far from the Kings Camp. The next day he ſtormed a Caſtle in a Village near adjoyning, the defendants whereof flying amain to the Camp, his men had well nigh entred with them; but coming to hand-ſtrokes, were beaten back, being ſeverally laid at, both from the fortifications and the Ships. But Cæſar eſpying a very high place, which by reaſon of it's natural ſtrength was little looked to by the Alexandrians, ſet certain Companies to get up there into the Camp; which being performed, and a great cry raiſed on purpoſe round about, the Romans brake in, in ſeveral places, and made great ſlaughter. Moſt of the defendants fled upon the irruption, and in great heaps leaped down into the Trenches, wherein they firſt being overwhelmed, the reſt with great eaſe got over, amongſt which was the King; but coming to take boat, ſo many preſſed in after him, that the Veſſel ſunk, and he was drowned, after he had reigned well nigh four years. Together with him fell in this War (though moſt after another faſhion) twenty thouſand men, twelve thouſand were taken, with ſeventy long Ships, and five hundred of the Romans are ſaid to have been ſlain. Cæſar in confidence and purſute of this Victory, with the Horſe marched preſently to the City, where he found now not any reſiſtance, the Citizens entertaining him in a ſuppliant poſture, whom he comforted and forgave.

Cæſar ſtormeth the Ægyptian Camp.

A. M. 3598.

Oroſius lib. 6. cap. 16.

Ptolomy is drowned.

Cæſar taketh Alexandria.

43. Having thus made an end of the War, he laid not Ægypt to the Roman Empire, but gave it to Cleopatra, joyning to her in marriage (to colour the buſineſs) her younger brother as yet but eleven years old; but indeed ſubjecting all things to her will and power, with whom he was ſo familiar, as, out of love to her, he ſtayed in Ægypt nine moneths, and had done it longer, or elſe had taken her with him to Rome, had he not been called thence by the urgent affairs of Syria; and not long after ſhe brought him a Son, whom by his permiſſion ſhe named Cæſario. At his departure he removed Arſinoe out of the Kingdom, leſt any diſturbance ſhould ariſe upon her account, and left three Legions behind him for the ſecurity of theſe two Princes, who being diſreſpected by their own People for their reſpect to him, as yet were not confirmed in their ſeats.

Dio. lib. 42.

Appian de bello civili l. 2.

Plutarch in Cæſare.

Sueton. in Julio.

44. As for the Government, Cleopatra reigned, and acted alone without the control of any, permitting her brother to enjoy the title with his life as yet. Not long after Cæſars departure, the eldeſt ſon of Pompey his Enemy coming to Alexandria, ſhe is (a) reported to have been as familiar and common with him; yet upon Cæſar's invitation ſhe (b) went with her brother to Rome, where they were admitted as friends and allies: for her a lodging was provided in his own houſe, and having built a Temple to Venus Genetrix (which he had vowed before the battel

(a) Plutarch in Antonio.
(b) Sueton. ut prius.

at

Cleopatra poyſoneth her brother,

Cometh to Antony in Aſia who followeth her into Ægypt.

(c) Appian ibid.
(d) *Joſephus. Antiquit.l.*15. cap. 4.
(e) *Appian de bello civili l.*3, & 4.

A. M. 3964.
Ol. 184. an. 3.
V. C. 712.
Hyrcani 22.
M. Emilio Lepido 2.
L. Munatio Planco Coſſ.

Plutarch ut prius.
*Appian lib.*5.

at Pharſalia) he therein placed (c) her effigies beſides the Goddeſs. In the fourth year, her brother growing towards a man, ſhe (d) poyſoned him, to be at her own liberty. After Julius Cæſar was killed in the Senate houſe, ſhe ſtood ever firm to thoſe that proſecuted the conſpirators: to (e) Dolobella, at his requeſt of aid, ſhe ſent four Legions, and had a Fleet ready to put out had the weather ſerved. To Caſſius, who with menacing language demanded ſupplies, ſhe plainly refuſed to ſend any; for that he had an hand in Cæſars death, his threats only inciting her to go and meet Octavius Cæſar and Antony, who were then making an expedition againſt him and his fellow Brutus, the heads of that faction. He getting knowledge of her intentions, ſent a ſtrong party with ſixty ſhips to hover for her about Peloponneſus; but ſuch a tempeſt ſeized on her Fleet, that her deſign was fruſtrated, and having received great loſs, and now fallen ſick, ſhe was forced to return into Ægypt. Antony after the overthrow of Brutus and Caſſius, being left in Aſia to ſettle the affairs thereof, thither ſhe repaired to him in a ſtrange antick faſhion, and, he, who when he formerly ſerved under Gabinius in Ægypt, had caſt a wonton eye upon her, was now ſo ſmitten, (though forty years old) that he alſo became enſlaved to her in his affections. She ruled him and all his affaires, and procured him out of hand, to cauſe her ſiſter Arſinoe to be made away; who being formerly led in triumph by Julius Cæſar after the Alexandrian War, with the pity of all men, had for her brothers and ſiſters ſake been then diſmiſſed.

Plutarch & Appian ut prius.

Dio lib. 49.

A. M. 3968.
Ol. 185. *an.*4.
V. C. 717.
Herodis 3.
M. Vepſanio Agrippa.
L. Canidio Gallo. Coſſ.

*Joſephus Antiq.l.*15. *c.*5.

Plutarch & Dio ut ſupra.

Their looſe practices.

45. Antony had no power but to follow her into Ægypt, where they ſpent their time in nothing but extraordinary vanity and dalliance. After his reconciliation to Cæſar, and the making up of the breach betwixt them, by his marrying of Octavia, Cleopatra fearing that this new wife might draw his affections from her ſelf, pretended to be almoſt mad in love with him, practiſing upon her body in ſuch ſort, that being reduced into a Conſumption, ſhe ſeemed not to be able to live in his abſence; whereupon he gave over his intention of invading Parthia for that time, and returned to Alexandria. Not long after ſhe begged of him that part of Judæa which bare Balm, and many other places and Countries, which he beſtowed upon her, to the great diſtaſte of the People of Rome, who took it in high diſdain, as well that ſuch vaſt poſſeſſions ſhould be given her, as that now he had divers children by her, two of which, being twins, were named Sun and Moon. Shortly after ſhe accompanied him as far as Euphrates, then making an Expedition into Armenia, and taking Judæa in her way homeward, that part thereof, which Antony had given her, together with Arabia, ſhe let out to farm unto Herod, whom alſo, either out of her filthy affection to him (which ſhe pretended) or for ſome other end (having formerly wiſhed for an advantage againſt him, to get his Kingdom) ſhe ſollicited to the breach of the chaſtity of them both; but he inſtead of giving her ſatisfaction, conſulted with his friends how to kill her, and then being again terrified from that, to do her honour waited on her home as far as Peluſium. Antony having proſpered in Armenia, returned, and entred Alexandria in triumph, leading with him Artavaſdes the King with his wife and children, with whom he earneſtly laboured to make them fall down before her, as ſupplicants, but to no purpoſe. Then ſpent they their time in feaſting, he divided almoſt half of the Roman Empire betwixt her and her children; ſhe took upon her the name of Iſis, and he of Oſiris, and Father Bacchus, having his Temples crowned with Ivy, and wearing Buskins; being drawn in that garb, after the faſhion of Bacchus, in a chariot through the ſtreets of the City.

Sueton in Octavio & Dio lib. 49. 50.

Plutarch. in Antonio.

War at Rome is decreed againſt her.

46. Theſe fooliſh and looſe practices brought great inconveniences upon them. For Cæſar Octavius and he fell preſently of recriminating each other, and Antony not long after had the confidence to ſend to Rome, to deſire from the Senate a confirmation of his donations to her and her children; which gave ſuch offence, that his friends were forced to flie out of the City; whereupon he ſent thither again ſome to thruſt Octavia (his Wife, and Cæſar's ſiſter) out of his houſe, and took upon him to make War upon both People and Senate. Cæſar hereat inraged, found out a way to incenſe the People againſt him, by opening his will depoſited in the hands of the Veſtal Nuns, wherein he had laboured to make Cæſario to be the lawful ſon of the Dictator, named for Heirs his Children begotten on Cleopatra, and commanded that notwithſtanding he might die at Rome, yet his body ſhould be ſent to her to Alexandria. Theſe things found to be true, gained credit to others which were but reported; as that in caſe he ſhould get the better, he would beſtow Rome it ſelf upon the Queen, and tranſlate the Seat of the Empire into Ægypt. When Cæſar then was ready for the War, it was decreed againſt her, and he was deprived of all his Offices, which alone was thought enough at this time, leſt once declared an Enemy to the State, others with him ſhould have been included in the ſame capacity, of whom divers, being men of great influence, might have been driven through deſperation, to act more vigorouſly for him. Hereby it was thought he would be ſufficiently intangled, reſolving not to forſake her on any terms whatſoever, and vulgarly accounted to be bewitched by her. And to little leſs could theſe things practized by him amount to. He called her Queen, Lady, and Miſtreſs, gave her Romans for her Guard (who had her name engraven on their Targets.) He went abroad, celebrated Games, ſate in Judgement, and ſometimes rode with her, and when ſhe pleaſed to be drawn in her Chariot, ran by her ſide amongſt the Lackies. She was ſo confident ſhe ſhould be Miſtreſs at length of the Miſtreſs of the World, that if ſhe would ſwear moſt religiouſly, it ſhould be by that Law or Sentence, which ſhe ſhould pronounce in the Capitol.

He is bewitched as it were by her.

47. For all this adoe, yet in the preparation for the War, Antony miſtruſted her, and that ſo far, as to have his meat taſted for fear of poyſon. She taking notice of it, poyſoned a Cup of drink, and giving him it, when he was about to ſet it to his mouth, interpoſed her hand, convincing him thereby how eaſie a matter it was for her to do that of which ſhe was ſuſpected to have an intention, and then ſending for a Malefactor out of Priſon, and giving him the liquor he died immediately. This made him bold and confident of her, and further enſlaved his affections, inſomuch that that ſhe ruled him in the management of the War. For Canidius, whom ſhe had bribed to get leave for her to continue with him, changing afterwards his mind, or (at leaſt his language) and adviſing him to ſend her back into Ægypt, and to go into Thrace or Macedonia, and there to decide the controverſie in a pitcht battel, ſhe prevailed with him not onely to ſtay, but made Antony ingage at Actium in a Sea-fight, yet providing rather for flight than victory. Ere it could juſtly be diſcerned which party would carry it, ſhe being impatient of delay, with her Golden Prow and Purple Sayls, giving a ſign to her Ægyptians, betook her ſelf to flight, which Antony ſeeing made haſte after her as faſt as poſſible, and being received on board, neither ſaw, nor was ſeen by her; but ſate him down in a ſad and thoughtful poſture, holding his head betwixt his hands; and for three or four dayes ſo continued, till arriving at Tanarus (a Promontory of Laconia) the women there that were intimate with her brought them together. He paſſing over into Africk, ſhe returned into Ægypt, counterfeiting a triumph with her Ship curiouſly adorned, and melodious ſinging, that ſhe might be received of her Subjects, the chiefeſt of which preſently ſhe put to death, whom ſhe knew formerly to have born no good will towards her, and now to be elevated upon the report of the defeat received at Actium. Confiſcating their Eſtates, and rifling religious Houſes, ſhe heaped together a great Maſs of Treaſure, raiſing Forces therewith with all expedition, and that ſhe might draw into Confederacy the King of Media, ſhe ſent him the head of Artavaſdes (or Artabazus) the Armenian, his Æmulator. Then, attempting a matter of greateſt difficulty, ſhe conveyed Ships over the Iſthmus, or Neck of Land (which parting the Ægyptian (or Mediterranean) from the Red-Sea divideth Aſia from Africk) into the Arabian Bay, intending to fly ſervitude, and ſeek out ſome Forein ſeat, wherein to ſpend the remainder of her dayes. But Antony returning to her, who as yet had heard nothing of the loſs of his Land-Army, they encouraged themſelves, and ſhe changed her purpoſe. Her Ships were burnt by the Inhabitants of Arabia Petræa, at the procurement of Q. Didius the Preſident of Syria.

Plinius Natural. Hiſtor. lib. 21.cap.3.

Yet ſuſpecteth her.

Plutarch. ut prius.

She maketh him ingage at Actium,

Dio lib. 50.

Where he is defeated.

A. M. 3974. Ol. 187.ann.2. V. C. 723. Herodis 9. Octavio Cæſare 3. M. Valerio Meſſala Coſſ.

She conveyeth ſhips into the Arabian Bay to ſeek out her fortune, but is diverted by him.

48. But Antony having notice that his Army had revolted to Cæſar, withdrew himſelf in a ſad and Melancholick poſture from the ſight of all men into the Iſland Pharos, and then again within a while, having diſburthened himſelf of grief, returned to the Court, where they indulged their genius more than ever, thoſe that were willing to die with them giving in their names, and paſſing away their time together in nothing but feaſting and jollity. She gathered together divers ſorts of poyſons, which ſhe tried upon Capital Offenders and Brutes, approving above all the biting of an Aſp, which ſhe obſerved without any convulſion to caſt the party into an heavy ſtupefaction, with a moderate ſweat upon the face, and ſo to kill with an eaſie kind of languiſhment. Before Cæſar came down into Ægypt againſt them ſhe ſent ſeveral times to him. She asked the Kingdom for her Children, and without Antony his knowledge ſent him a Scepter, a Crown of Gold, and a Royal Throne, giving up her Kingdom to him, as it were with thoſe, Plutarch. in Antonio & Dio lib. 51.

Many willing to dye give their names, and they ſpend their time in jollyty.

She yet laboureth to curry favour with Cæſar.

to gain reſpect. He received them as a good Omen, and returned to her openly threatning language; yet underhand promiſed her impunity, and the entire poſſeſſion of her Kingdom, if ſhe would make away Antony. And fearing leſt ſhe might be brought to undertake ſome deſperate deſign, he ſent one Thyrſeus his Freed-man, and a cunning fellow to her, to make her believe he was in Love with her, hoping that then, beſides the ſaving of the Treaſure, which ſhe had threatned to burn, ſhe having a great ambition to be loved by all great perſons, would not ſtick at killing Antony. She deſiring indeed that it might be ſo, and remembring how his Uncle, in time paſt, and ſince that Antony had been bewitched with her, eaſily fooled her ſelf into a fond belief thereof, and promiſed her ambition, not onely pardon, and Ægypt, but the Roman Empire it ſelf. Antony ſeeing her kind to the Meſſenger above meaſure, ſuſpected ſomething, and ſoundly laſhing him, ſent him back to his Maſter; and then ſhe to wipe off his jealouſie moſt ſolemnly celebrated his birth-day (though ſuitably to her preſent condition ſhe neglected her own) and ſought all manner of wayes how to humour him. Yet did ſhe betray Peluſium in to Cæſars hands, and when he drew down towards Alexandria ſecretly forbad the Towns-men to go out againſt him, though openly ſhe exhorted them to reſiſtance. And when Antony had provided a Fleet, ſhe cauſed it wholely to revolt, and in like manner the Horſe, which Antony plainly ſeeing, after the overthrow of his Foot, returned into the City, crying out that he was betrayed by her into their hands, againſt whom, for her ſake he had taken Arms.

She betrayeth Peluſium, and cauſeth the Fleet and Horſe to revolt to him.

40. She being afraid of him, went to her Monument, as intending to kill her ſelf, under pretence of being in feare of Cæſar, and ſent a Meſſenger to him to tell him ſhe was dead. He giving credit to it, deſired Eros his ſervant to kill him; but he preventing it with his own death, he wounded himſelf in the belly; but the ſtroak not being ſuch an one as could preſently diſpatch him, he intreated his friends to do it, who refuſing, and running out of the room, a tumult enſued, and ſhe perceiving what was done, ſent for him up into her Monument. He underſtanding ſhe was alive, aroſe, thinking he might alſo poſſibly live; but the blood iſſuing out in great abundance, he deſpaired of it, and was born by his attendants to the door of the building, whence he was drawn up with Cords in a lamentable plight, all in goar blood, helping himſelf as it were, and ſtretching out his hands to her, and her women, who haled him up thus to the top. When he was got up ſhe laid him on a bed, tore her fleſh, wiped off his blood with her face, calling him Lord, Husband, and General, after which he preſently expired. Cæſar now deſired to get her into his power by ſtrong hand, having an extraordinary ambition to grace his Triumph with her, and not willing to promiſe any thing, and be counted a deceiver by falſifying his word. She continued ſtill in the Monument, hoping at leaſt to purchaſe her Kingdom by the Treaſure ſhe had in her power, and refuſed to come down, talking with the meſſengers from above. But preſently ſome got in to her, removed all things out of the way wherewith ſhe might hurt her ſelf, and then bringing her into the Palace, detracted nothing from her former ſtate, thereby to delude her with vain hope. Cæſar now without any trouble entred Alexandria with Arius the Philoſopher on his right hand, who formerly had read the Sciences to him; he permitted her to bury Antony as ſhe pleaſed, which after ſhe had done, being ſpent with ſorrow, and her breaſt all exulcerated with ſtroaks, ſhe thereby contracted a Fever, and glad of that pretence to abſtain from all ſuſtenance, and ſo end her dayes, ſhe conſulted alſo with Olympus her Phyſician how to reduce her ſelf into a Conſumption. But Cæſar ſmelling it out, ſo terrified her about her Children, that ſhe was content to deſiſt.

Antony killeth himſelf.

Cæſar earneſtly deſireth to lead her in Triumph, and doth all he can to deceive her.

41. Shortly after, he coming to comfort her, ſhe caſt her ſelf down at his feet, indeavouring with all the art ſhe had to inveigle his affections, which though he perceived, yet fixing his Eyes on the ground, he onely ſaid, Be of good chear Woman, thou ſhalt have no harm; She being ſollicitous, not for life, but love, and a Kingdom. Then gave ſhe in an Inventory of her Goods and Treaſure, at which Seleucus one of her officers was ſo Malapert, as to accuſe her of ſuppreſſing ſomething, whereupon ſhe flew in his face, and ſoundly buffeted him, Cæſar ſmiling, and gently reprehending her for it. But ſhe asked him whether it was not a hard caſe for her, whom he had deigned to viſit, to be accuſed by one of her own ſlaves, if ſhe had reſerved any thing, not for her ſelf, but wherewithall to preſent his Wife and Siſter, that they might render him the more favourable to her. Hereat he exceedingly rejoyced, hoping ſhe had a great deſire to live, and promiſed her great matters, vainly ſuppoſing he therein deceived her. But ſhe having notice by Dolobella, Plutarch & Dio ut ſuprà.

Vide Sueton in Octavio.
Florum lib. 4. cap. 11.
Oroſium lib. 6. cap. 19.
Eutropium.

But ſhe having notice of his intentions dieth by the biting of an Aſp.

a young Gentleman amongſt his followers, and one that bare her great good will, that after three dayes, ſhe and her Children were to go for Italy, firſt obtained leave of him to celebrate the obſequies of Antony, which having performed with lamentations, and great ſhew of affection, ſhe commanded a Bath to be prepared, and ſitting down to meat, ſumptuouſly Dined. After Dinner ſhe gave a Letter to her Keeper to carry to Cæſar (wherein ſhe deſired ſhe might be buried by Antony) ſealed, that he thinking the contents to be of conſequence, might the more eaſily be removed out of the way. He being gone, with the help of her two women, ſhe made faſt the doors, moſt gorgeouſly apparelled her ſelf, as upon ſome ſolemn day, with her Royal Ornaments, and then put an Aſp which ſhe had procured ſecretly to be brought in amongſt Figs, Grapes, and Flowers) to her left Arm, with the biting of which, ſhe fell preſently as into a ſleep, and ſo died. Cæſar having read the Letter preſently perceived what was done, and indeavoured with all ſpeed to recall her to life, though in vain, grieving ſore that he was fruſtrated of a glorious Triumph, yet pitying and admiring the perſon, whom he cauſed to be royally interred with Antony, according to her deſire, and afteawards dealt very nobly with their Children. Adorned ſhe was with all the endowments of nature above her Sex. Being learned her ſelf, ſhe was a great Lover and promoter of knowledge; which ſhe teſtified in erecting another Library, in the room of that which had been burnt, ſupplyed with Books from Pergamus at the procurement of Antony. She lived thirty nine years, reigned twenty two (counted from her Fathers death) fourteen whereof ſhe ſpent with Antony. And with her periſhed her Kingdom, now reduced into the form of a Roman Province, and the Macedonian Empire was quite extinct, three hundred years after the death of Darius, and the Monarchy of Alexander, by whom it aroſe; two hundred and ninety three after Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus had obtained Ægypt; in the third of the one hundred and eighty ſeventh Olympiad, the year of the World three thouſand nine hundred ſeventy five, and twenty eight before the birth of Chriſt. Octavius Cæſar the fourth time, and M. Licinius Craſſus being Conſuls.

A. M. 3975.
Ol. 187. an. 3.
V. C. 724.
Herodis 10.
Octavio Cæſare 4.
M. Licinio Craſſo Coſſ.

Contemporaries with the Empire of the Macedonians.

CHAP. VII.

The Judæan Kingdom or Principality of the Aſmonæans.

From the departure of Antiochus Sidetes from Jeruſalem to the Reign of Herod an alien, being by birth an Idumæan, Conteining the ſpace of ninety eight years.

John firnamed Hyrcanus his exploits.

I. AFter Antiochus had raiſed his ſiege and departed from Jeruſalem, as was ſaid before, he undertook an Expedition againſt the Parthians, where in he was ſlain. John the Son of Simon who then was chief both Prieſt and Magiſtrate of the Jews accompanied him ſome way with a band of Auxiliaries, and got the ſirname of Hyrcanus from the overthrow of the Hyrcanians, as it's thought, and returned with great credit into his own Countrey. After Antiochus his death, he led down an Army into Syria, thinking, as indeed it fell out, that the Cities were left without defence, whereof he took ſeveral, Medaba, Samaga, Sicima, and Gerizim, where the Cuthæans had built a Temple reſembling that at Jeruſalem.

A.M. 38.70.

A.M. 3877.

A. M. 3878.
Ol. 263. ann. 2.
V. C. 627.
Seleucid. 186.
Ptol. Phyſcon. 20.
Joh. Hyrcani 9.

He reneweth the League with Rome.

Beſiegeth Samaria.

Jeruſalem. In this Expedition he alſo ſubdued Idumæa, the inhabitants whereof he put to their choice, whether they would be circumciſed or quit their habitations. They choſe the former, and now began to be reckoned amongſt the Jews, ſubmitting to all their rites and ceremonies. After this he ſent to Rome, deſiring that the confederacy made with the Senate might be renewed; that Joppa, Gazara, with other Cities and places taken from the Jews by Antiochus, contrary to their Decree, might be reſtored, that it might not be lawful for the King of Syria to paſs through their Countrey with his Armies, that whatſoever Antiochus had attempted againſt them in War contrary to their will might be made fruſtrate, and that the Senate would pleaſe to ſend their Ambaſſadors to procure thoſe things, and to cauſe ſatisfaction to be given for the havock made of the Countrey. The Fathers renewed the confederacy with them, according to their deſire, promiſed to take order they ſhould be no more wronged, and diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors with money to bear their charges, and letters commendatory to thoſe through whoſe Countreys they ſhould paſs. The many changes which then preſently happened in the Syrian Kingdom ſo diverted the ſeveral Princes from medling with the Jews, that they were glad of their friendſhip, and this proved a ſufficient opportunity for Hyrcanus to eſtabliſh his affaires. For they deſtroying one another with War, he ſecurely injoyed the Revenues of the Countrey, and got together a great Maſs of money; ſo that deſpiſing them, he went and beſieged Samaria, the Inhabitants of which he was diſpleaſed with for their injury offered to the Mariſſeni, though the King of Syria's Subjects, yet his friends and allies.

Idem cap. 18.

Idim ibid. & de bello Judaico lib. 1. c. 2, & 3.

Taketh it.

Grudges betwixt him and the Phariſees.

2. He caſt a Trench about it, and committed the ſiege to the care of his two ſons Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſorely oppreſſed the defendants, hindering all importation of Victuals, ſo that they were conſtrained to beg aid of Antiochus Cyzicenus then reigning in Syria. He came, but was overthrown by Ariſtobulus his Soldiers, and being purſued by the brothers as far as Scythopolis, hardly eſcaped, and the ſiege was renewed. The beſieged reduced to their former neceſſities, ſent once more to Cyzicenus, who then obtaining about ſix thouſand men of Ptolomy Lathurus (then expelled his Kingdom by his mother) made an inroad into Hyrcanus his Dominions, and made havock of all things, thereby hoping to conſtrain him to raiſe the ſiege. But having loſt many of his men being intercepted by the Enemy, he himſelf went to Tripolis, and gave over the War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander being more venturous than wiſe was preſently ſlain, and his fellow was corrupted to betray Scythopolis and other Towns to Hyrcanus, who then after a years lying before Samaria took it, razed it, and brought the water-courſes through the Place, by the filth of which all appearance of a Town was taken away. After this, inviting the Phariſees on a time (whoſe Scholar he had been) to a feaſt, he laboured to approve his ſincerity to them, and deſired, if any of them knew any fault in him, to tell him plainly of it. All approved of his manners but one Eleazar a ſeditious and bad man, who told him, that if he would be accounted good, he muſt deveſt himſelf of the Prieſthood, and be content with the Principality, for that he had heard ſay, that his mother was a captive in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This being utterly falſe, Hyrcanus was grievouſly offended, and ſo were the Phariſees; but Jonathan a Saducee of the contrary fact, and one in great grace with him, took thence occaſion to tell him, that this affront came from all the Phariſees together, and that he ſhould perceive it by the puniſhment they would inflict upon him, if their opinion was demanded. They being mercifully inclined, thought it ſufficient he ſhould be impriſoned and beaten for no greater an offence: at which Hyrcanus was ſore diſpleaſed, as then thinking they had raiſed that ſcandal of him. Wherefore being more incenſed by Jonathan, he revolted to the Saducees, abrogated the conſtitutions of the Phariſees, and puniſhed their followers, whence it came to paſs, that neither he nor his ſons were much beloved by the People. A ſedition alſo aroſe hereupon, but he quieted all, and having governed thirty one years died, being honoured with three eſpecial dignities, of the chief Government, High-Prieſthood, and alſo Prophecy, as Joſephus tells us, who relateth, that he foretold his two eldeſt ſons ſhould neither of them long enjoy his Principality. A. M. 3899. the laſt of the one hundred and ſixty Olympiad, about one hundred and four years before the birth of Chriſt.

The original of the ſeveral Jewiſh Sects.

3. Mention being here made of Phariſees, it is requiſite to ſpeak ſomething of this Sect and others amongſt the Jews, according to the nature of this work. Joſephus firſt maketh mention of them in the ninth Chapter of his thirteenth Book of Antiquities, afterwards more diligently and largely * handling their matters.

* Lib. 18. c. 2. & de bello lib. 2. c. 7.

There is no queſtion but theſe ſects ſprang up after the return of the Jews from the Babyloniſh captivity. It's probable that the difference amongſt them aroſe after the building of the ſecond Temple, about their worſhip and offerings. Some thought they were onely to live by the preſcript of the Law, neither above nor below it. Others believed they were not onely to act according to the bare letter of the Scriptures, but alſo according to ſuch ſenſes and conſequences as might be made out from it, and accordingly they offered over and above what the Law required in the ſervice of the Temple, even what they conceived was due according to their riches or other reſpects. Thoſe that ſtood to the letter of the Law were called Karraim: Thoſe that beſides the precepts of the Law did works of ſupererogation, and voluntary ſervice without any compulſion, were named Haſidim, that is Sancti or Holy, and (after they grew into a body) Haſidæans. As long as this voluntary and ſupererogatory ſervice was free and ſpontaneous, there was no ſuch ſchiſm; but when this doctrine of the Haſidæans came to be digeſted into precepts, and the precepts of ſupererogation into Writings and Canons, many doubts, diſputes, and controverſies, daily aroſe, whence two dogmatical Sects had their original. One which onely allowed of the Law it ſelf, and another that imbraced alſo the gloſſes and interpretations of it. From the latter, being that of the Haſidæans, ſprung up ſome who called themſelves Peruſchim or Separate, as thoſe, who by reaſon of their holineſs were not only diſtinct and ſeparated from the vulgar, but alſo from other Haſidæans, for that they taught that thoſe conſtitutions formerly accounted free, were to be obſerved out of neceſſity. Theſe Peruſchim in Syriack Pheruſchim, came by Greek Writers to be called Phariſæi. Now as out of the Haſidæans aroſe the Phariſees, ſo from amongſt the Karraim the Saducees, ſo named from Sadoc. Antigonus the Maſter of this Sadoc, and Scholar to Simeon the Juſt, amongſt other heads of doctrin had taught, that they ought not to be like Servants, who ſerved their Maſters on condition to receive their Wages, meaning that we ought to ſerve God out of love, and not for our own gain or advantage. But Sadoc, or Saduc, and Baithus interpreted this godly ſaying into a wicked ſence, teaching, that there was no reward after this life; and therefore denied the future ſtate, and framed their Hereſie. The third ſect was that of the Eſſæi or Eſſeni, who as it's probable ſprang from the Phariſees, though when it becan it be uncertain. Philo Judæus thinketh they were ſo called from their holineſs Ἐσσαῖοι, as though Ὁσιαῖοι, though more probably from Hæſi the Syriack, whence the Greek Ὅσιος may be derived. The Hebrew ſignifieth ſuch as live apart from noiſe, which agreeth much with thoſe Eſſeni, who like the Pythagoræans kept ſilence, and lived in deſerts or Villages by themſelves, far from others. They had skill in Phyſick, and thence ſome would derive their name from the Hebrew Aſa, which ſignifieth to heal. This Sect was later then that of the Phariſees, and ſome think it aroſe at this time when Hyrcanus turned Saduce, and perſecuted the Sect of the Phariſees; for then might many of the Phariſees to ſhun perſecution depart into the Wilderneſs and deſert places, and afterwards be called Eſſæi or Eſſeni, who were held more ſtrict than the Phariſees themſelves.

Conſule Joſephum Scaligerum in Elencho Trihæreſi Fullerum Miſcellan. l. 1. c. 3.

Druſium lib. de tribus ſectis Judæorum. Jacobum Cappellum ad A. M. 3891. & Simſonium & A.M. 3896

Ariſtobulus the ſon of Hyrcanus changeth the Principality into a Kingdom.

4. But, (to return to our matter) John ſirnamed Hyrcanus left five ſons, whereof Ariſtobulus the eldeſt (ſirnamed Philellen for his love to, and familiarity with the Greeks) ſucceeded him, and firſt changed his Principality into a Kingdom, ſetting a Diadem on his head, four hundred and eighty one years after the return of the Jews from the Captivity of Babylon. His ſecond brother he loved exceedingly, ſo as he made him his partner in the Kingdom; but ſhut up the reſt in priſon, and with them his Mother, to whom his Father had left the Principality, and proceeded ſo far in unnatural cruelty, as to ſtarve her to death. Not long after, he cauſed to be made away alſo his beloved brother, though againſt his will he did it. For he (Antigonus by name) returning victorious from the Wars, at the Feaſt of the Tabernacles, marched up with his Soldiers to the Temple, as intending to offer Sacrifice for his brother then lying ſick. This was preſently interpreted to Ariſtobulus as an effect of a bad intention towards him, and a ſufficient ſign of affecting the Kingdom, and it was repreſented to him, as if Antigonus would preſently come down and kill him, accounting it folly when he might Reign alone, to be content with a communicated honour. He having rejected tales heretofore, did not eaſily give credit to them now, but to provide for his own ſecurity, and yet ſhun ſuſpition, he commanded ſome of his Guard to ſtand in an obſcure place where he was to come, and if he came armed, then to kill him, but if not, then not to moleſt him, and he ſent alſo to him to come without any guard at all. But the

A. M. 3900. Ol. 168. ann. 4. V. C. 649. Ptol. Lath. 13.

His cruelty againſt his mother and brethren.

Queen and the reſt of the conſpirators, perſwaded the meſſenger to deliver his errand the clean contrary way, ſo that Antigonus thinking nothing, but coming to ſee his brother, was there murdered. After this was done, Ariſtobulus preſently repented of the deed, though knowing nothing concerning the meſſage, which ſo increaſed his diſeaſe, that he vomited blood for anguiſh of mind. The blood being carried out by one of his attendants, chanced to be ſpilt in that place where Antigonus was ſlain, which being judged by them that ſaw it, to be done of purpoſe, they cryed out againſt the thing, and made ſuch a noiſe, that the King hearing it, forced the matter out of them; after which his Agony increaſed ſo highly (crying out, that his blood was required for that of his Mothers and Brothers which he had ſpilt, and chiding as it were his body for retaining the Soul required of him by their Ghoſts) that in great torment of conſcience he preſently breathed out his laſt, when he had ſcarcely reigned a whole year. He profited much his Countrey by his Government, and making War upon Ituræa, laid a great part of it to his own Dominions, and frighted the Inhabitants by threatning baniſhment to them, into an imbracement of Circumciſion, and the other Jewiſh Rites.

He dieth within a years time.

5. He being dead, his Wife Salome (called by the Greeks Alexandra) ſet his brothers at liberty, of which Jannæus (or Alexander) was made King, excelling the other, as in age ſo alſo in modeſty. His Father is ſaid to have hated him, and ſent him out of his ſight to be educated in Galile preſently after his birth, becauſe being ſollicitous for his two eldeſt Sons, and deſiring of God to know his Succeſſor, his likeneſs was preſented to him in his ſleep. Being ſeized of the Kingdom, he put to death one of his Brothers that conſpired againſt him, but the other who was contented with a private life he much honoured. Having ſetled his affairs at home, he went and beſieged Ptolemais, which with Gaza only of the Sea-Towns remained unconquered, beſides the Tower of Straton (ſince called Cæſarea) and Dora, which Zoilus the Tyrant had got into his hands. At this time the two Brothers Antiochus Grypus (called by Joſephus Philometor) and Antiochus Cyzicenos in Syria, attending nothing but the deſtruction of each other, the Defendants had little hope of any ſuccour from either of them, onely Zoilus, who gaped after the City himſelf, gave them a little relief. There remaining no help to be hoped for, but either from Ægypt, or Cyprus (whither Lathurus had been expelled by his Mother Cleopatra) they ſent to him, deſiring he would reſcue them out of the hands of Alexander, giving him hopes, that he ſhould not onely have them, but the Inhabitants of Gaza alſo on his ſide, and that Zoilus, the Sidonians and others would come and help him. He being puffed up with theſe promiſes made what haſte he could, but Demanetus one of their Citizens perſwaded them for reaſons formerly recited to refuſe his help, notwithſtanding which he came on, and pitching his Tents near the City, ſeeing he had no Meſſage from them, began to be diſcouraged. But Zoilus and the Gazæans came ſhortly to him, and deſired his help againſt Alexander, who waſted their Territories, whereupon the ſiege was raiſed before Ptolemais, and Alexander departed home, wherein he attempted to overturn, by policy the deſign of Ptolomy. He ſent privily to Cleopatra, exciting her againſt him, but openly counterfeiting himſelf his Friend and Ally, promiſed him three hundred Talents of Silver to take off Zoilus the Tyrant, and lay his Territories to his Dominions. At firſt he willingly imbraced his friendſhip and took Zoilus, but then finding he had ſent underhand to his Mother, renounced it again, and went and beſieged Ptolemais, which had ſhut the Gates on him, where leaving part of his Army to continue the ſiege, he departed thence to invade Judæa. Alexander alſo underſtanding his purpoſe, raiſed an Army of fifty thouſand (ſome ſay eighty thouſand) and went to meet him.

Joſephus Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 20.

Jannæus or Alexander his brother ſucceedeth him.

A. M. 3901.

Beſieging Ptolemais, the ſiege is raiſed by Ptolomy Lathurus.

A. M. 3905.
Ol. 170. ann. 1.
V. C. 654.
Seleucid. 213.
Alexand. 5.
C. Mario 6.
L. Valerio Flacco Coſſ.

6. He took Aſychis a Town in Galile, ſetting upon it at unawares on the Sabbath, and then attempted to do the like by Sephoris, a place not far diſtant from the other; but was received with ſuch reſolution, that he loſt many of his men, and aroſe from thence to go to meet Alexander, whom having found to have reached the River Jordan, he pitched his Tents on this ſide over againſt him. Alexander ſuffered him quietly to paſs fooliſhly ſuppoſing that the victory would be more eaſie if the Enemy had the River on his back, and ſo could not run away. For ſome time the Victory was doubtful, or ſeemed to incline to Alexanders party, till his Soldiers being beaten back by a reſerve of freſh men, and having none to ſuccour them, were put to flight, and the Enemy gave the chace as long as he could hold a ſword for wearineſs, ſo that thirty thouſand (ſome have affirmed fifty fifty thouſand) were ſlain in this battel. Ptolomy ranging up and down the Countrey, fell at length into ſome Villages, which ſeeing full of Women and Children, he commanded his Soldiers to kill them promiſcuouſly, and cutting off their limbs to caſt them into hot Caldrons, that a report going that his Army ate mans fleſh, the enemy might thereby be diſcouraged. But Cleopatra hearing that her ſon thus proſpered in his undertakings, thought her ſelf concerned therein, eſpecially he being ſo near her, and therefore ſhe came againſt him with Forces both by Land and Sea, over which ſhe placed Checeias and Ananias, both Jews. Her ſon thinking he had her at advantage, being now out of Ægypt, haſted thither, but ſhe had left it ſo provided, as he could not do any thing according to his purpoſe, and was beaten back to Gaza by a party ſhe ſent after him. She having taken Ptolemais, Alexander thither came to her, where he was received as a perſon diſtreſſed by her adverſary, and one who onely had refuge in her ſelf. Some adviſed her to ſeize his Countrey into her hands, and not to ſuffer ſo many good Jews to be at the command and pleaſure of one man: but Ananias counting it wickedneſs for him to diſpoſeſs a man received into friendſhip, and his own Kinſman beſides, and withall thinking that thereby he ſhould loſe himſelf with the Jews in all places, he perſwaded her to the contrary, and ſo ſhe entered into a League with him at Scythopolis, a City of Cœleſyria.

Idem ibid. & cap. 21.

Who invadeth Judæa, and overthroweth Alexander in battel.

But is driven back by his own mother.

Who entereth into League with Alexander.

Idem ibid.

7. Hereby being freed from all danger, both from Mother and Son, he preſently made another expedition into Cœleſyria, took Gadara after he had layen ten moneths before it, and Amachus a ſtrong Caſtle upon the River Jordan, where Theodorus the Son of Zenon had laid up his Treaſure, who falling ſuddenly upon the Jews, cut off ten thouſand of them, and plundered the Carriages. Yet he was not at all terrified herewith from ſetting upon Raphia and Anthedon (called afterwards Agrippias by Herod) which he took, and perceiving Ptolomy to be gone to Cyprus, and his Mother into Ægypt, being angry with them of Gaza, for calling him in to help them againſt him, he ſet upon the City, and waſted their grounds. In the mean time Apollodotus their General brake out into his Camp by night with twelve thouſand men, and as long as night laſted had the better of it, but as ſoon as it was day the Jews Uniting themſelves, and encouraged after they ſaw Ptolomy was not come as they expected, charged the Townſ-men ſo fiercely that they ſlew a thouſand men. For all this they would not yield, expecting the coming of Aretas the Arabian King; but the City was taken ere they could ſee his face, by the treachery of Lyſimachus the Brother of Apollodotus, whom he envying for being in ſo great grace with the People, murdered, and then getting a party cloſe about him delivered up the place. Alexander upon his entry did no harm to the Inhabitants, but not long after gave commiſſion to his Soldiers to kill and ſlay all they would, who ranging up and down with fury and Sword, as many of them loſt their lives as they ſlew, the Defendants fighting couragiouſly, and ſetting their houſes on fire, leſt they ſhould become a prey to them; and ſome killed their Wives and Children with their own hands, rather than they ſhould be led into Captivity. It hapned that at the ſame time that Alexander was let in, the Senate was met, which conſiſting of five hundred men, he put them all to the Sword, and then razing the City, returned to Jeruſalem a year after he firſt ſate down before Gaza.

He again invading Cœleſyria,

Hath Gaza betrayed to him.

A. M. 3909.
Ol. 171. an. 1.
V. C. 658.
Seleucid 217.
Alexand: 9.
Cn. Domitio
Ænobarbo
C. caſſio: Longino Coſſ.

Idem ibid. & De bello lib. 1. cap. 3.

8. He was not at all affected by his Subjects, which they clearly manifeſted when the Feaſt of Tabernacles came. For then as he was about to ſacrifice they threw Orenges at him, and railed at him, upbraiding him with Captivity (that I ſuppoſe of his Grand-mother objected before to his Father) and crying out that he was not worthy of ſo high an Office as the High Prieſt-hood. Being inraged hereat he ſlew about ſix thouſand of them; made up the place about the Altar with boards to defend him for the time to come from the violence of the multitude, and furniſhed himſelf with Guards hired out of Piſidia and Cilicia. Then overthrew he the Arabians, and impoſed Tribute upon the Moabites and Galadites, and levelled Amathus with the ground, Theodorus not once daring to ingage. But making another expedition againſt the Arabians, he was drawn into an Ambuſh by Obedu their King, and being thruſt amongſt the Craggy and precipitous Rocks by a multitude of Camels, he hardly eſcaped by flight to Jeruſalem, his whole Army being cut off. Then were his Rebellious Subjects encouraged by this his overthrow to begin freſh ſtirs, which continued ſix years, during which time they fought often, but he had the better, and deſtroyed no leſs than fifty thouſand of them. This yet was no matter of joy to him thus to loſe the ſtrength of his own Kingdom; therefore he endeavoured endeavoured to make up the breach, and by fair means to be reconciled to them. But being asked by him wherewith he ſhould appeaſe them, they anſwered, if he would kill himſelf, for ſcarce could they pardon him being dead. Then ſent they to Demetrius, ſirnamed Acærus, inducing him with great promiſes to come and aid them, ſo that joyning with him they made up an Army of three thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot, their King having twenty ſix thouſand and two hundred men in his Army. Both at the firſt laboured to draw their Enemies to revolt, Demetrius thoſe Greeks that were in pay with Alexander, and he the Jews which had called him in, but this ſucceeding on no part, they both reſolved to end the controverſie with dint of ſword. Demetrius had the better of it (all Alexanders Auxiliaries being ſlain, though they behaved themſelves moſt gallantly) but he was no whit better, but much worſe for his victory. For the Jews taking pity of their King after this his defeat, about ſix thouſand went over to him, which ſo diſcouraged Demetrius, that he thereupon retreated into his own Country.

He is defeated by the Arabians, and hath Wars with his rebellious and ſawcy Subjects.

Idem ibid. & Antiq. lib. 13. cap. 22.

9. They thenceforth waged War with him by themſelves, but ſtill had the worſt of it, and many of them were ſlain. At length he forced the ſtrongeſt up into a Town called Bethoma, which reducing, he took them in it, and brought them up to Jeruſalem, where he cauſed eight hundred of them to be nailed to Croſſes, and their Wives and Children to be ſlain in their ſight, yet living, he beholding the Spectacle from an high place, banquetting, and dallying with his women.

A. M. 3920. Ol. 173. an. 4. V. C. 669. Seleucid. 228. Alexand. 20.

He was highly provoked with that ſtubborn people, who not only brought him often into extream danger of life and eſtate, but not contenting themſelves with what they could do by their own power, without calling in of forreign aid, had reduced him to that neceſſity, that he was glad to reſtore thoſe places he had ſubdued in the Country of Moab and Galaad to the Arabian; and for animadverſion upon them they nicknamed him Thracida. About eight thouſand men got away by night, and paſſed all the time he lived, in Exile, and ſo ever after the Kingdom continued free from ſeditions.

Idem Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 23. & De bello lib. 1. cap. 4.

Antiochus Dyonyſus King of Syria intending to make an invaſion into Arabia through his Kingdom, he getting knowledge of it, drew a Ditch from Caparſale (afterwards called Antipatris) as far as the Sea of Joppe, to hinder him, ſtrengthening it with a Bulwark, and Forts built here and there upon it where he expected him. But he burning theſe Forts eaſily got over, and then invading Arabia, was there ſlain in battel by Aretas the King, who was made King of Cœleſyria, and making an inroad into Judæa, overthrew Alexander at Adida, and forcing him to ſubſcribe to his own conditions, then departed.

His Conqueſts abroad.

Afterwards Alexander gathering together his Forces, went and took divers Towns with all the Valley of Antiochus (as it was called) and the Caſtle Gamala, and returned to Jeruſalem at the end of three years, now joyfully and honourably received by his people for his valour; and indeed at this time the Nation, what by his own, and the diligence of his predeceſſors, arrived at that height for dominion and glory abroad, that they enjoyed many Cities in Syria, Idumæa, Phœnicia, and other Countries; whereof a Catalogue of moſt Joſephus hath left unto us, and amongſt which Polla a Town of Moab was deſtroyed, becauſe the Inhabitants refuſed to receive the Jewiſh Rites.

Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 13.

His death.

Alexander towards his latter end fell to drunkenneſs, and thereby contracted a Quartan Ague, which held him three years; yet recovered he his antient temper of mind, though not of body, and following on his Wars laid ſiege to Ragola beyond Jordan, in the Country of the Geraſens, where being ſpent with the force of his diſeaſe, he died before the Walls of that place, in the twenty ſeventh year of his reign, and of his age the fourty ninth. A. M. 3927. and the third of the 173 Olympiad, ſome ſeventy ſix years before the birth of Chriſt,

A. M. 3927. Ol. 175. an. 3. V. C. 676. Seleucid. 235.

10. His wife Alexandra ſeeing his end approaching, bewailed much the condition of her ſelf and children, being deſtitute of ſuccour, and about to enter upon the government of a People, likely enough to be untoward towards them, which bore him ſo much ill will.

His advice to his wife to gain the Phariſees.

He adviſed her, that ſhe might reign ſecurely, firſt to keep cloſe his death till that place ſhould be gained, then going victoriouſly to Jeruſalem to ſend for the chief of the Phariſees, whom both he and his Father had grievouſly offended, and thereby incurred the hatred of the People, and to gain their favour to ſhew them his body, and give them power of diſpoſing of it as they would either as to beſtow burial upon it, or caſt it out without Sepulture, or otherwiſe to abuſe it at their pleaſure; and withal, to promiſe them to do nothing without their counſel and advice. The Caſtle being taken, ſhe ordered her affairs according to his direction, whereby ſhe purchaſed the love of the Phariſees, who going out and ſpeaking to the People, related the great things done by Alexander, ſignified to them them the loſs of a juſt King, and ſo ſtirred up the multitude to mourning and lamentation, that hereby ſhe procured him (even as he forelold her) a more honourable burial than elſe he could have had, and as ſumptuous a funeral as any of his Predeceſſors obtained. Alexander left two ſons by this his wife, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus; but to her left the management of the Kingdom. The elder of their ſons was not at all made for government, but dull and heavy. She being in great grace with the People, becauſe ſhe ever had pretended to diſlike the proceedings of her husband, made Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt, not ſo much out of reſpect to his birthright as his lazineſs, keeping the title of Queen and Governeſs, though indeed all things were ordered at the will and pleaſure of the Phariſees, whom the People were commanded to obey, and againſt whom all ſuch conſtitutions as were made by Hyrcanus were taken away. Yet ſhe took care for ſomething her ſelf, for ſhe kept in pay a great number of foreigners, and ſo increaſed her power, that ſhe became formidable abroad, and ſuch a terror to the neighbouring petty Governors, that ſhe conſtrained them to give Hoſtages.

Idem cap. 24. & de bello ut prius.

Which ſhe followeth and reigneth her ſelf.

11. Yet no great matters were done abroad, but ſtirs ſufficient hapned within the Kingdom; for the Phariſees knowing no moderation in the proſecution of their ambitious and envious deſires, cauſed her to put to death thoſe that had counſelled her husband to deal cruelly with the eight hundred before mentioned, and they made away divers of them; till ſuch time as thoſe of moſt power and eſteem being backed by Ariſtobulus (who complained of the too great power of his Mother) came to Court, and there laid before her how unworthy it was, that they ſhould ſuffer ſo much for their faithfulneſs to Alexander, and how joyful news it would be to Aretas the Arabian and others, to hear that the Kingdom was deprived of ſuch men, who had done good ſervice againſt him. They beſought her, that if their adverſaries were not ſatisfied with what blood they had ſpilt already, to give them leave to depart, and provide for their own ſafety, or if that could not be granted, to diſtribute them into ſeveral places of ſtrength, that there they might live quietly and meanly, with which condition they would be contented, ſeeing Fortune ſo frowned upon the favourers of Alexander. They ſetting theſe things off with all advantage poſſible to gain compaſſion, and calling on the ghoſt of Alexander, Ariſtobulus alſo ſoundly reprehended his Mother, but withal added, that they were juſtly puniſhed, for permitting the chief power to be in a woman, as if no poſterity had been left by his Father. She not knowing what to do, delivered into their hands all her Caſtles, except three, in which ſhe had hoarded up her choiſeſt goods, and ſhortly after ſent her younger Son againſt Ptolomy Mennæus, who troubled ſorely Damaſcus, but he returned without having done any thing. A report went at the ſame time, that Tigranes the Armenian had invaded Syria with fifty thouſand men, and would ſpeedily come into Judæa, which ſo terrified both Queen and People, that they ſent Ambaſſadors to him then lying before Ptolemais; for Celene or Cleopatra then reigned in Syria, and had adviſed her Subjects to exclude him. He kindly received the Ambaſſadors, becauſe come ſo far to tender him reſpect, and gave them incouraging words. And after he had taken Ptolemais, news being brought him, that Lucullus in his purſute of Mithridates the Great, King of Pontus, was entred Armenia, and waſted the Country, he being Son in Law to that King, and therefore taking his part, departed home with all Expedition.

This raiſeth ſtirs betwixt the two factions.

A. M. 3934.
Ol. 177. an. 2.
V. C. 683.
Seleucid. 242.
Alexandræ 8.

12. After this, Alexandra falling grievouſly ſick, Ariſtobulus judged that now or never was there a fit opportunity for him to do ſomething, and leſt the Phariſees ſhould get all into their hands, departed by night with one man in his company, and got the Caſtles within a ſhort time into his power, which ſhe had committed to their adverſaries, even to the number of twenty two within little more than fifteen dayes. This being underſtood, ſhe and all the People were ſtruck with conſternation, knowing that he would take the Supream Power, and fearing they ſhould dearly pay for what they had done to his familiar friends. They thought good then to ſecure his Wife and Children in the Caſtle adjoyning to the Temple at Jeruſalem. He increaſed in followers and in power daily, taking the ſtate of a King upon him, and got an Army from the Mountain Libanus, Trachonitis, and the petty Princes thereto adjoyning. The chief of the Jews therefore with Hyrcanus came to the Queen, beſeeching her that ſome courſe might be entered into to prevent his attempts, who now had gotten ſo many convenient places. She with ſhortneſs of mind told them they might do whatſoever they thought meet and convenient for the Commonwealth; that they had liberty and ſtrength enough both as to Souldiers, and money alſo Ariſtobulus her younger Son aſſumeth the ſtate of King.

She dieth.

A. M. 3936.
Ol. 177. an. 4.
V. c. 685.
Sileucid. 244.

alſo the nerves of War; but as for her ſelf, ſhe could look to nothing, her body being now ſpent; and ſhortly after ſhe breathed her laſt, having reigned nine years, and lived ſeventy three. A woman of wiſdom, courage, and induſtry above her ſex, and who in the whole courſe of her Government could not be drawn (for the generality) from moderation, juſtice, and honeſty. But whereas ſhe looked more at the preſent than future times, ſeemed to ſide with the Enemies of her houſe, and to have made the Kingdom naked of fit Rulers, after her death the effects of her male adminiſtration was felt by her family, which came into ſuch misfortunes, as it miſcarried and fell from that power, wherein ſhe had laboured and taken ſo much pains to eſtabliſh it.

Joſephus Antiq. l. 14. c. 1. & de bello ut ſupra & c. 5.

Ariſtobulus by a battel diſpoſſeſſeth his Brother Hyrcanus.

Lib. 14. c. 2.
* Vide Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. lib. 1. cap. 7.

Antipater ſtirreth up Hyrcanus to recover his juſt right.

13. For Hyrcanus having entered upon the High-Prieſthood in the third year of the 177 Olympiad, Q. Hortenſius, and Q. Metellus Creticus bing Conſuls, his brother Ariſtobulus now preſently made War upon him. A battel being fought near Jericho, moſt of Hyrcanus his Souldiers revolted to the other, whereby he was forced to betake himſelf into that Caſtle where Ariſtobulus his wife and children were kept, and he now made his conditions to be ſuffered to live quietly a private life, remitting to his brother the Kingdom and Principality, and changing eſtates with him, he removing into Ariſtobulus his private houſe, and Ariſtobulus to the Court, which covenant was ſolemnly ſworn to, and confirmed in the Temple. But not long did this agreement hold, being broken by the means of Antipater, who being Governour at that time of Idumæa, feared the power of Ariſtobulus, and therefore endeavoured his deſtruction, both by ſtirring up Hyrcanus and the moſt powerful of the Jews againſt him. The fame of Herod Son of this Antipater, cauſeth his original to be more enquired into. Nicolaus Damaſcenus to flatter the ſaid Herod, derived his pedegree from the chief of the Jews, which returned from Babylon; but Joſephus denyeth it, and reports him to have been an Idumæan born. * Others have delivered, that this Antipater, or Antipas, was the Son of one Herod the Prieſt of Apollo's Temple at Aſcalon, which City being invaded by the Idumæan thieves, he was taken with other ſpoils out of the Temple, and whereas his Father was not able to ranſom him, was brought up after the manner of the Idumæans, and became very familiar with Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt. Joſephus ſaith that he was conſtituted Governour of Idumæa by Alexander the King, and his Wife, and then minding his own intereſt, entered into ſociety with the Arabians, Gazæans, and Aſcalonites, having purchaſed their friendſhip with great gifts. He profeſſed to the Jews that it was unjuſt, that Ariſtobulus ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy his uſurped power, from which he had caſt down his elder brother, and had deprived him of the prerogative of his age. The ſame things he often incultated into Hyrcanus, adding withal, that his life was in danger, except he would in good time ſave himſelf by flight, for that the friends of his brother ſtill conſulted, how they might rid him out of the way, and eſtabliſh the Kingdom upon the other.

And procureth him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia.

Joſephus ut prius cap. 3.

Who beſiegeth Jeruſalem.

Idem cap. 4.
A. M. 3941.
Ol. 179. an. 1.
V. c. 690.
Seleucid. 249.
Ariſtob. 6.

14. He being a plain and well-meaning man, gave no great credit to theſe ſlanders; but the other ceaſed not for all that to invent freſh accuſations of Ariſtobulus, as if he lay in wait for his life, and at length hardly obtained of him to flie to Aretas King of the Arabians, becauſe his Country was nigh to Judæa. Antipater went firſt to the King, to get a promiſe from him not to betray him into the hands of his Enemies, which being obtained, he returned to Jeruſalem, and thence not long after taking Hyrcanus out by night, by great journeys came to Petra, where Aretas kept his Court. Being very great with the Arabian, he laboured to perſwade him to reſtore Hyrcanus, and with his importunity and gifts at length prevailed. Hyrcanus alſo promiſing, if by his means he ſhould recover the Kingdom, to reſtore to him that Country with the twelve Towns, which his Father Alexander had taken from him. Aretas being drawn in by theſe promiſes, undertook this Expedition with fifty thouſand men, and overthrew Ariſtobulus, who being firſt forſaken of his followers, who now fled amain to his brother, retired to Jeruſalem, where the Arabian and Hyrcanus beſieged him in the Temple. The Feaſt of the Paſſover hapning during the ſiege, the Prieſts who only remained with Ariſtobulus, that the Sacrifices might not be omitted, bargained with the beſiegers for beaſts to be ſold them for that ſervice, but when they had let down the money from the walls, were derided by them. But this wickedneſs the Hiſtorian obſerveth to have been puniſhed with great ſtorms and tempeſts, which procured extraordinary ſcarcity of Corn. In this mean while Pompey the Great being diverted by the War with Tygranes in Armenia, ſent Scaurus his Quæſtor, as Appian calls him, into Syria, who coming ſtraight to Damaſcus (taken then by Metellus and Lollius) haſted without intermiſſion into Judæa. To him both parties ſent, to deſire his friendſhip and help, but though each promiſed as much as the other (viz. four hundred Talents) yet he cloſed with Ariſtobulus, being counted more free and rich, and whoſe requeſt was more eaſie to be fulfilled, in driving away the Nabathæans, than that of the other, to take the place which he held, being ſo ſtrong both of it ſelf and by defence.

But is beaten off by Scaurus.

15. Taking the money of Ariſtobulus he eaſily raiſed the ſiege, denouncing to Aretas that he ſhould depart, except he would be declared an Enemy of the People of Rome; and then returned to Damaſcus. Ariſtobulus having gotten this advantage againſt his Enemies, followed them with a great Army, and joyning battel overthrew them at a place called Papyron, about ſeven thouſand of them being ſlain, and amongſt the reſt Cephalio the brother of Antipater. But not long after Pompey came to Damaſcus, and going about Cœleſyria, thither were ſent to him Ambaſſadors from ſeveral parts. Ariſtobulus ſent him an excellent preſent, being a golden Urn of the value of five hundred Talents, which afterwards was dedicated by him amongſt other things in the Capitol at Rome. Shortly after were ſent ſome to him from both the brothers; Antipater from Hyrcanus, and one Nicodemus from the other, to whom he anſwered, that coming to Damaſcus he would hear the cauſe. Thither was ſent alſo an Ambaſſage of the Jews themſelves, who declared they were unwilling to live under Kings, it being the cuſtom of their Country to yield obedience to the Prieſt of their God; and that though theſe two were of that race of Prieſts, yet being deſirous to change the Government into another form, they thereby intended to enſlave them. Hyrcanus accuſed his brother of ambition and violence, in that he had gone about to deprive him of his birth-right, and the other excuſed himſelf by the neceſſity of the thing, leſt the Principality ſhould have been transferred into another family by his heavy dulneſs, which rendered him incapable of employment. To Hyrcanus bare witneſs one thouſand Jews which Antipater had brought for that purpoſe, but to Ariſtobulus a Company of effeminate Gallants, ridiculous to all for their fantaſtick bravery. Pompey having heard them, and diſapproved of Ariſtobulus his violence, diſmiſſed them both kindly at preſent, promiſing he would come to them as ſoon as he had inſpected the affairs of the Nabathæans, bidding them be quiet in the mean time, and uſing Ariſtobulus civilly, leſt he ſhould ſtop up the paſſages. But hereby he won nothing upon him, for not expecting his promiſes, he went to Delium, and thence betook himſelf into Judæa.

Idem cap. 5.

Both Brothers ſent to Pompey to complain.

Who ſideth with Hyrcanus.

Idem cap. 6. & de bello lib. 1. cap. 5.

16. Pompey being offended with this carriage of Ariſtobulus, took the Army which he had provided againſt the Nabathæans, and with other ſupplies out of Syria, and the Legions which were at his command, followed him. Coming into Judæa, and hearing he was in a Caſtle near Coreas, he ſent to him to come and ſpeak with him, and he obeyed, being adviſed by thoſe about him to take heed of Warring with the Romans. When he had diſputed the caſe with his brother, he returned to the Caſtle, and ſo he did divers times, deſiring to pleaſe Pompey, and pretending a willingneſs to obey him in all things, but providing ſtill for the War, fearing the Principality might be beſtowed upon Hyrcanus. Pompey in concluſion required him to deliver up into his hands the Garriſons, and write to the Governors of them for that purpoſe; which he obeyed alſo, but then preſently departed to Jeruſalem there to prepare for War. He followed him, and in the way heard how Mithridates of Pontus was killed by his Son Pharnaces. His firſt nights quarters he took up at Jericho, where the Trees grew, that being cut diſtilled with the precious Balſamum; and the next day marching towards Jeruſalem, Ariſtobulus repenting of what he had done, came and met him, offered him money, and referred himſelf to his pleaſure, ſo that omitting War he would order things in a peaceable manner. He pardoning him, ſent Gabinius to Jeruſalem to fetch the money; but he being ſhut out by Ariſtobulus his Souldiers, returned empty handed, which Pompey taking in great diſdain, committed Ariſtobulus to cuſtody, and went himſelf to the City. There were two factions diſagreeing with each other, whereof that of Ariſtobulus brake down the bridge, which went out of the City to the Temple, and therein fortified themſelves, whereupon the other let in the Romans into the City and Palace. Then did Pompey beſiege the Temple, filled up with the great toil of his Souldiers the Ditch before it, and with Engines brought from Tyre battered the Walls, taking occaſion at the ſuperſtition of the Jews, who thought it ſinful to do any thing on the Sabbath-dayes, but defend themſelves. The greateſt Tower being battered down, the Romans broke in (Cornelius Fauſtus the Son of Sylla firſt entering the breach) and then made ſlaughter of twelve thouſand, the Prieſts even

And followeth Ariſtobulus into Judæa.

Lib. 14. cap. 7.

A. M. 3942.

cap. 8.

Beſiegeth his party in the Temple, and taketh it.

then (as they had done all the ſiege) not neglecting to offer ſacrifices, and amongſt the reſt Abſalom the Uncle, and father-in-law of Ariſtobulus was taken, being the youngeſt Son of Hyrcanus. Pompey with many followers entered the Temple, and looked on thoſe things, which it was unlawful for any but the Prieſts to behold; yet touched nothing he ſaw, ſo great was his abſtinency. The Temple was taken as Joſephus tells us, in the third month, and the faſt day, which was kept in memory of Jehoiakim's burning the Roll, in the 179 Olympiad, C. Antonius and M. Tullius Cicero being Conſuls, A. M. 3942. about ſixty two years before the birth of Chriſt.

Idem ibid.
Lib.20.cap.8.*

He reſtoreth the Prieſthood to Hyrcanus forbidding him the Diadem, and carryeth Ariſtobulus and his Sons to Rome.

Idem lib. 14. cap. 10. & de bello lib. 1. cap. 6.

His Son Ariſtobulus eſcapeth, and is defeated by Gabinius, and he himſelf alſo getteth away from Rome.

17. Pompey reſtored the Prieſthood to Hyrcanus, with the Government of the Country, *(forbidding him the wearing of the Diadem) becauſe amongſt ſeveral other ſervices he had done him during the ſiege, he had alſo kept the Countrymen from taking up Arms for Ariſtobulus. Then putting to death the Authors of the Sedition, he made the Jews Tributaries to the people of Rome, the Cities they held in Cœleſyria he took away, and ſubjected them to a Governor of their own, and the whole Nation much elevated then with ſucceſs abroad, he contracted within its own bounds; Ariſtobulus and his brother being the cauſe of all theſe troubles, and of the loſing of the Countries liberty to the Romans, who within a ſhort time exacted above ten thouſand Talents of it. Pompey having left Syria to the Government of Scaurus, with two Legions haſted to Rome, leading Ariſtobulus bound thither, with two Sons, and as many Daughters. One of his Sons eſcaped in the journey, and returned into Judæa, where he got together a conſiderable power, and awed his Uncle Hyrcanus unable to reſiſt him, and who, when now he was about to repair the Walls of Jeruſalem, demoliſhed by Pompey, was forbidden to do it by the Romans. But within a while Gabinius was ſent from Rome to Govern Syria. He undertook the War againſt him, by this time having ten thouſand Foot, and one thouſand and five hundred Horſe at his Command, but notwithſtanding he overthrew him not far from Jeruſalem, killing and taking ſix thouſand of them, and then beſieged him in the Caſtle Alexandrium whither he had fled. Leaving here ſufficient ſtrength for carrying on the ſiege, he went and viſited the Countrey, cauſing divers Cities to be re-edified, and then returning, and more powerfully inforcing the ſiege, Alexander yielded himſelf, and the Caſtles, which by his Mothers advice to Gabinius were demoliſhed, leſt they ſhould nouriſh another War. Gabinius then went to Jeruſalem, and eſtabliſhed Hyrcanus in the Prieſthood, but cantonized the Countrey into five parts, which he ordered to be Governed in an Ariſtocratical way. One diviſion was to be Governed by an Aſſembly at Jeruſalem, another by one at Gadara, a third at Amathus, a fourth at Jericho, and a fifth by one ſitting at Saphora a Town of Samaria. The Jews very gladly embraced this Government. But Ariſtobulus not long after eſcaped from Rome, and coming into Judæa miniſtred occaſion of further trouble.

*Idem ibid. & lib.*14. *cap.*11.
A. M. 3949.
Ol. 181. an. 1.
V. C. 698.
Hyrcani 8.

He is taken and ſent back by Gabinius.

Alexander his Son ſtirreth, but is defeated.

18. Coming into his own Countrey, he preſently found ſome who out of deſire of innovation ſided with him, amongſt the which was Pitholaus the Governor of Jeruſalem, who revolted to him with one thouſand men. He firſt ſeized upon Alexandrium, and went about to re-edifie the Walls thereof, but knowing that Gabinius had ſent againſt him three of his Officers, he departed toward Machærus, diſmiſſing the unarmed multitude, and making a choice of eight thouſand men. The Romans following he gave them battel, in which he fought ſtoutly, till his men being overpowered, five thouſand of them were ſlain upon the place, almoſt two thouſand fled to an Hill not far of, and a thouſand with him, brake through the Enemy to Machærus. There he thought to renew the War having fortified the place, but being beſieged, and holding it out two days, he could no longer withſtand, but was taken, and together with his Son Ariſtobulus, (who it ſeems got away with him) ſent back to Rome, where he was more narrowly looked to, but his Sons, becauſe Gabinius had ſo agreed with their Mother, in conſideration of the delivering up of the Caſtles formerly mentioned, were ſent back by the Senate. Then prepared Gabinius an expedition againſt the Parthians, but paſſing over Euphrates, was hired by Ptolomy Auletes to reduce him into his Kingdom, as we ſaid in the foregoing Chapter. In this voyage he made uſe of Hyrcanus, and eſpecially Antipater, who furniſhed him with ſupplies, both of men and proviſions, and prevailed with the Jews, inhabiting about Peluſium, to give him paſſage. But during his abſence Alexander the Son of Ariſtobulus made work enough for him after his return; for having gotten together a great multitude of Jews, he reſolved to cut off all the Romans that inhabited thoſe parts. Gabinius ſent Antipater before to ſee if he could perſwade the people to be quiet, and he effected it with many; but thirty thouſand remaining ſtill with Alexander, he came out and gave battel to the Romans, near the the Mountain Itabyrius, wherein he loſt ten thouſand men. Gabinius victoriouſly thence marched to Jeruſalem, where ſetling things according to the pleaſure of Antipater, he went againſt the Nabatæans whom he overthrew in one battel, and diſmiſſed Mithridates and Orſanes, two noble Parthians who had fled unto him, pretending an eſcape. Then returning to Rome, he left his Province to Craſſus his Succeſſor.

Cap. 12.

Craſſus his ſacrilege and puniſhment.

19, Craſſus intending an expedition againſt the Parthians, came through that Countrey, and ſpoyled the Temple not only of thoſe two thouſand Talents which Pompey had ſpared, but of all the Gold found there beſides, which amounted to the ſum of eight thouſand Talents more, though Eleazar the Treaſurer had given him a beam of Gold weighing nine hundred pounds, and he had taken an Oath therewith to be ſatisfied, and abſtain from the money. But going againſt the Parthians, he received the reward of his Sacriledge and Perjury, being ſlain. Caſſius flying into Syria defended it from the incurſions of the Enemy, and being come to Tyre viſited alſo Judæa, where at the firſt onſet he took Tarichæas, and therein thirty thouſand Captives, which he led away and ſlew Pitholaus the favourer of Ariſtobulus at the deſire of Antipater, who now grew very conſiderable, having entered into Confederacy and Alliance with ſeveral Princes, and eſpecially with the Arabian, out of whoſe Countrey he had Marryed a Wiſe of noble extraction, by name Cypris, by whom he had four Sons, Phaſaelus, Herod, Joſeph, and Pheroras, and a Daughter named Salome, which Sons he alſo ſent into Arabia, there to be kept whilſt he was ingaged in the War with Ariſtobulus. When Pompey was driven beyond the Ionian Sea, and Cæſar had got Rome into his power, he ſet Ariſtobulus at liberty, and with two Legions ſent him back into Syria, hoping that all that Countrey, and round about Judæa, might be brought under by him; but he was prevented in his journey, being poyſoned by thoſe of Pompey's party, and lay in his own Countrey for ſome time unburied, being Embalmed, till by Antony he was ſent to be buried in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtors. This expedition proved fatal, not only to himſelf, but his Son Alexander alſo, who was beheaded by Scipio at Antioch, by order from Pompey, being firſt arraigned before the judgment ſeat for his offences committed againſt the Romans. His Brother Antigonus with his Siſters were ſent for by Ptolomy, the Son of Minnæus (who held Chalcis under the Mountain Libanus) and courteouſly entertained. For Philippio his Son being his Meſſenger, fell in Love with one of the Siſters, named Alexandra, and Marryed her, but the paſſion of Ptolomy overcoming both reaſon and nature, he killed his Son, and took the Lady to himſelf. By this time Pompey was ſlain; and then Antipater betook himſelf to Cæſar, as his intereſt led him, and by his great induſtry purchaſed his favour.

Cap. 13. & de bello ut prius cap. 7.

Ariſtobulus poyſoned by Pompeys party, and his Son Alexander beheaded.

A. M. 3957. Ol. 183. an. 1. V. C. 706. Hyrcani 16.

Idem ibid. & lib. 14. cap. 14.

20. Cæſar Warring with young Ptolomy in Ægypt, after the death of Pompey, Antipater joyned with Mithridates of Pergamus, who went down thither with ſupplies; for whereas being hindred from coming to Peluſium, he was forced to ſtay about Aſcalon, he perſwaded the Arabians to help him, brought a ſupply of three thouſand Jews himſelf, and procured divers Princes in Syria, as Ptolomy of Libanus, Jamblichus, and others, to ſend their men. Then at Peluſium did he ſpecial ſervice, being the firſt that broke down the wall and entered; and whereas the Jews inhabiting the Countrey of Onias hindered them from going any further, he prevailed with them not to oppoſe, and more than that to furniſh the Army with Proviſions. At Delta he recovered the battel almoſt loſt by Mithridates, and afterwards behaved himſelf very gallantly for Cæſar, having received many wounds as the tokens of his valour. Some have delivered that Hyrcanus himſelf went down into Ægypt, and there deſerved well of Cæſar, but whether it was ſo or not he endeavoured to requite them both. For, Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus coming with a great complaint to him againſt them (whereas rather in policy he ſhould have complained of the putting to death his Father and Brother through the procurement of Pompey and his faction) he declined his requeſts upon the reply of Antipater, confirmed Hyrcanus in the Prieſt-hood, offered to Antipater what Government he would deſire, and made him Procurator of Judæa, gave him leave to rebuild the Walls of the City thrown down by Pompey, and cauſed theſe grants to be regiſtred in the Capitol, and ſeconded them with divers decrees, both of himſelf and the Senate in favour of him and the Jews. Antipater then bringing Cæſar on his journey as far as the borders of Syria, returned and built up the Walls, and going about the Countrey, by threatnings and other policy, contained the People in obedience, otherwiſe ready to rebel. And whereas he ſaw Hyrcanus heavy and dull, and Antipater his great ſervices for Cæſar.

Cap. 15. A. M. 3958. Ol. 183. ann. 2. V. C. 707. Hyrcani 17.

Who rewardeth both him and Hyrcanus.

De bello ut prius cap. 8. & lib. 14. Cap. 16, 17.

A. M. 3959.
Ol. 183. an. 3.
V. C. 708.
Hyrcani 18.

and unfit to manage the affairs of Government, he made his Son Phaſaelus (who alſo commanded the Army) Captain of Jeruſalem, and the Country adjacent, and committed Galile to the cuſtody of his ſecond Son Herod, being now extream young, as not exceeding fifteen years, as our Author telleth us, except, as is moſt probable, that number be miſtaken for twenty five.

Herod the Son of Antipater his notable forwardneſs.

A. M. 3961.
Ol. 184. an. 1.
V. C. 710.
Hyrcani 20.
C. Jul. Cæſare 5.
M. Antonio
Coſſ.

21. Herod at the very firſt gave teſtimony of what ſpirit and height of courage he would be, finding out preſently occaſion for the exerciſe of it. For at that time there being one Ezechias a notable Thief, who with a great company of followers uſed to infeſt the Country of Syria, he took and ſlew him with many others of that rout, which thing ſo endeared him to the Syrians, that his name was ſung throughout the Towns and Villages, Peace being by his means reſtored, as it were, unto the Country, and the People unto their poſſeſſions; and thereby became he known to Sextus Cæſar the Preſident, and kinſman to the Dictator. Phaſaelus his Brother was hereby much ſtirred up to emulation, and moſt courteouſly behaved himſelf to thoſe of Jeruſalem, ſo that their Father was honoured by the People like a King, and yet notwithſtanding preſerved his fidelity intire to Hyrcanus. But divers of the chief of the Jewiſh Nation, underſtanding how he flouriſhed both upon his own account and that of his Sons, inwardly fretted thereat, and the rather, becauſe he made uſe of Hyrcanus for his own ends, as they conceived, having contracted friendſhip with the great ones, and Rome, and perſwaded him to ſend them money, yet procuring to himſelf the credit and profit of the gifts. But eſpecially the forward and bold diſpoſition of Herod affrighted them, whom they looked upon as a young and growing Tyrant, and therefore they grievouſly enveighed againſt Antipater to Hyrcanus, as one who carryed away all the profit of the Kingdom, an empty name being only left to himſelf, and laboured to bring him into ſuſpicion, hinting that ere long the vizard would be taken off, and he would dearly pay for the negligence of his own affairs. This they enforced by that bold act of Herod's killing Ezechias, and the reſt, in contempt of the Laws, which ſuffer no man, how wicked ſoever, to be put to death, till he firſt be caſt by the ſentence of his Judges. Hyrcanus though ſlow enough to believe any thing, yet having theſe things often ſounding in his ears, together with the lamentations of the Mothers of thoſe that were ſlain, grew ſomething moved, and ſummoned Herod up to Jeruſalem, to give an account of his actions before the Judges.

He is ſummoned to Jeruſalem to anſwer for killing Ezechias a thief.

Idem ibid.
Ant. et de bello.

22. Herod having ſetled the affairs of Galile, appeared, but with a guard, as his Father had written to him; yet with a moderate one, leſt taking care for his own ſafety, he ſhould affright Hyrcanus. Sextus Cæſar hearing of it, with threats wrote to Hyrcanus to quit him, which he was inclinable enough unto, loving him as his own Son; and when he appeared to anſwer, no body durſt accuſe him, except one Sameas bolder than the reſt, who inveighed againſt him for the manner of his appearance, not ſuitable at all to humility or guilt. The meeting being encouraged by his words, had certainly condemned him, had not Hyrcanus foreſeen it, and ſent him out of the way on purpoſe, having put off the determination to the next day. Herod retired therefore to Damaſcus, and afterwards viſiting Sextus Cæſar, and ſetling his affairs, plainly gave out, that he would no more appear though he were cited, at which they at Jeruſalem fretted, and ſought to perſwade Hyrcanus that all this tended to his ruin, and indeed he was convinced of it, yet could he do nothing, for that innate dulneſs which evermore accompanied him, though ſhortly after hearing that Herod had purchaſed of that Cæſar the Government of Cœleſyria, he feared he would imploy his power againſt him. And indeed ſo it hapned; for diſdaining now that he had been commanded to come and plead his cauſe, he marched towards Jeruſalem with an Army, and if his Father and Brother had not met him, and ſhewed him the uncertainty of the event of War, and that he was rather beholding to Hyrcanus for diſcharging him, than had reaſon to be angry with him, for being as it were forced by others to ſummon him up, he had made miſchief enough: But being prevailed with by them, he thought it was ſufficient for him to have made a ſhew of his power, and ſo retreated. About this time Cæcilius Baſſus in favour of Pompey made away Sextus Cæſar, and got his Army to ſubmit to him; but divers of Cæſars party reſolved to revenge his kinſman's death, and a War enſued about Apamea, whither Antipater, mindful of the benefits received from Cæſar, ſent his Sons with aid unto his Captains. The War being drawn out in length, Marcus, (or rather L. Statius Murcus) was ſent to ſucceed Sextus, and in the mean time Julius Cæſar was ſlain in the Senate houſe, which as it bred diſturbance and trouble to the whole Roman Empire, ſo neither did Judæa eſcape without its portion thereof.

He appeareth, but with a guard,

And had done miſchief but that his father and brother diverted him.

Appian de bello civili. lib. 3.
Paterc. lib. 2.
cap. 69.

23. A

Joſephus Antiquit. l. 14. c. 18, & 19. & de bello l. 1. c. 9.

23. A civil War following and the chief Captains on both ſides running up and down to provide themſelves for it, Caſſius one of the conſpirators came into Syria, where raiſing the ſiege at Apamia, he drew both Murcus and Baſſus to his own party, and then conquering the Country, levied men, and exacted grievous contributions: But eſpecially he afflicted Judæa, laying a taxe of above ſeven hundred Talents of Silver upon it. Antipater committed the raiſing of the money to his two Sons and others, whereof Herod firſt of all raiſed that which was impoſed upon Galile, and brought it, thinking it good policy to purchaſe the favour of the Romans at the coſt of others. Divers Cities with their Inhabitants were ſold to make up the ſum, amongſt which the principal were, Gophna, Emaus, Lydia, and Thamna; and Caſſius having done this, was further ſo inraged, that he had ſlain Malichus alſo one of the Collectors, had not Hyrcanus by the means of Antipater, ſtopped his mouth with one hundred Talents of his own money. But Antipater was badly rewarded by Malichus, for after the departure of Caſſius he lay in wait for his life, thinking, that he being removed out of the way, the greater ſecurity would happen to the affairs of Hyrcanus. Antipater getting knowledge of his intention, paſſed over Jordan, to provide himſelf to revenge this treachery, but he being a moſt crafty diſſembler, ſo denyed the matter with Oaths to his two Sons, that they reconciled him to their Father, who by his interceſſion then ſaved him, when Murcus the Preſident of Syria upon the report of his attempting new matters, had reſolved his death. But he preſerved him to his own deſtruction. For, his Son Herod for his good ſervice being made Procurator of Syria by Caſſius, with promiſe alſo of the Kingdom of Judæa, if he got the better, Malichus then ſo feared him, that he reſolved to make him away, which within a ſhort time he effected, procuring him to be poyſoned by Hyrcanus his Brother, and getting a Company of Souldiers to him, invaded the Government of the City. This was the end of Antipater, a right good man, a great States-man, and one who had preſerved his fidelity to his Prince, and his care to his Country, before his own private or ambitious deſigns.

Grievous exactions by Caſſius.

A. M. 3962. Ol. 184. an. 2. V. C. 711. Hyrcani 21.

Antipater poyſoned by Malichus.

Idem ibid.

24. His Sons having knowledge of his death, Herod would have revenged it out of hand, and by open force, but Phaſaelus thought good rather to circumvent the murderer by ſome way of his own, leſt a Civil War ſhould happen, and therefore ſeemed to be ſatisfied with Malichus his flat denial of the thing, and ſet himſelf about building of a monument for his Father. Herod viſiting Samaria, and ſeeing it much out of order, laboured what he might to cheriſh it, and ſate in Judgement, deciding the controverſies of the People, and then preſently came up to Jeruſalem to the Feaſt with a Company of Souldiers at his heels. Malichus being exceedingly afraid of his coming, perſwaded Hyrcanus not to permit him to enter, and he accordingly forbad him to approach ſo holy a ſolemnity with a prophane rout of ſtrangers; but he notwithſtanding this, got in by night, and ſo affrighted Malichus that he betook him to his old trade of diſſembling, weeping to him bitterly for the death of Antipater as his kind friend, yet in the mean time providing himſelf of a guard, ſo that for a time it was thought fit by Herods friends, not to evince his deceit, but for the ſhunning of ſuſpition to treat him fairly; yet did he ſignifie by Letters his Fathers death to Caſſius, who willed him again to revenge it, and gave order to the Tribunes then lying at Tyre to aſſiſt him in his juſt endeavours. Caſſius not long after having taken Laodicea, they went and carryed him crowns and money, and then Herod thought to be even with him; but he ſuſpecting ſomething at Tyre, out of deſperation caſt higher matters than ever in his head. For his Son being kept hoſtage in that City, he reſolved to go in, and carry him out by ſtealth into Judæa, and then, when Caſſius ſhould be ingaged in the War againſt Antony, to ſollicit that Country to revolt, and get to himſelf the Principality, and caſt out Hyrcanus. But the cunning of Herod prevented him, who being aware of his project, invited him and Hyrcanus to ſupper, and then ſent to the Tribunes to come out to meet him, who remembring the commands of Caſſius, encountering him on the ſhoar, ſlew him there. Hyrcanus was ſo aſtoniſhed with fear at the fact, that he was not himſelf, and ſcarcely recovering his ſenſe, asked Herod who had ſlain Malichus; to whom one of the Tribunes anſwered, the command of Caſſius, at which he replyed, that Caſſius had preſerved both him and his Country, by cutring off him that had plotted the deſtruction of both. Whether he ſpake this ſeriouſly, or approved the thing out of fear, is uncertain; but thus Herod revenged his Fathers death upou Malichus.

Antiq. ut prius cap. 20.

His Son Herod revengeth his death,

25. Caſſius being gone out of Syria, there hapned a great ſtir at Jeruſalem by means

Idem ibid. & de bello lib. 1. c. 10.

Falleth ſick,

Antiquit. l. 14. cap. 21.

His acts after his recovery.

means of Fœlix, who being left there Commander, the Souldiers attempted violence upon Phaſaelus, intending by his death to revenge that of Malichus upon his Brother Herod. It hapned that at that time Herod living at Damaſcus with Fabius the Roman Captain, was ſick, and unable to come and help his Brother, but he by himſelf was too hard for Fœlix, and forced him into a Tower, whence he let him go with his life, and then expoſtulated much with Hyrcanus, objecting ingratitude to him for taking Fœlix his part, and ſuffering the Brother of Malichus to ſeize upon divers Caſtles; for now he held many, and Maſſada amongſt the reſt, the ſtrongeſt of all. But Herod after his recovery regained them all from him, ſuffering him to depart quietly out of Maſſada upon his deſire. Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus about this time ſo bribed Fabius, that he ſuffered him to get himſelf an Army, and Ptolomy Minnæus becauſe of the former affinity betwixt them, made him his Son in Law, Marion alſo, who by Caſſius his means had ſubjected Tyre, and divers places of Syria, came in to his help, having ſeized upon three Caſtles in Galile, but Herod alſo going againſt them, had them all ſurrendred by the Tyrians whom he diſmiſſed very graciouſly, out of reſpect to their City, and then marched againſt Antigonus, whom being ſcarcely entred the Coaſts of Judæa he overthrew. Returning to Jeruſalem he was received very honourably, not only by the People, but Hyrcanus alſo, who had of late received him into his family, contracting him to Mariamne the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Ariſtobulus, and his own niece by his Daughter; by which Wife he was made a Father of three Sons and two Daughters, having on a former Wife (and his own Country-woman) named Doris, begotten Antipater his eldeſt Son. But now within a while Caſſius and Brutus were overthrown at Philippi by Cæſar and Antony, of whom the former returning into Italy, the other came over into Aſia, which gave occaſion to new ſtirs in Judæa.

Cap. 22.

Stirs in Judæa upon the approach of Antony.

Cap. 23.

Which end in the promotion of Herod, and his Brother Phaſaelus.

26. Antony being come into Bithynia, Ambaſſadors were ſent to him thither from all Countries, and amongſt the reſt came ſome from the chief of the Jews, to complain of Phaſaelus and Herod, who uſurped, as they ſaid, all the power, an empty title being only left to Hyrcanus. Herod went to defend himſelf, and ſo prevailed with his Money, that his accuſers were never heard. Antony having reached Epheſus, an Ambaſſie was diſpatched to him in the name of Hyrcanus, and the whole Nation, deſiring that all Captives which Caſſius had carryed away out of Judæa, might be ſet at liberty by his Letters publiſhed throughout the Province, which he readily granted out, and as he was travelling into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Cilicia, to whoſe allurements wholly giving up himſelf, at the ſame time came one hundred of the moſt conſiderable of the Jews to complain again of the two Brothers, whom Meſſala defended, and Hyrcanus himſelf ſtood by to aſſiſt. Their cauſe being heard at Daphne, Antony demanded of Hyrcanus whether part was fitter to Govern, who anſwering in commendation of Herod, he, who formerly loved the young men for their Fathers ſake with whom he had contracted familiarity when he ſerved in Ægypt under Gabinius, conſtituted them both Tetrarchs, and committed to them the Government of the Jews. To this purpoſe he wrote Letters, and caſt fifteen of their adverſaries into priſon, and had put them to death, had not Herods interceſſion prevailed for them; and yet were they not diſcouraged ſo as to deſiſt. For inſtead of one hundred, a thouſand returned in Ambaſſage, and ſtayed for him at Tyre, but his favour being further purchaſed by the two Brothers, he commanded the Magiſtrate of that place to animadvert upon them, and aſſiſt Herod in obtaining the principality. Herod going to them as they ſtood before the City on the ſhoar, adviſed them to withdraw themſelves, and Hyrcanus alſo laid before them in how great danger they were if they ſhould go on in their purpoſe: But they contemning their advice were preſently fall'n upon out of the Town by their own Country-men and the Inhabitants, and part of them being ſlain, and ſome taken, the reſt returned. And the people clamouring exceedingly againſt Herod, Antony was ſo far incenſed, as he cauſed thoſe whom he had before committed to cuſtody to be ſlain.

Idem de bello ut prius cap. 11. & Antiquit. cap. 24.

27. A year or two after, Pacorus Son to the King of Parthia, and Barzapharnes, one of his great Officers, ſeized upon Syria, at ſuch time as Ptolomy Mennæus dying, Lyſanias his Son ſucceeded him. Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus bargained with the Parthians for one thouſand Talents, and five hundred women, to ſettle him in the Kingdom of Judæa, and kill Herod with his friends, and though he could not perform the conditions, yet lead they down an Army to re-eſtabliſh him. Pacorus came down to the Sea-Coaſts, where he was excluded by the Tyrians; but they of Sidon and Ptolemais giving him entrance, he ſent a party of Horſe under the conduct of one Pacorus the Kings Butler into Judæa to make diſcoveries, and if it could be, to help Antigonus, with whom the Jews inhabiting Carmel joyning, he hoped by this force to ſeize upon a part of the Country called Drymæ, and divers ſtill coming in pierced to Jeruſalem. The number ſtill increaſing, they attempted the Palace, but the two Brothers with their friends oppoſing themſelves, beat them back into the Temple, and then ſent ſome Souldiers into certain houſes near adjoyning to defend them, which the people taking notice of, ſet them on fire, and therein burnt them alive, being unable to ſhift for themſelves; which injury Herod a little after revenged upon his adverſaries, of whom he ſlew many upon a Sally. Daily skirmiſhes thence inſued, Antigonus his party ſtaying for the feaſt of Pentecoſt, expecting then a great multitude of people to come up from all parts, and accordingly at the day many thouſands being aſſembled, what with Arms, and what without, they overran all, except the Palace which ſtill Herod and his Brother Phaſaelus kept with a few Souldiers, with whom alſo iſſuing out into the Suburbs, having there fought moſt manfully, he put many thouſands to flight. Shortly after, Antigonus procured Pacorus the Parthian with a few horſe-men to enter Jeruſalem, under pretence of compoſing the difference, but indeed to eſtabliſh him in the power, who being kindly met by Phaſaelus, and entertained, he perſwaded him to go in Ambaſſage to Barzapharnes, thereby intending to entrap him. He ſuſpecting nothing, went contrary to the mind of his Brother, who adviſed him rather to deſtroy the perfidious Barbarians, and with him went alſo Hyrcanus (an unheard-of imployment for the Prince himſelf) under conduct of Pacorus.

The Parthians procured by Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus invade Judæa.

Hyrconus and Phaſelus going in ambaſſage to Barzaphantes are perfidiouſly captivated.

Herod beſieged at Jeruſalem getteth forth.

28. As ſoon as they came into Galile, they were met by the Governors of the Towns there, and Barzapharnes entertained them very civilly, and gave them gifts, but preſently ſought how he might entrap them. Phaſelus was lodged with his Train near the Sea, where hearing that Antigonus had made ſuch a bargain with the Parthians, as is above related, began to ſuſpect them, and then he had alſo intelligence, that they would be laid in wait for by night, and be privately ſecured; and certainly they had been taken ere now, but that there was great expectation, that the Parthians which Pacorus had left at Jeruſalem, ſhould take Herod, and thereupon the thing was deferred, leſt coming to his ears, he ſhould have notice of their Treachery, and thereby eſcape it. Shortly after, his fears were confirmed when he ſaw a Guard coming to ſecure him, whereupon there were not wanting ſome that adviſed him to mount, and ſave himſelf by flight, eſpecially one Ofilius, who had the ſecret revealed to him by Saramalla the moſt wealthy amongſt the Syrians, who now alſo voluntarily offered him ſhips to ſave himſelf. But he refuſed to forſake Hyrcanus and his Brother, and going to Barzapharnes, blamed him for harbouring ſuch deſigns, told him, if he wanted money, he might have more from him than Antigonus, and how baſe a thing it was to betray Ambaſſadors, innocent, and who had been drawn out upon the ſcore of his own faith. The Parthian ſwore there was no ſuch matter, and that he troubled himſelf with vain ſuſpitions, and preſently got him out to Pacorus; but he being gone, ſtraightway hands were laid on Hyrcanus, and Phaſelus, in vain upbraiding the Barbarians with perjury; an Eunuch alſo was diſpatched to Jeruſalem to get Herod by ſome means or other out of the Walls, and apprehend him. Phaſelus had ſent to make known his condition to him, but the Meſſengers were intercepted, which he having knowledge of, had a conference with the Chief of the Parthians then at Jeruſalem, who by all means laboured to get him out of the Palace. But he ſuſpecting them, and giving no credit at all to their words, preſently heard for certain of his Brothers Captivity, and ſeeing them in doubt what to do againſt him, reſolved to ſhift for himſelf, and taking the opportunity of the evening, departed with his relations that night, unknown to the Enemy.

A.M. 3965.
Ol. 185. an. 1.
V. C. 714.
Hyrcani 24.
Ante Chriſtum 38.
Cn. Domitio Calvino 2.
C. Aſinio Pollione Coſſ.

Cap. 25.

He goeth through Idumæa to Petra in Arabia for aid.

29. He travelled towards Idumæa, whither at length he came to Maſſada the Caſtle; but as his departure was ſad, ſo his journey was as dangerous, being purſued by the Parthians, whom following behind his Train he kept off, and was oppoſed alſo more violently by the Jews, over whom yet he got a victory, and afterwards in memorial of it built a ſumptuous Palace in the ſame place. Once his Mothers Litter was overturned in the way, with which ſhe being brought into danger of death, and he fearing the Enemy might overtake them, he drew out his ſword to kill himſelf, and had done it, but that the next to him interpoſing themſelves hindred it, ſhewing him how it was not the part of a valiant man to forſake others, by ſetting himſelf at liberty, as they termed it. After he came to the Borders of Judæa, dæa, his Brother Joſeph met him, and perſwaded him to diſmiſs the moſt of his followers, becauſe the Caſtle could not harbour them, which he did to the number of nine thouſand and above, giving them money to bear their charges, and taking the ableſt Souldiers, whom he had culled out from amongſt the reſt, with his relations, to the number of eight hundred, he marched on to Maſſada, and there placed them, where no ſort of Proviſions was wanting; but he himſelf held on for Petra in Arabia, hoping of that King, who was ſuch a friend of his Fathers, to obtain help for the recovery of his Brothers liberty. But the Parthians after his departure from Jeruſalem plundred the City and Palace, and waſted the Country, in which they deſtroyed Mariſa a wealthy Town, and ſo reducing Antigonus into Judæa, delivered up Hyrcauus and Phaſelus into his hands, who was grievouſly troubled that the women had eſcaped, which he intended together with the money to have given to the Parthians.

Antigonus having received Hyrcanus and Phaſelus, depriveth the former of his ears, and Phaſelus daſheth out his own brains.

30. Then fearing that Hyrcanus by the favour of the people might again be reſtored to the Kingdom, he either cut or bit off his ears, making him thereby uncapable of the Prieſthood, which by the Law was not given, but to one of an entire body. But Phaſelus knowing he was deſtined to death, for that he could not otherwiſe kill himſelf for his bonds, daſhed out his brains againſt a ſtone. It was reported, that being grievouſly wounded in his head, Antigonus cauſed poyſon to be put into it inſtead of ſalve; and that he hearing before his death that his brother Herod had eſcaped, underwent it cheerfully, as leaving behind him a revenger of it. And he certainly knowing nothing thereof, laboured exceedingly to prevent it, going to Malchus the Arabian, whom he knew to be obliged to his family, hoping of him to get money, either upon free gift or truſt, and reſolving to give three hundred Talents for his brothers Ranſom, whoſe Son alſo a Child of ſeven years old he carryed with him to leave as a pledge. But the Arabian being perſwaded by his great ones to retain the money owing, with the goods which Antipater had depoſited with him, ſent ſome to meet him, and command him to depart from his borders, and after he was gone repented of what he had done, and ſent after him, but too late. For he was now almoſt got into Ægypt, hearing of his Brothers death in the way, where Cleopatra kindly entertained him, intending to uſe him in her Wars; but nothing could hinder him from haſting to Rome, though in the Winter ſeaſon, and though great ſtirs were reported to be in Italy, whither alſo he came, though with great danger, for the difficulty of Navigation.

Being rejected by the Arabian, he goeth to Rome.

31. He came thither when not long before there had been an agreement made betwixt Antony and Cæſar the Triumvirs (the former having marryed Octavia ſiſter to the later) and another betwixt them two and young Pompey, who then held Sicily, which was a time convenient enough for his affairs. He made his application to Antony, of whoſe favour he had formerly taſted, recounting to him the whole ſtory of the Parthians overrunning Judæa, of his brothers death, and the miſery of his family now beſieged in a Caſtle, and how through theſe Tempeſts both at Sea and Land, he had ventured to come to him as his only harbour and refuge; and withal he was not ſparing in offering money to him, in caſe he could procure him to be declared King of Judæa. Pity wrought ſomething with Antony (being backed with the memory of that friendſhip which had paſſed betwixt Antipater and himſelf) the money more, and to theſe being ſuperadded an hatred of Antigonus, whom he accounted a turbulent man, and one that bore a mind full of hatred towards the Romans, he much inclined to favour him. Cæſar alſo, partly for that Antipater had done good ſervice for his adoptive Father in Ægypt, and becauſe he was willing to gratifie Antony, was ready to do him all good Offices, being alſo inclined to favour him out of a particular fancy he had to the man for his courage. The Senate therefore being called, firſt Meſſala, and then Atratonius commended him to them, relating his Fathers, and then his own merits towards the Commonwealth; and withall they accuſed Antigonus, and inveighed againſt him as an Enemy, for that he had not only born himſelf as ſuch heretofore, but now of late in the calling in of the Parthians. Herewith the Senate being offended, Antony then declared to them that it would much conduce to the carrying on of the Parthian War, which was now depending, if Herod ſhould be King; ſo that without any more to do, he was ſo declared by unanimous conſent, and then being accompanied into the Capitol by Cæſar and Antony on each hand, the Conſuls going before, there ſacrifized, and according to the cuſtom, laying up the decree of the Senate, was feaſted by Antony. Thus obtained he the Kingdom with the wonder of himſelf as well as others, through the eſpecial friendſhip of Antony, having

Cap. 26.

Where to the wonder both of himſelf and others, he is declared King of Judæa.

ing ever ſeared that the Romans would never conſent he ſhould have that honour which was not wont to be beſtowed, but upon a Royal race, and therefore he intended to have ſued for it, not for himſelf but for Alexander, Brother to Mariamne his Wife; and this increaſed the wonder, that within ſeven days he ſhould be diſpatched and diſmiſſed out of Italy. But thus obtained he the Sovereignty of Judæa, A. M. 3965. in the firſt of the 185 Olympiad, Domitius Calvinus the ſecond time, and C. Aſinius Pollio being Conſuls, ſome thirty ſeven years before the birth of Chriſt.

A. M. 3965.

32. During his abſence, Antigonus laid cloſe ſiege to the Caſtle of Maſſada, where he left his relations, abounding with all ſorts of proviſions; only water was wanting; ſo that Joſeph had thoughts of flying with two hundred men into Arabia, the King whereof he had now heard to have repented of the rejecting of his brother. But this was prevented by a ſhower which fell by night, as if ſent on purpoſe from Heaven for their relief, whereupon they were ſo heartned, as to ſally out upon the beſiegers, whereof they cut off many. In the mean while Ventus the Roman General being ſent into Syria to expel the Parthians thence, after their retreat, came into Judæa, pretending to help Joſeph, but indeed with intention to fleece Antigonus of a round ſum of money, and this he did, pitching his tents nigh to Jeruſalem, which being done, he drew off the greater part of his forces, and left Silo with a party behind him, leſt the fraud ſhould be underſtood, whom Antigonus was alſo to pacifie till ſuch time as the Parthians could come to help him. But in the mean time Herod landed at Ptolemais, and having got together no mean company, haſted through Galile againſt him. To Silo and Ventidius Antony had ſent expreſs order by Gellius, to place him in the Kingdom. Ventidius was then buſie in compoſing differences amongſt the Cities, which the incurſion of the Parthians had made: Silo was in Judæa, but corrupted by Antigonus. Yet Herods forces increaſing, he marched towards Maſſada to relieve his friends, which he accompliſhed, having firſt taken Joppe in his way, notwithſtanding the lying in wait againſt him by Antigonus, after which having taken in alſo the Caſtle Reſſa, he went up to Jeruſalem, accompanied by Silo's Souldiers, and many Citizens affrighted at his power. Laying ſiege to the City, both he and Antigonus laboured to draw over the contrary parties to themſelves, and though Herod could not at all move the Townſmen, yet it appeared that Silo was corrupted; for he cauſed ſome of his Souldiers to begin a mutiny, requiring to be led into a place more plentyfull of proviſions, which Antigonus had all cut off; but Herod took ſuch care for the bringing in of new, that his plot was fruſtrated, and taking out a party of ten Companies (half Jews and half Romans) went and took Jericho, forſaken of its Inhabitants, which he left to be rifled by the Romans. Then returning, he ſent down the reſt of their Army into their Winter quarters, which he appointed in Idumæa, Galile, and Samaria. Antigonus alſo obtained of Silo to have part of his men received into Lydda, thereby endeavouring to curry favour with Antony; ſo that the Romans lay idle all this ſeaſon in places abounding with all neceſſaries.

Joſephus de bello l. 1. c. 12.

Idem Antiq. l. 14. c. 27.
A. M. 3966.

He beſiegeth Jeruſalem.

33. Herod was not idle, but ſending his Brother Joſeph into Idumæa with one thouſand Foot and four hundred Horſe, went down into Galile to reduce ſome places there held by Antigonus; and within a ſhort while brought all the Country into obedience, except thoſe men that lurked in caves, and then dividing to his Souldiers one hundred and fifty drachmes a man, placed them alſo in their Winter quarters. Silo a little after came to him, being caſt off by Antigonus, who had ordered the Inhabitants to take all neceſſaries with them, and flie into the mountains, that ſo the Romans might be ſtarved. Ventidius being now ingaged in Syria againſt the Parthians, ſent to Silo to come to him when he had with Herod finiſhed the War. But Herod having no confidence in him, diſmiſſed him beforehand, and went himſelf againſt the Thieves, who dwelling in caves with their families in craggy and inacceſſible rocks, he was fain to invent certain cages, which being let down to the ſides of the rocks full of Armed men, either ſlew them or tumbled them down headlong out of their holes, or elſe burnt them within, and by this means he ſubdued them all. Then placing Ptolomy over that Country, he marched into Samaria, but was preſently forced to return, for Ptolomy being ſet upon by thoſe who formerly had diſturbed Galile, was ſlain, and then they betook themſelves into the fens and inacceſſible places, and thence making excurſions, robbed all the Coaſts thereabouts; but Herod returning puniſhed them, pulled down their places of ſtrength, and fined the Cities one hundred Talents. In the mean while Ventidius having ſlain Pacorus, and put the Parthians to flight, by Antonius his command ſent Machæras to help Herod, with two Legions, and one thouſand Horſe; but he being corrupted alſo by Antigonus, would needs go to him as a ſpie againſt Herods will; Yet when he went could not be received, but was laid at with darts, ſo that repenting he had not followed Herods advice, he went and ſecured himſelf in Emaus, killing all the Jews that came in his way, without any difference of friend or Enemy, out of madneſs for what had hapned unto him. Herod being hereat enraged, reſolved to go and complain to Antony, but he entreated him to ſtay, or if he went, however to leave Joſeph with him to carry on the War againſt Antigonus, which later he granted, yet charging his Brother not to venture all, nor contend with Machæras. Then haſted he to Samoſata upon the River Euphrates, before which Antony then lay, leading Auxiliaries with him both Horſe and Foot. At Antioch he met with many, that having a deſign to go thither, durſt not for the Barbarians, who lying in the wayes, made great ſlaughters of travellers, but he taking the conduct of them upon him, ſtoutly defended them againſt the violence of the Robbers, and with great credit for his valour ſafely arrived at the Camp of Antony.

Goeth to Antony.

A. M. 3967.

34. Antony to do him honour, ſent out an Army to meet him, with great praiſes and embraces received him at the Camp, and gave him great reſpect, as a King of his own ſetting up. Shortly after his arrival Antiochus yielded up the place, and then Antony committing the Province to Soſius, and commending to him the affairs of Herod, went away back into Ægypt. In the mean while Joſeph neglecting his Brothers Counſel, was ſlain in Judæa, and great innovations followed in that place and in Galile; which Herod underſtanding, being ſent before by Soſius with two Legions, lying at Daphne the Suburb of Antioch, marched into Galile, where he worſted the Enemy, and took the Caſtle they fled into, whence haſting to Jericho, he there feaſted the chief Inhabitants in a room, which upon his departure to his chamber preſently fell down, and thereupon he was accounted to be eſpecially owned by God, who had ſo wonderfully preſerved him. Not long after he got five Towns into his hands, wherein he put to the ſword two thouſand of the Garriſon Souldiers, and then went againſt Pappus, whom Antigonus had ſent into Samaria in a vain oſtentation, as able to wage War in both places. Pappus gave him battel very boldly, but he overthrew him, and in revenge of his Brothers death did great execution, whereby Antigonus his intereſt was clearly broken, and he thought of quitting the City, had the weather ſuffered the King to improve the Victory, and make an end of the War. At night Herod being weary, went to waſh in a chamber, where one boy only was with him, and therein chanced to be divers armed men of the Enemy, who though they might have eaſily diſpatched him then naked, yet were they ſo affrighted, as they gladly got out and ſaved themſelves by flight. The extremity of the weather being over, he went up to Jeruſalem and laid ſiege to it in the third year after he had been declared King at Rome, intending to uſe the ſame manner of oppoſition as Pompey had made formerly againſt the Temple. But during the ſiege he turned off to Samaria, and there marryed Mariamne Daughter to Alexander and niece of Ariſtobulus, formerly contracted to him. The marriage being over he returned, and Soſius came alſo through Phœnicia up to Jeruſalem, ſo that both carryed on the ſiege with an Army conſiſting of eleven Legions, and ſix thouſand Horſe. The defendants with great earneſtneſs and courage made reſiſtance, countermining, and ſometimes fighting with the Enemy in the ground, though much ſtraitned for proviſions, it being the Sabatical year.

Idem de bello ut prius cap. 13.

He beſiegeth Jeruſalem.

Idem Antiq. ut prius cap. 28.

A. M. 3958.
Ol. 105. an. 4.
V. C. 717.
Herodis 3.
Ante Chriſtum 35.

Which after five months is taken, and therein Antigonus, who being beheaded by Antony, here the Principality of the Aſmonæans receive its period.

35. Force at length prevailed, joyned with skill, in both which the Romans excelled, ſo that after five months twenty of the ſtouteſt Souldiers, and then Soſius his Centurion got over, and the outward part of the Temple with the lower ſide of the City were taken, and at length the other alſo, where all were full of ſlaughters, the Romans being enraged by the tedіouſneſs of the War, and the Jews out of malice and particular grudges ſeeking to deſtroy all of the contrary Faction. Antigonus came and fell on his knees before Soſius, who received him with reviling ſpeeches, calling him Antigona. Herod had much adoe to keep the Souldiers from entering the ſecret places of the Temple, and to reſtrain them from ſlaughters, demanding of Soſius if the Romans intended to make him King of a deſert, and adding, that he ſhould think the price of all that blood which was ſpilt to be very little, though the Dominion of all the World ſhould come into the bargain, and at length was fain to redeem the City from further trouble by his own money, wherewith he diſmiſſed the Romans ſufficiently inriched. This diſaſter befel Jeruſalem in the Conſulſhip of M. Agrippa, and Canidius Gallius, and the laſt of the one hundred eighty fifth Olympiad, the third month, in the faſt, and on the ſame day it had been taken by Pompey twenty ſeven years before. Soſius conſecrating a crown of Gold to God, went away with Antigonus unto Antony. But Herod fearing that Antony carrying him to Rome, he ſhould there obtain favour with the Senate, as being of the Royal race, and procure the Kingdom at their hands, if not for himſelf, yet for his children, who never had ill deſerved of the People of Rome, he procured Antony to diſpatch him out of the way, who pretending at leaſt the unquietneſs of the Jews for his ſake, cauſed him to be beheaded at Antioch. And ſo the Principality of the Aſmonæans ceaſed, after it had endured free from the yoak of Syria ninety eight years; and Herod a man of forein and obſcure birth was confirmed in the Soveraignty over Judæa by the Romans, in the Empire of whom we ſhall hear further of him.

Idem ibid. & l. 15. c. 1. Plutarch in Antonio, & Dio lib. 59.

CHAP. VIII.

The affairs of Sicilie Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

From the death of Timoleon to the Sicilian or first Punick War, containing the ſpace of ſeventy three years.

Diodorus Siculus lib. 19. ad Olymp. 115. ann. 4.

The Original of Agathocles.

He is made a Colonel.

A. M. 3688. Ol. 116. an. 4. V. C. 437. Ptol. Lagi 7.

Liveth in Italy.

1. THe conſtitutions of Timoleon being Popular, and tending to the looſe liberty of the Vulgar, which was deſtitute of lawfully ſucceſſive Princes, Sicilie continued not in peace many years, being of all other places, through want of lawful Monarchs, moſt ſubject to the ambition and tyranny of thoſe, who, though private Citizens, through flattery and deceit enſlaved their neighbours. Amongſt the reſt Agathocles is moſt eminent; none that ever in any time went before him, coming up to him, or, reaching him by far in cunning and cruelty. He was the Son of one Carcinus a Potter, and brought up by his Father in that trade of life, who being baniſhed from Rhegium in Italy his native ſoil, came into Sicilie, and placed himſelf at Thermæ at that time ſubject to the Carthaginians. Before he was born, and when his Mother was yet great with him, the Delphick Oracle foretold, that he ſhould be the author of great calamities to the Carthaginians, and alſo to all Sicilie, and for that cauſe he was expoſed by his Father, but preſerved by his Mother, and reſerved to ſuch a time unknown to him, as he repenting of what he had done, gladly underſtood from her of his ſafety. Being then again received by his Father, he was brought up in the trade of a Potter, and was but young when Timoleon overthrew the Carthaginians at the River Cremiſſus, and made all free of Syracuſe that would come thither. He was then with his Father admitted into that City, and not long after his Father dyed, but one Damas a chief Citizen being extraordinarily affected towards him for his comlineſs, gave him whereon ſufficiently to live, and afterwards being created the Captain of the Agrigentines, beſtowed on him the place of a Colonel in the Army, for that he was wont formerly in muſters to wear thoſe arms which none elſe could bear for their bigneſs. But now being advanced to this degree, he rendred himſelf more popular by his bold adventures, and his making ſpeeches often to the people, and Damas dying, he marryed his Widow, whereby he got abundance of wealth. Afterwards it hapning that Crotone being beſieged by the Brutii, they of Syracuſe ſent relief thither, which amongſt other Captains was conducted by his Brother Autander, and he himſelf by decree of the people had alſo the Office of a Colonel. But the Chief command was committed to Heraclides and Soſiſtratus, the later of which out of envy defrauded him of the rewards of his valour, which he now abundantly ſhewed, whereat he was ſo inraged, as to accuſe him and his Companions to the people, of affecting the Tyranny, but they giving no credit to his words, Soſiſtratus after his return ſeized on the Principality. Agathocles then for ſome time continued in Italy, and endeavouring to get Crotone into his power, failed of his Enterprize, and withdrew himſelf to Tarentum.

2. He was received into pay amongſt the Mercenaries, but being ſuſpected to attempt new matters, was not long after again caſhiered, after which getting together a Company of Italian Fugitives, he relieved Rheginum, then ſet upon by Soſiſtratus and Heraclides, and then Soſiſtratus being baniſhed Syracuſe, together with his Authority, returned thither, where ſometimes a private perſon, other-Endangered at Gela.

Suſpected to affect the Tyranny and baniſhed.

Recalled, and made General.

whiles an Officer, he valiantly behaved himſelf againſt the Tyrants faction, in which the Carthaginians, and a great number of the chiefeſt Citizens were ingaged. Having once broke into the City Gela, and there being overmatched by Soſiſtratus and the Towns-men, ſo that he and his party were all of them in danger to be cut off, he ſent his Trumpetters round about to the Walls, commanding them to ſound an Allarm, whereby it came to paſs (as he intended) that the Enemy thinking the beſiegers had broken in from all quarters, retired from him to repulſe them, and ſo he ſafely retreated this Sconce. This buſineſs of Soſiſtratus being over, and Aceſtorides the Corinthian Created General of the Syracuſians, Agathocles was ſuſpected becauſe of his politick head, to affect the Tyranny; yet Aceſtorides would not take him of publickly, for raiſing new ſtirs, but commanding him to depart the City, ſent ſome to lye in wait, and kill him in the way; which he ſuſpecting, ſent out a young man very like himſelf, with his Cloaths, Horſe, and Armour, and in a diſguiſed habit travelled through by-wayes, ſo that he devolved the danger upon the head of another, and eſcaped. Afterwards the Exiles of Soſiſtratus his faction being received, and a peace made with the Carthaginians, he lived as an out-law within the Country, but gathering together conſiderable forces, proved ſo formidable to his own Citizens, and their new Allies, that they ſought to him themſelves to return, and having brought him into the Temple of Ceres, there took an Oath of him not to be againſt the popular Government. Making a ſhew then of Patronizing Democracie, he ſo inveigled the people by his fair ſpeeches and cunning pretences, that he was conſtituted General, and keeper of the Peace, till ſuch time as the differences then on foot, through the reſtitution of the Exiles, ſhould be compoſed; and then having obtained his wiſhed for opportunity, the Army being at his beck, and under pretence of oppoſing ſome, who at Erbita had lately revolted, ſufficient occaſion being taken to increaſe his ſtrength, he marched out as againſt the Rebels, and united unto him three thouſand men, ſome whereof had formerly ſerved him againſt the Carthaginians, and were moſt addicted to himſelf, and adverſe both to the people in general, and the ſix hundred who now had the power in their hands, after the Ariſtocracie was taken away. With theſe, and certain Syracuſians, who being poor themſelves envyed the wealth of others, he ſtrengthned himſelf, and accuſing the ſix hundred to the Souldiers as having plotted againſt him, procured them eaſily to be taken for Enemies, and cauſing an Allarm to be ſounded, commanded the Army to march to the City, and there to kill the Malignants, and take the ſpoyl of them and all their party.

Under a ſpecious pretence he cauſeth a Maſſacre to be made of the rich Syracuſians.

Taketh the Office of Captain General without a Collegue.

A. M. 3688.

3. The Army marching preſently to the City, every part thereof was filled with ſlaughters, there being no difference made betwixt friend and Enemy, but according to the riches or poverty of the perſons, and many running out into the ſtreets to know what the matter was, were ſlain as they asked the queſtion: all the Gates were ſhut that none might eſcape, ſo that four thouſand by this means in one day periſhed. Many leaped down the Walls, of which ſome periſhed in the fall, but others to the number of ſix thouſand eſcaped, of which moſt fled to Agrigentum, where they were courteouſly received, but ſufficiently tormented in this reſpect, that their Wives and Daughters at home were abuſed by the Souldiers in revenge for their eſcape. Agathocles being glutted with a two dayes ſlaughter, gathered together the multitude of his Captives, of which he only diſmiſſed Dinocrates for his former friendſhip, but the reſt he preſently put to death or baniſhed, and then calling the people together, grievouſly inveighed againſt the ſix hundred, and at the Ariſtocratical Government, and then mentioning what he had done to purchaſe the liberty of his Country, very formally laid down his Office, knowing certainly he ſhould be ſollicited to take it up again. For, his Souldiers now made rich by other mens goods, would not endure that he, or his authority, ſhould forſake them, but cryed out he muſt take care of them, ſo that with much adoe, as it ſeemed, he took upon him the Office of Chief Captain, but without a Collegue, being unwilling, as he ſaid, to be called to an account for others breaking the Laws, when as he acted according to them; to which the people conſenting, he was Created Captain General with full Authority by their ſuffrages.

Idem ad an. 2. Olymp. 116.

4. He carryed it with all ſweetneſs and moderation towards all them at the firſt, took great care for the Revenues, making of Arms, and increaſing of the Fleet, and got ſeveral of the Inland Towns into his power. Having ſeized upon a Caſtle of the Meſſenians, he promiſed to reſtore it for thirty Talents, but after the receit of the money, not only refuſed to ſurrender it, but alſo endeavoured to take Meſſene it ſelf, part of the Wall being fall'n down, and though he failed herein of his Enterprize, yet beſieged he Mylæ, and had the place ſurrendred to him, but the Carthaginians ſending their Ambaſſa-

Ad. ann. 3.

The Agrigentines provoked by the Exiles, reſolve to make War upon him.

Amilcar the Carthaginian maketh a peace.

Amballadors, expoſtulated with him his breaking the League, and conſtrained him to give the Caſtle up again into the hands of the Meſſenians. The year after, the Exiles that lived at Agrigentum exhorting their entertainers not to ſuffer him thus to go on in his Conqueſts, and make a prey of their Towns, for that it was better now to ſet upon him before he had confirmed his Tyranny, than when he ſhould be grown too ſtrong for them, and to be forced to War with him againſt their Wills. This appearing to be but reaſon, the people decreed the War, and having entred into a ſtrict Alliance with them of Gela and Meſſena, ſent ſome of the Exiles to Lacedæmon, thence to procure a General, ſuſpecting the fidelity and moderation of their own Citizens, and calling to mind the worth of Timoleon. At that time was there in that City one Acrotatus Son to Cleomenes the King, labouring under the envy of moſt of the youth, becauſe the Lacedæmonians having been overthrown by Antipater, who then Governed Macedonia (after the death of Alexander the Great) when ſuch as returned from the defeat were acquitted by the people, he alone had oppoſed the decree. Being inraged hereat, they beat him, and laid in wait for his life, whereupon now deſirous of ſome foreign command, he eaſily accepted of this imployment, and without conſent of the Ephori, with a few ſhips ſailed to Agrigentum, yet did he nothing worthy, either of his family or Country, but proving more bloody and cruel than the Tyrants themſelves, incurred the diſpleaſure of the people. Giving himſelf up to all luxury, and therewith ſpending the publick revenue, he murd'red Soſiſtratus the Chief of the Exiles having invited him to ſupper, for nothing but out of emulation, whereupon he was deprived of his command, and had been ſtoned, but that he withdrew himſelf into his own Country. After his departure a compoſure was made by the interpoſition of Amilcar the Carthaginian, upon theſe terms, that of the Greek Cities Heraclea, Solinus, and Himera ſhould continue under the power of the Carthaginians but the reſt, over which the Syracuſanians had the Dominion, ſhould be left to their own Laws.

Ad ann. 1. Olymp. 117.

He breaketh it.

A. M. 3693. Ol. 117. an. 1. V. C. 442. Seleuci 1. Ptol. Lagi 12.

5. The Iſland being hereby cleared of the Enemies Forces, he ſecurely laid divers Towns to his Dominions, and with the acceſſion of many places to his former ſtrength ſufficiently confirmed himſelf, having over and above his Syracuſians, and Confederates, ten thouſand Foot, and three thouſand five hundred Horſe of Mercenaries in conſtant pay, and making proviſion of all ſorts of Ammunition, for that he foreſaw, that the Carthaginians diſapproving of the peace made by Amilcar, would within a ſhort while renew the War: The year after ſeeing himſelf ſufficiently furniſhed, he reſolved then not to expect them, but begin himſelf; yet deſiring firſt to clear his way, by removing whatever might hinder him from the neighbouring Cities, he firſt attempted Meſſene whither the Exiles of Syracuſe had fled; and he firſt prevailed with them to expel theſe, and then to admit him into the Town, where he killed ſix hundred of the chiefeſt of them, and moſt adverſe to his power. Thence he went to Agrigentum, thinking to make alſo a prey of it; but ſixty ſhips of the Carthaginians with Forces having lately come thither, he forbore to attempt any thing, and drew his Forces into the Territories of the Carthaginians, where he took in divers Caſtles. In the mean while Dinocrates the principal man amongſt the Exiles ſent to Carthage, deſiring aid before Agathocles ſhould reduce all Sicily into his power, and having gathered his Companions together, and raiſed a pretty Force, ſent Nymphodorus to the Town of the Centorippini held then by Agathocles, but being promiſed to have it betrayed into his hands, under condition they ſhould be left to their own liberty, he got by the night into the Town, but the Garriſon having timely knowledge of it, cut him off, and all his followers which had entred, and Agathocles puniſhed the Conſpirators. But Dinocrates being called by the Inhabitants of Galaria, with three thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe marched thither, where Agathocles his faction being caſt out, he pitched his Tents without the Town; but he ſent two of his Captains againſt him with five thouſand men, who at length put him, and his whole Army to flight, and recovering the place, animadverted upon the Revolters, Agathocles being elevated with this ſucceſs, hearing the Carthaginians were ſeized on an Hill, marched thither, intending to fight them with all the power he could make, but they declining an engagement, in a Triumphant manner he returned unto Syracuſe.

Ad. ann. 2.

The Carthaginians receive a great loſs by ſhipwrack.

6. The year following, the Carthaginians ſhipped a great Army for Sicily under Conduct of Amilcar, a man of high Nobility; but ſuch a Tempeſt ſeized on the Fleet, that two hundred and ſixty Veſſels loaded with men and Proviſions miſcarryed, which made them cover their Wall with black, as it was the cuſtom upon ſome great and publick diſaſter. But Amilcar being an induſtrious man, gathering together the Relicks of the ſhipwrack, liſted more men after his arrival, and made up a compleat Army of forty thouſand Foot, and well nigh five thouſand Horſe. Agathocles perceiving himſelf too weak to encounter the Enemy at preſent, took care how to ſecure his Towns and Caſtles from revolting, and eſpecially Gela, near to which the Enemy then lay. To ſend in a great party at once, he thought might awaken the Townſ-men too much, and put them upon ſome attempt diſadvantageous to himſelf, ſo that he got ſome Soldiers in at ſeveral times, till they amounted to a number too ſtrong for the other, and then going thither, accuſed the Inhabitants of Treachery, and took occaſion to make a Maſſacre of four thouſand of them, the goods of whom he ſeized, with all the Silver and Gold of thoſe that remained. Then pitched he his Tents againſt the Carthaginians, encamped on an Hill where the Caſtle of Phalaris the Tyrant of old time was reported to be, whence it got the name of Ecnomos, i. e. wicked or unlawful. A River ran betwixt the two Camps, concerning which a rumour having been of old time ſpread, that a great multitude of men ſhould periſh near it, this hindred both the Armies from ingaging, till ſuch time as excurſions being made on both ſides, the Africans broke out of their Trenches to reſcue the prey, which Agathocles foreſeeing, had placed many men in ambuſh upon the River, who falling upon the Carthaginians, as they purſued their friends, drove them back, and with great ſlaughter gave the chace unto their Camps. Agathocles judging this a fit ſeaſon for an ingagement, aroſe with his whole Army, and fell upon them in their Trenches, into which he brake, and there maintained for ſome time a hot diſpute, till the Enemy repulſed him by help eſpecially of Slingers, natives of the Iſland Baleares, who being exerciſed after the faſhion of that Countrey in ſlinging of ſtones, forced back the Syracuſians, by throwing at them thoſe of a pound weight. Yet he broke in in other places, and had almoſt done his work, when freſh ſupplies to the Enemy arrived out of Africk, which falling on him in his rear, turned the fate of the day clear againſt him, and put his men to flight, of which great execution was done by five thouſand Africans that gave the chace, many alſo deſtroyed themſelves by drinking over haſtily, out of extremity of the heat which then raged through the influence of the Dog Star. So that he loſt no fewer than ſeven thouſand men, ſix hundred onely of the Carthaginians being ſlain.

Overthrew Agathocles.

7. Agathocles getting together his ſtraglers betook himſelf to Gela, having given out, that he determined for Syracuſe with all ſpeed, ſo that three hundered Affricans entering Gela, and fearing nothing, were all cut off by him. Then ſhut he himſelf up there, that the Carthaginians laying ſiege to the place, the Syracuſians might have time enough to victual their City, and indeed Amilcar thought firſt of all to beſiege it, but afterwards underſtanding what force was in it, changed his purpoſe, and took in ſeveral Towns and Caſtles, and behaved himſelf ſo obligingly, as many within a ſhort time revolted to him. Agathocles then withdrew to Syracuſe, which he furniſhed with all ſorts of Proviſions for the enduring of a Siege, intending to leave a party for defence thereof, and remove the War into Africk, by paſſing all his Army over thither. For, conſidering that the Carthaginians had almoſt got all Sicilie, and his confederates generally revolted to them (who were moſt potent now both at Sea and Land) he judged it (though the moſt venturous, yet) the ſafeſt way to invade the Enemy in his own Territories, which being a ſuddain and moſt unuſual thing, he ſhould daunt him therewith, and drive his Subjects into an open revolt, and force him to call back the Army out of Sicilie. Communicating therefore this purpoſe to no man living, he left Syracuſe to the Government of his brother Antander, and ſevering all the relations of the City one from another, that no mutiny or ſedition might ariſe in his abſence (taking part of them along with him as hoſtages) he raiſed money by ſeizing the eſtates of Orphans into his hands (which he promiſed to reſtore when they ſhould come to age) by borrowing money of Merchants, and robbing of Temples; but eſpecially by calling the multitude together, and acquainting them, how he was moſt ready to endure any hardſhip, but it pitied him for the People: therefore he adviſed all that feared themſelves and eſtates to depart, which when the richeſt and moſt out of favour had done, he procured them to be cut off, and confiſcated all their goods. Then manumiting all ſlaves that were fit for the Wars, he ſhipt his men in ſixty Veſſels, and getting out into the Main whilſt the Carthaginians knew not his deſign, eſcaped them by the darkneſs of the night, and though they chaſed him all the way, yet arrived he in Africk with his Army in ſafety.

Ad ann. 3.

They having almoſt got all Sicilie into their hands, he reſolveth to divert them by invading Africk.

Being landed he burneth his ſhips.

The Carthaginians at firſt daunted,

Are overthrown by him.

8. Once arrived he burnt his Ships, as well to take away from his Soldiers all hope of eſcape (thereby to heighten their valour) as alſo having no great Army, left for the defence of the Navy, leſt it ſhould be divided. Then fell he upon two Cities immediately, which he took (the Soldiers being encouraged at the ſight of ſo pleaſant and rich a Countrey) but ſuffered none of his Army to lye there, but deſtroyed the places, leſt his men ſhould relie upon them as a refuge. The Carthaginians were wonderfully daunted at the firſt report of his landing, concluding he durſt not venture over, except he had firſt, by deſtroying their Army, made all ſure in Sicilie, but underſtanding the whole affairs by ſome meſſengers ſent from the Fleet, they gathered courage, blamed their Sea-officers, who having the Sea in their power, had ſuffered the Enemy to land, and made choice of two Captains, Hanno and Bomilcar, thinking that their enmity towards each other which had been intailed upon them, would prove the commodity of the Commonwealth; though indeed therein they were miſtaken. Theſe two Generals thought not fit to ſtay for their aſſociates, but muſter as many of their own Citizens as would make a ſhift, and ſo raiſing forty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe, with two thouſand Chariots, they encounter the Enemy. Agathocles his men, many of them, wanting Arms, he made them counterfeit ones, to be ſo eſteemed a far off, and perceiving them to be diſcouraged at the number of the Carthaginian Horſe, he procured many Owles to be let go in the Camp, which birds being taken to bring alwaies good luck with them, the Soldiers were therewith ſo cheared, that they reſolutely ſet upon the Enemy, and brake preſently the body of Horſe. The Chariots they drove for the moſt part back amongſt the Foot, which they charged alſo with ſuch reſolution, that the Wing where Hanno commanded was diſcomfited, and he himſelf ſlain. Bomilcar his Colleague underſtanding this, having formerly wiſhed for ſome good opportunity to invade the Tyranny (which the moſt eminent men of Carthage were many times forced to do, for the avoiding of thoſe cenſures and puniſhments conſtantly inflicted upon them for the leaſt miſcarriage of fortune, by the heady rabble) thinking now an occaſion to be preſented to him, as it were from Heaven, reſolved to take hold of it. And for that he thought it moſt convenient for him, that the Enemy ſhould not be overthrown, but an awe continued upon his Citizens, he retreated by little and little, ſuffering the Sicilians to prevail, and at length drew off his men to an Hill, whence they all fled as faſt as they could to Carthage, having loſt of their number one thouſand men, and killed of the Greeks but two hundred.

9. The Carthaginians now ſhut up in their City, and beſieged by Agathocles (though they had carried with them above twenty thouſand pair of Manicles in their Chariots to bind the Greeks, over whom they promiſed themſelves an eaſie Victory) were very much diſcouraged, and laying the blame of the misfortune upon the neglect of their ſuperſtition, ſent great gifts to Hercules the god of the Tyrians, from whom they were iſſued, and for that they had redeemed their own Children of late (by others gotten elſewhere) from being ſacrifized to Saturn, they preſently offered up to him two hundred boyes of the chiefeſt amongſt them for Nobility, being put into the hand of the Statue, and thence falling down into the hollow of it full of fire. They ſent alſo to Amilcar into Sicilie for aid, who receiving the news, cauſed it to be given out that all the Sicilian Army was cut off, and earneſtly thereupon urged the beſieged to a ſurrender of Syracuſe, ſhewing them (to inforce the matter) the Iron-work of the Ships wherein the Army had paſſed over, which indeed the Carthaginians had taken up into their Veſſels after the burning of the Fleet. But the chief men amongſt the beſieged ſtayed the reſt from yielding, though Antander the brother of Agathocles was ſo faint-hearted, as to be for delivering up the City, and caſt eight thouſand of the contrary faction, and the friends of the exiles, out of the Town: But within a few dayes arrived a Gally from Agathocles, to give them knowledge of his ſucceſs, which being purſued by the Carthaginians, and the People flocking to the Haven to gaze, the walls were ſo forſaken that Amilcar taking his opportunity, got ſome of his men over, but an Alarm being given, they were either ſlain, or forced headlong down the fortifications. Amilcar hereat diſcouraged, raiſed his ſiege, and ſent a ſupply of five thouſand men over to Carthage.

Amilcar raiſeth his ſiege before Syracuſe.

10. Agathocles in this mean while took divers places in Africk, and fortifying his Camp before Tunis (wherein he alſo left a ſtrong Garriſon) marched further and beſieged Adrymis, and drew into ſociety with him Elymas the King of the Africans. The Carthaginians having notice of this, turned all their forces upon Tunis, which they beſieged, having firſt become Maſters of his Camp; but he hereupon leaving a great part of his Army ſtill before the Town, went with the reſt to an high Hill, whence he might eaſily be ſeen both by the Carthaginians that lay before Tunis, and alſo by the Inhabitants of Adrymis, and there making abundance of fires, deceived them by this ſtratagem at both places. For the beſiegers thought he was coming with a great Army to relieve Tunis, and therefore raiſed their ſiege out of hand, and departed to Carthage, the beſieged of Adrymis out of a ſtrong apprehenſion that new ſupplies were coming to the Enemy, yielded the Town. Then took he Thapſus by ſtorm, and divers other places, and having now got into his hands about two hundred Towns, went higher up into Libya. The Carthaginians took another occaſion at his abſence to beſiege Tunis, but he thereupon returned as before, but overcame them by a ſtratagem of a clean contrary Nature with the former; for he commanded that no fires now ſhould be made, and marching very faſt fell upon them at unawares, and cutting off two thouſand, took very many Priſoners, and forced the other to betake them to their heels, whereby he exceedingly advanced his affairs, giving the Carthaginians ſuch a blow (who now by reaſon of their ſupplies arrived out of Sicilie, were thought ſuperiour to him) that improving the Victory he went againſt Elymas, who had revolted from him, and killed him with a great number of his Subjects.

Agathocles proſpereth exceedingly in Africk.

11. The year following, Amilcar in Sicilie once more beſieged Syracuſe, and preſently made great haſte for ſtorming of it after his arrival, becauſe the Soothſayers had foretold him, that that day he ſhould dine in the City. A great number joyning themſelves to him out of hope of plunder, they ſo ſtopped up the way with Cariages, that they hindered one another, and ſuch a tumult aroſe, that the Syracuſians having notice of it, ſallied out upon them, and putting them to flight made great ſlaughter of them, and taking Amilcar alive, delivered him to the friends of thoſe that had been ſlain, who moſt cruelly tortured him to death, having been formerly it's probable, condemned by his ingrateful Citizens themſelves, though as then, he having the Army in his power, they durſt not let it be known, but caſting all their votes (written as the manner was) into a Veſſel, they ordered it to be covered, and the thing not to be looked into, until his return, and the giving up of his command. But his Army which conſiſted of one hundred and twenty thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe, being thus ſtrangely defeated, was divided then into two factions. The Exiles and Greeks choſe them Dinocrates for their Captain, and the Carthaginians, him that had held the next place to Amilcar. The affairs of Sicilie being thus in confuſion, the Inhabitants of Agrigentum thinking a fit opportunity for gaining the Principality of the whole Iſland to be put into their hands, made Zenodocus their Captain, who went and took in divers Towns, many revolting to him (all which with the former he reſtored to their liberty) and reſtrained the excurſions of the Syracuſians, who were in great diſtreſs for want of proviſions which had been cut off by the Carthaginians, the conſtant Maſters at Sea. By this time Amilcar's head was ſent over to Agathocles, who receiving it with joy, raiſed the contrary affection in the Enemy, to whoſe Camp he brought it, together with the meſſage, that their forces were utterly cut off, whereupon they deſpaired forthwith of better fortune, adoring the head of their nominal King.

Ad ann. 4.

Amilcar beſieging Syracuſe again is taken and killed.

Juſtin l. 22.

Whereupon his Army is divided into two factions.

12. Agathocles was much puffed up at his proſperity, though he was not far from the waining of his fortune, a præludium to which was made by Lyciſcus one of his Officers, who in a drunken fit exceedingly jeered him. He took it patiently, and made a jeſt of it, becauſe the man was very ſerviceable to him in his Wars, but Archagathus his Son taking it heignouſly, returned it to him in his own language with threats, which further ſo inraged him, that he threw in his Teeth (which was generally reported) his inceſtuous having to do with his ſtep-mother. The young man hereat was ſo tranſported, as he ran him through and ſlew him outright, which was followed by a mutiny of the whole Army, demanding juſtice againſt him; and this flew to that height, that the Soldiers choſe themſelves Captains, ſeized on Tunis, and beſieged Agathocles and his Son, and many of the Officers upon promiſe of larger pay, revolted to the Carthaginians, who had not been wanting to add fuel to this flame. Agathocles ſeeing the danger he was in, put aſide his Purple, and made a pitiful Oration to the Soldiers, wherein he told them he was willing to lay down his life if ſo they pleaſed, rather than end his dayes by ſome ignominious death, and drew out his Sword as intending to kill himſelf; but the Army hindered it, and compelling him to reſume his Robes, were throughly reconciled Agathocles being puffed up his fortune changeth by a grievous mutiny of his Soldiers.

Yet he quieteth them now, and defeateth the Carthaginians.

conciled to him, except ſome two hundred which went over to the Enemy. He taking this opportuinty marched preſently againſt the Carthaginians, who full little thought of a battel, but expected preſently a general revolt; ſo that taking them thus at unawares, he eaſily overthrew them with great ſlaughter.

Diodorus Siculus ut priùs, Ad ann. 1. Olymp. 118.

Agathocles obtaineth another victory againſt the Carthaginians.

Sendeth for Ophellas out of Greece.

A. M. 3697. Ol. 118. ann. 1. V. C. 446. Seleuci 5. Ptol. Lag. 16. P. Decio Mure. 2. Q. Fabio Maximo 3. Coſſ.

Whom he treacherouſly murdereth.

13. About this time the Numidians revolted from thoſe of Carthage, who ſent out an Army the next Spring to reduce them to obedience. Agathocles underſtanding that, left his ſon at Tunis, and marching after them with all expedition, at length overtakes them, then overthrows them, though with great difficulty, and loſs to himſelf. The Numidians, whileſt he was employed in the battel, having been intent upon the event of the fight, fell in, and plundered his Carriages, and getting away the greateſt part of the goods, by reaſon of the darkneſs of the night, he was glad to divide the plunder of the field equally amongſt his Soldiers, in way of recompence for the damage ſuſtained by them. Such Greeks as he took Priſoners, and had aſſiſted the Carthaginians, he put into a Caſtle, where they fearing to be put to death ſet upon the Garriſon by night, but being too weak, betook themſelves thence to a certain fortified place, which Agathocles hearing marched thither with his Army, and drawing them out under promiſe of impunity, contrary to his faith given, killed them all to the number of one thouſand, of which half were Syracuſians. At this time there was one Ophellas, who having been an Officer under Alexander the Great, had ſeized upon Cyrene, and gaped ſtill after larger Dominions. To him now ſent Agathocles, inviting him to come and joyn with him againſt the Carthaginians, offering him all Africk for a reward, to which he pretended he was conſtrained to paſs over, aſſuring him he would content himſelf with Sicilie, or elſe, if he thought good, invade Italy more commodious for him than Africk, by far. The man puffed up with great expectations, ſent to Athens (whence he had married a Wife of the ſtock of famous Miltiades) to unite them to joyn with him in the expedition, which not onely divers of that City readily imbraced, but others of Greece now much ſhattered by Wars within it ſelf, which were raiſed by Alexander his Succeſſors. Ophellas then began his journey (with above ten thouſand Foot, ſix hundred Horſe, one hundred Chariots, beſides ten thouſand others, extraordinary, as they called them) of two moneths long, through a deſert infeſted with wild Beaſts and venomous Serpents, wherewith his Army was ſore diſtreſſed, as alſo by want of neceſſaries, till at length they arrived at Agathocles his Camp. There they were received with all manner of Proviſions, but as the greateſt part of them were gone out to gather Forrage, he ſet upon the reſt with their Captain, who though he reſiſted, yet being overborn, was ſlain moſt treacherouſly, and Agathocles then forcing them to lay down their Arms, got into his power the whole Army, having aforehand ſtirred up his Soldiers againſt Ophellas, by feigning that he lay in wait for his life.

Bomilcar ſeeketh to invade the Tyranny at Carthage, and miſcarrieth.

14. Whilſt Agathocles was in hand with this treacherous deſign, Bomilcar having long intended, but ſtill out of fear deferred, the invaſion of the Tyranny, communicated his intention to five hundred Citizens, and one thouſand Mercenaries, and broke out into open Rebellion againſt his Countrey. Having ſeized on the new Citie, he thence invaded the old, which cauſed great conſternation at firſt, whileſt every one feared they had been betrayed into the Enemies hands; but underſtanding the matter, they preſently made head againſt him, who going on in his way made ſlaughters of all he met; but what with oppoſing him in the Streets, and throwing down ſtones fron the Houſes, they drove him back again into the new Citie through the narrow wayes, and there beſieged him. At length upon promiſe of pardon for what had paſſed, an agreement was made, and his followers by reaſon of the danger the Citie ſtood in, were all diſmiſſed without any puniſhment; but he, notwithſtanding the faith given to him, was moſt ignominiouſly, and with great Tortures put to death.

Idem ad ann. 2

Agathocles taketh the title of King.

* Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 11. cap. 4.

15. The year after, Agathocles hearing that the Captains of Alexander had taken the Titles of Kings upon them: for that he thought himſelf neither inferiour to them in power, Territories, nor for valiant Acts, called himſelf King in like manner: yet took he not the Diadem, being accuſtomed conſtantly to wear a Crown of Myrtles heretofore, either for the Ceremony of ſome Prieſthood, or as * others have conceived, by reaſon of baldneſs, which rendered bim exceedingly uncomely about the head. Then to attempt ſomething worthy of ſo great a Title, he fell upon Utica, near which taking three hundred of the Inhabitants, which upon his coming had been ſhut out, when he could not perſwade them to yield, he framed

an

A. M. 3698.
Ol. 118. ann. 2.
V. C. 447.
Selenci 6.
Ptol. Lagi 17.

an Engine, to which he tied many of them, and drawing it along to that place where he intended to break into the Town, expoſed them either to be ſhot to death by their friends, or elſe if they within out of affection ſhould forbear, then could he eaſily enter. The defendants preferring their Countreys ſafety before that of a few private men, when they could do no leſs, repulſed the Enemy with all poſſible endeavour; but for all this Agathocles broke in at another place, and filled the Citie with ſlaughter, no regard being had to any condition; and after he had overcome them alſo in a Sea-fight, placed a Garriſon there, and ſubdued all the Maritime Towns under his power. Though he proſpered thus in Africk, yet was he ſollicitous for Sicilie, where the Agrigentines had made ſome progreſs in freeing the Cities; but now of late had received ſo great a blow from his Captains, that broke in pieces their deſign. Juſt after the fight was over he arrived, and making a progreſs about the Iſland, recovered moſt of the Towns, onely he was repulſed with great loſs from Centorippa, and upon the ſame terms gained Apollonia. Henceforth his affairs began univerſally to decline. In Sicily, Dinocrates got ſo great an Army of Exiles together, that he durſt not fight him, though continually dared, and dogged at the heels. In Africk his Son Archagathus proſpered very much at the firſt through the good fortune of Eumachus, who ſubdued many places. But the Senate at Carthage dividing their Army into three parties, whereof one was to march for the Maritime parts, another for the Iſland, and the laſt for the upper Countreys, they thereby attained their ends, viz. to leſſen their number in the Citie (which made all Proviſions ſcarce, by ſending out thirty thouſand men) to contain their Allies in fidelity, by giving them hopes of relief, and (which was the chiefeſt) to force the Enemy alſo to divide his Army, and ſo draw him down from Carthage it ſelf.

Returning into Sicily, his affairs go down the wind, both there and in Africk.

16. For Archagathus dividing his Army to oppoſe the Carthaginians in the ſeveral quarters, loſt almoſt the two parts thereof, which he ſent out under Conduct of two ſeveral Captaines, to the number of about nineteen thouſand men; ſo that the Carthaginians reduced almoſt all places back to obedience, all the confederates revolted except a few, and Archagathus being diſtreſſed for want of all things, and the remainder of his Army in great terrour, he ſent to his Father into Sicily to acquaint him in what poſture matters ſtood, and to deſire ſpeedy relief. He ſeeing his affairs to go down the wind in the Iſland was ſollicitous how to leave it, and three hundred Veſſels of the Carthaginians blocked up the mouth of the Haven, ſo that he could not ſtir out. But eighteen Veſſels coming in from Hetruria, he perſwaded the Maſters thereof being friends to put out, and then when the Carthaginians (as he expected) gave them the chaſe, he fell in upon their Rear, and beyond all hope got a Victory, boarding five of their Fleet, which he took together with the Defenders. Hereat encouraged, he ſent Leptines againſt Agrigentum, knowing Xenodocus their General then to be out of favour with a great part of the Town, and he ſeeing himſelf unable to grapple with him ſtirred not out, but provoked by the Citizens, ſo that being worſted, for fear of condemnation he fled to Gela. Agathocles now feaſted the people for joy, making himſelf common with all, and giving them Wine to exceſs, ſo that their wits being out, when that once was in, they might ſpeak their minds, and he thereby know their inclinations; for he feared that after his departure they might call in Dinocrates and the Exiles, and reſtore again the popular Government. Having by this means got out who they were that diſtaſted his power, he feaſted them again by themſelves, with other five hundred who bore the moſt noble minds, and compaſſing them in with his Mercenaries, ſlew them every man.

Being to return into Africk, he maketh a Maſſacre in Syracuſe.

17. Then ſayled he over into Africk, where he found his Army in a low and deſolate condition for want of neceſſaries. Therefore reſolved he to fight, though far inferionr to the Carthaginians, who ſought rather to draw out the time in length, knowing the condition of the Enemy; but he leading down his men to their Trenches, forced them to come out and give battel, in which he fighting valiantly, yet was worſted with the loſs of three thouſand men. After this a ſudden calamity ſeized upon both the Armies by reaſon of miſtakes. For the Carthaginians offering the moſt beautiful of their Captives, as a ſacrifice to their gods, it happened that the fire thence was driven to their Tents, which being covered with Reed and Straw eaſily catched it, and as eaſily were conſumed, whence it came to paſs that all things were in great confuſion. But the worſt of it was, that the Africans which had fought with Agathocles coming now over to them, the Scouts ſeeing them, gave

A ſtrange accident which maketh great diſorder in both the Camps.

Agathocles deſpairing of his affairs in Africk, intendeth to fly away with his youngeſt ſon.

gave an Alarm, as if all the Greeks taking their advantage of the fire were coming againſt them, ſo that flying in great confuſion, they killed and trode down one another, miſtaking one another for Enemies, and having thus diſpatched five thouſand of their Company, all ran away to Carthage, where they were received with great trembling by their friends, leſt that with them the Enemy ſhould enter. The Africans which were coming over, being affrighted at the burning of the Camp, retreated, which being alſo ſeen by the Greeks, they gave notice to Agathocles that the Carthaginians were coming againſt him, ſo that he drew out his men in great fear and terrour, who meeting the Africans, and they taking one another for Enemies, they killed, and ſlew all they could during the night ſeaſon, till ſuch time as four thouſand being ſlain, the reſt retreated to the Camp. Agathocles after this, ſeeing himſelf too weak now to grapple with the Carthaginians, and thereby his affairs to be deſperate in Africk, reſolved to return into Sicily, and conſidering that the Enemy having the command at Sea, would not ſuffer the Army to paſs away quietly, he reſolved with his younger Son Heraclides, and a few more, to paſs over ſecretly, and leave Archagathus behind him, whom he was jealous of, becauſe of the report raiſed of him that he had to do with his Stepmother.

The eldeſt hearing of it raiſeth a mutiny, wherein Agathocles is bound in Fetters, but being looſed eſcapeth away, and both his ſons are killed by his Army, which maketh its own terms.

18. But Archagathus having notice of his intention (which he took in marvailous evil part) communicated it to ſeveral of the Officers, who raiſing a mutiny preſently in the Army, Agathocles was ſeized on, and made ſure in Fetters. A little after it hapned that an Allarm was made in the Camp, as if the Enemy approached, which made all Arm themſelves and run out, and amongſt the reſt the Keepers of Agathocles, whom then the multitude ſeeing in ſuch a condition, cried out preſently that he ſhould be looſed; which being done, he forthwith took Boat with a few attendants, leaving both his Sons behind him. The Army underſtanding this killed them both, and then agreed with the Carthaginians for three hundred Talents to reſtore the Towns yet in their hands, and that ſuch as would ſhould receive pay in their ſervice. And ſuch as did ſo had the Terms performed; but thoſe that out of hope of ſuccour from Agathocles held out the places, being all forced to yield, their Captains were Crucified, and the common Soldiers being bound in Fetters, were forced with their hard labour to repair that Countrey which formerly they had helped to depopulate.

His horrid cruelty towards the Ægeſtans.

19. Thus the Carthaginians obtained peace after four years; Divine vengeance hurrying Agathocles to puniſhment, after that perfidious murder of Ophalles, his two ſons being ſlain on the ſame day, and by the hands of his Soldiers. After his arrival in Sicily he went preſently to Ægeſta, a Town confederate with him, whence wanting money he exacted much Treaſure, but they grumbling, and complaining thereof, all the poorer ſort he brought forth, and ſlew at the River Scamander, and then tortured the reſt with all ſorts of Torments to make them confeſs what they had. Some he broke upon the Wheel, others he ſhot of from Engines as Stones. Some had their Ancles cut off, and endured other ſuch cruel torments. He invented a kind of puniſhment alſo, ſomething reſembling Phalaris his Bull being a bed of Iron, wherein one being put, was burnt or fried to death by fire put underneath. Rich Women had their Ancles broken with Iron Tongs, others their Breaſts cut off. Some out of terror burnt themſelves in their houſes, and others hanged themſelves, ſo that the whole flower of the People being abſolutely deſtroyed, he ſold the Children to the Brutii in Italy, and utterly to deſtroy the name of the City, called it Dicæopolis, and Peopled it with Fugitives. Hearing then that his Sons were ſlain in Africk, to be revenged on the Soldiers, he ſent commands to Antander his Brother, to kill all their friends and kinſfolks at Syracuſe, which he readily performing, no ſex nor age was ſpared, but ſo horrid a Maſſacre committed, that as well old and decrepit men as young infants were included in the ſlaughter. Such as were thus murdered lying on the Sea ſhoar, none durſt bury them, though never ſo nearly related, ſo that the Sea waſhing them away was coloured with the blood, carrying along with it a note of this cruelty to other parts at a good diſtance. Agathocles continued his progreſs up and down the Iſland, ſtrenthgning Towns, and raiſing money; but Paſiphilus his Captain deſpiſing him now for the lowneſs of his fortune, fled over to Dinocrates, and withdrew the Army alſo from him. This caſt him into ſuch deſpair, that contrary to his former boldneſs, he ſent to Dinocrates, offering to quit the Tyranny, and reſtore the Government to the People, ſo he might have but two Caſtles to maintain himſelf on, and earneſtly preſſed him to admit of the conditions. But he gaping after the chief power himſelf, Diodorus ut ſupra. ad ann. 3.

Out of deſpair he offereth to lay down his power, but Dinocrates intending to obtain the Tyranny himſelf rejecteth it.

ſelf, and unwilling to be reduced again to the eſtate of a private Citizen (being now (though but accounted Captain of the Exiles) as a King indeed, in regard of the great extent of his power and command) put him off with one pretence or other ſtill, till Agathocles ſmelling out his device, procured ſome to accuſe him to the Army, and ſending to Carthage made peace with them on theſe terms; to reſtore all the places to them they formerly had in Sicilie, and for this in way of requital, to receive five hundred Talents of Gold, and a great quantity of Corn.

Idem ad an. 4.

20. Furniſhing then himſelf with a ſmall Army, he went againſt Dinocrates and his Exiles, who ſeeing the little number he brought with him (being but about five thouſand Foot, and eight hundred Horſe) in compariſon of themſelves, amounting to twenty five thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, gave him battel. The diſpute at firſt was very ſharp; but ſhortly ſome two thouſand of the Exiles revolting to the Tyrant, ſo encouraged his men, and diſcouraged thoſe they had forſaken (who thought them to be more than indeed they were) that they were eaſily put to flight, though ſo far exceeding in number. All the Horſe got away, and ſome of the Foot; but the greateſt part ſetling upon an Hill, made peace with Agathocles, who had ſent to them, inviting them now at length to lay down their enmity, and return home; but after he had got them into his power, contrary to his faith given (which he never obſerved) he ſlew ſome ſeven thouſand of them. The remainder of the Army being gathered up he received, and Dinocrates himſelf, to whoſe command he committed part of his Souldiers, and contrary to his own diſpoſition, truſted him to the laſt. He betraying his companions, ſlew Paſiphilus at Gela, and going about in ſubduing the Towns and Caſtles (in which work he ſpent two years) delivered them all up to Agathocles.

A. M. 3700.
Ol. 118. an. 4.
V. C. 449.
Seleucid. 8.
Ptol. Lagi 19.

Whom he overthroweth and yet receiveth into favour.

Diodorus in Excerpt. l. 21.
A. M. 3704.

Juſtin lib. 23.

Rageth againſt the Italians.

21. Not long after, Caſſander the King of Macedonia beſieging Corcyra, Agathocles went and raiſed the ſiege, burning all his ſhips in the Havens. Returning to his Army, and underſtanding that certain Ligurians and Tyrrhenians had joyned with thoſe that ſlew his Son Archagathus, he got them into his power to the number of two thouſand, and put them all to the ſword. The Brutii (a People which iſſuing from the Lucanians, were grown mighty high, and at the very firſt fought againſt thoſe from whome they had their original, and forced them to a Peace, on equal terms) being offended with him, he ſailed over into Italy againſt them, and determined to beſiege a Town belonging to them, but they ſetting upon him at unawares, forced him with the loſs of four thouſand men to return to Syracuſe. Yet was he not diſcouraged from making another Expedition againſt Crotone, which purpoſing to beſiege, he pretended he was about to ſend his Daughter to the King of Epirus with a Royal Fleet, and beguiling them herewith, laid cloſe ſiege both by Sea and Land to the Town, when they full little thought it. Having undermined a great houſe, they being terrified thereat, opened their Gates and let him in, after which he plundered the Town, and committed great ſlaughters. Then entred he into ſociety with the Japyges and Pacetii notable Pyrates; whome furniſhing with Veſſels, he was to have part of the booty; and leaving a Garriſon in Crotone, he returned to Syracuſe.

Diodorus ibid.

Entereth into ſociety with Demetrius Poliorcetes.

22. Once more having prepared an Army of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, he paſſed over into Italy, where being arrived, and committing the Navy to the care of Stilpo, he commanded him to make excurſions into the Territories of the Brutii, but he coaſting along and waſting the maritime parts, loſt almoſt all his ſhips by a Tempeſt. He himſelf took by ſtorm the City of the Hipponiatæ, at the report whereof the Brutii were ſo affrighted, that they ſent to him to treat, and delivered up ſix hundred Hoſtages. Yet after his departure they brake their oath, and expelling his Garriſon, returned again to their own freedom. Agathocles being returned home, ſent his Son of his own name to Demetrius Poliorcetes now King of Macedonia, to enter into ſociety with him, who taking the meſſage in good part, rewarded the Ambaſſador with royal gifts, and ſent one back with him, who under colour of ratifying the League, might eſpie out the condition of Sicilie. Having now been a long time, as he thought, at Peace with the Carthaginians, he made all proviſion poſſible again for ſhipping, intending to make another Expedition into Africk, and hinder the exportation of Corn from Sicilie and Sardinia.

Whilſt he thinketh of making another Expedition into Africk.

A. M. 3716.
Ol. 122. an. 4.
V. C. 465.
Seleuci 24.
Ptolom. Lag. 35

23. But while he buſied himſelf with ſuch thoughts, he was prevented by one Mænon, who being born at Ægeſta, had been taken captive there, and for his beauty was preferred to his ſervice. For a time he diſſembled the diſpleaſure he conceived from the calamity of his Country, and his own ignominious and filthy condition dition, till he might have an opportunity to be revenged upon the Tyrant. But now it hapning, that Agathocles commending Agathocles his Son to the Syracuſians as his Succeſſor; and ſending him to ſucceed Archagathus (his nephew by Archagathus his Son, and a man of great courage) in the command of the Army then quartering about Ætna; Archagathus ſeeing how things were likely to go, plotted the ruin of them both, and ſending to Mænon, deſired him to make the old man away with poyſon, while he in the mean while inviting the young one to a feaſt, made him drunk, and then killed him. Mænon mindful of the meſſage, when the King after meat called for a tooth-pick to cleanſe his teeth, dipped one in poyſon and gave him it, which he uſing, began by little and little to wax ill, and then his teeth putrifying in a horrid manner, this was ſucceeded by tormenting pains. Seeing himſelf near his end, he called the people together, and inveighing bitterly againſt Archagathus, ſtirred them up to revenge him on him, and reſtored the Democracy to the people. Afterwards his voice failing him, he was put upon the funeral fire yet breathing, by Oxythenius, who had been ſent to him from Demetrius, and burnt. Juſtin from Trogus (who in the whole ſtory of this Tyrant diſſenteth from Diodorus) reporteth, that before his end, he ſent back his Wife Theogene an Ægyptian by birth, with her two young Children, and great wealth, into her own Country, to be out of that danger which he foreſaw muſt needs enſue. The ſtory of his life is almoſt beyond parallel; but he dyed after he had lived ſeventy two years, and thereof Reigned twenty eight, as amongſt other Hiſtorians cited by our Author, Antander his own Brother left recorded; A.M. 3718, and the ſecond of the 123 Olympiad.

He is prevented by poyſon.

A. M. 3718. Ol. 123. an. 2. V. C. 467. Seleuci 26. Ptol. Lagi 37. Vide Diodorum in Excerpt 12. lib. 21.

24. The Syracuſians having again got the power into their own hands, put to ſale Agathocles his goods, pulled down and tare in pieces all his pictures. Mænon in the mean while who had poyſoned him being in the Camp with Archagathus, and elevated with the thought of what he had done, made away alſo Archagathus by treachery, and with good words drawing the Army to himſelf, reſolved to make War upon the Syracuſians, and ſeize on the Principality. The Syracuſians therefore having made Hicetas their Prætor, ſent him out againſt him, but the Carthaginians joyning with Mænon, they were conſtrained to deliver them four hundred Hoſtages to let fall the War with them, and receive the Exiles. Afterwards the mercenary Souldiers being denyed the right of Suffrage in the election of Magiſtrates, a great ſedition aroſe thereupon, and both they and the People took arms, but the better ſort interpoſed themſelves, and prevailed with both parties to agree, the Souldiers conſenting to depart the Iſland with their goods. Theſe Mercenaries marching away, came to Meſſene, a Sea-town ſtanding over againſt Italy, where being kindly entertained by the Inhabitants, they ſo well requited them, that in the night they maſſacred them all, and Marrying their Wives, ſeized upon the Town, which they called in their own Campanian Language Mamertina; Mars in that ſpeech being named Mamers. Over againſt this Town ſtood Rhegium upon the promontory of Italy, which being in danger now in the War betwixt the Romans and the Tarentines, the Inhabitants deſired of the Romans to have a party ſent them for their defence, which being alſo Campanians, in imitation of what their Countrymen had done at Meſſene, and by their help, they alſo killed or expelled the Inhabitants, and ſeized upon their Town and Territories. Decius their chief Commander they baniſhed for the unequal diviſion of the prey, who going thence to Meſſene, fell ill afterwards of his eyes, and ſent to Rhegium for an expert Phyſician in this kind, who coming to him, in revenge of what he had done to his Country, applyed Cantharides to his eyes inſtead of ſalve, and utterly blinded him. And when the Romans were once diſintangled from the War, having grievouſly reſented the Treachery of their Souldiers, they beſieged them in the Town, which taking, they brought three hundred of them to Rome, and in the market-place firſt whipped and then beheaded them, after the cuſtom of their Anceſtors, to vindicate their credit with their confederates.

Mænon who poyſoned him laboured in vain to get the Tyranny.

The Mercenaries maſſacre the Meſſenians, and the Roman Soldiers thoſe of Rhegium.

Idem ibid. & Polybius lib. 1.

Diodorus Excerpt. l. 22.

25. In Sicilie were now many petty Tyrants: Hicetas at Syracuſe, Phintias at Agrigentum, and ſeveral others at other places. Theſe two fell out and Warred with each other, inſomuch that by reaſon of their mutual excurſions and depredations their grounds lay untilled. Hicetas having ſtill the upper hand of the other, was ſo elevated, that he ventured to fight with the Carthaginians at the River Teria, but as it proved to the great loſs of his men. Ever ſince the death of Agathocles, had the Syracuſians laboured with all their might to reduce that whole Iſland into their power, and now at this time rather doubling their diligence than at all ſlack-Plutarch in Pyrrh.

ing their endeavours, ſent over into Italy to Pyrrhus King of Epirus (who now was buſie in War againſt the Romans, being called thither by the Tarentines) deſiring aid of him for the expelling of the Africans, and to take upon him the protection of Sicilie. Hicetas having held the Dominion of Syracuſe nine years, was then ejected by Thynio, who together with Soſtratus were ſo vexed with the Carthaginian War, that they again called Pyrrhus into Sicilie.

Diodorus ibid.

Pyrrhus King of Epirus called over into Sicily by the Syracuſians.

The Mamertines entered into League with the Carthaginians, and reſolved if poſſible to hinder his landing, the Romans were alſo by reaſon of their enmity with him eaſily drawn into the confederacy, ſo that the Straights of Sicilie were narrowly watched. He delaying his coming till the next year, the Carthaginians ſent back thirty of their Ships upon other occaſions, and beſieged Syracuſe. But then he (having been in Italy now two years and four moneths, without ſucceſs) paſſed over without controul, and came directly to Syracuſe, where the Carthaginians lying incamped with no leſs than fifty thouſand men, having alſo one hundred Ships at anchor in the Haven, yet upon his approach raiſed their ſiege, not daring to try the hazard of a battel.

A. M. 3782.
Ol. 125. an. 4.
V. C. 477.
Antioc. Soteris 6.
Ptol. Philadelph. 8.

26. Pyrrhus coming to the City, reconciled the Inhabitants to their Governours, for which getting great favour, and receiving meſſages from diverſe Cities, which gave up themſelves into his hands, he not onely thought now of gaining Sicily (which he intended to give to his Son, begotten on Lanaſſa the daughter of Agathocles, as Italy to another) but of laying Africk it ſelf alſo to his Dominions.

Juſtin lib. 23.

Making a journey through the Iſland, he received the Cities to protection, and within a ſhort ſpace ſubdued all the places held by the Carthaginians, except, Lilybæum, a Town built upon the Sea by their Anceſtors, after that Dionyſius had taken Motya.

Diodorus ut ſuprà.

Proſpereth.

After he had been ſome time before it, though a great ſupply had arrived, yet ſent they alſo to him, offering him money to raiſe his ſiege; and he was inclined to accept of the offer; but his friends in Council perſwaded him by all means to refuſe it, and utterly expel the Africans out of Sicily. Then did he with all his might attempt the taking of the place by force, but it being ſtrongly defended, he every time came off with loſs, and finally after he had continued the ſiege for two moneths, roſe up and departed. After this he had thoughts of becoming Maſter at Sea, and tranſporting his Army into Africk; but behaving himſelf too Majeſterially in the preparation for this attempt he loſt himſelf exceedingly, and then ſuſpecting the fidelity of Thæmo and Soſtratus, the one he compelled by fear to revolt from him, and the latter he ſlew as guilty of the ſame intention.

Plutarch ut priùs.

But by his cruelty loſeth himſelf and departeth.

This ſo provoked the Cities, that ſome revolted back to the Carthaginians, and others to the Mamertines, ſo that perceiving a great defection, and a conſpiracy alſo hatched againſt him, being now ſollicited alſo by the Samnites and Tarentines for more aid, he departed again into Italy, being oppoſed ſo in his paſſage by the Carthaginians on the Sea, and that he loſt moſt of his Ships, and ſo much after he had landed by the Mamertines (who had before wafted over one thouſand men) that with much ado he got ſafe to Tarentum.

27. After the departure of Pyrrhus, the Soldiers which quartered in the Towns near to Syracuſe, beyond all example, created two Magiſtrates out of their own body, Artemidorus and Hiero, to the great indignation of the People, which took it in diſdain that their priviledge ſhould be thus uſurped by the Army.

Polybius lib. 1.

Juſtin ut priùs

The Syracuſian Soldiers created two Magiſtrates, Artemidorus and Hiero.

Yet afterwards did they confirm the honour unto Hiero for his great moderation and high abilities, who being the Son of Hierocles, had ſtrange preſages whileſt yet a Child concerning his future Dignity. He perceiving how in the abſence of the Prætor, the Syracuſians were apt to be ſeditious, and attempt new matters, entred into affinity with Leptines (by marrying his daughter) whom he knew to be the moſt conſiderable man, and of great Authority amongſt the vulgar, that he might ſupply his place as it were in his abſence, and contain the people in obedience. After this marriage was over, taking notice of the looſe Carriage of the old Mercenary Soldiers, and how they were ever inclining to mutinies, he drew them out againſt the Mamertines, who being Barbarians (as the Greeks alwayes termed all beſides themſelves) had ſeized upon Meſſene, and dividing them from the reſt, which he kept with himſelf, expoſed them againſt the Enemies, and ſuffered them every man to be cut off, ſo that being rid of them, he thenceforth Governed without any fear or trouble.

A. M. 3730.
Ol. 128. an. 2.
V. C. 479.
Antioch. Sot. 8.
Ptol. Philad. 19.
M. Curio Dentato 2.
L. Cornelio Lentulo Coſſ.
Polybius & Diodorus ut ſuprà.

Hiero being ſole Magiſtrate falleth upon the Mamertines.

Three or four years after he ſet upon the Mamertines in good earneſt, who, though they bare themſelves high ſo long as their friends and aſſociates continued Maſters of Rhegium (created much trouble to the Carthaginians, and compelled divers Towns to pay Tribute) yet now ſince the defeat of them, and eſpecially after that Hiero had got into his power two places near unto them, they were exceedingly ſtraitned.

A. M. 3739.

28. Yet ſent they out againſt him eight thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe under the Conduct of one Cios, who calling the Soothſayers to divine what the iſſue ſhould be, they anſwered, that he was to ſpend the next night in the Enemies Camp, at which being much elevated, he ſet his men in order, and paſſed over the River. Hiero ſent two thouſand choice Meſſenians, and five hundred others, to get about the Hill Thorax, and come upon their backs, he in the mean time charging their front. Here was maintained a ſharp diſpute, till the ſeven hundred freſh men coming upon the backs of the Mamertines, did great execution upon them, ſo that being now compaſſed about, they betook themſelves to flight. Cios the General fighting moſt valiantly, received ſo many and great wounds that he ſwooned with too great expence of bloud, and being taken alive, was brought into the Camp of the Syracuſians, where all means poſſible were uſed for his recovery. But it hapning that divers Horſes being brought out of the Field, he eſpied that on which his Son rode amongſt them; whereat taking an apprehenſion of the young mans death, in great trouble of mind he untied his wounds, and thereby cauſed his own end, as unwilling to outlive his ſon.

Hannibal the Carthaginian General deceitfully tampereth with them.

29. The Mamertines upon the news of this defeat were minded to give up themſelves, and their Citie, into the hands of Hiero. But it hapning that Hannibal the Carthaginian General, being at that time in the Iſland Lipara, heard of the overthrow, and came over preſently to congratulate Hiero, as he pretended, but indeed to circumvent him with his General craft in which he was well skilled; and Hiero was ſo wrought upon as to give credit to him, and lye ſtill. Then went he to the Mamertines, and finding them ready to ſurrender, turned them clearly from it, and drew them to his own intereſt, by bringing them relief into the Citie. Hiero returning to Syracuſe, was for a reward of his great ſervice ſaluted King by the conſent of all men, which title he held to his laſt, the ſpace of fifty four years. Hannibal cunningly placed his Garriſon in the Caſtle, and thereby awed the whole Town, ſo that the Mamertines then ſuſpected him as much as Hiero, and they hindring thus each other from gaining the place, at length made an accord to carry on the War againſt it in common. This combination cauſing the other to bethink themſelves of ſome forein aid, they ſent to the Romans, deſiring them to take the patronage of them, their own Countrey-men, as being Originally Campanians.

Polybius ibid.

They ſend to the Romans for aid.

30. The Meſſage found no good entertainment with the Senate, for that the Fathers accounted it an abſurd thing for them, who had puniſhed the perfidiouſneſs of thoſe that had ſeized upon Rhegium ſo ſharply, now to take upon them to protect thoſe that were guilty, and patterns of the ſame Crime; and they could by no means be brought to conſent unto it. But the people (who alone could do it) being perſwaded by the Prætor that it was high time to ſtop the proceedings of the Carthaginians, who had almoſt ſwallowed up all Sicily, and would uſe that Iſland as a Bridge to paſs over into Italy, and being alſo made to believe how profitable it would be to their particular intereſts to undertake the War, having ſuffered much by that late one with Pyrrhus, and the Tarentines, they decreed that aid ſhould be ſent them. The next year was Appius Claudius accordingly ſent over with an Army, with which he put to the worſt, both Hiero and Hannibal, and thereupon conſtrained the other to joyn himſelf to him againſt the Carthaginians. This is called the Sicilian, or the firſt Punick War, which for that it falls into the Hiſtory of the Romans more eſpecially, under whom thenceforth Sicilia was ever ſubject, it muſt neceſſarily be referred thither, as to its proper place. It began A. M. 3741. the firſt of the 129 Olympiad, in the 19th of the Reign of Antiochus Soter, the ſecond King of Syria, and the twenty firſt of Ptolomy Philadelphus, the ſecond alſo of Ægypt, after the diviſion of the Empire of Alexander the Great; twenty two years after the death of Agathocles, in the 490th year after the building of Rome, Appias Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, being Conſuls.

A. M. 3739.
Ol. 128. an. 3.
V. C. 488.
Antioch. Sot. 17.
Ptol. Philad. 19.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

The affairs of the Romans Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

SECT. I.

From the War of Privernum to the firſt Punick War, wherein the Romans firſt ſet foot out of Italy,

Containing the ſpace of ſixty ſix years.

War decreed againſt the Palæpolitans.

Livius lib. 8.

A. M. 3678.
Ol. 113. an. 2.
V. C. 173.
Alexand. 10.

1. IN the year after the taking of Privernum was War decreed againſt the Palæpolitans. Palæopolis ſtood not far off from the place where Neapolis (now Napoli or Naples) is ſeated, and, as ſome think, there where at this day, is ſeen il borgo de Chiara. The ſame people inhabited two Cities, being deſcended from Cumæ, which was alſo a Colony of Chalcis in Eubœa, now called Negropont. For the Cumani having a good Fleet firſt paſſed to the Iſlands Menaria and Pithecuſa, and afterward ventured upon the Continent. The Palæpolitans truſting to their own ſtrength, and counting of the treachery of the Samnites, and the plague Which now had ſeized upon Rome, committed many Hoſtile actions againſt the Romans that inhabited the Countreys about Cumæ and Falernus. When L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publius Philo were both Conſuls the ſecond time, the Fæciales were ſent to demand reſtitution, who bringing from thoſe Greeks (more valiant in tongue, ſaith Livy than in deeds) a fiery and reſolute anſwer, it was reſolved that War ſhould be made upon them.

Alexandria in Ægypt, when built.

2. Whileſt this War depended, the year following was Alexandria in Ægypt built, as Livy writeth, whereas the foundation of this City was laid, while Alexander was in Africk, the year before the death of Darius, and the fifth before this, wherein C. Pætilius and L. Papirius Mugilanus were Conſuls. This ſame year he maketh Alexander the King of Epirus to have been ſlain, who being Uncle by the Mothers ſide to Alexander the Great, is thought to have undertaken an expedition into Italy, out of emulation towards his Nephew, that as the one was now Conquering the Eaſt, ſo the other might endeavour to ſubdue the Weſt, having no leſs matter to work upon in Italy, Africk, and Sicily, than the other found in Aſia and Perſia. He was deceived by the Oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, which bidding him beware of Pandoſia and Acheron, he knowing there was a City of the former name in Epirus, and a River of the later, thought himſelf ſo much the ſafer, as he could get fartheſt off from theſe. Being therefore ſent for by the Tarentines, he came into Italy, and made War with the Brutii and Lucani, from whom he took many Towns, and three hundred Familier, which he ſent as Hoſtages into Epirus. He entred into a League with the Metapontini and Romans: But the Brutii and Lucani recruiting themſelves by the ſupplies of their neighbours, reinforced the War, and ſet upon him near Pandoſia (a Town ſituate a little above Conſentia, the Metropolis of the Brutii) near to which ran a River called Acheron. Taking this River with his Horſe, he was therein ſlain by a Lucanian, and his dead body being carried down the ſtream into the Enemies quarters was mangled into pieces. A certain Woman whoſe Husband and Children were taken priſoners by the Epirotes, got the pieces together, and in exchange for her relations ſent his bones to Metapontus, whence they were conveyed into Epirus unto Cleopatra his Wife, and Olympius his Siſter, whereof the one was Siſter, and the other Mother to Alexander the Great.

Alexander King of Epirus ſlain in Italy.

3. The Palæpolitans though aſſiſted by the Samnites and Tarentines, were overmatched ſo, as glad they were to yield up their City, and the Samnites loſt three

Sect. I.

The Palæpolitans being conquered the Tarentines their allies proceed in the War, and draw in the Samnites and Neapolitans.

New Laws in favour of Debtors.

L. Papyrius Curſor made Dictator.

Is hindred from puniſhing Fabius Rutilianus his Maſter of the Horſe-men.

A. M. 3681.
Ol. 114. ann. 1.
V. C. 430.
Alexand. 13.

of their own Towns. The Tarentines yet proceeded, and drew both the Samnites and Neapolitans (the other part of this Greek Colony) afreſh into the War, wherein alſo the Inhabitants of Veſtinus, together with their allies ingaged themſelves. Whilſt this War was but beginning, great ſtirs happened in the City. There, one L. Papyrius had given up himſelf to one C. Publius as a ſlave, to work out his Fathers debt. Being a young man of a beautiful body, Publius attempted filthily to abuſe him, and when he would in no wiſe ſuffer this, moſt grievouſly beat and tore his body with rods. In this plight Papyrius got away, and running to the People, by declaring his condition, ſo affected them, that they procured the Fathers to Decree, that the Conſuls ſhould propoſe to them in the Comitia theſe two Laws: the firſt, That no man ſhould be detained in bonds, except for ſome miſdemeanor, till the time of his puniſhment: the ſecond, that the money and goods, not the body of the debtor ſhould be reſponſible. Whereupon all Priſoners for debt were forthwith ſet at liberty. The year following the Veſtini were overthrown by Junius Brutus Scæva the Conſul, who alſo took from them two Towns. His Colleague L. Furius Camillus being ſick in Samnium (or the Countrey of the Samnites) pronounced Dictator L. Papyrius Curſor, the moſt famous Captain by far of thoſe times, who named Q. Fabius Rutilianus for his Maſter of Horſe-men. Papyrius being in Camp againſt the Samnites, was forced to return to Rome, for the renewing of his auſpicia, and at his departure commanded his Maſter of Horſe-men not to ſtir out of the Trenches to fight one ſtroak till he came back: but Fabius underſtanding that a notable advantage of doing ſomething of conſequence was preſented from the Enemy, fell upon the Samnites, and made great ſlaughter of them. The Dictator hearing of this, in a great rage returned to the Camp, and had put him to death, but that he was reſcued by the Army, from which flying to the City, Papyrius followed him, and preſſing ſore to the Senate the neceſſity of diſcipline and authority, would not at all give way to the entreaties of the Fathers. This forced M. Fabius the Father of the party to appeal to the People and their Tribunes, by which he hardly was drawn to pardon him, though his authority was ſaved together with the life of Fabius, through the intreaties of thoſe who might juſtly have Commanded it, as was confeſſed by himſelf.

The Samnites overthrown,

Deſire Peace which is denied them.

Livius lib. 9.

4. This ſeverity of the Dictator ſo alienated the hearts of the Souldiers from him, that it had well nigh coſt him the loſs of a battel, which conſtrained him to be more Popular; then afterwards he overthrew the Samnites, and harrazed their Country. This made them deſire Peace, but returning quickly again to their former enmity, in the ſecond year after, they received another great defeat from A. Cornelius Aruina the Dictator. Herewith they were ſo ſtruck, that they ſent all the Priſoners they had home to Rome, with ſuch plunder as they had taken, and the dead body with the goods of him who had been the Author of the Revolt, and who fearing to be given up had killed himſelf. The Senate onely received the men, with ſuch goods as any Citizen could challenge for his own, and denied them Peace. At this C. Pontius a leading man amongſt them took occaſion grievouſly to enveigh againſt the injuſtice of the Romans, and cauſing them to take arms, led them preſently near to a place called Caudium, whence having apparelled ten Soldiers in the habit of Shepherds, he ſent them to Calatia (where he heard the Conſuls lay at preſent) with a charge, that when they ſhould be asked where the Army of the Samnites was, they ſhould anſwer in Apulia, beſieging Luceria, which it had already well nigh taken. A rumour being already ſpread abroad of ſuch a thing, now obtained greater credit, and the Romans accounted themſelves by all means bound to ſuccour Luceria, and the rather, for fear leſt all Apulia ſhould revolt. Two wayes there were which led to Luceria: one by the Sea ſide open and ſecure, another through the Straights of Caudinum called Furcæ Caudinæ (at this day Caudino, and Forche Caudine, ten miles diſtant from Benevento) a place incompaſſed about with high Mountains, and into which one could not enter, nor depart out of it but through very difficult and ſtraight paſſages. The Conſuls leading their Army through this, as the neareſt way, were quickly ſtopped up, ſo as they could neither proceed nor retire, becauſe on all ſides Pontius had blocked up the paſſage.

They entrap the Roman Army at Furcæ Caudinæ.

A. M. 3684.
Ol. 114. ann. 4.
V. C. 433.
Ptol. Lagi 3.

5. The Samnites having the Roman Armies at this advantage, ſent to Herennius the Father of Pontius their General, and a very wiſe man, for his advice what was to be done. He ſent word they ſhould diſmiſs the Romans without any injury at all, which anſwer not pleaſing, they ſent back for another, and then he counſelled them to cut them off, and not leave a man alive. Theſe two extremes being aſcribed to dotage, he came to the Camp, and offered his reaſons. He ſaid, he gave the firſt advice as ſuch, which if followed, would by a great courteſie have for ever obliged a moſt powerful People, and the ſecond, as tending ſo far to the weakning of their power, as they could not for a long time either recruit themſelves or renew the War, having loſt two ſo conſiderable Armies; as for any third expedient he found none. Being asked concerning a middle way of diſmiſſing the Romans in ſafety, but under the obligation of ſome conditions, he anſwered, that this courſe would not procure them friends, nor diminiſh their enemies; for ſuch was the Roman Nation, that being diſgraced or defeated, it could not reſt, but would ſtill retain the memory of what preſent neceſſity urged it to ſubmit to; neither, ſaith he, will they ſuffer you to reſt till puniſhed abundantly. But this wiſe counſel would not be heard; ſo that the Romans had theſe conditions ſet them: The Army was to march away onely with their clothes, having firſt in token of ſlavery paſſed under the jugum: the Romans ſhould quit wholly the Country of the Samnites, and thence remove their Colonies: and both Roman and Samnite live under the ſame terms of confederacy and alliance. The Armies were conſtrained to ſubmit, and in great ſhame and conſternation marched away diſarmed. This diſaſter hapned in the four hundred thirty third year of the City, and the third after the death of Alexander the Great, when T. Veturius Calvinus the firſt, and Sp. Poſthumius the ſecond time were Conſuls.

Make it diſgracefully paſs under the jugum and march away diſarmed.

6. The City was moſt grievouſly afflicted with ſhame and anger at ſo diſgraceful and unuſual a thing. Poſthumius perſwaded the Senate to deliver himſelf and his Collegue into the hands of the Samnites, as being onely obliged to the conditions, and not the State, which was unacquainted therewith. This being accordingly done, Pontius refuſed to receive them, exclaiming againſt the perfidiouſneſs of the Romans. The Army then marching down again ſufficiently revenged themſelves, under the conduct of Papirius. Several Towns which had revolted were recovered, and ſcarce could the Samnites obtain a Truce for two years. They brake this Truce ere the time was out, and thereby drew the War again upon them, which enduring for eleven years, they loſt many thouſands of men, with many Towns, which humbled them ſo, that upon their ſubmiſſion the uſual confederacy was granted to them. Then were the Æqui chaſtized, who had helped them, and thereby were other Nations affrighted into ſubjection. In the ſecond year after, began another War with the Hetruſcans, wherein were fought divers bloody battels; but ſtill the Romans had the better, who ſtormed divers Towns, and waſted the Country. Two years after, the Samnites rebelled again, and joyned with the Hetruſcans, but with the ſame ſucceſs as formerly, being grievouſly ſlaughtered, eſpecially under the conduct of Q. Fabius Maximus, and Decius Mus; the later of whom, ſeeing his wing give ground, in a great and bloody battel fought with the Samnites and Galls (for thoſe now had joyned with them) ſolemnly devoted himſelf and the Enemy to the Dii Manes, and ruſhing into the midſt was killed, as his Father had been forty four years before. Still continued the miſeries of the Samnites, and two years after their laſt Army (for this time it muſt be underſtood) was cut in pieces by L. Papirius ſon to the former, who alſo took many Towns, and for his ſervice obtained a moſt ſplendid Triumph. It is obſerved, that over the Samnites the Romans triumphed thirty times: viz. Conſuls twenty ſix times, L. Papirius the Dictator twice, Publius Philo once, who firſt of all others triumphed with Proconſular power, and once Q. Fabius another Proconſul. The Family of the Fabii obtained, of theſe thirty, four triumphs, and that of the Papirii five, as may be ſeen in the Capitoline Tables. This war having begun in the 410 year of the City, ended in the 481, and therefore continued 71 years, not fifty onely, as Florus, according to his cuſtome, falſely computeth; neither 81 as Appian, nor 49 onely, as Eutropius; nor yet onely ſeventy, which number Livie aſſigneth with tolerble difference. All Writers agree, that the Romans had no Enemy in Italy, who longer, or more pertinaciouſly, mannaged the grand quarrel with them, than the Samnites.

The conditions are renounced at Rome, and the Samnites often again defeated.

Decius Mus as his father before him, devoteth himſelf to the Dii Manes.

A ſummary account of the War with the Samnites.

7. During theſe ſucceſſes abroad, the People having got of late ſo many priviledges, were reaſonably quiet; yet their Tribunes having one occaſion left to create trouble to the Fathers, ſtomached much that all the Prieſts and Augurs ſhould be created out of the Nobility, and laboured to make the Commons partakers of theſe Offices. The Senate made no great reſiſtance, as being now accuſtomed to yield, and that in things of far greater moment, as the Conſulſhip, Cenſorſhip, Dictatorſhip, and Triumphs. So, whereas as yet there were but four chief Prieſts and as many

The Prieſthood and Augurſhip communicated to the Commons.

Augurs, to them were added four, and to thoſe five out of the body of the Commons. And this ſame year did M. Valerius the Conſul prefer a Law of Appeale more diligently enacted. Now was it the third time preferred ſince the baniſhment of the Kings, alwaies by the ſame Family. The cauſe of renewing it, ſaith Livie, I ſuppoſe was no other, than that the power of a few prevailed above the liberty of the Commons. Which cannot be, if we conſider, how for a long time the will of the multitude had got ground, and before this overturned the prerogative of the Patricians. The Lex Porcia, ſaith he, ſeemeth alone to be enacted for the backs of the Citizens, becauſe it inflicted an heavy puniſhment upon him that ſhould beat with rods or kill a Roman Citizen. The Lex Valeria having prohibited any to be killed or beaten who had appealed, if any did contrary, added no more than it was naughtily done, which (ſuch was then the modeſty of men) was I believe, a ſufficient obligation for the Law. Now ſcarcely can any one threaten a Slave in that manner. Fabius Gurges after this, being Conſul, fought unproſperouſly with the Samnites, whereupon the Senate conſulted about removing him from the Army. Fabius Maximus his Father deprecating this ignominy, prevented it, by promiſing he would go to the War as Legatus or Lieutenant to his Son. He performed it, and ſo aſſiſted the young man, that he procured him Victory, and a Triumph, wherein C. Pontius the Samnite being led was put to death. After this, L. Poſthumius a man of Conſular dignity, being ſet over the Army, uſed the help of the Soldiers in his own field, and for that was puniſhed. The Samnites deſiring Peace, the League was renewed with them the fourth time. But preſently again, as it ſeemeth, they rebelled; for P. Cornelius Rufinus, and Manius Curius (ſirnamed Dentatus, becauſe born with teeth, according to Plinie) overthrew them in ſeveral bloody battels, and took divers of their Towns. Livie in his eleventh Book (as appeareth from it's Epitome) wrote, that Curius Dentatus the Conſul, having overthrown the Samnites and Sabines, who had rebelled, triumphed twice the ſame year. After this were Colonies ſent to Caſtrum, Sena, and Adria. The Triumviri for Capital matters were now alſo firſt made. The Cenſus being perfected, the Luſtrum was made, and two hundred and ſeventy three thouſand Polls of the Roman Citizens were ceſſed.

The Law of Appeal renewed the third time.

Livii Epitom. lib. 11.

A. M. 3713.
Ol. 122. ann. 1
V. C. 462.
Seleuci 21.
Ptol. Lagi 32.

War with the Samnites.

Eutropius lib. 2.

8. Preſently after happened the third ſeparation of the Commons from the Patricians. The cauſe was the great debts which the poorer ſort had contracted. As a remedy for this the Tribunes of the Commons, thoſe incendiaries, propoſed new Tables in way of defalcation, which the Conſuls in favour of the Creditors oppoſed. The conteſt came to that height, that the Plebeians departed into the Janiculum, for the reconciliation and reducement of whom, Q. Hortenſius was made Dictator. He appeaſed them with good words, and perſwaded them to return, by promiſing that for the time to come their Plebiſcita ſhould have the force of Laws, and bind the whole politick body. This accordingly, by a Law called Lex Hortenſia, he enacted: though it appeareth out of Livy, that the ſame in effect had been granted twice before, viz. in the three hundred and fifth year of the City, by L. Valerius, and M. Horatius the Conſuls, and again in the four hundred and ſixteenth by Q. Publius Philo the Dictator, fifty years before this preſent, which having not been obſerved, might give the Commons as great diſtaſte as the matter of debts, if we may judge from that which pacified them. * Florus telleth a ſtory, that the buſineſs of Matrimony betwixt the Patricians and Plebeians cauſed this third ſeparation of the Commons into the Janiculum, the tumult being raiſed by Canuleius the Tribune. But ſtudents are to take notice, that none but he ſpeak any thing of this Sedition in this place, and by the inſtigation of this perſon, for this cauſe of marriage. That great Contentions were raiſed betwixt the two orders about the taking away the Law made by the Decemviri, which forbad marriage betwixt them, is often atteſted by Livy. But that the Commons departed into the Janiculum for the burthen of their debts, after great and long contentions in the four hundred and ſixty eight year of the City, is by ſeveral Authors affirmed, and that thence they were reduced by Hortenſius the Dictator, who preferred a Law in the Eſculeium, that what the Commons commanded ſhould bind all Quirites: neither do Writers mention any other cauſe of the third Separation.

The third ſeparation of the Commons.

Livii Epitom. lib. 11.
Plin. lib. 16.
Xonaras.

A.M. 3719.
Ol. 123. ann. 3.
V. C. 468.
Seleuc. 27.
Ptol. Lagi 38.

The Lex Hortenſia.

* Lib. 1. cap. 25.

The errour of Florus.

9. Hortenſius died in the time of his Magiſtracy. After this there was action with the Volſinienſes and Lucani, againſt whom aſſiſtance was given to the Thurini. Then the Roman Ambaſſadors being killed by the Galls Senones, War was decreed againſt them, and L. Cæcilius the Prætor was cut off by them with the Legions. The Tarentines being jealous of the growth of the Roman power, had hitherto privily Livius Epitom. l. 11. 12.

The Original of the Tarentines, and a deſcription of their Citie, Government, and converſation.

Lege Strabon. l.6. p.278.&c. Florum lib. 1. c. 18.

privily ſavoured the Samnites, though openly they maintained a confederacy with the Romans. This People, being the oſpring of the Partheniæ, who were baniſhed Lacedæmon, for that being promiſcuouſly begotten, they could not have any inheritance, and therefore plotted againſt the State as was ſhown before, inhabited a Citie called Tarentum, from Taras a certain Heroe, the Metropolis once of Calabria, Apulia, and all Lucania. It was ſituate in a Peninſula on the Bay of the Adriatick Sea, famous for its bigneſs, Walls, and Haven eſpecially, which lay ſo convenient for ſayling into the Roman Coaſts, Iſtria, Illyricum, Epirus, Achaia, Africk and Sicily, that Florus accounteth the ſituation admirable. The Tarentines affecting looſe Democratical Government, obtained great power in thoſe parts, having a more conſiderable Fleet than any of their neighbours, thirty thouſand Foot, three thouſand Horſe, and one thouſand perſons fit to command them. They imbraced the Philoſophy of Pythagoras , eſpecially one Archytas, who governed the Citie a long time. In aftertimes luxury was produced by proſperity to ſuch exceſs, that if credit may be given to Strabo, the Tarentines had more publick Feſtivals yearly, than the year hath dayes; by reaſon whereof, the State of the Commonwealth under ſuch a Government was rendred much worſe. One of their bad cuſtoms was (as he judgeth it) to uſe the Conduct of Foreiners in their Wars; for againſt the Meſſapii and Lucani they employed Alexander the Moloſſian, and before that Archidamus the Son of Ageſilaus, as afterward Cleonymus and Agathocles; and afterwards Pyrrhus againſt the Romans. They contended with the Meſſapii about Heraclea, and imployed alſo againſt them the two Kings of the Daunii and Peucetii. Neither would they obey the foreign Captains for whom they had ſent, but fell to odds with them which procured no ſmall inconvenience.

Oroſius lib. 4. cap. 1. Xonaras.

The Original of their War with the Romans.

* Valer. Max. lib. 2. cap. 5. Exemp. 5.

They ſend for Pyrrhus King of Epirus.

Plutarch in Pyrrho.

10. Near to the Haven, in the view of the Sea, was the Theatre of the City, which proved the cauſe of all its miſery and calamities, ſaith Florus. They were therein beholding Games, when L. Valerius (the Duumvir as he is called in Livy's Epitome) or one of the Roman Admirals ſayled thither as to a confederate Citie. They taking the Romans for Enemies, ſaith Florus (who addeth what cannot be credited, that they ſcarce knew, who, or whence the Romans were) or as others think, having both knowledge and malice ſufficient, ſet upon the Fleet, and either ſunk, or at leaſt rifled it, and ſlew the Admiral. The Senate ſent L. Poſthumius to complain of the injury, who delivering his meſſage boldly was diſmiſſed with a very diſſatisfactory anſwer, at his coming in, having had * Urine thrown upon him, or one of his Companions. War therefore was decreed againſt the Tarentines, and committed to the management of L. Æmilius the Conſul, who firſt indeavoured by fair means to reclaim them, and when that could not do it, waſted their Territories with Fire and Sword, revenging their inſolence with cruelty as Oroſius writeth, for which ſervice he triumphed the year after his Conſulſhip, as appeareth out of an old inſcription. The Tarentines finding themſelves too weak for the encounter, ſent to Pyrrhus King of Epirus for aid, whom they had formerly aſſiſted againſt the Corcyræans. The multitude were of themſelves rather inclined to peace; but a certain company of men, by Greek Authors called Demagogi (from their leading of the People) would not let them reſt, till they had reſolved upon the War; whereupon they ſent Ambaſſadors to Pyrrhus, who not onely in their name, but of other Italians alſo preſented him with gifts, and ſignified that they ſtood in need of a General, Eminent both for abilities and reputation; Italy it ſelf being able to furniſh them with Forces out of the Countreys of the Lucanians, Meſſapians, and Samnites. The King being of a reſtleſs ſpirit, incouraging himſelf in vain hopes (whereby he graſped as it were the Empire of all the Weſt) promiſed them to come over with an Army, and diſpatched before him with three thouſand men, One Cineas a Theſſalian, an excellent Orator, and Scholar of Demoſthenes. He afterwards took the Sea himſelf with twenty Elephants, three thouſand Horſe, and twenty two Foot, beſides five hundred Archers and Slingers; but upon the Main was ſeized with ſuch a Tempeſt, that his Fleet being ſevered, many Veſſels were loſt, he was forced to leap out into the Water, and with great hazard got to Land, and onely at preſent two Elephants, a very few Horſe-men, and about two thouſand Foot could be recovered from the Shipwrack by the Meſſapians, upon the Coaſts of whom they were caſt.

A. M. 3725.
O'. 125. ann. 1.
V. C. 474.
Seleucidarum 33.
Antiochi Soteris 3.
Ptol. Philadelph. 5.
Idem ibid.

11. Pyrrhus did nothing without the conſent of the Tarentines, till his Ships, and the greater part of his Army arrived; then taking notice how they minded nothing but bathing and feaſting, he ſhut up the publick meeting places, reſtrained them from walking (in which exerciſe they were wont to diſcourſe idly concerning War) and forbidding drinking, and Games, called them to Arms, making Levies of the youth with ſome rigour and ſeverity. Valerius Lævinus the Conſul haſting to give him battel ere the aſſiſtance of the Confederates came, he drew out his Army to him; but before they ſhould joyn, ſent to him, offering himſelf an Umpire betwixt the Romans, and their adverſaries, to which Valerius anſwered, that they neither cared for him as an Umpire, nor feared him as an Enemy, and taking his Spies, he cauſed them to be led throughout the Camp, and then bade them return, and tell him what they had ſeen. Pyrrhus pitched his Tents betwixt Pandoſa and Heraclea, a Town ſituate betwixt Tarentum and Metapontus, built by the Tarentines. The Romans beyond the River Siris not Liris, a River of Campania, as Florus and Oroſius Write, who alſo draw Heraclea out of that part of Magna Græcia, lying upon Siris and Metapontus, into Campania. In the fight Pyrrhus had his Horſe killed under him, by one Obſidius a Ferentane, who was ſlain in the place by his followers. This made him change Armour with one near to him, who being made at for him and ſtruck down, his Armour was taken from off him, and being carried about by the Romans in token of his death, ſtruck ſuch a terrour into his Souldiers that it had coſt him the Victory, but that he ſeaſonably with ſome labour made himſelf known. Whileſt the Victory ſeemed yet to be doubtful, or rather to incline toward the Romans, the Elephants being brought into the battel decided the controverſie. Till the paſſing of Alexander into the Eaſt, this Beaſt had been talked of, but never ſeen by the Europæans nor them of Aſia, except the Indians and their neighbours, as alſo the Southern Africans. Homer deſcribeth the houſes of rich men to have been adorned with Ivory, but as * Pauſanias noteth, never mentioneth the beaſt. The Romans themſelves were amazed, not knowing what they were; but the fault is laid upon their Horſes, which not enduring the ſmell or bigneſs of the Elephants broke their Ranks which opportunity the King took, and ſending his Horſe in amongſt the Romans thus diſordered, put them to the rout. He got but a bloody Victory, he himſelf being wounded, and a great part of his men ſlain, though of the numbers on either ſide Writers do not agree.

Eutrop.

Who defeateth Lævinus the Conſul by the help of his Elephants.

* *Eximp. vid in Atticis p.*11 *& Juſtin l.*18.

12. Having taken Priſoners one thouſand and eight hundred of the Romans, he uſed them with great civility, and buried their dead, whom obſerving to be wounded all before, and to be with ſtern countenances, he lifted up his eyes, and ſaid: He could have been Maſter of all the world if he had had but ſuch Souldiers. After this having received the Auxiliaries of the Sammites, Lucani and Brutii, he marched towards Rome as far as Præneſte, a Town eighteen miles diſtant from the City, waſting all with fire and Sword in his paſſage. Hearing that the Romans were buſie in recruiting their Army, he conſidered it was moſt creditable for him to make peace with them, being he had no hopes to ſubdue them, and for that purpoſe ſent Cineas to feel their minds, a man ſo powerful in the art of Rhetorick, that the King acknowledged him to have ſtormed more Cities by his Tongue, than he had ever done by force of Arms. Cineas preſented the principal Citizens and their Wives with gifts from Pyrrhus; but they refuſed them. When he had ſomething wrought upon the Senate to make a peace, and admit Pyrrhus into the Citie, Appius Claudius now blind came in, and by an Oration, recorded by Plutarch, procured the contrary. The Ambaſſadour at his return being asked what he thought of Rome, anſwered, that the Senate ſeemed to him as a Council of ſo many Kings. After Cineas his return the Romans ſent to Pyrrhus about redeeming of Priſoners, amongſt others C. Fabricius, a man of great note for virtue and poverty. The King being informed by Cineas concerning his diſpoſition, offered him Gold, which when he refuſed with great reſolution, to try his gravity, the next day as they were talking together, he commanded the greateſt Elephant he had to be ſet behind the hanging, and then on a ſudden the Tapeſtry being removed, the beaſt held his Proboſcis over Fabricius his head, and roared exceedingly. But he not at all terrified, though he had never before ſeen this kind of Creature, ſmiled, and told the King, that neither his Gold the day before, nor his Elephant now did at all move him. Pyrrhus amazed at his greatneſs of mind, releaſed to him the Priſoners, on this condition, that if the Senate accepted not of Peace they ſhould return to him, which accordingly they did, having ſaluted their friends, and ſolemnized the Saturnalia, being commanded to do it by the Fathers upon pain of death.

Eutrop. ut prius & Plutarch.

Marcheth towards Rome.

Sendeth about a peace which Appius Claudius hindereth.

Fabricius goeth to him about redeeming of Priſoners.

13. P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Decius Mus, being Conſuls for the following year, were

A. M. 3726.
V. C. 475.

Lib. 13.

Tuſcul.

Several ingagements of the Romans with him.

were ſent againſt Pyrrhus. The Romans by this time had learnt not to fear Elephants with ſuch aſtoniſhment as formerly; ſo that theſe beaſts now were overcome and killed, Pyrrhus himſelf was wounded, twenty thouſand of his men ſlain, and five thouſand of the Romans, according to Eutropius, but from Livies Epitome, it ſhould appear that the iſſue of this battel was doubtful, and Cicero writeth that Decius was ſlain. Florus relateth, that firſt in Apulia, and then at Aſculum the Romans had better ſucceſs, Curius and Fabricius being Conſuls; for now the terror of the Elephants was worn off, and C. Minutius by cutting off the Proboſcis from one, ſhewed that the Beaſts could die. Darts were thrown ſo thick upon them, and fire upon the Towers on their backs, that the Army was ſorely diſtreſſed, in which condition it remained till night relieved it, and the King being the laſt that fled, having received a wound in his ſhoulder, was carryed out by his Guard in his Armour. But as Florus is to be read with great caution in every place, ſo eſpecially in this; for Curius and Fabricius were never Conſuls together, as the Tables ſhow. This therefore is to be referred to the enſuing year wherein C. Fabricius Luſcinus, and Q. Æmylius Papus (both of them the ſecond time) were Conſuls. Plutarch writeth that two dayes together Pyrrhus and the Conſuls fought at Aſculum; whereof, on the former, his Elephants could do him no ſervice, but on the later, chuſing a more even ground, by the means of the Elephants eſpecially, he drove the Romans back into their Camp, having ſlain of them ſix thouſand, and loſt three thouſand and five hundred and five of his own men, as Hieronymus relateth out of the Kings Records. But he addeth, that Dionyſius neither wrote any thing of two battels fought at Aſculum, neither, for certain, of Pyrrhus his Victory: one fight he mentioned fought till Sun-ſet, at the concluſion whereof Pyrrhus was wounded in the Arm, which wound, with the Samnites rifling his baggage, put an end to it; either party having loſt above fifteen thouſand men. That this battel (or thoſe battels) fell out in the year aforeſaid is clear from that which moved Pyrrhus this way to attempt the ending of the controverſie. For the Conſuls, Fabricius and Æmilius, receiving a Letter from the Kings * Phyſician, wherein he offered to poyſon him, upon condition to be well requited, they wrote back to Pyrrhus to acquaint him with the Treaſon, and in theirs included the Phyſicians Letter. To requite the Romans for this courteſie, he ſent back their Priſoners gratis, and diſpatched away Cineas again to treat of Peace. The Romans would neither receive their Captives in way of free gift, nor reward; but ſent him ſo many of the Samnites and Tarentines: as for Peace, they refuſed to admit of any, except he would return with his Forces into Epirus. He perceiving (ſaith Plutarch) that he muſt try with them another battel, marched unto Aſculum. Moreover the Triumphal Tables ſhow, that in the Conſulſhip of Fabricius and Æmilius, the Romans fought with the Lucani, Brutii, Tarentines, and Samnites at Aſculum, which as * Strabo writeth, was a Town of the Piceni in the midland Country, moſt Fortified by nature, being encompaſſed, beſides a Wall, with mountains, over which no Army could paſs.

* De hac hiſtoria aliter apud alios relata Conſule Livii Epit. l. 13. Val. Max. l. 6. c. 5. Exem. 1. Tullii Offic. l. 3. Gellium l. 3. c. 8.

* Lib. 5. p. 241. B.

Pyrrhus getting nothing by his very ſucceſs.

Is ſent for into Sicily and paſſeth over thither.

14. Pyrrhus after this action at Aſculum, is reported to have anſwered one who congratulated with him about his ſucceſs, in this manner: If we overcome the Romans another time we are utterly loſt. For he had by this time loſt a great part of the Souldiers he had brought over, and almoſt all his friends and Captains: he had no more to ſend for: he perceived his Italian Allies to loiter, and the Romans to have a conſtant ſupply, whereby they preſently recruited their Army, and filled up their Legions, and he ſaw clearly that their courage was nothing daunted by the loſs of one battel, but rather their ſtrength and reſolution to be the more increaſed. Being preſſed with theſe difficulties, he had preſently a recourſe to vain hopes, occaſioned by ſuch affairs as caſt him neceſſarily into an anxious deliberation. For at the ſame time, the Agrigentines, Syracuſians, and Leontines, out of Sicily, gave up themſelves to him, deſiring his help in caſting out the Carthaginians, and clearing the Iſland of Tyrants: and out of Greece came intelligence, that Ptolomæus Cærannus was ſlain in battel by the Galls, and therefore it was moſt convenient for him to come into Macedonia, now without a King. Blaming Fortune much that had conjoyned two ſuch great opportunities, whereof the one muſt neceſſarily be omitted, after a long debate he reſolved to apply himſelf to the matters of Sicily, as more conſiderable than the other of Greece, becauſe of Africk. Having ſent over Cineas beforehand to deal with the Cities about the ſtate of affairs, he put a Garriſon upon the Tarentines, who took it in ill part, requiring him either to proſecute the Gellius l. 4. c. 8.

A. M. 3728.
V. C. 477.

L. 2. de Oratore.

War againſt the Romans, for which he had been called, or clearly quitting the Country of Tarentum, to leave the City in that condition wherein he found it: But returning them no pleaſant anſwer, he bade them ſtay his time, and ſo departed, after he had carryed on the War in Italy two years and four months. For the following year, P. Cornelius Rufinus, and C. Julius Brutus, both the ſecond time, were Conſuls. Rufinus was a man very expert in War, but extraordinarily covetous and ſcraping, inſomuch that upon this account he was much hated by Fabricius, formerly mentioned. Yet, when this year he ſtood for the Conſulſhip, for that it was a very dangerous time, and his competitors were perſons of no value, Fabricius laboured earneſtly to have him elected, and when every one wondered at it; either to his friends, or, as Cicero* writeth, to Rufinus himſelf, giving him thanks, he anſwered: Malui compilari quam vænire, I deſired rather to be pilled than ſold.

Returneth with difficulty.

A. M. 3730.
Ol. 126. an. 2.
V. C. 479.
Seleucid 38.
Antiochi Sot. 8.
Ptol. Philad. 10.

15. Pyrrhus having found things in Sicily according to his mind, proceeded in his enterprize with as much ſatisfaction, till growing tyrannical, he incurred the hatred of thoſe that imployed him, part of whom revolted to the Carthaginians, and others betook themſelves to the aid of the Mamertines. Perceiving at length that he was involved in the deep hatred of all, and nothing throughout the Iſland but revolts, new councils and a ſtrong conſpiracy againſt him, he received Letters from the Samnites and Tarentines, who being ſhut up in their Towns, which they hardly maintained, deſired his aſſiſtance. He was glad of ſo ſpecious a pretence, that he might not ſeem to be driven by deſperation out of Sicily, which indeed as a periſhing Veſſel in ſo great a Tempeſt he was not able to govern, and ſo returned into Italy, after he had been abſent near as long as formerly he had there continued. The Barbarians ſet upon him in his paſſage, and the Carthaginians ſo diſtreſſed him in the Straights, that he loſt many of his Ships. The Mamertines having landed, to the number of ten thouſand men before him, would not adventure to fight with him, but diſtreſſed his Army much in narrow and difficult places, killing two Elephants and many Men in the rear. He himſelf fighting in the front with a valiant and skilful Enemy, received a hurt in his head, whereupon he withdrew himſelf a little. This ſo animated the Mamertines, that one of them, great in bulk, and glittering with armour, came out far before the reſt, and in a threatning manner bade Pyrrhus come forth if he were alive. Pyrrhus inraged with his guard, bloody as he was, and with a terrible countenance ruſhed through the midſt, and coming up to the Barbarian, ſtruck him with ſuch fury upon the head, that the ſtroak through the Swords mettal and the ſtrength of the arm, pierced to the lower part of the body, ſo that in a moment it was chined down in the middle, and the two parts fell down on either ſide. The Barbarians aſtoniſhed hereat, left off their attempts, and ſo without further interruption he marched with twenty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe to Tarentum, where increaſing his Forces by new levies, he proceeded into Samnium againſt the Romans, who there lay incamped.

He is defeated by Curius Dentatus the Conſul.

16. Few of the Samnites joyned now with him, becauſe being ſo often overthrown by the Romans, their courage was wholly broken, and for that they were diſpleaſed with him for his going into Sicily. He divided his Forces into two parts, whereof one he ſent againſt L. Cornelius Lentulus into Lucania to hinder him from joyning with his Colleague M. Curius Dentatus the other Conſul, againſt whom he marched, then lying in a fortified place near Beneventum. Haſting to ſet upon him ere the other could come to his relief, with the moſt valiant of his men, and fierceſt of his Elephants picked out, he marched by night towards his Camp, but paſſing through Woods his lights failed him, and going out of his way he loſt his time ſo much, that at break of day the Romans diſcovered him upon the Hills. Curius then in haſt, as he could, drew out his Forces, and falling upon the vantguard of Pyrrhus put it to flight, killing many men, and taking ſome Elephants. Animated by this ſucceſs, he deſcended into the Plain, and there joyned battel with the whole Army. In one wing he beat back the Enemy, in the other by the violence of the beaſts was born back to his Camp, whence calling forth thoſe who kept the guard, they from high places ſo plied the Elephants with darts, that they forced them back upon their own friends, whom bearing down, and breaking their ranks, they thereby procured Victory to the Romans. Florus and Oroſius, contrary to what Plutarch reporteth of Beneventum (concerning which place Learned men do much doubt) make the battel to have been fought in Lucania in the Arruſinian Plains. Florus writeth, that the cauſe of the Victory was a young Elephants being wounded in the head, which turning back and roaring for the pain, the Dam hearing him, ran as to his relief, and ſo both of them diſordered the battel, ſhe overturning as Enemies all ſhe met. Oroſius ſaith, that the beaſts were thus diſordered by bundles of hemp beſmeared with pitch, which having hooks in them and ſet on fire, the Romans caſt upon their backs, and the Towers ſet thereon. Frontinus maketh the battel fought about Fatuentum, in the Aruſinian Plains. Eutropius is ſilent concerning the place; but writeth, that Curius Dentatus beat Pyrrhus back to Tarentum, ſlew twenty three thouſand of his men, and led, the firſt of all others, Elephants (four in number) in triumph to Rome; which beaſts the Romans called Lucæ boves, becauſe they were firſt brought out of Lucania, where Pyrrhus was overthrown: This maketh much againſt that place which Plutarch aſſigneth for the battel, the original of whoſe error ſeemeth a miſtaking of Beneventum for Fatuentum, or Statuentum, a City of Lucania.

16. This Victory, ſaith Plutarch, made way for the eſtabliſhment of the Roman Empire: for the Romans got ſuch courage and reputation by this ſucceſs, that being counted invincible, they preſently obtained all Italy, and not long after, Sicily alſo. As for Pyrrhus, he having ſpent ſix years, and fall'n from his hopes both in Italy and Sicily, returned into Epirus, yet with a mind nothing daunted. He was thought the Ableſt Captain of all the Kings of that time, both for military skill, and perſonal valour; but what he had already obtained, he loſt ſtill by ſtriving to graſp more. Therefore Antigonus compared him to a Gameſter, who having lucky hits, knew not how to uſe them. (a) Having ſent to the Kings of Aſia, and Antigonus eſpecially, for men and money, after he had received bare Letters, he called the Epirots and Tarentines together, and told them, that preſently aſſiſtance would come, which report being carryed unto the Roman Camp, the Conſuls durſt not ſtir, and ſo taking this advantage, the night following, he paſſed over unmoleſted into Epirus (b) Curius the Conſul having taken his Camp, touched nothing of the plunder; and whereas the Senate gave ſeven Acres of ground apiece to the people, and five hundred to him, he would not exceed the common proportion. This year, C. Fabricius Luſcinus and Q. Æmilius Papus, much (c) commended for their poverty, being Cenſors, (d) removed P. Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice Conſul and once Dictator, from the Senate, becauſe they had found in his houſe of plate for the ſervice of his table ten pounds; this being againſt a Law, as (e) Plutrach hinteth. At this Luſtrum were ceſſed two hundred ſeventy one thouſand two hundred and twenty four polls of Roman Citizens, as appeareth from the Epitome of the fourteenth Book of Livie's Hiſtory.

And withdraweth himſelf into his own Kingdom.

(a) Pauſan. in Atticis.
(bq) Val. Max. l. 4. c. 3. exemp. 5.
(c) Idem l. 4. c. 4. exemp. 3.
(d) Livii Epit. l. 14.
Val. Max. l. 2. c. 9. exemp. 4.
Agellius l. 17. c. 21.
(e) In Sylia.

17. The Roman name had begun to be famous before, but was terrible after the overthrow of Pyrrhus. In the ſecond year after his flight, (a) Ptolomy Philadelphus ſent Ambaſſadors to congratulate with the Romans about their ſucceſs, and to enter into confederacy with them. They ſent, to do him honour, Ambaſſadors alſo to Alexandria, where he received them moſt courteouſly, and ſent them back loaded with gifts. At their return they brought the gifts, though given to themſelves in particular, into the Treaſury; but the Senate commanded them to be reſtored. In the third year after the departure of Pyrrhus, the (b) Tarentines, being neither able to drive out the Garriſon he had there left under Milo, nor procure Peace of the Romans, deſired aid of the Carthaginians, wherewith giving the Romans battel, they were overthrown. Milo ſenſible how badly he was able to reſiſt, by leave from the Conſul Papirius, departed with his men, and left the Caſtle, which the Romans having got into their hands, eaſily maſtered the City, the walls whereof they demoliſhed. Peace and liberty was granted to the Citizens, and the two Conſuls L. Papirius Curſor, and Sp. Cornelius Maximus (both Conſuls the ſecond time) triumphed, having finiſhed both the Tarentine War and that of the Samnites in the four hundred and eighty firſt (or the four hundred and eighty ſecond) year of the City, as the Capitoline tables do ſhew. The greateſt part of Italy was now conquered, an acceſſion being made not only of the Tarentines and Samnites, but the Lucanians alſo, and a little before of the Etruſcans. After this, the (c) Campanian Legion, which without command had ſeized upon Rhegium was beſieged, and upon ſurrender was put to death. The Inhabitants of Apollonia in Illyricum ſending Ambaſſadors to Rome, the two Ædiles Q. Fabius and Cn. Apronius beat them, and for that were delivered up to the Apolloniates. The Picentes were overcome and had peace given them. Colonies were ſent forth to Ptolomy Philadelphus by an Embaſſie maketh a confederacy with the Romans.

The Caſtle and Town of Tarentum taken; moſt of Italy being now ſubdued.

(a) Livii Ep. l. 14.
Eutrop. l. 2.
Val. Max. l. 4. c. 3. ex. 9.

(b) Oroſius l. 4. c. 3.
Xonaras.
A. M. 3733.
Ol. 127. an. 1.
V. C. 482.
Seleucid. 41.
Antioch Sot. 11
Ptol. Philad. 13.

(c) Livii Epit. lib. 15.
Val. Max. l. 6. c. 6. exemp. 5.

Silver money firſt ſtamped.

(d) Lib. 33. c. 3.

Ariminum in the Country of the Piceni, and to Beneventum (till now called Maleventum) in that of the Samnites. About the ſame time was ſilver Coin firſt ſtamped at Rome, braſs being uſed altogether till now, the State having got much ſilver in a Caſtle of the Samnites, as Xonaras writeth. This hapned five years before the firſt Punick War, as (d) Pliny computeth, C. Fabius Piſtor, and Q. Ogulnius Gallus being Conſuls, in the fourteenth year of Antiochus Soter, and the ſixteenth of Ptolomy Philadelphus, A. M. 3736, two hundred and ſixty ſeven years before the birth of Chriſt.

SECT. II.

From the Firſt Punick War, to that with Antiochus the Great, in which the Romans firſt invaded Aſia, the ſpace of thirty ſeven years.

The Original of the Sicilian or firſt Punick War.

A. M. 3740.
Ol. 128. an. 4.
V. C. 490.
Seleucid. 49.
Antioch. Sot. 19.
Ptolom. Philad. 21.

1. THe Umbri and Sallentini being newly ſubdued, and the number of Quæſtors being increaſed to eight, the Romans took occaſion to transfer their Armies over the Sea into Sicily, and begun that, which from the Iſland (that gave both occaſion to, and was the ſeat of, it) is by Greek Writers called the Sicilian War. There had the Mamertines moſt perfidiouſly ſeized on Meſſana, as is already related, and thereupon were become Enemies to Hieron King of Syracuſe, who beſieged them juſtly as thieves and murderers, and had taken the City, but that Annibal the Carthaginian cunningly diverted him, with an intention to get it into his own hands, as it came to paſs; for pretending fair things to the Mamertines, as before to Hiero, and ſending them in proviſions, he poſſeſſed himſelf of the Caſtle. They being thus cheated by him, and now ſtraightned by both, who had joyned together againſt them, betook themſelves to the Romans for relief. The Senate begun to be very ſenſible of the power of the Carthaginians, who had now almoſt the whole Iſland in their hands, and was jealous of their approach ſo near to Italy; ſo that a juſt quarrel with them ſeemed very acceptable. But ſo bad was the cauſe of the Mamertines, as they could not in conſcience undertake the patronage of it, and gave them a denial. From the Senate the thing was brought to the People, which beſides it's antient uſe to debate matters concerning War, had by the Hortenſian Law obtained power by it's Plebiſcita to bind the whole State. The Prætors ſhewed what great profit would redound to the Commonwealth in general, and particularly to private Citizens (who having ſuffered much by the late Italian Wars, were deſirous by a new one to recruit their fortunes) and therefore by a Plebiſcitum they decreed aid to be ſent to the Mamertines, in the four hundred and eighty ninth year of the City, Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges the third time, and L. Milius Vitulus being Conſuls.

Hiero King of Syracuſe being worſted maketh his peace with the Romans.

2. In the year following, and the Conſulſhip of Appius Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, Appius was ſent over with an Army to Meſſana, to execute the commands of the People. He firſt defeated Hiero, then the Carthaginians, and ſo raiſed the ſiege. The ſucceeding Conſuls Manius Octacilius and M. Valerius Maximus, were ordered both, and with all the Legions, to paſs into Sicily, wherewith Hiero was affrighted into obedience, perceiving that the Romans were moſt likely to remain Victors, and made his Peace upon theſe terms, To reſtore all their priſoners without ranſom, and pay one hundred Talents of Silver. The Romans imbraced his friendſhip the more readily, for that the Carthaginians being maſters at Sea, they could not well ſend over proviſions, which they hoped might be ſupplyed by him in good meaſure. They alſo by this alliance thought themſelves eaſed of the burthen of War, and therefore the next year they ſent over but two Legions. Valerius the Conſul from Meſſana had the ſirname of Meſſala, who alſo having taken Catana, carryed thence a new Sun-Dial to Rome, Papirius Curſor having thirty years before ſet up the firſt that ever was in that City. This though not perfect, the People uſed ninety nine years, till M. Philippus their Cenſor ſet up a perfect one by it, and about the ſame time Scipio Naſica being Cenſor, firſt divided the equal diviſion of the day into hours, by water dropping out of one veſſel into another. This Pliny relateth out of Varro, who alſo reported, that out of Sicily the firſt Barbers were brought to Rome by P. Ticinius Mena, about the four hundred and fifty fourth year of the City, before which time the Romans never cut their hair. The firſt that that was ſhaven every day was Scipio Africanus, whom Auguſtus imitated therein; none more uſing the Razor than he.

A Dial brought out of Sicily to Rome.

And Barbers.

Agrigentum taken.

3. The next year was Agrigentum taken after a long ſiege; Hannibal who came to raiſe it being overthrown by L. Poſthumius and Q. Mamilius the Conſuls. The news whereof filled Rome with exceſſive joy, and the Citizens now elevated in mind, would not acquieſce in former Councils. It ſeemed not ſufficient to them, that they had ſaved the Mamertines, nor inriched themſelves with great booty: but conceiving good hope that they might be able to caſt the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and much thereby promote their affairs, they thitherto directed their thoughts and conſultations. On Land indeed they ſeemed ſufficiently to proſper, for L. Valerius and T. Octacilius the ſucceeding Conſuls, managed the War very well; but the Carthaginians without controverſie being Maſters at Sea, thereby procured the Maritime Towns to revolt to them, ſo that the War was poiſed betwixt the two intereſts, now inclining to one ſide, and then preſently to the other. Moreover Italy was often moleſted by the Carthaginian Fleet; but Africk out of all danger. Wherefore they concluded, there was neceſſity of betaking themſelves alſo to Sea matters. Having never as much as thought of the Sea before, they now ſet upon building of one hundred Quinqueremes and twenty Triremes, a thing moſt difficult, becauſe the Carpenters were utterly to ſeek how to make the former ſort of Gallies, their uſe being utterly unknown to the Italians. But before they had made tryal, when they firſt tranſported their Forces to Meſſana, they ventured to fight with the Carthaginians, who had received the Dominion of the Sea, without any competition from their Anceſtors; which boldneſs and confidence Polybius eſteemeth no leſs than miraculous. Firſt of all Cn. Cornelius the Conſul and Admiral, going with ſeven Veſſels to reduce a Town of the Liparæans, was taken in the Haven by one ſent from Hannibal. But Duilius his Collegue preſently after gave the Carthaginians a great overthrow, the Souldiers having provided iron hooks, by the help of which they could board them and fight as on Land. The Romans hereby extraordinarily animated, relieved the Ægeſtans, and took Macella a certain Town by ſtorm. But Amilcar Captain of the Carthaginian Land-Forces then lying at Panormus, underſtanding that in the Roman Camp there was a mutiny, for that the Auxiliaries and Legions contended who ſhould have the firſt place in battel; and that the former had ſeparated themſelves, he ſuddenly fell upon them in their removal, and killed almoſt four thouſand men. Hannibal after this loſs at Sea departed to Carthage, where recruiting his Naval Forces he went into Sardinia, and being blocked up in a port by the Romans, loſt many ſhips, and for that was crucified by the Souldiers, who overlived the defeat. The puniſhment which he feared for the former overthrow he craftily evaded; for, before the thing was heard at Carthage, he ſent one of his friends thither, who coming to the Court, told the Senate that the Roman Admiral was come with a great Fleet, and therefore he was come to ask their advice whether he ſhould fight him. All the Senate anſwered, there was no doubt but he ought, to which the meſſenger replyed, he hath fought and is overthrown. By this means he hindered them from condemning that fact, which before they had judged that it ought to be done.

A. M. 3743.
Ol. 129. an. 3.
V. C. 492.
Antioch.Theï. 1.
Ptol.Philad 23

The Romans now firſt apply themſelves to Sea matters.

Hannibal crucified by his Souldiers.

A. M. 3745.
Val. Max. l. 7.
c. 3. exter.
exemp. 7.

Hanno ſlain.

4. Now had the Romans paſſed both into Sardinia and Corſica; Divine Providence as Caſaubon noteth upon Polybius, ſo ordering it, that preſent ſucceſs ſhould diſpoſe their minds for ſuch future undertakings, as made way for their decreed Empire. (a) Hanno, the year following, being in Sardinia was ſlain, and his Army cut off by L. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul. The next, many Towns were loſt and taken in Sicilie on both ſides. But (b) Calpurnius Flemma a Roman Tribune (or Leader of a Legion) gave a great demonſtration of his valour. For A. Attilius Calatinus the Conſul, having raſhly brought the Army into ſuch ſtraights, out of which there was no poſſibility to extricate himſelf, he with three hundred men took an hill near adjoyning, and drew thereby the Carthaginians to himſelf, till the Army could paſs through without oppoſition. All the three hundred were ſlain, yet he ſorely wounded and covered with dead bodies ſurvived, being by Roman Writers compared, for this act, to Leonidas the Spartan. This ſtory is twice told by Julius Frontinus, who acquainteth us with the uncertainty of the mans name, ſome calling him Laberius, others Q. Cæditius, but moſt Calpurnius Flamma. The following year, C. Attilius Regulus the Conſul ſubdued the Iſlands Lipara and Melita, whereof the later is ennobled by the ſhip-wrack of St. Paul, lying betwixt Sicily and Africk. Polybius writeth, that firſt Regulus was worſted at Sea, and then he defeated the Carthaginians. Now the Romans reſolved to change the ſeat of the War

(a) Oroſius l. 4. c. 7.
(b) Front. Statag. l. 1. c. 5. Exemp. 15. & l. 4. c. 5. Exemp. 10.
Gellius l. 3. c. 7. alii.

The valiant act of Calpurnius Flamma.

The Conſuls paſs into Africk, and in their paſſage defeat the Carthaginians at Sea.

War into Africk, and the next year ſent a Fleet under command of the Conſuls M. Attilus Regulus (who was ſubſtituted in the place of Cæditius) and L. Manlius, containing three hundred and thirty long and covered ſhips. The Carthaginians ſenſible enough how concerned they were to keep the War from their own doors, oppoſed them with three hundred and fifty Veſſels, and a threefold battel was fought, on the ſame day, in which the Romans remained Victors, having taken ſixty four ſhips with the defendants, and ſunk thirty, and of their own loſt twenty four, but not with the men; for the Carthaginians fearing their Corvi or Iron hooks, were afraid to come near them. Repairing then the ſhips they had taken, they paſſed over into Africk, and had ſurrendered to them Clupea a City ſeated upon the Promontory Hermæa. This done, they ſent to the Senate for further orders, employing themſelves, till the return of the meſſengers, in waſting the Country, which they did without interruption. At length they received the reſolution of the Senate, which was, that one of them ſhould continue in Africk with a convenient Army, and the other return to Rome with the remaining Forces.

Regulus maketh War againſt a monſtrous Serpent.

Defeateth the Carthaginians, and not long after is defeated and taken himſelf.

5. (a) M. Attillius Regulus remained in Africk with forty ſhips, fifteen thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe. Pitching his Camp upon the River Bragada, or Bagrada, he was forced to make (b) War with a Serpent of miraculous bigneſs, which with the great trouble of his whole Army, and uſe of Engines for battery, at length he ſlew, and ſent its skin, one hundred and twenty Foot long, to Rome. The Hiſtory hereof was curiouſly and elegantly related by Livie, as (c) Valerius telleth us. After this, (d) the Conſul gave the Carthaginians a defeat, fighting in ſuch a place where their Horſe and Elephants could do them no ſervice, and then took Tunetum or Tunis. But not long after he was overthrown himſelf, taken priſoner, and almoſt his whole Army loſt; this Victory being got for the Carthaginians by Xantippus, the Lacedemonian, whom afterwards ſending honourably home as they pretended, they commanded thoſe that carryed him to drown him and his in the Sea, leſt ſo great a Victory ſhould be aſcribed to the Lacedemonians, as Appian writeth. Of thirty thouſand but a few eſcaped into the City Aſpis (called alſo Clupea) where they were beſieged, till their Enemies perceiving they profited nothing, roſe up and made proviſion for reſiſting the ſuccours which the Senate ſent the following year, under command of M. Æmilius Paulus and Ser. Fabius Nobilior, the Conſuls. They taking the Sea with three hundred and fifty ſhips were oppoſed by the Carthaginians, whom they defeated, and took one hundred and fourteen of their Veſſels with the men in them, as Polybius writeth, or took thirty and ſank one hundred and four, as Eutropius and Oroſius, the later whereof addeth, that of the Carthaginians were ſlain thirty five thouſand, and that the Romans loſt nine Gallies and one thouſand and one hundred men. The Conſuls then went to Clupea, but, taking in the relicks of the Army, preſently ſet ſail again for Sicily. The Pilots told them they muſt take heed of the outward part of that Iſland, which was full of ſhelves and very dangerous, eſpecially at that time betwixt the riſing of Orion and the Dog. But they gave no heed to the Seamen, out of a deſire, by ſhewing of their freſh Victory and Plunder, to procure certain Towns upon the Coaſts to yield. They had ſafely paſſed the middle of the Sea, and drew near to the Coaſts of Camarina, when ſuch a tempeſt and ſo great calamities fell upon them, as cannot be expreſſed, ſaith Polybius, for the greatneſs thereof. For, of four hundred and ſixty four ſhips, eighty ſcarcely were ſaved, and the reſt were ſwallowed up, or caſt upon Rocks, ſo that the Shoar was filled with dead bodies, and broken pieces of Ships. Both the Conſuls periſhed. Thoſe few that eſcaped Hiero kindly received, and furniſhing them with Cloaths and other neceſſaries, conveyed them ſafe to Meſſana. Karthalo the Carthaginian taking advantage of this diſaſter, beſieged, conquered, and burnt Agrigentum, the Walls whereof he alſo demoliſhed.

(a) Polybius lib. 1.

(b) *Gallius l.*6. c. 3. *Liv. Epit.l.*18.

(c) *Lib.*1. c.ult Exemp. ult. Polybius ut ſupra.

A. M. 3749.
Ol. 131. an. 1.
V. C. 498.
Ant. Thei. 7.
Ptol. Philad. 29.
M. Attilio Regulo 2.
L. Manlio Vulſone Coſſ.

The Conſuls in their return from Sicily periſh by a lamentable ſhipwrack.

Agrigentum deſtroyed.

*Idem ibid. Eutrop. l.*2. *Diod. Siculus l.*23. Eclog. 12.

A. M. 3750.

6. The Romans nothing at all diſcouraged by the greateſt loſs that ever a tempeſt procured, gave order for the making of two hundred and twenty Gallies, which was proſecuted with ſuch alacrity, that in three months time they were both made and lanched. Aſdrubal the Carthaginian with all the old Army, new levies, and one hundred and forty Elephants, came into Sicily, and of old and new Veſſels made up a Fleet of two hundred ſail. The Conſuls A. Attilius and Cn. Cornelius being commanded to paſs into Sicily, therein, this year, took ſeveral Towns, and returned. Their ſucceſſors C. Servilius Cæpio and C. Sempronius Blæſo, in the beginning of the next Spring with all the Fleet paſſed into Sicily, and thence into Africk, where coaſting about they landed in many places, but did nothing memorable.

rable. At length they came to the Iſland of the Lotophagi called Meninx, not far diſtant from the leſſer Syrtis. Here they fell upon ſome quicks in the low water and were in great danger, being utterly ignorant of the Coaſts, but the Tide returning, when they had lightned the ſhips, cleared then off the ſhelves, and they returned in a kind of flight to Panormus in Sicily. Then paſſing hence towards Rome through the ſtraights very unadviſedly, ſuch a Tempeſt fell upon them, as above one hundred and fifty ſhips were loſt. Though the Senate and People were marvailouſly pricked forward to all attempts by deſire of glory, yet ſo many and great were their loſſes at Sea, that they were conſtrained to omit naval preparations, and place all their hope in the land Forces. They ſent L. Cacilius Metellus and Cn. Furius Pacilus the Conſuls into Sicily with the Legions, and ſixty ſhips only, for the conveying of neceſſaries to the Army. And not only did they plainly yield the Dominion of the Sea to the Carthaginians, but feared them alſo on Land, becauſe of their Elephants, which had oftentimes done them great dammage. Aſdrubal the Punick General underſtanding their fears, and how one of the Conſuls was returned back into Italy with half of the Army, in great confidence waſted the grounds about Panormus, and the more careleſly, becauſe Metellus kept himſelf within the Walls. But the Conſul taking an opportunity, ſo placed his men in reſpect of the Elephants, that when the Carthaginians came againſt the Town, he overthrew them, ſlew twenty thouſand, and took twenty ſix Elephants, according to Eutropius. But Oroſius writeth, that twenty ſix were ſlain, and one hundred and four taken: and Livie related, as appeareth by the Epitome of his nineteenth Book, that one hundred and twenty Elephants were led in triumph, with thirteen Captains of the Enemy. Diodorus Siculus maketh the occaſion of the overthrow to have been given by the Celtæ, in Aſdrubals Army, who meeting with Wine brought thither by Merchants, ſo ingurgitated themſelves therein, that being not themſelves, they broke the ranks and turned all into diſorder, which opportunity Metellus inſtantly improved.

Another ſhip-wrack of the Conſuls.

Metellus the Conſul defeateth the Carthaginians.

7. This defeat cauſed the Carthaginians to deſire Peace, and offered to ſend to the Senate about it. Amongſt the Meſſengers was Attilius Regulus whom they had overthrown, and taken priſoner, five years before, and now bound with an Oath to return to Carthage, in caſe neither Peace nor exchange of priſoners could be procured. He when he came to Rome, according to what he thought of the intereſt of the Commonwealth, diſſwaded the Senate from Peace; and yet to keep his Oath returned to Carthage, where he was cruelly tormented to death; and as * Cicero writeth, by hunger and watching having his eye-lids cut off. The year following, becauſe the Land-Forces were very fearful of the Carthaginian Elephants, and very uncheerfully went about their work, the Romans provided another Fleet, and beſieged Lilybæum, a Town ſtanding upon the Southern Promontory of Sicily, overagainſt Africk, but without ſucceſs; within a while the Navy was brought to nothing, and Amilcar Barcas being ſent from Carthage troubled Italy with his inroads and depredations. For ſeven years then did they abſtain from the Sea; but being ſorely diſturbed by Amilcar, they reſolved once more to try their fortune that way, and a Fleet was provided, and furniſhed out of their private purſes, the Treaſury being now exhauſted. With this they gave ſuch a blow to the Carthaginians near the Iſlands Ægates, under conduct of C. Lutatius Catulus the Conſul, as made them give commiſſion to Amilcar to conclude a Peace, if he found it requiſite. Though he was, as to his own diſpoſition, much averſe to it, yet ſeeing it neceſſary for his Countries welfare, he made an agreement with Lutatius upon theſe terms, if the Romans would approve them; viz. That the Carthaginians ſhould wholly quit Sicily; make no War upon the Syracuſians or their allies; releaſe without ranſom all Priſoners, and pay within the ſpace of twenty years two thouſand two hundred Talents of Silver. This pleaſed not the People, and therefore ten men were ſent into Sicily, with full authority to conclude the Peace, who ſhortned the time of payment, added one thouſand Talents to the former ſum, and further cautionated that the Carthaginians ſhould not only quit Sicily, but all the Iſlands alſo betwixt it and Italy. Thus ended the firſt Punick War, after it had continued twenty four years, and Lilybæum had been beſieged ten; in the five hundred and thirteenth year of the City, the fourth of the one hundred and thirty fourth Olympiad, the ſixth of Seleucus Callinicus, and the ſixth of Ptolomy Euergetes, A. M. 3764, two hundred and thirty nine years before the birth of Chriſt, A. Manlius Torquatus the ſecond time, and Q. Lutatius Cerco being Conſuls.

Which moveth them to ſend about a Peace.

Regulus one of the Meſſengers diſſwadeth it, and for that at his return is tormented to death.

* De Finib. l. 5. Sed conſule Gellium l. 6. c. 4.

Defeated again at the Iſlands Ægates, they deſire,

Polybius l. 3.

And obtain Peace.

Diodorus l. 24.
A. M. 3764.
Ol. 134. an. 4.
V. C. 513.
Seleuci Callin. 6
Ptol. Euerg. 6.

8. The Carthaginians ſubmitted to the terms of this Peace, that they might recruit cruit themſelves by a ceſſation; but the Peace procured them greater danger than the War could well have done. For, Amilcar Barcas, after the ratification, drew down the Forces to Lilybæum, and giving them up into the hands of Geſco, to be tranſported, laid down his Office. Geſco wiſely conſidering what danger there was of ſuch a multitude of Mercenaries it's falling into ſedition (eſpecially becauſe they wanted their pay, which the publick Treaſury already exhauſted could not afford them) conveyed them into Africk by ſmall companies together. But his Superiors, either through inadvertency, or for want of money, diſmiſſed them not as they arrived; but ſtayed them till all ſhould come together, with intention to prevail for an abatement of their wages. The City growing full, many outrages were committed by the Souldiers, which cauſed the Townſmen to procure their Captains to lead them out to Sicca a Town not far off, and when they left their baggage behind them, as intending ſhortly to return to Carthage, they fearing their unwillingneſs to depart, or their ſpeedy return, becauſe of their Wives and Children, in the carriages, forced them to take all away. When they were come to Sicca, they fell into greater licentiouſneſs through want of employment, and demanded larger pay than formerly they had pretended to, expecting alſo great rewards promiſed them by their Captains in dangerous adventures. As ſoon as they were all come thither, Hanno the Carthaginian Prætor was ſent to them, who was ſo far from curing, that he heightned the diſtemper.

Sect. 2.

Lege Polybium l. 1.

A lamentable mutiny of the Carthaginian Mercenaries.

9. He not only brought none of thoſe things with him which they expected, but complaining of the emptineſs of the Treaſury, talked of abating ſomething of their conſtant wages. This put the multitude into a rage, into which having once fallen, it was hard to be appeaſed, as upon other accounts, ſo through the diverſity of their ſpeech, things being either miſrepreſented by unskilful interpreters, or miſunderſtood by them who were willing enough to be miſtaken. Breathing nothing but fury and violence, they took Arms, and in deſpight of Hanno and the other Officers marched toward Carthage, and encamped at Tunis, fifteen miles from the City, to the number of twenty thouſand. The Carthaginians affrighted at the multitude reſolved to ſatisfie them; but then the Mercenaries perceiving how they were feared, every day invented what to add to their demands, requiring beſides their pay the price of their Horſes loſt in the War; and, after this was granted, Proviſion for ſeveral years, which they ſaid was behind. Their late Maſters not daring to deny them any thing, prevailed that ſome one who had commanded them in Sicily ſhould be choſen as Moderator, and the whole matter left to him.

Hanno ſent to make up the breach inlargeth it.

They march towards Carthage.

10. The Souldiers made choice of Geſco, as one who had beſt deſerved of them. And he laboured to pacifie them all he might, and was about to pay them their Arrears. But there being in the Army one Spendius, a Campanian of Italy by birth, but by condition a Roman ſlave, who having ran away from his Maſter, wanted neither ſtrength nor courage; and one Mathos an African; the former fearing to be tortured to death if his Maſter caught him, as the Roman manner was, and the later though free, fearing to be called to an account for his too great forwardneſs in the late ſtirs, ſought how to drive all things into extremity, that they might procure a War, inveighing grievouſly againſt Geſco and the Carthaginians, as having a deſign as ſoon as the reſt were diſperſed and gone home, to ſpend their rage againſt the Africans. The multitude herewith were ſtrangely incenſed, ſo that who ever attempted to ſpeak, before they could be heard what they would ſay, were all ſtoned to death except theſe two. Geſco yet would not ceaſe to do his duty, but went from one Nation to another, labouring to pacifie them; but when the Africans demanded allowance for their Proviſions, he bade them ask it of Mathos their Captain. This ſo tranſported them, that they plundered the goods of the Carthaginians, with all the money he had brought for the diſchargement of the Army, and binding him and his followers in a contumelious manner caſt them into priſon.

Spendius and Mathos hinder the agreement, and provoke the multitude.

11. By the advice of Mathos they rebelled againſt the Carthaginians, and ſo began the War called Libycum and Africum, as alſo ζενικὸν. Their numbers being increaſed to ſeventy thouſand. Matho and Spendius now created Generals, divided their Forces, and beſieged Utica and Hippacra. Hanno was ſent from Carthage to the relief of the Uticans, and at the firſt onſet drove away the beſiegers; but entering the Town, and loitering there, they ſet upon his Camp without, and killing many, took all his Engines, and other things prepared for the War. His Superiors troubled hereat, created Captain Amilcar Barcas, and ſent him into the field with Whence ariſeth the Libyan, or African War.

Amilcar Barcas defeateth the Mercenaries.

ſeventy Elephants, and ten thouſand men. There he was encompaſſed by the Africans on his Front, the Numidians on his Rear, and Spendius on his Flank, where Naravaſus a Numidian with two thouſand of his followers revolted to him. Encouraged by this addition he engaged with his Enemies, cauſing his men ſo to face about as the Front became the Rear, whereby ſeeming to be in confuſion, the Mercenaries thought they ran, and breaking their Ranks to purſue them he took this opportunity, and ſetting on them out of order obtained the Victory, having ſlain ten thouſand, and taken four thouſand Priſoners.

Who are further provoked by their Captains.

12. He gave Arms to all ſuch Priſoners as would ſerve under him, and having exhorted the reſt to fight no more againſt the Carthaginians, diſmiſſed them freely. Spendius and Matho, together with Autaritus Captain of the Galls, hearing this, doubted how far his clemency, eſpecially the offer of indemnity, might prevail with the Africans and others, and conſulted how to obviate this his deſign by ſetting the multitude at irreconcilable enmity with the Carthaginians. To this purpoſe they feigned Letters to be ſent out of Sardinia from their friends, giving them to underſtand, that certain amongſt them held intelligence with the Enemy, and adviſing them to keep cloſe Geſco, and the other with him. Spendius taking hereat occaſion, earneſtly adviſed them not to truſt to the pretended clemency of Amilcar, and by no means to permit Geſco to eſcape; for thereby they ſhould incur the contempt of their Enemies, and by ſtrengthening them through the aſſiſtance of ſo great a Captain, not a little damnifie their own affairs. Whilſt he yet ſpake another pretended meſſenger brought Letters as from Tunis of the ſame Contents with the former; and then Autaritus openly proteſted, that whoſoever had any regard to the kinkneſs of the Carthaginians could not be faithful, and therefore ſuch were to be heard as perſwaded the moſt bitter things againſt Carthage, all others being Traitors and Enemies. Then did he perſwade them to Torture Geſco to death, with ſuch as were now with him, and all that hereafter ſhould be taken. There were many which ſpoke againſt this cruelty, eſpecially as Geſco was concerned in it; but for ſome time they were not underſtood, ſpeaking in their own Languages, and when what they aimed at was fully known, ſome one cryed out ſtrike them, which ſo provoked the multitude, that they forthwith ſtoned them. After this, bringing forth Geſco, and the other Carthaginians to the number of ſeven hundred, they cruelly tormented them to death; and made a decree, that whomſoever of them for the time to come they ſhould take, he ſhould be uſed in the ſame manner, and if any of their Allies were taken, his hands being cut off, he ſhould be ſent back to Carthage. This they very carefully afterwards obſerved, having alſo refuſed to deliver the dead bodies to the Meſſengers that came for them, and threatned, if any more came, to deal with them as they had uſed Geſco.

Amilcar Uniteth the Carthaginian forces.

Mathos and Spendius elevated by their ſucceſs beſiege Carthage.

Amilcar forceth them to break up.

13. Amilcar ſeeing into what ſtraights he was caſt by this boldneſs of the Mercenaries, ſent for Hanno, judging that an end might ſooner be put to the War if the Forces of the State were all United. Such of the Enemies as he took in the heat of the fight he killed, as he might by the Law of War, or taking them alive, caſt them to wild beaſts. When he thought that he had brought matters into a fair way of recovery, they preſently relapſed into a far worſe condition than ever. For, the ſhips that brought Proviſions miſcarryed by force of Tempeſt; Sardinia at the ſame time revolted from them, which was wont to ſupply them with large Proviſions; and Hippacrita and Utica which hitherto had remained faithful, now revolted without any manifeſt cauſe. Mathos and Spendius herewith elevated, reſolved to lay ſiege to Carthage it ſelf, and ſhortly after performed it. The Carthaginians in this their diſtreſs betook themſelves to their neighbours, whereof the Romans, and Hiero King of Syracuſe in Sicily, being ſenſible of the ſawcineſs of their Enemies, were ready to do them all good Offices. Herewith better enabled, they held out, and Amilcar lying abroad, ſo cut off all Proviſions from the Mercenaries, that being no other than beſieged themſelves, they were forced at length to riſe up and depart, reſolving to obſerve Amilcar's motions, and ly in wait for him on the ſides of the Mountains; for they would not venture to take the plain, being afraid of his Elephants, and the Horſe of Naravaſcus; and otherwiſe they were much inferior to the Carthaginians, who far ſurpaſſed them in Military skill, though but equal to them in valour.

14. But Amilcar ſingling them out by parties, killed many of them, and when they ingaged with their whole Force cut them off by ſtatagems: ſometimes by day, otherwhiles by night he would fall upon them on a ſudden with great Terror, and ſuch of them as he took he caſt to the beaſts. At length he compaſſed them about in ſuch a place, as, though they were afraid to fight they could not eſcape, and being ſhut up within a Ditch and Rampire, they were forced to devour one onother. Though they now could expect no mercy, yet they ſent to deſire a Parley, and having obtained leave, Autarolus, Zarxas, Spendius, and other Captains were ordered to manage it. It was agreed that the Carthaginians ſhould pick out ten men whom they pleaſed, and the other be diſmiſſed in their Coats. The Covenants being finiſhed, Amilcar declared that he made choice of thoſe who were preſent, and ſo got the moſt eminent Leaders into his power. The Africans underſtanding that their Officers were ſeized, took Arms in great haſte, but Amilcar with his Elephants and his Army compaſſing them in on every ſide, put them to the Sword. For the improvement of this ſucceſs, he and Annibal went and beſieged Mathos in Tunis, before the Walls whereof he nailed Spendius to a Croſs with the reſt of the Captives. Annibal pitching his Camp on that ſide of the Town towards Carthage, careleſly demeaned himſelf, which Mathos conſidering, made a Sally, and killing many, took much plunder, and amongſt other Priſoners Annibal himſelf, whom bringing to Spendius his Croſs, after he had taken down his Collegue's body, he nailed him to it, and killed thirty more of the moſt Noble Carthaginians.

Sect. 2.

Utterly defeateth them, and the War endeth, after three years and almoſt four moneths.

15. It was long ere Amilcar knew of this diſaſter, and when he did, for the diſtance of place, and difficulty of paſſage, he could give no relief. Marching therefore from Tunis, he ſate down by the mouth of the River Macaris, and his Superiours at Carthage making new Levies joyned Hanno in Commiſſion with him. Theſe two, after ſeveral paſſages, at length agreed to fight one ſet battel with the Enemy, who conſenting, a bloody conteſt enſued, wherein at length the Carthaginians had the better. A great part of the Africans were ſlain, and the reſt fled to a neighbouring City, where not long after they yielded themſelves, and Mathos was taken alive. The Subjects of Carthage now all returned to obedience, except they of Hippacrita and Utica, who being paſt hope of mercy from their inraged Lords, ſeemed reſolved to ſtand out; but Hanno and Amilcar bringing their Forces, conſtrained them to ſubmit to ſuch conditions as the Carthaginians would lay upon them. Mathos, and thoſe that were with him being carried to the City, were handled with all ſorts of contumely and torment, and ſo this Libyan War ended, having laſted three years, and almoſt four moneths, being, ſaith Polybius, the moſt cruel and wicked that ever we heard of. But it gave the Carthaginians occaſion to repent of two great errors, viz. Truſting ſo great a multitude of Mercenaries together when they were idle; and the cruel, and tyrannical uſage of their Subjects.

16. The Romans, (that we may return to them the Hiſtory of whom is our proper ſubject) though they obſerved the League during theſe troubles, at and length, as was ſaid, gave the Carthaginians alſo reaſon to like well of their friendſhip, yet thought they had ſome cauſe to be angry with them. For ſuch of their Subjects as ſayled from Italy into Africk, they ſeized on, leſt they ſhould carry Proviſions to their Enemies, and had at Carthage almoſt five hundred of ſuch kind of men in Priſon. Yet when Ambaſſadors were ſent to complain hereof, they kindly diſmiſſed all thoſe in cuſtody, which ſo affected the Romans, that they alſo ſent them all their Priſoners, gave them all they asked, and permitted their Merchants to carry them neceſſaries, forbidding them to Traffick with their Enemies: they alſo refuſed to hearken to ſuch of the Carthaginian Mercenaries as having betrayed their truſt, invited them into Sardinia. But though Polybius telleth us that this they did; yet it appeareth from him alſo that this modeſty continued but for a time. For, allured, as it ſeemeth, by this invitation, they ſayled thither, which much offended the Carthaginians, who thought that the place by far more right belonged to them; ſo that they prepared to ſend Forces into the Iſland. The Romans took occaſion hereat to decree War againſt them, complaining that theſe Forces were not deſigned ſo much againſt the Sardinians as themſelves, which forced the other, who found themſelves in no good caſe to manage the War with them, to give way to the time, and quit not onely Sardinia, but pay further to the Romans one thouſand and two hundred Talents. This, though ſubmitted to at preſent, bred ſuch grudges and malice, as at length brake out into another War, a more dangerous and bloody than the former.

The Romans wreſt Sardinia from the Carthaginians with more Tribute.

Comedies and Tragedies firſt at Rome, made by Livius Andronicus.

17. In the (a) year after the ending of the firſt Punick War, the five hundred and fourteenth of the City, C. Claudius Cento, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus being Conſuls, the year preceding the birth of Ennius, the firſt Comedies and Tragedies were

(a) Cicero Tuſcul. lib. 1. & in Bruto. Caſſiodorus in Chronico.

Comedies and Tragedies firſt at Rome, made by Livius Andronicus.

The Ludi Scenici.

The Satire.

(b) Lib. 17. cap. 21.

(c) Lib. 2. c. 4.

Lege Livium l. 7. & Caſaub. de Satira Romana.

were made by Livius Andronicus the Poet. This man being a Græcian born, was rightly called Andronicus, and ſirnamed Livius from his Maſter Livius Salinator, whoſe Children he taught, and for his learning was manumited by him. (b) Gellius ſaith, that he now firſt at Rome taught playes about one hundred and ſixty years after the death of Sophocles and Euripides, and fifty two after that of Menander. But whereas he is ſaid by Gellius firſt to have made or taught playes at Rome, it is to be underſtood of theſe two ſorts of Poetry now mentioned, (c) Valerius Maximus telling us, that he drew the minds of the ſpectators to thoſe ſhews from the uſe of Satires, which by little and little ſucceeded that moſt antient and plain Roman ſort of the Hiſtriones brought out of Etruria, (as we ſhewed before) for the ſtopping of the Peſtilence, through the command of the Oracle. Theſe Ludi Scenici were firſt managed with rude geſtures, and incompoſed Songs, called Verſus Feſcennini from Feſcennium a City of Etruria. From theſe jocular ſpeeches, which at random were wont to be uttered at the Roman Solemnities, came the Satire, as later in time ſo more elaborate, and as for metre a perfect Poeme containing ridiculous things digeſted into Verſe, which they were wont to utter amongſt themſelves, after the antient cuſtom. It differed as much from that of the Greeks, as from the reſt differeth Dramatick Poetry, whereof the Romans at this time knew not ſo much as the name. A Satire being afterwards variouſly handled by the Romans, at length was reduced to two ſorts, which Fabius onely acknowledgeth. The former was found out by Lucilius, and the later ennobled by Varro. Horace mentioneth two kinds of moſt antient Poetry; one whereof they uſed in the praiſe of their gods, as when they appeaſed Tellus with a Sow-pig, and Sylvanus with milk: the other, when in jeſt and ſport they jeered one another, being the ſame with the Feſcennine Verſes, whence came the Satires, to which Livius Andronicus added the playes of Comedies and Tragedies, as was obſerved.

A. M. 3769. Ol. 136. an. 1. V. C. 518. Seleucid. 77. Seleuci Callinici 11. Ptol. Energet. 11.

The third Sæcular or Terentine Games.

Vide Valerium Maxim. l. 2. c. 4.

The Original of the Terentine Games.

Trina Terentino celebrata trinoctia ludo. Auſon.

18. Four years after, were celebrated at Rome the third time the Sæcular Games, concerning which it is convenient to ſpeak in this place, that beginners may know the differences of Roman exerciſes. Theſe were called Ludi Magni, as others were, (in oppoſition to the Scenici, and games made by private men) and Ludi Terentini (not Tarentini, whereof Students are to beware) from Terentus a place in the Campus Martius where they were celebrated. But there were other games called alſo Terentini Ludi (which ſome not conſidering have run into confuſion) and that more properly than theſe Sæcular ones were, and therefore the riſe of them all is to be related. There was one Valeſius a man of prime note, amongſt the Sabines; who living near Eretus, and not far from Tiber, in a great Plague, had two Sons and a daughter which fell dangerouſly ſick. Amongſt his prayers for them, he heard a voice that they ſhould recover, if carrying them to Terentus, he would fetch them ſome warm water of Tiber from the Altar of Pluto and Proſerpina. He thought the City Tarentum was meant, and doubted how he ſhould come by any Tiberine water in that remote part of Italy; but reſolving to be obedient, he ſailed down the River towards Oſtia, and late at night arrived at the Campus Martius, where he underſtood there was a place called Terentus. Landing here, he gave his Children ſome warm water, wherewith refreſhed they fully recovered, and told their Father, how in a dream they had ſeen a certain god, who commanded, that at the Altar of Pluto and Proſerpina black coloured Sacrifices, (furvæ hoſtiæ) ſhould be offered, as alſo that Lectiſternes (Beds made for the cauſe of Sacrifice, as whereon to lye down after the Roman faſhion at a ſolemn feaſt) and night-games ſhould be made. Valeſius ſeeing no Altar in the place, thought of making one, when, as his ſlaves were digging for that purpoſe, they found one in the earth dedicated to Pluto and Proſerpina. Here then he Sacrificed, and three nights together, becauſe of the number of his Children, made Lectiſterns and Games, being afterwards from this thing named Manius Valeſius Terentinus. Zozimus writeth, that the Romans one hundred years before being to fight with the Albans, were admoniſhed to build this altar in the Earth, and that having ſacrifized they covered it. But this paſſage concerning Valeſius hapned about the twelfth year of Servius Tullius, wherein he founded the Luſtrum; in the one hundred eighty and eight of the City, and the ſame wherein the Panathanæa were inſtituted (or rather reduced to the courſe of five years, being formerly inſtituted by Theſeus) at Athens, this being the third year of the 53 Olympiad.

The Terentine and Sæcular Games confounded.

19. This was the Original of Terentine Games, which ſome have confounded with the Sæcular. For, the next that were celebrated were made by Valerius Poplicola in the year following the baniſhment of Tarquinius, which Zozimus calleth Games of Pluto and Proſerpina, and * Cenſorinus, from Antias the Hiſtorian, giveth them the name of Sæcular. This confuſion caſt Cenſorinus into ſuch a perplexity about the Sæcular Games, that he thus expreſſeth the incertainty of the Roman intervalls of times and ages. ‘Some think the Roman ages to be diſtinguiſhed by the Sæcular Games; which, if it be ſo, the manner of the Roman age is uncertain. For, concerning the intervalls of times, wherein theſe Games ought to be celebrated, we are not only ignorant how great they were formerly, but what they ought to be for the time to come. For, Antias and other Hiſtorians, with Varro and Livy, have written, that they ought to be made every hundreth year. But on the contrary both the Commentaries of the Quindecimviri (or fifteen men*) and the edicts of* Auguſtus teſtifie, that they ought to be reiterated every hundred and tenth, as * Horatius Flaccus alſo ſaith. Further, if we ſearch the annals of antient times, we ſhall yet be in greater uncertainty by far. For, Valerius Antias ſaith, that the firſt Sæcular Games were made after the baniſhment of the Kings, 245 years after the building of Rome by Valerius Publicola*: But the commentaries of the fifteen* Men, ſay, that two hundred ninety and eight years M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius being Conſuls. The ſecond Games Antias will have made in the 305 year of the City, but its written in the Commentaries of the fifteen Men, in the four hundred and eight, M. Valerius Corvinus the ſecond time, and C. Pætilius being Conſul: and ſo he proceedeth.

* Quem vide cap. 17. lib. de die Natali.

Which much perplexed Cenſorinus.

* Certus undenos decies per annos Orbis ut cantus, referatq; ludos Ter die clarâ totienſq; gratâ Nocte frequentes.

‘20. * Jacobus Cappellus diſſolveth the difficulty in this manner. The cauſe of this perplexity which troubleth Cenſorinus is this. All Sæcular Games are Terentine, but all Terentine Games are not Sæcular, For ſome were made upon ſome occaſion, as thoſe which Valerius Publicola made this 245th year of the City, and Valeſius about the year 188. Theſe were Terentine Games but not Sæcular. Now, the Sæcular are of two ſorts. The greater, which perhaps thou mayſt not call amiſs * Quindecimvirales, were celebrated at the diſtance of one hundred and ten years. Of this kinde the firſt were made by the command of the Quindecimviri, in the 298 year of the City, 110 years, as it ſeemeth, after the firſt Terentine Games made by Valeſius. So, the Valeſian ſhall fall in the 188 of the City. The firſt of the Quindecimviri were made in the 298 year of the City, the Second in the 408, the Third in the 518, and the Fourth in the 628. The leſſer Sæculum, or Age, conſiſted but of 100 years, inſtituted as it ſeemeth, by L. Valerius, after the baniſhment of the Decemviri, that year being according to ſome the 300 of the City. So the Firſt Centenarie Games agree with the 305 Varronian year of the City, the Second with the 405, the Third with the 505, the Fourth with the 605.

* Hiſt Sacra & Exotica ad A. M. 3491.

The difficulty reſolved by Jacobus Cappellus.

Quindecim Diana preces virorum curet. Horat. in carm. Sæculari.

* Vide Tacitum Annal. lib. 11.

21. Though the Second of the Centenaries ſhould have been celebrated in the 405 year, yet whether it happened through the Gallick War or otherwiſe (they were not till that following, wherein M. Popilius Lænas the fourth time, and L. Cornelius Scipio were Conſuls, as Zozimus writeth. Theſe Cenſorinus hath omitted and four more, if credit be given to the inſcription of a certain ſtone mentioned by George Herwart, from which it ſhould appear, that before this year were celebrated three Sæcular Games, viz. in the 100, 200, and 300 years, according to the account of Pictor, and the 105, 205, and 305, according to that of Varro. Two Solemnities alſo at the diſtance of 110 years, as in the 188 and 298, after the account of Varro, to which may be added thoſe made by Poplicola extraordinarily in the 245 year. So that the Games celebrated this year (viz. in the 406) may rightly be called the ſeventh Games. The Quindecimvirals (or thoſe of 100 years) continued till Conſtantine's time, who forbad them to be celebrated in the 1067 year of the City. His Son Conſtantius alſo prohibited the Centenaries, which in his time fell into the 1100 year of the City. Fifty ſeven years after, the Heathen got leave of Honorius to celebrate the Terentine Games again in his ſixth Conſulſhip (for which Claudian thanks him) two hundred years after they had been kept by Severus. But to return, theſe Third Sæcular Games which gave occaſion to this diſcourſe, and were celebrated in the five hundred and eighteenth year of the City, and the fifth after the firſt Punick War, P. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Licinius Varus being Conſuls, were thoſe of the Quindecimviri, or of the interval of 110 years; that we may note thus much for the information of Students.

Obſervations concerning the Centenaries.

22. In the ſixth year after the firſt Punick War (a) the Temple of Janus was ſhut at Rome now the ſecond time, all things being in quiet, and the Romans having no Wars any where after the reducement of Sardinia by T. Manlius Torquatus the Conſul. In the following year, being the 520 of the City, the firſt (b) divorce was made by Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who, though he did it under a ſpecious pretence

The Temple of Janus ſhut the ſecond time.

The firſt divorce.

(a) Livius l. 1. Eutropius l. 3. Plutarch in Numa.

(b) Val. Max. l. 2. c. 1. exemp. 4. Angellius l. 17. c. 21. Dionyſ. Halicarn.

Sect. 2.

pretence of his Wives barrenneſs, was ever ill-willed for it by the People. This ſame year was M. Porcius (c) born in the Precincts of Tuſculum, who had the name of (d) Cato for his wiſdom; Catus in the Roman Language (whence the diminutive Catulus) ſignifying ſagacious, acute, or ingenious. And this year did Cn. Nævius the Poet (e) publiſh playes to the People, who wrote alſo the firſt Punick War, (wherein he ſerved) in the moſt ancient kind of Verſe called Saturnii Verſus, which were ſucceeded by the Feſcennini, ſome being with metre and ſome without. He died in the thirtieth year after this, and left a proud (f) Epitaph of of his own making, which he commanded ſhould be engraven on his Tomb, and Gellius hath recorded together with thoſe of Plautus and Patuvius.

Cn. Nævius the Poet.

(c) Cicero de Senectute.
(d) Plutarch in Catone.
(e) Agellius ut ſupra.
(f) idem l. 1. c. 24.

23. Five years the Temple of Janus continued ſhut, and in the ſixth was opened by a War with the Illyrians. For, Teuta Queen of that Nation, the Widow of Agron (who for joy that he had proſpered in his enterpriſes againſt the Ætolians, drank ſo hard, that he fell into a Pleuriſie, and thereof died) elevated by her proſperity in Peace, gave out Commiſſions to her Subjects to rob all at Sea whomſoever they met with. The Illyrians then having taken Phœnice a ſtrong City of Epirus, ſtruck a great terror into all the Maritime parts of Greece, and ſetting upon the Italian Merchants, ſome they robbed, others they killed, and not a few they carried away priſoners. The Romans having hitherto neglected all complaints againſt them, when now many came together, ſent unto Illyricum Caius and Lucius Coruncani, to inform themſelves concerning theſe matters. Teuta anſwered, ſhe would take care that no publick injury ſhould be offered to the Romans, but it was not the cuſtom to hinder any from making what private commodity they could out of the Sea. But ſaith Lucius, the Romans have a good cuſtom publickly to proſecute private injuries, and to relieve the injured: therefore we will ſhortly endeavour, God willing, to conſtrain thee to amend theſe cuſtoms. The Queen took this liberty of ſpeech ſo hainouſly, that her Womaniſh impotency and anger prevailed againſt the Law of Nations, to have ſome ſent after the Ambaſſadors, who killed Lucius. For this, War was decreed againſt her, and both the Conſuls of the 525 year of the City, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and L. Poſthumius Albinus Conſul the ſecond time, were ſent into Illyricum; Fulvius with the Navy, and his Collegue with the Land-Army.

Polybius l. 2.

The Illyrians infeſt the Italians at ſea,

Whence a War enſueth.

24. Fulvius received Corcyra, given up into his hands by Demetrius Pharius; then took he Apollonia, and the Armies joyning, the Conſuls freed Dyrrhachium beſieged by the Illyrians. Then moſt of the Illyrick Cities were either taken or delivered up, whereupon the Queen retired with a few followers to Rhizon a ſtrong Town, ſituate upon a River of the ſame name, and the Spring following ſent to Rome to deſire Peace. It was granted to her on theſe terms: To pay a yearly tribute; to quit all Illyricum, except a very few places: and not to ſail beyond the River Quiſſus with more than two Barks, and thoſe unarmed. For nine years the Illyrians continued in obedience, till the 535 year of the City, wherein rebelling, they were again reduced by Æmilius Paulus and M. Livius the Conſuls. For, Demetrius Pharius then their King, forgetting the great favours received from the People of Rome, waſted the Towns of Illyricum ſubject to the Romans, and paſſed the bounds ſet by the League. Æmilius within ſeven dayes took Dimalium, and followed him to Pharus, a Town of the Iſland Phario, which he alſo took. Demetrius being fled to Philip King of Macedonia, he ſeized on the reſt of Illyricum, which he ordered to pay a ſtipend to Pineus the ſon of Agron. But thus was begun, and finiſhed the War with Teuta, which Florus (according to his cuſtom, breaking the order and ſeries of time) falſly placeth after the Gallicum Ciſalpinum, or that with the Galls inhabiting within the Alpes.

A.M. 3776.
Ol. 137. ann. 4.
V. C. 525.
Sel. Callinici 18.
Ptol. Euerg. 18.
Idem & Juſtin.

Peace is granted to Teuta the Queen.

25. For, the ſame year wherein the peace was made with Teuta, the promulgating of the Agrarian Law by C. Flaminius, Tribune of the people, brought this great, and dangerous War upon the Common-wealth. There being a good quantity of ground Conquered within the Countrey of theſe Galls, he preferred a Law for the dividing of it to the People, man by man. Q. Fabius Maximus being now Conſul the ſecond time ſtiffly oppoſed it, Sp. Carbilius his Collegue not ſtirring as (a) Cicero telleth us; the Senate alſo laboured to croſs it, but when in the Roſtra Flaminius read the Law, his Father laying hands on him he obeyed, and went down, though he neither valued the Conſul nor Senate, nor yet was affrighted with the levying of an Army. Nay, the People about him was ſo overawed by paternal right, that, as Valerius Maximus writeth, though the Aſſembly was thus diſappointed, not the leaſt muttering was heard. Whether the Law for diviſion fully

A.M. 3777.
V. C. 526.

The Seditious attempts of Flaminius the Tribune,

(a) De Senect.

Lib. 5. cap. 4.
Exemp. 5.

fully paſſed or not (by reaſon of the interruption by old Flaminius) yet this thing gave occaſion to a new and great War, as Polybius writeth, who miſtaketh the time by four years, for as much as theſe ſtirs about the Agrarian fell not out in the five hundred twenty ſecond, but the five hundred and twenty ſixth of the City, wherewithall the ſecond Conſulſhip of Fabius Maximus, and that of Sp. Carnilius Maximus is joyned. Indeed the firſt of Fabius fell in with the five hundred and twenty firſt year of the City, two years before Teuta killed the Ambaſſador, and two more at leaſt before the finiſhing of the Illyrian War, whence may be conjectured that as the miſtake of Polybius might ariſe from want of diſtinction, betwixt the firſt and ſecond Conſulſhips of Fabius; ſo the error of Florus (or him, who ever wrote that Syſtem) in placing the Gallick War before the Illyrian, might proceed from an (inconſiderate) truſt to the Authority of that excellent Author.

Occaſioneth the War, called Bellum Gallicum Ciſalpinum.

26. The report concerning this Law awakened the Galls, eſpecially the Boii, who were neareſt neighbours. Concluding now that the Romans fought not ſo much for glory and Dominion, as out of a covetous deſign of enriching themſelves, they ſent to the Inſubres for aid, exhorting them to remember what their Anceſtors once did at Rome, and to tread in their ſteps. Theſe joyning together ſent over the Alps for other Galls, living near Rhodanus, and called Geſſatæ, from their Wages, ſaith Polybius, or as others write, from Geſſa a kind of weapon they uſed. Their Kings, Congolitanus and Aneroeſtus being allured by great promiſes, with a vaſt force paſſed over the Alpes, and joyning with the Inſubres and Boii, to the number of fifty thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand Horſe brake into Etruria. When firſt the Romans heard of their paſſing the Alps, they commanded Æmilius the Conſul to go to Ariminum, to give them trouble in caſe they came that way. They ordered one of the Prætors into Etruria, for, C. Attilius the other of the Conſuls was already ſent into Sardinia. The whole City was ſad and grievouſly afflicted, fearing the Galls as fatal to it. All the Regiſters of the Military age were inquired into, to ſee what forces they, and what their Aſſociates, were able to ſet forth. The Italians prepared to fight, not as for the Roman Empire, but their own ſafety; ſo that an Army was in readineſs, conſiſting of ſeven hundred thouſand Foot, and ſeventy thouſand Horſe, according to Polybius. But Fabius Pictor wrote, as Eutropius relateth, that eight hundred thouſand men were prepared for this War, wherein he himſelf was employed.

Preparations on the Roman ſide for this War.

27. The Tables of the Military age, as they were brought to the Senate, contained of the Latines eighty thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe; of the Samnites ſeventy thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe; of the Iapyges and Meſſapians fifty thouſand Foot, and ſixteen thouſand Horſe; of the Lucanians thirty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe; of the Marſi, Marucini, Ferentani and Veſtini twenty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe. And of the Roman people gave their names, together with thoſe of Campania, two hundred and fifty thouſand Foot, and two hundred and thirty thouſand Horſe. The total ſum five hundred and fifty eight thouſand. There went out with the Conſuls four Legions, whereof each contained five thouſand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe, together with thirty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe of the Aſſociates: in all fifty thouſand eight hundred Foot, and three thouſand two hundred Horſe. There were in readineſs for neceſſary occaſions, of the Etruſcans and Sabines fifty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe, which the Prætor led into Etruria to oppoſe the Enemy on the Borders. Of the Veneti and Cenomani were aſſembled twenty thouſand and as many of the Umbri and Sarſinates inhabiting the Appennine Mountains, who were placed on the Borders of Gall, by invading the Territories of the Boii to draw them back, and divide them from the reſt. Theſe were the Forces placed on the Borders. At Rome were in a readineſs for the uncertain chances of War, as a ſupply, thirty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand five hundred Horſe of Citizens, beſides of the Aſſociates thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. In Sicily, and about Tarentum were placed two Legions, whereof each contained four thouſand two hundred Foot, and two thouſand Horſe. The ſum of all theſe amounts to two hundred ten thouſand and three hundred men. So, ſaith Polybius, the ſum of the Forces which guarded the City were one hundred and fifty thouſand Foot, and about ſix thouſand Horſe, but the whole number of the multitude fit for War was ſeven hundred thouſand Foot, ſeventy thouſand Horſe, which yet Hannibal durſt oppoſe, and invade Italy with ſcarce twenty thouſand. But this will appear further in what ſhall be hereafter ſaid.

Sect. 2.

A. M. 3780.
Ol. 138. ann. 4.
V. c. 429.
Sel. Cer [illegible] 2.
Ptol. Euerg. 22.

The Galls overthrown beg beace.

Which the Conſuls hinder.

28. The Galles deſcending into Etruria waſted all with fire and Sword till they came to Cluſium, a place three dayes journey diſtant from Rome. There were they beſet, the Prætor on their back, and the two Conſuls before blocking up all the paſſages, ſo that they were forced to fight two contrary wayes in two Fronts, and that very diſadvantageouſly, both by reaſon of their nakedneſs, and the unfitneſs of their Arms. But the vanity of the Gæſatæ was moſt hurtful to them, who caſting off their Cloths would needs fight naked and charge firſt; for, being eaſily diſcomfited, they diſcouraged their fellows. Forty thouſand were ſlain, and ten thouſand taken, amongſt whom was Concolitanus; the other King Aneroeſtus having killed himſelf. This battel was fought in the five hundred and twenty nitnh year of the City, L. Æmilius D pus, and C. Attilius Regulus (who was therein ſlain) being Conſuls. Afterwards inroads being made into the Territories of the Galles, they were ſeveral times overthrown, and ſo harraſed, that they ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome to beg peace on any terms. The people being inclining enough to it, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio the Conſuls of the 532 year put a ſtop to the thing.

Marcellus endeth the War.

* Aſpice ut in ſignis ſpoliis Marcellus opimis Ingreditur, victorque viros ſupereminet omnes. Hic rem Romanam magno turbante tumultu Siſtet eques ſternet Pœnos Gallumq; rebellem Tertiaque arma patri ſuſpendet capta Quirino. Virgil. Æn. 6.

Vide Polybium lib. 2.
Plutarch. in Marcello.
Florum. l. 2. c. 4.
Eutrop. lib 3.
Oroſium lib. 4. cap. 13.
Livii Epitom. lib. 23.

* Simpſon in Chronic. Catholic. ad A. M. 3780.

29. The former eſpecially, having a diſpoſition ſuitable to his name (Marcus and Mamercus being thought to be derived of Mars, and therefore alſo the diminutives Marculus and Marcellus) inflamed the multitude to the War; whereupon the Galls now deſperate reſolved to make the laſt tryal, and uſing all indeavours, ſent, and hired thirty thouſand of the Gæſatæ. The Conſuls invading the Countrey of the Inſubres beſieged Acerræ, which to relieve the Galles laid ſiege to Claſtidium, a Town aſſociate with the Romans. Here was fought a bloody battel, wherein the Galles were overthrown, Marcellus with his own hand killed Virdomarus King of the Gæſatæ, and dedicated the third * Opima Spolia to Jupiter Feretrius, though Numa had commanded they ſhould be conſecrated to Quirinus. Thoſe that eſcaped fled to Mediolanum (now Millane) the chief ſeat of the Inſubres, which being ſhortly taken, the War was thereby ended after ſix years, and Marcellus returned in Triumph. The title of the Triumph in the Capitoline ſtories mentioneth with the Galles Inſubres, Germans alſo to have been ſubdued, which Germans ſeem no other then the Gæſatæ, thus called by ſome miſtake. As for the name of Cæſatæ, though Polybius thinketh it derived from their Wages, and others from a kind of weapon; yet * another rendreth a more probable derivation, which the condition of theſe people being Mercenaries prompteth to. The Teutonick language (a dialect whereof Joſeph Scaliger and others prove the antient Gallick to have been) calleth him Gaeſt, whom the Engliſh Saxon a (a branch alſo of the Teutonick) nameth Gueſt, at this time, betokening a ſtranger. The word Gæſata might well therefore be thence derived, being changed ſomething by thoſe that were ignorant of the Language, from that whereby the Galls ſignified ſtrangers, ſuch as theſe Mercenaries were.

The Acts of Amilcar Barcas, after the ending of the firſt Punick War.

Of Aſdrubal his ſon-in-law.

Diod. Sicul. lib. 25. Eclog.

Annibal the ſon of Amilcar Barcas created General by the Carthaginians.

Polyb. lib. 3.
Livius l. 21.
Corn. Nepos in Hamilcar.
Val. Max. l. 9. c. 3. Exter. Ex. emp. 3.

30. The third year after the ending of the Gallick, began the ſecond Punick, or Carthaginian War. Amilcar the Carthaginian Captain had a great itching deſire to renew the quarrel with the Romans, as ſoon as the State could recover its ſtrength, and had done it betimes, but that the War with the Mercenaries hapned, which much diſtreſſing the Commonwealth, he paſſed over into Spain, where having to do with ſuch an Enemy as he could grow upon, he there inlarged far and wide the Carthaginian Dominion, and died in great honour, though he was drowned in a River, being put alſo to flight by Oriſſon King of the Iberi, who pretending to come to his aſſiſtance in the ſiege of Helice unexpectedly fell upon him. As he had governed the Army in Spain nine years, ſo his ſon-in-law Aſdrubal ſucceeding him, commanded it almoſt as many, with a mind as averſe from the Romans as he; but he diſſembled his hatred and deſigns, that he might gain all Spain to the Carthaginian intereſt. After eight years he was ſlain by a Gall (ſaith Polybius) or a ſlave to a certain Spaniard (ſaith Juſtin) who killed him in revenge for his Maſters death. He alſo much bettered the affairs of Carthage, not ſo much by Arms as his winning carriage upon the petty Princes. After his death Annibal the ſon of Amilcar Barcas was choſen Captain by the Army, and preſently confirmed at Carthage by the people, whom his Father taking along with him into Spain, being then nine years old, compelled to ſwear at the Altar; his hand touching the Sacrifice, that as ſoon as he could he would be an Enemy to the People of Rome.

31. Annibal preſently after his Creation fell upon the Olcades whom he ſubdued, and beſides them, within a years ſpace, the Vaccæi and Carpentani, and nothing thing remained beyond the River Iberus that was conſiderable, and unſubdued, beſides the Saguntines. They being confederate with Rome gave them there intelligence how things went, who ſent ſome into Spain to ſee how matters ſtood, and what was intended by the Carthaginians. Theſe Commiſſioners having audience of Hannibal, religiouſly admoniſhed him not to meddle with the Saguntines, and (according to the League made with Aſdrubal) not to paſs over the River Iberus. His anſwers did not conceal his inward hatred, which cauſed the Romans to expect no better than a War; but they hoped to have Saguntus the ſeat thereof, and endeavoured to clear themſelves of Illyricum ere it hapned. Annibal was not ignorant of what they deſigned, end therefore reſolved by taking that Town to cut off all hope of Warring in Spain. He doubted not by that example to terrifie others, ſo as to reduce to obedience thoſe that yet ſtood out, and confirm therein ſuch as he had already brought under; and this eſpecially he aimed at, by reducing this place, to leave no Enemy at his back, by the plunder of which alſo he intended to gratifie his Soldiers. With all his force then he ſet upon it, and provoking his men by his own example to all manner of diligence, took it in the eighth moneth. The Inhabitants retained their fidelity unto the Romans to the laſt, and when almoſt ſpent with hunger, Fire, Sword, and Engines, they that remained, in a fire made in the Forum conſumed themſelves with all their Riches, as Florus writeth, though Polybius ſpeaketh of much money found in the Town, beſides rich ſtuff, which Hannibal ſent to Carthage.

He taketh Saguntus a Town in Spain, confederate with Rome.

32. When firſt the Romans heard that Saguntus was taken, they ſent Ambaſſadors to Carthage to require that Hannibal ſhould be delivered up as the breaker of the League, or elſe to denounce War. Upon their arrival the Carthaginians deputed Hanno to treat with them, who ſleighted the matter of the League made with Aſdrubal, pretending there was none; and if there was, it was made by his meer pleaſure without the conſent of the Senate. Beſides, therein, he ſaid, was no mention made of the River Iberus; that a regard was to be had of the Allies of both the States he confeſſed, but this nothing concerned the Saguntines, who at the time of the ratification were not confederates with Rome. The Ambaſſadors perceiving the Carthaginians backward to what they propounded, ſpake no more; but the Senior of them holding out the lap of his Gown to the Senate, Here, ſaith he, we bring you both War and Peace; whether you will have I ſhall bring forth. The Carthaginian King bade them bring forth which they pleaſed; then the Roman, ſaying, he would take out War, many of the Senators anſwered, that they accepted of it. This fell out in the Conſulſhip of M. Livius, afterward called Salinator (from his bringing up the Impoſt upon Salt) and L. Æmilius Paulus. In their time forein Ceremonies begun to be brought into Rome, which diſpleaſing the more ſober ſort of them, the * Senate thought fit that the Chappels of Iſis and Serapis ſhould be pulled down. When no Artificers would venture to touch them, Æmilius the Conſul put of his prætexta, or long Robe edged with purple Silk, and taking an Hatchet ſtruck it into the door.

Satisfaction is demanded by the Romans.

And none being given, War is denounced and accepted of.

* Val. Max. l. 1. c. 3. exemp. 3.

33. In the year following, being the five hundred and thirty ſixth of the City, the ſixth of Antiochus the Great, and the fifth of Ptolomy Philopater, in the Conſulſhip of Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and Tib. Sempronius Longus, three and twenty years after the ending of the firſt punick War, the ſecond began, which we have deſcribed by Polybius, and after him by T. Livius, who hath tranſcribed the twenty firſt Book of his Hiſtory almoſt word for word. Annibal now twenty ſix years of age, in the Spring moved from his Winter quarters with ninety thouſand Foot, and twelve thouſand Horſe, and paſſing over the River Iberus, ſudued all the Towns as far as the Pyrenæan hills. Then leaving Hanno with a ſufficient force to keep the Country, and ſending as many of the Spaniſh Soldiers home, he marched with the reſt, in number fifty thouſand Foot, and nigh nine thouſand Horſe, over the Pyrenæans and ſo through Gall unto the Alpes. Having marched one hundred miles in ten dayes from the River Rhodanus, he came to the foot of theſe Mountains, which when he aſcended, he encountred with great difficulties being oppoſed by the Allobroges (inhabiting the Country now called Savoy) who poſſeſſed themſelves of the places through which he muſt neceſſarily paſs. On the ninth day he arrived at the top, whence his Soldiers had a proſpect of Italy. Proceeding after a little reſt, he loſt as many men here in the depth of the Snow, as formerly by the incurſions of Enemies, and at length came to a place which would affoard no paſſage for Horſe, or Elephants. The place of it ſelf was precipitous, but lately by a falling of earth it was become ſo, to the depth of one thouſand foot. He laboured then to bring his

A. M. 3787.
Ol. 140. an. 3.
V. C. 536.
Antiochi Mag. 6.
Ptol. Philop. 5.
Polyb. l. 3.
Livius. l. 21.

The ſecond Punick or Carthaginian War beginneth,

Annibal having conquered all Spain as far as the Pyrenæan hills, his men through other wayes never before trodden, but at length the Snow making them impaſſable, he was forced to betake himſelf to the levelling of the Rock. They made a great fire, wherewith the Rock being heated, they putrified it with Vinegar, then did they cleave it, and ſo diminiſhed the deſcent by moderate turnings, that not onely the beaſts of burthen, but the Elephants alſo might ſafely paſs. Four dayes were ſpent about the Rock: and by this time almoſt all the beaſts were waſted; for on the top was little graſs, and that covered with Snow. Coming lower, certain Valleys afforded paſture, where the Cattel were refreſhed, and reſt was given to the weary Souldiers. Thence deſcended Annibal into the Plain, in the fifth moneth after he had parted from new Carthage (built by Aſdrubal, and now called Cartagena) in Spain, having paſſed over the Alpes in fourteen dayes. In the paſſage he loſt a great part of his Army, bringing into the Countrey of the Inſubres, but ten thouſand and two hundred African Foot, eight thouſand of the Spaniſh, and ſix thouſand Horſe.

Paſſeth over the Alpes into Italy.

34. Scipio the Conſul having Spain for his Province, was by Sea going thither, when he underſtood that Hannibal was near the River Rhodanus. There he intended to have given him a ſtop; but miſſing of him, he returned on ſhipboard and haſted to Italy, there to meet him, before his men had yet refreſhed themſelves. They met and joyned battel, wherein the Conſul had the worſt, being wounded, and preſerved alive by the valour of his young ſon afterwards named Africanus. The Roman Senate, when firſt they received intelligence that Hannibal had paſſed the Alpes, ſent for the other Conſul Sempronius out of Sicily to the aid of his Collegue. According to order he brought over his Army, and united it with Scipio's at the River Trebia. Having had the better in ſome skirmiſhes with certain parties of Annibal, he deſired to make trial of a battel, that his Collegue being ſick, he might have all the glory of the Victory, and though Scipio alledged, that by delaying to fight the Galls might be farther drawn in, and their own Soldiers better exerciſed, yet leſt the battel ſhould be deferred till the coming of the next Conſuls, he reſolved to fight alone. Annibal feared nothing more, than that they ſhould refuſe to fight, becauſe as yet the Galls continued his, and he knew the beſt of the Roman Captains to be unable to act, and his own Army freſh and chearful. In the battel, which ſhortly followed, the Romans were overthrown, being drawn out by a party that Hannibal ſent to provoke them, ere they had armed their bodies againſt the extremity of the mid-winter ſeaſon, either by meat or other proviſion; ſo that ingaging with cold and hunger, and beſet with their Enemies (whereof as in the former battel, the Numidians, to their great terror fell upon their rear) they were defeated though with great ſlaughter of the Enemy, through whoſe ranks ten thouſand broke and eſcaped to Placentia, the reſt being either ſlain, taken, or drowned in the River. The Carthaginians having purſued them to the River Trebia, returned to their Camp ſo ſtupified with cold, that they were ſcarcely ſenſible of the Victory. For, rain mixed with ſnow, and intollerable cold, killed many men, and almoſt all the Beaſts and Elephants.

Defeateth Scipio the Conſul.

And Sempronius his Collegue.

35. At this time things went better with the Romans in Spain and Sicily. In the former Cnæus Scipio (being ſent thither by his Brother the Conſul upon his return into Italy) overthrew Hanno the Carthaginian, and took in a good part of the Country, wherein was alſo new Carthage. For the following year C. Flaminius (who being Tribune had preferred the Agrarian Law) was the ſecond time made Conſul, together with Cn. Servilius Geminus. He had a good gift in ſpeaking, but no skill in War, being yet heady and impatient of advice. Hannibal having all this while made the Country of the Galls the ſeat of the War, reſolved to change it, and after ſome conſultation about his way into Etruria, reſolved upon that of the Fens, as ſhort and unexpected to the Enemy, though more troubleſome to paſs. Being forced to march three or four whole dayes through water, this ſorely diſtreſſed all his men, except the Galls, many of the beaſts were left in the mud, and the Hoofs of the Horſes came off. He himſelf riding on an Elephant that was onely left, eſcaped with his life, but was ſorely pained in his eyes, one whereof he loſt utterly. Being arrived at dry ground, he hoped by ſome means or other to entrap the Conſul, underſtanding what his diſpoſition was: He paſſed by the Camp and went further into the Country, which inraged Flaminius, who thought himſelf ſlighted by the Enemy. When amongſt the Romans ſome told him that he muſt not raſhly purſue, but uſe great caution, eſpecially by reaſon of the Horſe; but above all things ſtay for his Colleague, and not hazard a battel without the conjunction of both Armies, he was ſo far from following their advice, that he could not bear their words. Riſing with all his Forces he had neither reſpect to time nor place, onely ſeeking to fight, as if nothing had been more certain than the Victory, with hope whereof he ſo elevated the vulgar, that a Rabble followed the Camp greater in number than the Army it ſelf, and furniſhed with Chains, Bonds, and other things, wherewith to keep faſt thoſe Priſoners and booty, whereof they doubted not to become Maſters.

Lege præter Polyb. & Liv. Plutarch in vita Fabii. Corn. Nepot. Annib. Appian in Annibalicis. Florum l. 2.c.6.

And Flaminius at the Lake Thraſymene.

36. Annibal marching through Etruria, waſted it with Fire and Sword, the more to inrage his Enemy, and at length came to the Lake called Thraſymenus and Thraſymene, near to which are certain Mountains, and betwixt them and it a narrow way leading to a Valley, beſet with them, and a ridge of Hills. Theſe Hills he made choice of, wherein to place his men, beſtowing them round about, ſo that Flaminius following him into the Valley, was fallen upon round about, and ſlain with many of his men ere (almoſt) they knew who hurt them, by reaſon of a miſt which then was riſen from the Lake. Within the Valley fell fifteen thouſand, and near upon ſix thouſand eſcaped to a Village, where they were forced to yield themſelves. Annibal gathering all his Priſoners together, to the number of fifteen thouſand, kept in cuſtody the Romans, but diſmiſſed the Latines without ranſome. The body of the Conſul, ſaith Valerius Maximus, was ſought for by Annibal to be buried; even his body, who as much as in him lay, had buried the Roman Empire. Cn. Servilius the other Conſul who kept Ariminum (a Countrey of Italy now called Rimini, lying upon the River Rubicon) hearing of Annibal's coming into Etruria, purpoſed to joyn with his Colleague, but finding that difficult, choſe out four thouſand men whom he ſent to his aid, under conduct of C. Centenius (by ſome called Centronius) whom he commanded, if poſſible, to reach him before the fight. Hannibal hearing of this ſupply, after the battel, ſent out Maharbal with a party, which cutting off one half, forced the the other to an hill, where they alſo yielded themſelves.

Val. Max. l.1. c. 6. exemp. 6. Eutrop. Oroſium.

Whereupon Fabius Maximus is made Vice-Dictator, who by delaying breaketh Annibals ſucceſs.

37. The Romans ſtruck with conſternation at theſe loſſes, upon mature deliberation reſolved there was need of a General with abſolute authority. But the Conſul (who alone had power, and that in the Roman Dominions, to name a Dictator) being abſent, and incompaſſed with the Carthaginian Forces, ſo that no meſſage could conveniently be ſent to him, and the People having no power to create a Dictator, they created as a Prodictator, or Vice-Dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucoſus, whoſe Maſter of the Horſe-men was M. Minutius Rufus. Fabius matched Annibal in policy, breaking his ſucceſs by delaying to fight, which others had increaſed by their temerity, ſo that he obtained the name of * Cunctator. Hannibal was hereof very ſenſible, being by him put to his ſhifts, wanting proviſions exceedingly, and lying in an Enemies Country. But the Maſter of Horſe-men being ſomething hot and raſh, in Fabius his abſence, got the better in certain skirmiſhes, and hereby procured ſo much favour from the multitude, which now accounted the worthy Dictator lazie and fearful, that beyond all example his power was made equal to that of his. Minutius puffed up herewith, ſought to improve his authority by further raſhneſs, ſo as to ingage with the Enemy, in which action he and his party had been overthrown, but that Fabius in good time came in and ſaved him. This ſo convinced him of his former folly, that he confeſſed his fault to the Dictator, whom he called his Father, and renouncing his new power again, ſubjected his Office to the Dictatorſhip.

* Unus homo nobis cunctando reſtituit rem. Ennius.

38. Fabius, when his ſix moneths were out, laid down his Office, and was badly requited, the Tribunes and others calumniating him with the Nobility, as wilfully lengthening the War, which procured Terentius Varro a raſh, hot, and inconſiderable man, for the next year to be created Conſul. He, though joyned with a prudent perſon L. Æmilius Paulus, ſo far prevailed, as to joyn battel with Annibal at the place of Cannæ an ignoble Village of Apulia, which the year before had been deſtroyed, and onely the Caſtle remained, on which Annibal had lately ſeized. The Romans brought into the Field eighty thouſand Foot, and about ſix thouſand Horſe; the Carthaginians not much above forty thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe. Florus writeth, that for the deſtruction of the unhappy Army, both General, Earth, Heaven, the day, and the whole nature of things conſpired. For Annibal not content with the ſending of thoſe who counterfeiting a revolt, fell upon the backs of the Romans, obſerving the nature of the place, ſo choſe out his ground, that beſides his Army they muſt needs fight with wind, duſt, and Sun. But from others it appeareth, that the Romans fighting with their faces toward the South, and the Carthaginians toward the North, the Sun-beams offended neither. However the

Who yet giveth the Romans a moſt grievous overthrow at Cannæ.

A. M. 3789.
Ol. 141. ann. 1.
V. C. 538.
Ant. Mag. 8.
Ptol. Philop. 7.
Belli Punici 3.

abilities of the Punick General were ſeen ſo far in this, as in other battels, that he overmatched them in skill, who exceeded him in numbers, making ſuch ſlaughter of them, that at length wearied, he commanded his Soldiers to forbear, as Florus telleth us. Of the Romans we ſlain fifty thouſand men ſay Plutarch and Appian; ſeventy thouſand ſaith Polybius, and Livy hath forty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand ſix hundred Horſe. Amongſt theſe was Æmilius the Conſul (who unwilling to ſurvive the defeat refuſed to flie) 2. Quæſtors, 21. Tribunes, 80 of Senatorian degree, divers of Conſular dignity, and ſo many Equites or Knights, that, as Pliny writeth, Hannibal ſent three buſhels of Gold Rings to Rome, which were the Enſignes of that Order, though Pliny from this number endeavoureth to prove that the uſe of them at this time was promiſcuous, elſe a vaſt number muſt there have been of them: but Livy writeth, that more likely report held there were but one buſhel. Hannibal loſt five thouſand and ſeven hundred of his men. Varro the Conſul fled to Vennuſia with ſeventy Horſe, whither alſo eſcaped four thouſand Foot and Horſe, which leading to Cannuſium, where were already ten thouſand men, he made up a ſhew of a Conſular Army, which by the help of Walls, though not of Arms, ſeemed able to defend it ſelf.

And enervateth his Army by wintering at Capua.

Livius lib. 23.

39. Had Hannibal taken his opportunity and marched to Rome, in all probability he might have made an end of the War, and of the Roman Empire both together; but this great Souldier knew (as Maharbal Captain of his Horſe truly told him) how to get, but not how to uſe and improve a Victory. For, he loytered all this Summer, and having Capua a wealthy and luxurious City given up into his hands by the Townſ-men, there he took up his Winter quarters, and Capua became a Cannæ to his Soldiers. For, hereby he utterly ſpoyled an excellent Army, which now was ſo enervated by the pleaſures and effeminateneſs of the place, as ever after it became impatient of labour, and its ancient Military Diſcipline, ſo that before this it was harder for the Romans not to be overcome by Hannibal, than afterwards to overcome him. His fortune preſently began to change. He was worſted at Nola by Marcellus the Prætor, and repulſed at Caſilinum, a very ſmall Caſtle for a good ſpace. At this time, though there was a Dictator in the Camp (M. Junius Pera, whoſe Maſter of the Horſe-men was Tib. Sempronius) yet the Senate being exhauſted by the War, M. Fabius Buleo was named Dictator by Terentius the Conſul, for filling it up, without a Maſter of Horſe-men. He coming into the Roſtra, ſaid, he did not approve that there ſhould be two Dictators at one time (which never before had been known) nor that he was created without a Maſter of Horſemen; neither that the power of Cenſorſhip ſhould twice be permitted to one man; nor that power for ſix moneths ſhould be given to any Dictator, except for the War. What extream neceſſity had procured, he ſaid he would moderate. For he would not remove any Senator which C. Flaminius, and L. Æmilius the late Cenſors had choſen, onely tranſcribe, and cauſe them to be read over, leſt the credit, and eſteemed of Senators ſhould be in the power of one man; and ſo he would ſupply the places of the dead, that this man before that, and not one order ſhould ſeem preferred above another. The old Senate then being called over, he choſe into vacant places, firſt ſuch as ſince the laſt Cenſorſhip had born Curule Offices, as each one had been firſt created; then ſuch as had been Ædiles, Tribunes of the Commons, or Quæſtors, and laſtly, ſuch had any ſpoyls hung up at home, which they themſelves had taken from the Enemy, or had received a Civick Crown. So one hundred and ſeventy ſeven being thus choſen with univerſal approbation, he preſently laid down his Office.

Two Dictators at the ſame time.

The Senate filled.

The Romans quickly recovered their courage.

Annibal and his party goeth down the Wind in Italy, and Spain.

40. The Romans, though the defeat at Cannæ threatned them with no leſs than ruin, quickly recovered their courage. When Varro (being ſent for to name a Dictator) was near the City, all Ranks went forth to meet him, and though he was the cauſe of the overthrow, gave him thanks that he had not deſpaired concerning the Commonwealth. Philip King of Macedonia having expected the fortune of both parties, after the battel of Cannæ joyned in affiancy with Hannibal; and this being diſcovered through the intercepting of his Ambaſſadors, for to prevent his coming into Italy, the Romans took order for the invaſion of his own Territories. At this time Hannibal was beaten at Cumæ, and conſtrained to raiſe his ſiege; and from Nola the ſecond time by the ſame hand; Hanno having the ſame fortune at Grumentum. In Spain the Scipioes ſo managed the War that they got ground, being continually Superiors. Aſdrubal was ordered by the Senate at Carthage to paſs into Italy, but upon his departure they defeated him in battel, and by this ſucceſs not onely overthrew the deſign of joyning with Hannibal, but drew moſt of the Spaniards to their party, ſtill improving the Victory.

And in Sardinia.

Livius lib. 24.

41. In Sicilie and Sardinia, though ſeveral attempts were made by the Carthaginians, and ſome revolts happened, yet things proceeded in a good condition. In one battel in Sardinia twelve thouſand were ſlain, and many taken Priſoners, amongſt whom were Aſdrubal, Hanno, and Mago, all noble Carthaginians. A year or two after the death of Hieron King of Syracuſe (who having been a faſt friend to the Romans died at ninety years of age or more) altered much the face of affairs. For Hieronymus his Grandſon ſucceeding him, was for his wicked diſpoſition quickly made away, and then the City breaking into divers factions; that which was moſt contrary to the Roman intereſt prevailed, by the means of two inconſiderable men made Prætors. Marcellus the Conſul beſieged Syracuſe both by Sea and Land, but was hindered from ſtorming it by the skill and invention of that excellent Mathematitian Archimedes. He framed ſuch Engines, as therewith to caſt huge ſtones upon the Romans, and great beams upon their Ships. He would ſet the Ships upon one end, overturn them, and hoizing them up into the air, after all the men, and other things were falln out of them, let them fall upon the Walls, or return down into the Sea. Such was the exactneſs of his skill, both near at hand, and afar of, that neither by Sea nor by Land could they attempt a ſtorm, their Engines of battery being alſo diſmounted by the force of his.

In Sicily Marcellus beſiegeth Syracuſe.

Lege Plutarch in Marcello. Livium lib. 25. Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. Extern. Exemp. 7. Ciceron. Tuſcull. lib. 1. & 5. & De Finibus l. 5.

42. Marcellus hereupon departed from the ſiege, jeering his own Engineers, and calling Archimedes by the name of Briareus. He deſtroyed Megara, one of the moſt ancient Cities of the Iſland, and falling upon the Army of Hippocrates, as it was incampiug it ſelf, killed above eight thouſand men. After this he made incurſions, and drew ſeveral Towns from the Carthaginians. He took Damippus the Spartan as he ſayled from Syracuſe, about the redemption of whom coming often near the Walls of that City, he obſerved a Tower negligently kept, and convenient for receiving of men, becauſe the Wall there might be eaſily mounted. Taking the opportunity of Diana's feaſt, wherein the Syracuſians gave up themſelves to Wine and ſports, he ſeized on this Tower and through it beſtowing his men about the Walls, eaſily became Maſter of the City, after three years ſpent in the ſiege. He wept when he beheld the goodlineſs of it, which notwithſtanding his Commands for moderation (in which he was eminent) he knew would ſuffer much. But more than the reſt, the death of Archimedes troubled him, whom he moſt laboured to preſerve. Some wrote that this famous Artiſt buſied in his Geometrical ſpeculations minded not what was doing in the City; but a Soldier coming to him, and bidding him follow him to Marcellus, he would not go till he had finiſhed his probleme, and demonſtrated it, whereupon the Soldier killed him. Others reported that a Soldier ruſhing in upon him, he deſired reſpite from death till he had finiſhed his contemplation; but the Soldier not at all regarding him ſlew him preſently. A third report went, that as he was carrying his Mathematical inſtruments to Marcellus, certain Soldiers came upon him, who ſuppoſing it to be Gold he carried in the Veſſel, inſtantly ſlew him. One of theſe wayes periſhed Archimedes, who excelling all men in this noble skill, deſerveth as much of blame as he had of knowledge, in that eſteeming ſordid and baſe the making of Engines, and what ſerved neceſſary uſes, he onely ſeriouſly ſtudied the Science abſtracted from Mechanick works, and through this kind of greatneſs of mind, refuſed to write any thing concerning thoſe works, which procured him his deſerved fame and eſtimation.

Archimedes forceth him to depart.

Yet he ſurprizeth the City, but cannot preſerve Archimedes.

A. M. 3793. Ol. 142. an. 1. V. C. 542. Ant. M. 12. Ptol. Philop. 11. Belli Punici 7.

43. At this time the Scipioes in Spain having well nigh done their work, and intending ſuddenly to make an end of the War, unfortunately divided their Forces, and through the treachery of the Celtiberians were both cut off with almoſt their whole Armies. The Roman intereſt hereby had been deſtroyed in that Countrey, had not the remainders of the forces been kept together, and preſerved by L. Marcius a Tribune, who revenged the death of the two Generals and his other Countreymen, by falling on the Carthaginians, divided into two ſeveral Camps, Secure, and without any watch, and ſuffering none to eſcape from one to give notice to the other, ſlew thirty ſeven thouſand and took one thouſand eight hundred and thirty with great plunder. In Italy, Hannibal had Tarentum betrayed to him by the Inhabitants, the Caſtle ſtill holding out; and the Romans laid ſiege to Capua. Hither was Annibal called for aid; but he made no great haſte, out of deſire he had to take the Caſtle of Tarentum. Bethinking himſelf how great ſcandal he ſhould give to all his Confederates, in caſe he did not relieve that City, he marched thither, and ſet upon the Roman Camp, which was ſo well defended, that he was repelled, though aſſiſted by the Inhabitants, and his own Garriſon he there had left.

The Scipioes having Conquered almoſt all Spain, are deſtroyed by dividing their forces, and their death is revenged by Marcius.

Livius lib. 26.

The Romans beſiege Capua.

Hannibal having got Tarentum beſiegeth the Caſtle in vain, and Marcheth for Rome.

Perceiving then that the Enemy would not be drawn out of his Trenches, and that he could not break through his Camp, leſt the new Conſuls ſhould intercept his Proviſions, he reſolved to be gone. Conſidering much whither he ſhould go, he reſolved for Rome it ſelf, the head of the War, deſigning at leaſt by this Enterprize to raiſe the ſiege of Capua.

44. His coming being heard of at Rome, they were there variouſly inclined as to reſiſtance. Some thought that all the Armies in Italy were to be ſent for; but Fabius Maximus would by no means hear of leaving Capua: Therefore a middle way was taken, to ſend for one of the Captains from the ſiege to the defence of the City. Q. Fulvius then the Proconſul chuſing out fifteen thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe out of the three Armies, marched for Rome, which he entred at the Gate Capena (when Hannibal now lay encamped eight miles off) the Senate, leſt his power ſhould be diminiſhed, having decreed, that if he came into the City he ſhould have equal authority with the Conſuls. Annibal removing to the River Aniene, three miles from the City, with two thouſand Horſe thence went to take a view of it. Flaccus ſtomaching he ſhould take this liberty and do it with eaſe, ſent out a party of Horſe, which falling on made him retreat. The day after, and that following, Hannibal on one ſide, and Flaccus with the Conſuls on the other, drew out their forces for a battel, when on both dayes fell ſuch ſtorms of hail and rain, as the Armies could not joyn, but when they had retreated into their Camps a wonderful ſerenity appeared. This ſtruck the Carthaginians with a religious awe, and cauſed Hannibal to ſay, that ſometimes a Will, and otherwhiles fortune were wanting to him for the taking of the City. Removing back then his Camp to the River Turia, thence he proceeded to the Lake of Feronia, which Goddeſs had then a rich Temple there. This he robbed, and ſo marched through the Countreys of the Lucani and Brutii towards Rhegium and the Straights, where he well nigh had deſtroyed the Inhabitants unawares by the ſuddeneſs of his coming. Flaccus returned to the ſiege of Capua, whither that Hannibal returned not was much admired. The Campanians therefore deſpairing of any aſſiſtance from him, Capua was yielded up. The heads of the Rebellion (fifty three in number) were put to death (twenty eight having before poyſoned themſelves) at the command of Fulvius, contrary to the Will of his Collegue Appius Claudius, who would have had the the matter determined by the Senate at Rome. The common ſort was ſold, and the City, becauſe ſituate in ſo good a ſoyl, reſerved for a receptacle of all ſorts of Plow-men, Labourers, and Artificers, without any ſhew of government of its own, after it had ſtood about two hundred and ſixty years. Theſe things hapned in the eighth year of the War, being the 543 of the City, the 13th of Antiochus the Great, and the 12 of Ptolomy Philopator, P. Sulpicius Galba, and Cn. Falvius Centumalus being Conſuls.

Is hindred from fighting by Tempeſts, and departeth towards Rhegium.

A. M. 3794. V. C. 543.

Capua yielded.

Paterculus lib. 1.

Livius lib. 27.

Nero deluded by Aſdrubal

45. This year was ſent into Spain Claudius Nero, who having got Aſdrubal the Carthaginian into a ſtraight ſo as he might have cut off him and his Army, Aſdrubal promiſed he would draw all his Soldiers out of the Countrey, but drew out the time in length by the interpoſition of his Punick faith, till by little and little he withdrew all his men out of the danger. The Senate and People hearing this, took it ill that Nero would thus ſuffer himſelf to be abuſed, yet know they not whom to ſend to ſucceed him, and when the Comitia were held for the creation of a Proconſul, none appeared to ſtand for the Office. A great ſadneſs hereupon ſeized on the multitude, When Publius Scipio ſon to Publius Cornelius Scipio ſlain in Spain (whom as we ſaid he defended in battel) a young man but of twenty four years of age, ſtood up in a place where he might be ſeen, and profeſſed himſelf Candidate, having the year before been made Ædilis, though under age, by the great favour and confidence of the People. With great joy he was created by the ſuffrages of all, but when they conſidered what they had done, and eſpecially thought of his age, they were again much perplexed, which he apprehending, called them together, and with ſuch ſpirit and reſolution promiſed them good ſucceſs, that they departed well ſatisfied, judging many things to be in him which ſurpaſſed humane admiration; for having good parts, he could ſet them off to purpoſe. Paſſing into Spain then this year, the ſummer following he took new Carthage by ſtorm, a place of great conſequence both for riches and ſituation, by the fame of which exploit, together with his loving demeanour towards the natives, he well improved the Victory.

Publius Scipio taketh npon him the government of Spain and exceedingly proſpereth.

46. Hannibal at this time indulging his cruel diſpoſition in waſting ſuch Countries as he could not keep, loſt his credit; and the Romans in Italy gained thereby.

This

Sect. 2. This year M. Valerius Lævinus, who had done good ſervice againſt Philip of Macedonia, was the ſecond time, in his abſence, created Conſul, together with Marcellus the fourth time. Lævinus went into Sicily, where taking the City Agrigentum, he thereby brought the whole Iſland under the Roman Juriſdiction. The year following being the tenth of the War, Tarentum was betrayed into the hands of Fabius Maximus, now Conſul the fifth time, with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who the fourth time bore this Office. Marcellus for this year ſometimes winning and ſometimes loſing with Annibal, for that following being created Conſul (though he ſcarcely ſeemeth rightly created according to the Roman ſuperſtition) though otherwhiles wary enough, was cut off in an Ambuſh, whilſt with his Collegue T. Quintius Criſpinus, accompanied onely with two hundred and twenty Horſe, he went to view a place where he had a great deſire to fight Hannibal. Criſpinus alſo received a wound whereof he died, after he had named a Dictator for creation of the next Conſuls.

Lævinus recovereth all Sicily.

Marcellus ſlain.

A. M. 3797.
Ol. 143. an. 1.
V. C. 546.
Ant. M. 16.
Ptol. Philop. 15.
Belli 11.

47. The year following, Aſdrubal was ordered to go out of Spain into Italy, to the aſſiſtance of his Brother Annibal. This cauſed great carefulneſs in Rome, by reaſon they knew not well whom to oppoſe againſt him. At length M. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator (who lately had returned to the City, after that being publickly diſgraced he had abſented himſelf for ſeveral years) were created Conſuls, having been at great odds, and now reconciled through the interpoſition of the Senate. Livius was ordered to meet Aſdrubal, and Nero appointed to attend the motions of Annibal. But the later having ſome ſucceſs againſt his Enemy, picked out of the flower of his Army ſix thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe, and with great ſecrecy, and as much ſpeed, marched toward his Collegue, that he might reach him ere he joyned with Aſdrubal. Being joyned, they incompaſſed him, who was by a deceitful guide led into a dangerous place, and cut him with his whole Army in pieces: then marched Nero back to his own Army, and ere Hannibal knew of his departure, caſt his Brothers head into his Camp, whereby to his grief he knew of the defeat. The year following did P. Scipio after many Victories obtained, finiſh the War in Spain; all the Carthaginian Captains being either taken or driven away. This hapned five years after his undertaking the charge, and thirteen after the beginning of the War.

Aſdrubal ordered to march out of Spain into Italy,

Is cut off with his whole Army by Livius and Nero the Conſuls.

48. Scipio coming to Rome, and being made Conſul, greatly deſired to be ſent into Africk, urging it to the Senate as neceſſary for finiſhing the War, and undertaking ſo to manage his affairs, as to force the Carthaginians to recall Hannibal for the defence of his own Countrey. Fabius Maximus moſt earneſtly, and with ſome heat oppoſed this, and a conſiderable difference hereupon aroſe; but at length Sicily was granted him for his Province, and leave given him to paſs over into Africk, if he ſaw it convenient for the Commonwealth. All this year he ſpent in the Iſland, in providing neceſſaries for his Expedition, and the next, with a brave Fleet landed in Africk, where Maſaniſſa King of Numidia (who in Spain had joyned with him) came in to his aid. Within a while he killed Hanno with three thouſand men, and beſieged Utica; but Syphax King of Numidia, the enemy and competitor of Maſaniſſa (who formerly had entered into league with Scipio, but again upon a marriage with Annibal's niece revolted) coming with the Carthaginians to raiſe the ſiege, he having attempted in vain to ſtorm the Town, roſe up and departed to his winter quarters.

Scipio having ſubdued Spain is made Conſul.

The year following paſſeth into Africk.

Livius lib. 29.

A. M. 3800.
Ol. 143. an. 4.
V. C. 549.
Seleucidarum 108.
Ant. Mag. 19.
Ptol. Philop. 18.
Belli Punici. 14.

49. In winter he was not idle, but again beſieged Utica, and entred into a Treaty with Syphax and Aſdrubal about a Peace, in the mean time ſending his ableſt Soldiers in the habit of Slaves with his Commiſſioners, to view the Enemies Camps. This being ſufficiently done, he brake off the Treaty, and ſet fire upon the Camps, which the other not ſuſpecting, but thinking it came by accident, were cut in pieces when they were buſied in quenching the fire, to the number of forty thouſand men, and ſix thouſand were taken Priſoners. Not long after he gave them another great overthrow, which ſo affected the Carthaginians with fear, that they called home Hannibal. Preſently after they ſent a Fleet to relieve Utica, which worſted the Roman Navy; and they might have done more than this had not fear made them loiter. But ſhortly after this, Scipio again routed Syphax, who had got together an unexperienced company of ſtrangers, and taking him Priſoner, gave his Kingdom to Maſaniſſa. In Italy about this time Mago was overthrown, and wounded in an ingagement with Quintilius Varus the Prætor, and M. Cornelius the Proconſul: he alſo was recalled as well as his Brother Annibal, and died on the Sea of his wounds. The Carthaginians ſent an Ambaſſage to Rome, with a deſign to obtain a ceſſation till Hannibal

Idem lib. 30.
Polyb. l. 14, & 15.

Where he ſo diſtreſſeth the Carthaginians, could arrive out of Italy. But their aim being ſufficiently underſtood, the meſſage was ſlighted; and to witneſs their perfidiouſneſs, they brake the Law of Nations, by offering to violate Meſſengers ſent from Scipio.

That they recall Hannibal;

50. Annibal being recalled by his ſuperiours, with very much reluctancy quitted Italy, after he had therein ſpent ſixteen years. He complained much of the Senate and of himſelf. Of the Senate, becauſe fighting ſo long a time in an Enemies Country, they had ſo little ſupplied him with money and other things neceſſary for War. Of himſelf, for that having ſo often overthrown and put to flight the Roman Legions, he had ſtill delayed and given them time to breath. It's reported alſo, that ere he took Ship, he built an Arch near the the Temple of Juno Lacinia, wherein, in Punick and Greek letters, he wrote the ſum of his great atchievements. Taking the Sea, he landed in a few dayes at Leptis, whence he marched to Adrumentum, and thence to Zama. Conſidering now the weak eſtate of his Country, he deſired a meeting with Scipio to treat of Peace, which being granted, the two greateſt Captains in the World came to an interview betwixt their Armies, but receiving mutually no ſatisfaction, they returned to decide the controverſie by the Sword. Hannibal in the battel behaved himſelf moſt gallantly, and like ſo expert a Warriour amongſt his Soldiers, conſiſting of ſo many Nations and languages. But providence ordained the Victory to Scipio, who ſlew twenty thouſand, and took as many Priſoners, yet not without great loſs of his own men, whereof two thouſand fell. After this, Annibal perſwaded his Country-men to aſk Peace, and Ambaſſadors were diſpatched away accordingly.

A. M. 3802.
V. C. 551.

Whom he alſo overthroweth,

51. Scipio was not averſe to a cloſure, as loth to part with the glory of concluding the War, which the year before was in danger of being taken from him by Tib. Claudius Nero the Conſul, and now by C. Cornelius Lentulus, who both had procured Africk for their Province, and to be joyned in equal authority with him. The power of concluding the Peace was by the People decreed to Scipio, with ten others, which was at length agreed to on theſe termes. That the Carthaginians being free, ſhould enjoy all their Territories in Africk; but the Romans hold Spain with all the Iſlands of the Mediterranean any time in queſtion betwixt the two States. That all Rebels and Fugitives ſhould be given up to the Romans. That the Carthaginians ſhould deliver up all their beaked Ships, except ten Triremes, with all their tamed Elephants, and tame no more. It was made unlawful for them to make War in Africk or elſewhere, without Licence from the People of Rome. They were to reſtore all to Maſaniſſa, and enter into confederacy with him. To give money and Corn to the Roman Auxiliaries, till the Ambaſſadors ſhould be returned. To pay ten thouſand Talents of Silver in the ſpace of fifty years, and give one hundred Hoſtages for performance of theſe things. Thus ended the ſecond Punick War, in the eighteenth year, and Scipio obtained the honourable ſirname of Africanus, being the firſt General (if Livy obſerveth rightly) who was ennobled by the name of a Country he had overcome.

Whereupon Peace is deſired and obtained.

A. M. 3804.
Ol. 144. an. 1.
V. C. 553.
Ant. Mag. 23.
Ptol. Epiphan. 3.
Belli Punici 18.

52. The Romans had little or no reſt after this War; for immediately begun, or rather went on the Macedonian, or that with Philip, the occaſion being given, as was ſaid, ten years before, upon his entrance into confederacy with Annibal. The Ætolians being alſo invaded by him, aid was ſent them, by which he was worſted, and after ſeven years a Peace was made. But now the Romans having nothing to do, and being not without provocation, as well by his breaking of his faith with the Ætolians and others of their friends in thoſe parts, as by his ſupply of men and mony not long before ſent to Hannibal, and at the earneſt requeſt of the Athenians (the Territories of whom he had waſted) they decreed War anew againſt him, being alſo complained of by Attalus King of Pergamus, and the Rhodians, for moleſting the Cities in Aſia. Ser. Sulpitius Galba the Conſul obtaining Macedonia for his Province, by himſelf and his Lieutenant, put him to the worſt divers times, and had almoſt taken him. Together with Attalus and the Rhodians he cauſed him to raiſe his ſiege from Athens, whereupon the Ætolians before backward enough, by reaſon of their Magiſtrate, and the Athamanians now incouraged invaded his Dominions, but being idle and careleſs were eaſily repelled by him. This year, did M. Furius the Prætor get a great Victory over the Galls, which beſieged Cremona in Italy, killing thirty thouſand, and with them Amilcar the Carthaginian Captain. For this, after much diſpute in the Senate, he triumphed, though againſt the Cuſtom, and without preſident, for any one to receive this honour, that had obtained Victory with the Army of another, as he had done with the Soldiers of C. Aurelius Cotta the Conſul

The Macedonian War.

Livius lib. 31.

Galba the Conſul proſpereth againſt Philip.

A. M. 3805.
Ol. 145. an. 1.
V. C. 554.
Seleucidarum 113.
Ant. M. 24.
Ptol. Epiph. 4.

Conſul in his abſence, who took it moſt hainouſly. The year following, C. Bebius the Prætor entering unadviſedly into the Territories of the Galls Inſubres, was incompaſſed and loſt above ſix thouſand and ſix hundred men.

And ſo doth Flaminius.

One good thing done by the Tribune of the People Εὕρηκα.

Philip overthrown by Flaminnius at Cynoſcephale, deſireth, and obtaineth peace.

53. Nothing conſiderable was this year done in Macedonia by P. Villius Tappulus the Conſul; but his ſucceſſor T. Quintius * Flamininus (not Flaminnius as Plutarch now hath him; for the Flaminini Patritians muſt not be confounded with the Flaminii who were Plebeians) uſing great expedition, beat Philip out of the Straights, wherein ſecurely he had encamped, and by Sea his Brother Lucius (with Attalus) took ſeveral Towns of his Confederates, and beſieged Corinth, though in vain. The time coming for the election of new Conſuls, and it being uſual for them to take the Provinces from their Predeceſſors, the Tribunes rightly objected, that this courſe hindred the progreſs of the Wars, and procured Quintius his Government to be continued to him, who being about taking the Caſtle of Opus, Meſſengers came from Philip about a Treaty. Several times they met (which before they had alſo done at the Straights) and the Ambaſſadors of Attalus, the Rhodians and Achæans were preſent; but the effect was nothing, and Philip gave up Argos into the hands of Nabis Tyrant of Lacædemon, who uſed the Inhabitants with great cruelty and incredible exaction. But Quintius following Philip into Theſſaly, gave him ſuch a blow at Cynoſcephale, as forced him to ask Peace, which was granted upon terms moderate enough. All the Cities of Greece which he had got in his hands, were hereby, beyond all expectation, and to the wonder of themſelves and others, ſet at liberty, and left to their own Laws. The year preceding this concluſion, did the Galls receive a great overthrow from Cornelius the Conſul. But in Spain, C. Sempronius Tuditanus was totally defeated. The ſame year wherein the Macedonian War ended, the ſlaves in Tuſcany made a dangerous Rebellion, but were chaſtized, and quieted, by Attilius the Prætor. And about the ſame time was another victory obtained over the Galls.

* Apud Livium l. 32.

A. M. 3809.
Ol. 146. ann. 1.
V. C. 558.
Ant. M. 28.
Ptol. Epiph. 8.

A. M. 3810.
V. C. 559.

54. The year after the ratification of the peace, ſome bickering there was in the City about the Women. Twenty years before, there had been a Law preferred by Oppius, Tribune of the People, preſently after the defeat at Cannæ, forbidding women the wearing of Gold or Purple, and the uſe of any other kind of Pomp. This now did two of the preſent Tribunes labour to abrogate, the face of things being changed, and the occaſion removed. M. Porcius Cato the Conſul ſtood ſtifly for preſerving the Law, inveighing much againſt the Females; but partly through the appoſite reply of L. Valerius the Tribune unto the Conſul, out of his own book, called Origenes, and eſpecially through the the importunity of the Women themſelves (who with liberty of behaviour ſufficient filled the ſtreets, came to the Aſſembly, and conſtrained two of the Tribunes to let fall their interpoſition) it was abrogated. Cato then betook himſelf into Spain his Province, where uſing ſeverity towards himſelf as well as his Soldiers, he reſtored the Roman intereſt by good Diſcipline. Having led his Army upon the back of the Spaniards, and thereby neceſſitated them to fight, he overthrew them in a great battel, and took their Camp; after which, notwithſtanding the fickleneſs of the Natives, he reduced the Province to obedience. The ſame Summer did L. Valerius Flaccus his Collegue give another overthrow to the Galls in Italy.

The Oppian Law againſt the women repealed.

Motions in Greece.

55. In Greece, Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, ſtill held it, and Argos, in ſlavery; wherefore the freedom of them ſtill was wanting to the univerſal liberty of Greece, reſolved to be vindicated from the oppreſſion of the Macedonian party. Quintius, upon Nabis his refuſal to quit Argos, beſieged them both, and took in Gytheum a Port Town, which drove Nabis to ask peace. Quintius was not againſt it, urging to the Græcian Allies the length, which was likely to be of the ſiege of Sparta, the unſeaſonableneſs of the Winter ſeaſon, and the War that threatned from Antiochus King of Aſia; but indeed fearing leſt one of the new Conſuls taking Macedonia for his Province, might rob him of the glory of ending the whole controverſie in theſe parts. Yet the Greeks being earneſt for ſuppreſſing the Tyrant, he ſeemed to yield to it, and afterwards put them off by demanding ſuch ſupplies as they could not furniſh him with. Notwithſtanding this, the peace could not be made; for, Nabis accepted not of the terms, eſpecially of parting with his Ships. Hereupon Sparta was ſet upon round about, and had been taken, but that Pythagoras Son-in-law to the Tyrant ſet the out-houſes on fire, which drove away the Inhabitants. Though the onſet ſucceeded not, yet the danger put Nabis into ſuch a fright, that he now accepted of the former conditions, and had peace granted granted him; the Argives having ere this taken heart at the abſence of Pythagoras their Governour, and freed themſelves. The following year T. Sempronius the Conſul killed many of the Galls who had ſet upon his Camp, but with great loſs of his own men. Several times had the Romans now the better againſt theſe people, and the Ligurians. Then came they flatly to fall out with Antiochus the Great, King of Syria, and began a War with him five years after the ending of the Macedonian, in the 563 year of the City, the ſecond of the 147 Olympiad, the three and thirtieth of Antiochus, and the thirteenth of Ptolomy Epiphanes, A.M. 3814. P. Corn. Scipio Naſica, and Manius Acilius Glabrio being Conſuls.

The Romans fight proſperouſly againſt the Galls.

SECT. III.

From the War with Antiochus, and the invaſion of Aſia, to the deſtruction of Carthage, after which the Romans degenerated through ſecurity.

Containing the ſpace of forty five years.

The occaſions of the War with Antiochus

1. ANtiochus had invaded the Territories of Attalus; but being then the friend of the Romans, gave over his Enterprize at their deſire. After this, having an hungry deſire after Ægypt; upon applycation of the Ægyptians to Rome, he was commanded to deſiſt, which breeding in him diſcontent, it was heightened by reaſon of his ſetting upon ſeveral Cities in Greece. He ſaid that they once had belonged (though not of a long time) to his Predeceſſors; but the Romans being ambitious to ſet all Greece at liberty, plainly told him that theſe Towns muſt not be excepted. When he was thus enough incenſed, and by Hannibal (who had fled to him) ſpurred on, the Ætolians importuned him to joyn with them againſt their late friends and benefactors. This they did, being an inconſtant people, and very covetous, having taken offence at the ſmall quantity of booty, as they accounted it, alotted to them in the War againſt Philip, by T. Quintius.

Things introductive to it.

2. The Ætolians firſt of all attempted to get into their hands Lacedæmon, and other Towns, before held as cautionary by Quintius; but miſſed of their deſign, though they brake into the former, and killed Nabis the Tyrant; for, they were afterwards cut in pieces by the Inhabitants themſelves. Antiochus having through the cunning inſinuations of Thoas the Ætolian, changed his purpoſe of ſending Annibal into Africk, and thence into Italy, landed in Greece, with an intention to make it the Seat of War. He brought an inconſiderable Army with him; but ſeemed to have made a good beginning, having got Chalcis into his hands, and by that means eaſily brought under the whole Iſland of Eubœa. After this, he ſent and buried the dead bodies of the Macedonians ſlain at Cynoſcephale, thinking thereby to oblige Philip, who taking it as tending to his reproach, becauſe he had not done it before, it proved but an effectual means to make him his Enemy, the Theſſalians being no better affected, becauſe he had taken ſome of their Towns. Then wintring at Chalcis, he fell in Love with, and marryed an obſcure maid; his Army which before was indifferently good, falling with him into all idleneſs and exceſs.

M. Acilius the Conſul defeateth Antiochus at Thermopylæ.

A. M. 3814.
Ol. 147. an. 2.
V. C. 563.
Seleucidarum 122.
Ant. Mag. 33.
Ptol. Epiphan. 13.

3. M. Acilius the Conſul, to whom Greece fell by lot, eaſily recovered the places of Theſſaly, and afterwards beat Antiochus out of the Straights of Thermopylæ, whither, being deſerted by his confederates, he had retired, as is ſhewn in the Hiſtory of his Kingdom. Then the Conſul received the Bœotians, chiding them only for their ingratitude, and the Gates of Chalcis being ſet open to him, he preſently recovered Eubœa. This done, he went againſt the Ætolians, from whom after he had taken one or two Towns they offered to ſubmit, but being offended with the hard conditions he propounded, and for that large things were promiſed by Antiochus, they flew back. Hereupon he beſieged Naupactus (now Lepanto) and had utterly ruined them, but for the interceſſion of T. Quintius. For he having then received the Iſland of Zacynthus from the Athenians, came to the Camp, and though they had ill deſerved at his hands by detracting from his worth, yet thinking it diſhonourable for him, being the deliverer of Greece, that any one people ple ſhould periſh, he propoſed to the Conſul to be conſidered, whether to counterpoiſe the power of Philip, who now had got by his leave Athamania, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopio into his hands, it would not be good policy to preſerve the Ætolians. For this reſpect, and at their humble ſute he gave them Truce, that they might ſend to the Senate at Rome, and broke up his ſiege. Whilſt Acilius did theſe things in Greece, his Collegue Scipio Naſica got a notable victory over the Boii in Italy, which utterly broke their power in pieces.

L. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul obtaineth Greece for his Province with leave to paſs into Aſia.

4. Lucius Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius Nepos, being Conſuls for the following year, came, according to the cuſtom, to divide the Provinces by lot. Both were extreamly deſirous to have Greece, and Lælius being a man in great favour, offered that the thing might be left to the diſcretion of the Senate. Scipio at firſt knew not what to do, but his Brother Africanus perſwaded him by all means to aſſent to it. The thing was new, and the Senate expected many words on both ſides, when Africanus ſtanding up, told the Fathers, that if they would decree Greece to his Brother, he would go his Legatus or Lieutenant, whereupon there was no need any more ſhould be ſaid; for it was preſently voted with univerſal conſent, and power given to the Conſul to paſs into Aſia, if he ſaw it convenient. Coming into Greece he found Acilius fall'n upon the Ætolians again, becauſe the Senate had given them no poſſitive anſwer, either as to peace or War; only two things were propoſed: To caſt themſelves wholly upon the Senate, or pay down one thouſand Talents, and have the ſame Friends and Enemies with the Romans. When they deſired an expoſition of the former, no anſwer would be given, but a command to their Ambaſſadors to depart: The Conſul proſecuted what his Predeceſſor had begun, and with much ado, through the interceſſion of the Athenians by Africanus, another Truce was granted that they might have time once more to ſend to Rome. There their Ambaſſadors inſtead of confeſſing their faults, and asking pardon, boaſted what friends and aſſiſtants they had been to the Roman State, which gave ſuch offence, that they were commanded out of the City, as before.

5. Antiochus having with his Son Seleucus beſieged Pergamus the chief City of Eumenes, the friend of the Romans, was forced to raiſe his ſiege. He ſent to Æmilius the Roman Admiral now on thoſe Coaſts about peace, who diſowned any power of concluding it without the Conſul. Then did the Rhodians at Sea defeat his Admiral, which was Hannibal, a man out of his proper Element, and afterward in a battel fought with Æmilius, Eumenes, and the Rhodians, he fully loſt the command of the Sea. Affrighted hereat, he fooliſhly left Lyſimachia, which this year might have kept the Conſul in action, aud adding one folly to another ſuffered Scipio to paſs the Helleſpont without interruption. Now he offered to quit all places in Europe, and ſuch in Aſia as were the friends of Rome, to diſcharge half of the coſts ſuſtained by the Romans in the War, and rather than not be quiet, he was content to part with a portion of his own Kingdom. Theſe ſeemed but ſmall things to the Conſul, who thought it juſt that he, who had been the cauſe of the War, ſhould bear all the charges of it, and not only quit Ionia and Æolis, but leave all the Greek Cities to their liberty, which could not be, except he parted with all Aſia on this ſide the Mountain Taurus. The Ambaſſador had in charge to procure the favour of Africanus, to whom was offered the reſtitution of his Son taken priſoner, and all that could be expected on this ſide the Title of King, if he would live with him. But all private Offices of kindneſs only would Africanus promiſe, deſiring him by all means to procure peace, and, when he had received his Son, not to fight till he ſhould (being now ſick) return to the Camp. This cauſed Antiochus to delay fighting, but the Conſul followed, and provoked him to give battel, wherein his own Chariots Armed with Sithes, being driven back upon his own men, procured his overthrow. After this, peace was granted on the ſame terms as it had been offered to him before the battel. And thus this War ended in a ſhort time, and leſs trouble than was expected, the ſecond Conſul putting a period to it, who in imitation of his Brother took on him the ſirname of Aſiaticus.

Antiochus affrighted at his bad ſucceſs at Sea maketh offers.

Which are rejected.

He is overthrown, and hath peace granted upon former demands.

6. The year following, wherein M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius were Conſuls, the former going into Greece fell upon the Ætolians, who now had taken from Philip Dolopia, and Amphilochia with Athamania; and beſieging Ambracia, drove them once more to ſue for peace. They were referred by the Conſul to Rome, where the Ambaſſadors of Philip made great complaints againſt them upon the former account. But the Rhodians and Athenians interceeding once more for them, their ſute was granted, on condition to pay five hundred Eubœan Talents at ſeveral

Livius lib. 38.

Peace granted to the Ætolians.

ſeveral payments, to reſtore all priſoners, and have the ſame Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome.

Manlius ſubdueth the Galatians.

Juſtin. lib. 3.

7. Cn. Manlius the other Conſul was now in Aſia, where of that part taken from Antiochus, much he conferred upon Eumenes, and the Rhodians, according to the reſult of the Senate. This done, he undertook an Expedition againſt the Gallogræcians, or Galatians, a People which having followed Brennus into Greece, after his death, had ninety years before paſſed into Aſia, where they were ſo terrible, as none denyed them tribute before Attalus King of Pergamus. They inhabited vaſt and high Mountains, and in that reſpect were with diffculty to be come at; but the Conſul by throwing Darts, eſpecially at their huge bodies, made great ſlaughter and ſubdued them. Returning home through Thrace, he had well-nigh loſt his booty by the Inhabitants that lay in wait for it in the woody paſſages, and hardly got leave to triumph, becauſe he had undertaken the War on his own head. It is obſerved, that luxury and idleneſs were firſt brought to Rome by his Army, out of Aſia, through the provocations to effeminateneſs there found, and his looſe and neglected Government.

Luxury firſt brought to Rome by his Army.

Scipio Africanus called to account by the Tribunes.

Lege Livium lib. 28.
Val. Max. l. 3. c. 7. exemp. 1.
Gellium Noct. Attic. l. 4. c. 18.

A. M. 3818.
Ol. 148. an. 2.
V. C. 567.
Seleuci Phi*lop.* 1.
Ptol. Epiphan. 17.

8. In the third year after the ending of the War with Antiochus, and the ſame wherein he dyed, envy procured the fall of thoſe by whom the Victory was obtained. For, Scipio Africanus was accuſed of having defrauded the Treaſury of the booty taken in the War, and had a day ſet him by the Tribunes to anſwer it before the People. It is not certain who was his accuſer, ſome mentioning M. Nævius, and others the two Patilii Tribunes, ſet on, as ſome delivered, by M. Porcius Cato the Enemy of Scipio. The day of hearing being come, and the Tribunes having taken their places in the Roſtra, the party entred the Aſſembly with a great train of Friends and Clients. Silence being made, he put on his triumphal Crown, and told the People, how as that day he had overthrown Hannibal and the Carthaginians; wherefore thinking it convenient for that time not to meddle with any brawling buſineſs, he would go and ſalute the gods in the Capitol, and give them thanks, that as well that day, as at other times, they had given him both will and power to do eminent ſervice for his Country. Then he wiſhed that ſuch of them there preſent as thought it convenient, would accompany him, and pray that they might have ſuch principal Officers (Principes) as he had been.

His great ſpirit.

He departeth to Linternum and is not condemned through the procurement of Gracchus.

9. Going up to the Capitol, the whole Aſſembly followed him, as alſo to all the Temples in the City, inſomuch that the very Viators and Clerks left the Tribunes alone, who alſo followed, and from accuſers turned admirers, (as appeareth from Valerius Maximus) out of very ſhame. The Tribunes accuſed him alſo grievouſly in the Senate, and deſired he might be brought to his anſwer. He riſing up, produced the Books of accounts, wherein was punctually ſet down all the particulars, but he tore it in pieces before them all, diſdaining to give account for ſo ſmall a matter in compariſon of thoſe vaſt ſums he bhimſelf had brought into the Treaſury. The next day of appearance he abſented himſelf, and his Brother pretending his indiſpoſition, he was excuſed, and another day appointed, before which he withdrew himſelf to Linternum (or Liternum) a Sea Town of Campania. For he clearly perceived under what envy he laboured, it being alſo objected againſt him, that he had ſpent in idleneſs all that Summer he lay in Sicily, and his power with Antiochus, who having diſcharged his Son without ranſom, honoured him above all others, which he willingly took upon him, as one, who alone ſate at the helm, and could ſteer matters concerning Rome according to his pleaſure. In his abſence the Tribunes were very fierce againſt him, yet through the interpoſition of Tiberius Gracchus (formerly accounted his Enemy) he was not condemned.

Aſiaticus his Brother is fined.

The abominable practices at the Bacchanalia diſcovered.

Livius lib. 39.
Val. Max. l. 6. cap. 3. exemp. 7.
Auguſtin de Civitate Dei l. 18 c. 13.

A. M. 3819.
V. C. 568.

10. Lucius Scipio Aſiaticus his Brother was alſo called to an account, and eſcaped not condemnation, the money ſuppoſed to be retained to his own uſe, being charged upon his eſtate; and he was kept from impriſonment meerly by the power of Gracchus. The following year was diſcovered the abominable practice of certain women at the feaſts of Bacchus, which being kept in the night, all manner of filthineſs and continual murders were committed. At firſt theſe feſtivals were obſerved but three dayes in a year, but now five in every month, and men were admitted, whereas they were begun by women. All who being preſent and drawn in, would not conſent to ſuch abominations, were ſacrificed as Beaſts, a vaſt number being bewitched with this folly. The matter being revealed to Sp. Poſthumius Albinus the Conſul, he acquainted the Senate with it, by which, order was taken for apprehending the perſons, impriſoning ſome, and putting others to death, as well in other parts of Italy, as in the City; the contagion having infected many other places, but eſpecially Capua. It was brought to Rome out of Hetruria.

Sect. 3.

Africanus dieth.

A. M. 3822. Ol. 159. an. 2. V. C. 571. Seleuci Philop. 5. Ptol. Epiph. 21.

11. In the ſecond or third year after this diſcovery, and the fourth of his exile, died P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, whether at Linternum, or Rome, is unknown, the place of his burial being alſo uncertain. That he dyed this year, Livy gathereth, becauſe having been Prince or chief of the Senate at the former Luſtrum, this year he was left out, (which none uſed to be as long as he lived) by L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato the Cenſors, the former whereof was choſen into the place. Valerius Maximus telleth us, that he commanded this to be ingraven on his Tomb, Ingrata Patria nè oſſa quidem mea habes, which ſheweth that he was not buryed at Rome. He had that hap which uſually accompanyeth the beſt men, to find their Country ingrateful, being of excellent parts, and of a kingly ſpirit, which he aſcribed to himſelf in Spain, when the Natives ſaluted him by, and would have had him take upon him, the title it ſelf. And upon this account he might be hated by Cato, who though a virtuous man, was moroſe and ſowre. Livy joyneth with his (in the ſame year) the death of Philopœmen, and of Hannibal; ſo that the three great Captains of the World at that time, left it deſolate as it were by agreement. Philopœmen Captain of the Achæans was through the fall off his Horſe, taken in an engagement with the Meſſenians, and compelled to drink poyſon, having done great ſervice for his Country. Hannibal having notice that the Romans would demand him from Antiochus, fled into Crete to the Gortynians. Having great Treaſure with him, and knowing himſelf to be in much danger, becauſe of the Avarice of the Cretans, he filled many barrels with Lead, which covering on the top with Gold, he depoſited in the Temple of Diana, truſting the Gortynians with his wealth. Then put he his money into brazen Statues, which he was wont to carry about with him, and caſt them before the gate. They then watching the Temple diligently from none ſo much as him, he got away ſecretly, and went to Pruſias King of Bithynia, who uſed him in the War againſt Eumenes. But T. Quintius being ſent to Pruſias, whether by the Senate on purpoſe, or upon other occaſions, demanded him as the grand enemy of Rome, to be delivered into his hands. He had provided in his houſe ſeveral places for iſſuing out upon ſuch an occaſion; but being beſet, and no way left to eſcape, he took poyſon, which it's ſaid he carryed about him in his ring. So this renowned Captain ended his life in his ſeventieth year; for which thing Quintius was by many hardly thought of, and got the eſteem of an importune and cruel man, as Plutarch writeth.

And Philopœmen General of the Achæans

Lege Livium ut ſupra. Corn. Nepot. in Hannibale. Juſtin l. 32. Auctorem lib. de viris illuſtrib.

And Hannibal, all three in one year.

Livius l. 40. 41.

12. After theſe things, the Ligurians were often defeated by the Conſuls and other Commanders; many a thouſand of them being ſlain, as alſo of the Celtiberians and other Nations in Spain who were continually rebelling. The Iſtrians beat the Romans out of their camp, and put them to the rout; Manlius the Conſul in vain oppoſing it; but ſhortly after they were diſcomfited by the ſaid Manlius, and afterward fully ſubdued by Claudius the Conſul, who quelled alſo the Ligurians, as his Collegue Tib. Sempronius Gracchus did the rebellion of Sardinia, with the loſs of one thouſand and five hundred of the revolters. About this time Corſica alſo was ſubdued. The year following, Cornelius one of the Conſuls died at the bath at Cumæ, into whoſe place C. Valerius Lævinus was elected. Petilius Spurinus the other Conſul fighting againſt the Ligurians, laboured to take a certain Mountain called Letus, concerning which in his ſpeech to his Souldiers he ſaying, that that day he would take Letus (Hodie ego Letum utique capiam) by raſh fighting confirmed what he had ſaid in another ſence (viz. wherein Lethum ſignifieth death) than he had meant it. Theſe actions abroad were ſhortly after followed by the ſecond Macedonian War, or that with Perſeus, in the five hundred eighty and third year of the City, twenty four after the Peace made with his Father, and ſeventeen after the concluſion with Antiochus.

Several Nations ſubdued.

The War with Perſeus.

13. Perſeus in a manner ſucceeded to this War as well as the Kingdom, his Father having intended and made great preparations for it. Puffed up by theſe preparations, he ſought to draw away the Allies of the Romans from their friendſhip, and abuſed ſeveral of their friends. Their Ambaſſadors he ſlighted, refuſing to give them audience, which made the Senate reſolve upon the War; but it was to be committed to one of the following Conſuls; only for the preſent, Cn. Sicinius the Prætor of the City was commanded to raiſe men, and tranſport them into E- pirus, there to ſeize on the Sea-towns, that the Conſul might more freely land his Army. Some were ſent alſo into Greece to confirm the States in their friendſhip and alliance, who alſo demanding audience of Perſeus, after long waiting, he renounced the league made with the Romans, as entred into at the beginning of his Reign meerly for ſecurity. Hereupon the Ambaſſadors renounced alſo the confederacy made with him, and after that the Conſuls P. Licinius Craſſus and C. Caſſius Longinus had aſſumed their Office, the War was propounded to, and decreed by the People.

14. Quintus Martius and others being ſent into Greece to eſtabliſh the confederates in their fidelity, Perſeus began to bethink himſelf, and was affrighted, hearing of the motions of the Enemy. He applyed himſelf to Martius about a Treaty for Peace, truſting to that friendſhip which had paſſed betwixt their two families. The Ambaſſadors were glad of this addreſs, and to divert him granted him Truce, that he might ſend to Rome, for he had all things in a readineſs, and might have begun the War, as with great advantage to himſelf, ſo too ſpeedily to the Romans, who as yet had neither Army nor Leader arrived. Peace was denyed him by the Senate, and A. Attilius was ſent to ſeize upon Lariſſa the chief City of Theſſaly. Whereupon he drew together his Forces, having got a greater Army than any of his predeceſſors were Maſters of ſince Alexander the Great. He took in ſome Towns upon his borders, and Licinius the Conſul led ſo raw and unexperienced an Army into Macedonia, and through ſuch difficult and almoſt unpaſſable places, as had Perſeus taken his opportunity, he might eaſily have deſtroyed it, as alſo if he had not too ſoon retreated in a battel fought ſhortly after. After this he ſent to Licinius, offering to embrace the conditions ſubmitted to by his Father, in paying the tribute, and leaving the Cities to their liberty; which yet would not be granted. Then were Thebes and Aliartus taken in by Lucretius the Prætor; and the Conſul having had the better in another skirmiſh, received ſome Towns, and took up his Winter quarters; whilſt Appius Claudius in Illyricum loſt many men.

Peace is denied him by the Senate.

Thebes and Aliartus taken

A. M. 3834.
Ol. 152 an. 2.
V. C. 583.
Seleucid. 142.
Ant. Epiph. 6.
Ptol. Philom. 10.

15. The year following C. Hoſtilius the Conſul did nothing of moment; yet this he did in reference to the Army; he reduced the Souldiers to that antient diſcipline which his predeceſſor had let fall. Q. Marcius Philippus ſucceeding him at his firſt enterance into his Province might eaſily have been defeated, had he met with a prudent enemy, the wayes being ſo difficult and dangerous, that the Souldiers could ſcarcely for wearineſs hold their weapons. And after he had got into the plains he might eaſily have been ſhut up on every ſide, and famiſhed, but that Perſeus beſotted with fear ran away to Pydna, and left the Straights open to him. Yet Martius did nothing of conſequence, leaving all to be performed by his Succeſſor L. Æmilius Paulus, who had been Conſul ſeventeen years before. He cauſed the Eclypſe of the Moon to be foretold to his Souldiers, leſt they ſhould be diſcouraged by it, which brought great terror to the Enemy, that knew nothing of the natural cauſe. He kept them from fighting when they were weary, though the Officers much deſired to ingage. But the Armies lying incamped on each ſide of the River Enipeus, it hapned that a Beaſt paſſing over from the Roman ſide, was ſeized on, and being reſcued by degrees drew both the Armies into an ingagement, wherein Perſeus loſt the day, and with it his Kingdom. Flying into the Iſle of Crete, when all forſook him, he delivered up himſelf into the hands of Cn. Octavius. Æmilius ſeverely chaſtized the Epirots, who had joyned with Perſeus, plundering and demoliſhing about ſeventy of their Towns, whereby ſo much booty was got, as each Foot-man had two hundred Denarii, and every Horſe-man as much more. But the Souldiers having got little or no plunder in Macedonia, nor any of the Kings Treaſure, denyed their General a Triumph, which yet he obtained, and that very ſplendid. Of his four Sons, the two eldeſt he granted to be adopted to Fabius Maximus, and Publius Scipio the Son of Africanus, and of his two youngeſt, the one dyed five dayes before his Triumph, and the other three dayes after, which loſs he ſuſtained with great courage. Before his Triumphal Chariot was led Perſeus with his two Sons, and this ſame year Triumphed Cn. Octavius the Prætor at Sea, beſides L. Anicius, before whoſe Chariot was led Gentius King of the Illyrians, whom being the Confederate of Perſeus he had ſubdued, and forced to yield himſelf. This hapned to Macedonia and Illyricum, in the five hundred and eighty ſixth year of the City, the ſaid Æmilius, and L. Licinius Craſſus being Conſuls.

Perſeus beſotted with fear neglecteth his opportunities.

Livius l. 45.
Plutarch in Æmylio.

Is overthrown by Æmilius the Conſul, and yieldeth himſelf.

16. In the late War, Eumenes King of Pergamus, and the Rhodians, being wrought upon by Perſeus, ſtood Neuters, whereupon Eumenes coming towards Livii Epitom. lib. 46.

Rome

Sect. 3.

Rome, the Senate being unwilling either to declare him friend or foe, made a decree in General, that no King ſhould come into the City: the Rhodians with much ado, and after much ſeeking, were hardly received as friends and confederates. The ſame year that Perſeus was overthrown, Antiochus Epiphanes beſieging Ptolomy in Alexandria, upon the deſire of the beſieged, C. Popillius Lænas an auſtere man, with C. Decimus, were ſent from the Senate to command him to deſiſt, which he obeyed. After this the Romans fought in Liguria and Corſica with various fortune, the Dalmatians who had waſted the Borders of Illyricum and had overcome, and were overcome by C. Marcius, were ſubdued by Scipio Naſica. But in Spain things went ſo badly, and ſuch loſſes were received, that the City was abaſhed, none being found who would either go Lieutenant to the Conſul, or take place of a Tribune upon him, till Scipio Æmilianus (the Son of Paulus Æmilius, but adopted by Scipio the Son of the African) ſtanding up offered himſelf, and by his example drew on others. He went Lieutenant to Lucullus the Conſul, and behaving himſelf moſt gallantly in the War, killed an Enemy in a Duel which had challenged out any one in the Army, and firſt mounted the Walls of Intercatia.

Eumenes and the Rhodians having ſtood Neuters, are accordingly reſpected by the Senate.

Velleius Paterculus l. 1. c. 10.

Things go ill in Spain.

17. Lucullus ſubdued ſeveral Nations in Spain, though Sulpicius Galba unfortunately fought againſt the Luſitanians. About the ſame time one Andriſcus, an obſcure man in Macedonia, but ſomething reſembling Philip, counterfeited himſelf the baſe Son of Perſeus. He was once ſent to Rome by Demetrius the King of Syria, but making thence an eſcape returned, and renewed his claim to Macedonia, which partly by fair means, and partly by conſtraint, he got into his hands. Juventius the Prætor was firſt ſent againſt him; but he having ſtrengthened himſelf with the Thracians, cut him off and all his Army, and invaded Theſſaly, whence he was ejected by the help of the Achæans. After this, Q. Metellus the Prætor ſufficiently revenged the Commonwealth upon him, for he overthrew him in a great battel, whence he fled to Byzus, a petty King of Thrace, who delivering him up, he led him in Triumph. Metellus (accounted moſt fortunate) reduced Macedonia in this third Macedonian War into the form of Province, which ſhortly after alſo hapened to Africk. For, even now was proſecuting with all earneſtneſs the third and laſt Punick or Carthaginian War, and the ruin of the City Carthage it ſelf.

Andriſcus a counterfeit Son of Perſeus.

Florus lib. 2. c. 12.
Velleius lib. 1. cap. 11.
Oroſius lib. 4. cap. 22.

A. M. 3857.
Ol. 158. an. 1.
V. C. 606.
Ptol. Philom. 33.

Is taken.

18. Their opinion is not faulty, who profeſs not to be able to find any Meritorious cauſe of this War in the Carthaginians, and theirs, who affirm that Carthage was more hated for its competition of Empire, than for any fault it had committed in thoſe times. But there wanted not pretences. For, divers times had Maſaniſſa King of Numidia, and the Carthaginians, quarrelled about grounds upon the Borders, and often had the Romans ſent to take up the quarrel, but eſpecially of late not with indifferency had they judged, for that the fault lay in Maſaniſſa, who being a great friend of theirs, preſumed too much upon their affection to himſelf, and the jealouſie wherewith he knew them prejudiced againſt the other. The Ambaſſadors alſo that were ſent to Carthage, finding the City full, and flouriſhing, from that peace they had now enjoyed about fifty years, and provided alſo for war as well as peace, ſpake much of the danger which threatened Rome from it; eſpecially Cato, who never came into the Senate, but after that he had ſpoken his mind to any buſineſs, added, This I think, and that Carthage is to be deſtroyed. He was earneſtly contradicted by Scipio Naſica, who feared, that this rival for Empire once being removed, ſecurity would breed the deſtruction of the Commonwealth, as it too truly proved, this ſecurity being ſtrengthened by luxury and avarice, which the Aſiatick Triumphs had brought in. But Cato's reaſons drawn from preſent danger, ſo, in the apprehenſion of the Senate, over-ruled Scipio's forecaſt, that they reſolved upon a War, and kept the reſolution cloſe till they could catch at a convenient opportunity and pretence.

The pretences for the third Punick War.

Lege Polyb. Excerpt. lib. 33.
Appian. in Punicis. Livii Epitom. lib. 49. &c.
Flor. lib. 2. cap. 15.
Eutrop. lib. 4.
Oroſium lib. 4. cap. 22.

19. There being at this time three factions in Carthage, one affected towards the Romans, another ſtanding for the true intereſt of the State it ſelf, and the third for Maſaniſſa, this later was expelled by the ſecond, and a Law made that they ſhould never be again received. Thoſe men flying to Maſaniſſa, he ſent Guluſſa his Son to intercede for them, who being laid in wait for by Amilcar Samnis, although he eſcaped, yet thereupon the King beſieged Horoſcopa, a Town he much deſired; which act was expreſly againſt the Articles of the League. Aſdrubal went with a great Army to raiſe the ſiege, and a bloody battel was fought, wherein the Carthaginians were overthrown; but more dyed of the Plague, being incompaſſed paſſed near a Lake, which by its noyſom vapours corrupted the air. Hereby the remnant were forced to yield, and conſent to a great Tribute, with the receiving back of their Exiles, and yet were they almoſt all ſlain by a party of Horſe ſent againſt them, out of revenge by Guluſſa. The Carthaginians therefore had now had an Army in the Field, and that againſt a confederate of Rome, which was againſt the tenour of the laſt League. This advantage the Romans took, and ordered the Conſuls to undertake the War, though the other condemned thoſe that had broken the League, and moſt humbly offered any reaſonable ſatisfaction. M. Manlius Nepos, and L. Marcius Cenſorinus being now on their journey, it was anſwered, that they ſhould enjoy all as formerly, if within thirty dayes they would ſend three hundred Hoſtages, (all Sons of Senators, or the principal Citizens) to Lilybæum, and do what the Conſuls ſhould further command them. The Carthaginians deſirous to give ſatisfaction within the time limited ſent the Children, and when now the Conſuls were landed at Utica (which being a Sea-Town convenient for their purpoſe had been ſeized on before-hand) thither they ſent their Commiſſioners to wait on them, and know their pleaſure. Cenſorinus the Senior Conſul commending their diligence, demanded all their Arms, which without any deceit were delivered up. Now with tears imploring mercy they deſired to know their laſt doom, and were commanded to leave their City (which the Conſuls had order to level with the ground) and build another any where in their own Territories, ſo it were but ten miles from the Sea. This they received with great horror and rage, and all reſolved rather to die than forſake, or give way to the ruin of their antient ſeat and habitation.

The Carthaginians being commanded to leave their City, refuſe to obey.

20. The Conſuls delayed to begin the War, as not doubting in the leaſt but to take the City thus diſarmed and naked at their pleaſure. But they found it not ſo; for the Inhabitants acted by indignation and fury, though at firſt ſcarce themſelves, ſetled their minds to reſiſtance, men and women working night and day in making of Arms. Where iron and braſs were wanting, they made uſe of Gold and Silver; and the women gave the hair of their heads to ſupply the defect of Tow, or Flax. They made alſo Aſdrubal (whom before for fear of the Romans they had condemned) their General in the field, where he had already a good Army. When the Conſuls came againſt the City, they found ſuch reſiſtance that they were diſcouraged, and the reſolution of the beſieged increaſed hereby. They ingaged ſeveral times to their diſadvantage, and might have ſuffered much, had not the Army been ſecured and brought off, through the great wiſdom and courage of Scipio Æmilianus, who drew off alſo Pharneas, the Maſter of the Carthaginian Horſemen, to his own party; which things procured him an exceeding great name. This year dyed Maſaniſſa ninety years old, leaving a Son but of four years behind him; and truſting his Kingdom with Scipio, to be at his diſcretion diſpoſed of to his Children. This ſame year alſo dyed Cato, being about eighty five years of age, and lived not to ſee the too much deſired ruin of Carthage.

And the War beginneth.

Maſaniſſa and Cato die.

21. The year following, Calpurnius Piſo the Conſul, and Mancinus the Admiral did no great matters, beſieging Clupea, and Hippo (a Town ſituate betwixt Carthage and Utica) to no purpoſe. Within Carthage, Aſdrubal Grand-Son to Maſaniſſa by his Daughter, being joyned in commiſſion with the other Aſdrubal without, was accuſed by him as intending to betray the City to his Uncle Guluſſa, and having nothing to ſay for himſelf, or being too ſlow in it, was knocked on the head by a Form in the Council-houſe. Now at Rome were all mens eyes upon Scipio Æmilianus, looking on him as deſtined to end the War; and whereas he ſought but the Ædileſhip, and it was againſt the Law for him to be choſen Conſul ſo young (being but thirty ſix, whereas the Law required forty three) it was diſpenſed with for this time, and then was he made Conſul, who ſo ordered the matter, though not wholy during his Conſulſhip, as he demonſtrated the people not to have conceived vain hopes concerning him.

Scipio Æmilianus made Conſul, though under the Conſular age.

22. For, reſtoring diſcipline which had gone much to wrack through the neglect of Piſo, he ſoon after took that part of Carthage, called Megara, and drove the Inhabitants into the Citadel or Byrſa. Then ſecuring the Iſthmus leading to the City, he cut off all Proviſions from out of the Country, and blocked up the Haven; but the Citizens with incredible induſtry cut out an other paſſage into the Sea, whereby at certain times they could receive neceſſaries from the Army without. Scipio therefore in the beginning of Winter ſet upon their Forces lying abroad, whereof he ſlew ſeventy thouſand, and took ten thouſand, ſo that now no relief could be obtained from without. In the beginning of Spring, he firſt took the Taketh Carthage.

Sect. 4.

the Wall leading to the Haven Citho, and then the Forum, where was a moſt lamentable ſpectacle, ſome being killed by the Sword, and other wayes, others half killed by the fall of houſes, or by fire, or half buried in the earth; or having one Limb torn from another. Six dayes the ſiege of the Citadel continued. On the ſeventh it was deſired by ſome that all who would come forth ſhould have their lives, which being granted to all but revolters, ſome fifty thouſand yielded, and afterward Aſdrubal himſelf, who was reviled for it by the revolters (who ſet fire to the Temple, and therewith burnt themſelves) as alſo by his wife, which threw her ſelf with her two Children into the flames.

A. M. 3859. Ol. 158. ann. 3. V. C. 608. Ptol. Phyſconis 1.

Which is razed.

23. Then was the City deſtroyed, being twenty two miles in compaſs, and ſo big, that the burning of it continued ſeventeen dayes. The Senate at Rome receiving the news joyfully, ſent ten of their own Rank whom they joyned with Scipio for diſpoſing of the Country. They ordered none of Carthage to be left, and that it ſhould never be rebuilt, laying heavy curſes on thoſe that ſhould do it. All the Cities which aſſiſted it in the War were to be razed, and the grounds given to the friends of the People of Rome: the reſt of the Towns were to be tributaries, and governed yearly by a Prætor. All the Captives were ſold, except ſome of the chief. And ſuch was the deſtruction of this renowned City, ſo famous once for command and Empire, and rival to Rome it ſelf, after it had ſtood about ſeven hundred years, in the fourth after the beginning of the War, the ſix hundred and eighth of Rome, the third of the one hundred and fifty eighth Olympiad, and the fifth of Ptolomy Phyſcon. A. M. 3859, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius Nepos being Conſuls.

SECT. IV.

From the deſtruction of Carthage to the War with Mithridates King of Pontus, which afforded the occaſion to the firſt Civil War.

Containing the ſpace of fifty eight years.

The Achæan war, and the deſtruction of Corinth.

Lege Velleium Patercul. l. 1. c. 12. Floruml. 2. c. 16 Livii Epitom. lib. 6. c. 51, 52. Pauſan. in Achaicis, & de ære Corinth. Plinium l. 34.

1. THis year was fatal, not only to the greateſt City of Africk, but of Greece alſo; Corinth that famous Mart-town being levelled with the ground. The occaſion was given by the Achæans themſelves, who violated the Roman Ambaſſadors (though whether by word or deed is uncertain) who were ſent to diſſolve their Communality, and leave the Cities to their own peculiar Laws, which becauſe of this union and fellowſhip had been too formidable. They had alſo in conjunction with the Bœotians and thoſe of Chalcis, made War againſt the Lacedæmonians the friends and allies of Rome, becauſe they would not be ſubject to them. Upon theſe grounds the Senate decreed the War, which Metellus as yet in Macedonia firſt undertook; who drawing down his Army through Theſſaly into Bœotia, there overthrew Critolaus, then took Thebes, with Megara, and coming to the Iſthmus was there treating of Peace, when L. Mummius the Conſul came into this his Province. He overthrew Diæus the Achæan General, after which he entred Corinth and razed it, becauſe there the Ambaſſadors had been abuſed. The men were ſlain, and the women and children ſold, with all ſuch ſlaves as the Achæans had manumitted for the Wars. As Scipio, who deſtroyed Carthage (as his Grand-Father before him for conquering it) had the ſirname of Africanus, and Metellus for his reducing Macedonia, that of Macedonicus; ſo this year Mummius for this ſucceſs obtained the Sirname of Achaicus, and according to the cuſtom, having others joyned with him, reduced thoſe parts and all Greece with Epirus into the form of a Province, called afterwards Achaia, not Greece, becauſe the Greeks were ſubdued when the Achæans had the chief command, as Pauſanias writeth.

A. M. 3859. Ol. 158. an. 3. V. C. 608. Seleucid. 167. Ptol. Phyſcon. 1.

Mummius thence ſirnamed Achaicus.

Viriatus up in Spain.

2. Now was it ſeventy four years ſince the Romans, in the ſecond year of the ſecond Punick War, entred Spain in an hoſtile manner, and ſince that time, eſpecially ſince the departure of Scipio Africanus the elder, many had the riſings and ſtruglings of that People been, of all others moſt impatient of the yoak. Now was Viriatus up in Arms, who of a ſhepherd became a robber, and of a robber a General over ſuch-like as himſelf, and made the Romans work ſufficient for the ſpace of fourteen years, in which time he defeated many Armies. Q. Fabius Maximus Semilianus (or rather Æmilianus, being Brother to Scipio Æmilius, and adopted by Fabius Maximus) after ſome ſucceſs was yet by him brought to ſuch ſtraights, as glad he was to ask Peace upon equal terms, which Cæpio, the Conſul of the following year, refuſing to ſtand to, received Orders from the Senate accordingly to proſecute the War. Cæpio attempted at unawares to deſtroy him; but he eſcaped, and ſending Ambaſſadors to treat of Peace, Cæpio ſo wrought on them, that returning they murdered him, to their own ſhame, and the Conſul's ſmall credit, in his bed.

Sect. 4.

Is deſtroyed by Cæpio.

Vide Appianum in Ibericis. Florum l. 2. c. 18.

3. But, a more dangerous War than this threatned from Numantia, a Town of no great bigneſs, yet peopled with moſt valiant, though but few, Inhabitants. Before Viriatus his death they had foiled Q. Pompeius the Conſul ſeveral times, and forced him to condeſcend to a diſhonourable Peace, which though he denied, was ſufficiently proved, and by favour only he eſcaped that puniſhment which fell on Mancinus, who being conſtrained to accept of the ſame terms, was delivered up to the Enemy; but (as the Samnites formerly did by another after the defeat at Caudinum) they refuſed to receive him. After this Brutus defeated many thouſands of the Luſitanians, and overthrew the Gallæcians; but Lepidus the Proconſul ſet upon the Vaccæi, an harmleſs People of the hithermoſt Spain, or Hiſpania Terraconenſis, (for in the 559 year of the City, Spain was divided into Citerior or Terraconenſis, and Ulterior or Betica, and Luſitania, two Prætors being yearly ſent thither, the number of which Officers was therefore upon this occaſion increaſed to ſix) by whom he was utterly defeated. Theſe things ſo affrighted the Roman Soldier, that he almoſt quaked at the ſight of a Spaniard, and at Rome Men were ſeized with great fear and ſhame. Therefore Scipio Æmilianus Africanus muſt be created Conſul the ſecond time, as the only refuge and hope of his Country.

Oroſium l. 5. c. 7. Patercul. l. 2. c. 4.

Bad ſucceſs in Spain.

Cauſeth Scipio Æmilianus to be created Conſul the ſecond time.

4. At the firſt he reſtored diſcipline, the want of which had ſpoiled all, but then coming to engage, found the courage of the Enemy ſuch, that he reſolved to fight no more, but lay cloſe ſiege to Numantia, and govern himſelf according to the comportment of Affairs. At length the Beſieged, greatly ſtraightned, offered to yield upon reaſonable Conditions, or fight if they might have Battel given them, which being denied, having drunk ſtrong drink on purpoſe, they aſſailed the Beſiegers ſo fiercely, that the Romans had run, but that Scipio was the General. At laſt they fired the City over their own heads, and ſcarcely one of them remained to be led in triumph. This famous City was ſeated in the hithermoſt Spain, in the head of Galæcia, and the confines of the Celtiberians. It had with four thouſand Men, for the ſpace of fourteen years, ſaith Florus, or twenty according to Strabo, born the brunt of forty thouſand Romans, and many times put them to ſhameful flight, with great ſlaughter. Scipio deſtroyed it, after he had for a year and three months continued the Siege, fourteen years after he had ſo dealt with Carthage, in the 621 of the City, A. M. 3871. P. Mutius Scævola and L. Calpurnius Piſo Fruges (both learned Men) being Conſuls. At this time a ſervile War was raiſed in Sicily by one Ennus a Syrian of Apamea, the Slave of Antigenes of Enna. It was followed by Calpurnius Piſo the Conſul, and finiſhed by P. Rupilius Nepos his Succeſſor. Twenty thouſand Slaves were by him ſlain in Battel: Ennus being caſt in Priſon died (it's ſaid, of the lowſie diſeaſe) at Morgantia.

He beſiegeth Numantia, and taketh it.

A ſervile War in Sicily.

Excerpt. Diod. Sicul. lib. 34. Oroſius l. 5. c. 9.

5. Ever ſince the beginning of the Tarentine War to this time, for the ſpace of almoſt 150 years was there much modeſty, abſtinence, ſelf-denial, valour and vertue amongſt the Romans in general, of which yet eſpecially the Fabii, Fabritii, Marcelli, Curii, Metelli, the Scipio's and Æmilii have left Examples admirable to be commended to all Poſterity, ſuch were their cautious and politick, yet juſt and noble carriage, both at home and abroad. But now the Aſian Expeditions and Triumphs having brought in exceſs and riot, and the ruine of Carthage having taken away fear, idleneſs with ſecurity by degrees ſtole in upon them, and the infirmity of the Government (after that fear, which hitherto had preſerved it ſafe, was removed) again effectually ſhewed it ſelf. For though after this time many a People was ſubdued and brought under, and much glory gotten abroad, yet was it ſtained by emulations, jealouſies, and contentions at home, and even by ſhedding the Blood of one another in an open, though civil, feud, which firſt came to paſs while the former things were performed in Spain by Scipio.

6. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, Son to one of the ſame name, (who had been twice Conſul, and once Cenſor) by Cornella an excellent Woman, Daughter of Africanus the elder, being Quæſtor to Mancinus the ſecond in Spain, had an hand in the diſhonourable Peace made by him, for which, being reflected on by the Senate, or at leaſt thinking himſelf ſo to be, acted now by ſhame and fear, in diſtaſt of the Nobility, as it's ſaid, he caſt in his head how to become gracious and popular with the Commons. Procuring himſelf to be choſen Tribune, he preferred a Law, forbidding any Man to poſſeſs above five hundred Acres of the publick Grounds, and ordering the overplus to be divided to the poor. For, ſuch Grounds as the People of Rome took from their Enemies, they were wont, if tilled, to divide to their own Citizens; if not arable, they then let them out to farm by the Cenſors to Italians, or the ordinary ſort of Romans, on condition, that if they plowed them, they ſhould pay the tenth part of the Corn, and the fifth of other Fruits: and if they bred up Cattel, they were charged with a certain Rent. But it came to paſs, that by incredible impudence and licentiouſneſs of the Rich, the Husband-men were outed of their ancient Poſſeſſions, which by Purchaſing, and other ways, they got wholly into their hands, ſo that the Publick was defrauded of its Revenue, and the Poor of their Livelihoods. For reſtraining the avarice of the Rich, the Lex Licinia and Sempronia were enacted. Gracchus increaſed the former by adding that, leſt the Law ſhould be wreſted, half ſhould be given to the Children, and the reſt divided to ſuch Poor as had nothing. And if any went about to inlarge their Portion by Purchaſe, Triumviri or three Men ſhould be yearly appointed to judge what Ground was publick, and what private.

Tiberius Gracchus raiſeth a ſedition about the Agrarian.

Oroſius l. 5. c. 8, 9. Florus l. 3. c. 14.

Joh. Stadius Com. in Flor. l. 3. c. 14.

7. This netled the Nobility exceedingly, who, by vertue of this Law, were to part with their Inheritances; and one of his Collegues, Octavius by name, oppoſed it, for which he ſo handled him, as glad he was to quit his place, into which Gracchus choſe Q. Mummius one of his own Faction. This ſeverity being without preſident, much alienated even the minds of the multitude from Gracchus, who alſo perceiving there was not ground enough to quiet them all, (the expectation of whom he had now raiſed) he offered a Law for diſtributing the Money which Attalus King of Pergamus had left, together with his Kingdom, to the People of Rome. The Senate being aſſembled to conſult what was to be done, and all being of opinion that P. Mutius Scævola the Conſul ſhould defend the Common-wealth by Arms, he refuſed to do any thing by force. Hereupon Scipio Naſica taking up his Gown under his left Arm, held up his right Hand, and bad every one that loved the State to follow him. Up he went into the Capitol, being accompanied with moſt of the Senate, many Equites, and ſome Commoners, where Gracchus was ſpeaking to the People, and endeavouring to be choſen Tribune for the following year. They fell upon him and his hearers, whereof they killed three hundred, and amongſt them himſelf, with a piece of a Seat as he ran down from the Capitol. Thus he fell by the means of his own Kinſman, being a moſt excellently accompliſhed Man, though too violent in a matter honeſt enough. And this was the firſt Blood which in a ſeditious way the Romans firſt drew from one another, obſerved by Cicero to have been at the ſame time that the other Scipio deſtroyed Numantia.

Livii Epitom. l. 58. Velleius l. 2. c. 3.

Propoſing another Law for dividing of Money.

A. M. 3872. Ol. 161. an. 4. V. C. 621. Ptol. Phyſc. 14.

He and his Complices are killed by the means of Scipio Naſica his Kinſman, which was the firſt Blood drawn by the Romans from one another.

Offic. l. 1.

8. At this time there were ſome Riſings at Athens, and in Delos, being as ſparks of that fire formerly kindled by Ennus in Sicily, which with ſome trouble were extinguiſhed; neither was Italy altogether free from them. But a more noble War inſued about the Kingdom of Aſia. For, Attalus King of Pergamus or Aſia, (for ſo he is called, becauſe of a good part of Aſia given to Eumenes his Father) by his laſt Will left the People of Rome his Heir: But after his death Ariſtonicus his baſe Brother ſeized on the Kingdom as his Inheritance. Firſt was Licinius Craſſus the Conſul ſent againſt him, but was overthrown, and being taken, ſtruck one of the Soldiers on the Eye, on purpoſe to provoke him to kill him, which he did. He having thus miſcarried, (though he was aſſiſted in his enterpriſe by ſeveral Kings) his Succeſſor M. Perpenna haſting into Aſia, ſet upon Ariſtonicus at unawares, when he was not yet recovered of the ſecurity contracted by his Victory, and overthrowing him in Battel, beſieged him in Stratonice, where he forced him by famine to yield, and ſhortly after the Conſul died at Pergamus. The remainder of the War was finiſhed by M. Aquilius the next years Conſul, who poiſoned Fountains for taking in ſome Cities, and having together with thoſe joyned with him, (according to the Cuſtom) ſetled the Province with ſufficient oppreſſion of the People, he led Ariſtonicus in Triumph, though taken by another Man's labour; who by order of the Senate was ſtrangled in Priſon, in the 625 year of the City, the ſaid M. Aquilius Nepos, and C. Sempronius Tuditanus being Conſuls.

Livii Epitom. l. 59.

Oroſius l. 5. c. 8, & 9.

Ariſtonicus conteſting with the Romans for the Kingdom of Pergamus, Velleius Patercul. l. 2. c. 4. Florus l. 2. c. ult.

Is taken.

And ſtrangled

9. The

Sect. 4.

Vide Appian. de bello civili lib. 2. Velleium lib. 2. cap. 6. Plutarch in Gracchis. Val. Maxim. lib. 6. cap. 2. Exemp. 3. Livii Epitom. lib. 59, 60. Oroſium lib. 5. cap. 10. Florum lib. 3. cap. 15.

The civil diſſentions renewed.

Caius Gracchus, the Brother of Tiberius, patronizeth his Law.

9. The civil diſſentions died not with Gracchus (who periſhed four years before) his Law for diviſion of the grounds being ſtill in force, and the people being ſenſible of the equity thereof, as they accounted it; for that the rich had got all into their hands, and thoſe that underwent all the toyl in Conquering the Land, were ready to ſtarve, being alſo exhauſted by the Wars, and almoſt none but ſlaves left in Italy for ordering of the grounds. Gracchus had a younger Brother called Caius, whom together with Fulvius Flaccus, and Papirius Carbo, he had made Triumviri for diviſion of the grounds. He with his Collegues undertook the patronage of the Law, and proſecuting his Enterprize with all earneſtneſs, ſuch trouble aroſe about the diviſion, in accounting and removing, that the Italians finding themſelves agrieved betook themſelves to Scipio Africanus. He refuſed not to undertake their Patronage, yet in the Senate ſpake nothing againſt the Law; only thought fit that the executive power thereof ſhould be taken from the Triumviri, and given to ſome others. The Senate moſt willingly did this, and conferred it on Sempronius Tuditanus the Conſul, who finding the work troubleſom, went his way under pretence of the War in Illyricum. There being now none to fly to in this Caſe, the People conceived great indignation againſt Scipio, as ingrateful, and favouring the Italians more than themſelves, from which his Enemies took occaſion to raiſe further jealouſies. Indeed hearing of Gracchus his death at Numantia by repeating a verſe in Homer he liked well of what was done to him, and being at his return asked concerning his death, he approved of it before all the People, which being offended at him for it, he rebuked the multitude with contumelious language. But at night going to his Chamber, he meditated of ſomething he intended to ſpeak to the People the day following, and in the morning was found dead in his Bed, it's uncertain by what means. Cornelia the Mother of the Gracchi was ſuſpected to have joyned with her Daughter his Wife (who being not overhandſom, neither loved him much, nor was over much loved) in practiſing ſomething upon him. No inquiſition was made after his death, and he was buried privately, though ſo great a man, and one that had been the Pillar of the Commonwealth.

Ὡς ἀπόλοιτο ϗ ἄλλος ὅτις τοιαῦτα γε ῥέζοι. Odyſſ. 1.

Scipio Africanus the younger dieth ſuddenly.

10. The Poſſeſſors of the grounds ſtill made delays in the diviſion, and ſome thought that they to whom they were to be divided ſhould in way of recompenſe be made free of the City, which however pleaſing to others, was highly diſpleaſing to the Senate. While men muttered much of theſe things, C. Gracchus procured the Tribuneſhip, and then bearing a grudge to the Senate effectually ſhewed it. He preferred a Law for dividing of the publick Corn to every man monthly, and getting his Office continued to him for another year, that he might gratifie the Equites, brought down the Office of judging corrupt Officers from the Senators unto them. Romulus, as we ſaid, inſtituted three Centuries of Equites or Horſe-men, whereof one from himſelf was named Ramnenſis, another from Titus Tatius, Tatienſis; and the third from Lucanio (or Lucus) Luceris. Under Romulus, and the Kings, they were alſo called Celeres, Flexumines and Troſſuli. Afterwards Tarquinius Priſcus added three hundred more, and ſo there continued to be ſix hundred Equites. But though they were in the Commonwealth from the beginning, yet had they no peculiar order, authority, or rank, till this Law of Gracchus, by which it was enacted, that theſe judgements ſhould be peculiar to them. Their reputation thence forward increaſed with various ſucceſs about the Publicans till Cicero's time, who boaſting himſelf of this order, procured it ſuch honour, that from his Conſulſhip it came to be as a peculiar order in the State (before being included in the Plebeian, though it had a diſtinction by way of ſervice) being added to the Senatorian and Plebeian; out of which reſpect it was written after them both. Thus in ſeveral times were there ſeveral Ranks and Diſtinctions; the firſt diſtinction was betwixt Patricians and Plebeians; then Plebeians wreſting from the other a Communion in the greateſt Offices and places, though Patricians might ſtill be diſtinguiſhed in reference to Families, yet all Dignities being common to the reſt with them, ſuch Plebeians as could riſe to be Senators, conſtituted with the other the Senatorian rank (which included the Patrician, though the Patritian not it) thenceforth diſtinct from the Plebeian which ſtill contained the Equites. Then, as was ſaid, the Equites by the means of Gracchus and Cicero brake out from amongſt the Plebeians into a rank of their own.

Caius getting the Tribuneſhip, preferreth Laws diſtaſtefull to the Senate.

The Order and Rank of Equites, or Knights, how, and when it came up.

Sect. 4.

11. By this Law (ſaith Florus) Gracchus ſo divided the People of Rome, that he made it double headed (bicipitem, which expreſſion Varro alſo uſed, as appeareth from Nonius) and the Equites having the lives, and fortunes of Senators and Nobles in their hands, by ſeizing on the Revenue, with authority pilled the Commonwealth. He took the beſt time that could be deviſed for the making of the Law, becauſe the Senators having had hitherto the power of judging, were become odious of late, in that for mony they had acquitted Aurelius Cotta, Salinator, and M. Aquilius, perſons Capitally guilty of corruption. It's ſaid, he boaſted, that by this Law he had cut the ſinews of the Senatorian rank. And ſo he did; for by the authority of judicature they paſſed ſentence upon Roman Citizens, Italians and Senators, noting them with ignominy, baniſhing, or putting them to death at pleaſure, till ſuch time as their power was abated, as will be ſeen. For in the Comitia, or Aſſemblies, they conſpired with the Tribunes, and obtaining thereby what they pleaſed, had all things in their power, and flouriſhed with riches, whereas nothing remained to Senators, but a vain ſhew of Dignity. The Senators prevailed with Servilius Cæpio when Conſul, to make themſelves partakers of the power of judging, by a Law which he got preferred; yet ſtill had the Equites the better, for three hundred Senators only were added to them, who were in number ſix hundred. By the Laws of Livius Druſus, Sylla and Cotta their power was abated, Druſus making it but equal in judgement with that of Senators: Sylla transferred it wholly to the Senators, and Aurelius Cotta communicated the power of judging to three ſorts; viz. Senators, Equites, and the Tribuni Ærarii. But the Equites alone were wont to farm the cuſtoms of the Cenſors for five years, and thence from their farming the Publick Revenue had the name of Publicans. Theſe were the principal of the Equeſtrian Order, the Ornament of the City, and the ſtrength of the State, who made ſo many Companies as there were Provinces ſubject to the payment of Toll, Tribute, Cuſtom, or Impoſt.

How the Senators loſt in the tranſlation of the judicial power to the Equites by Caius.

Publicans whence ſo called.

12. But C. Gracchus, further than this, to gratifie the Commons, repaired the high-ways throughout Italy, ſent forth Colonies, bade the Italians ſue for their freedom, and gave power of ſuffrages to other Friends and Allies, contrary to the cuſtom; whom the Senate forbad to come near the City, at ſuch time as they knew his Laws would be offered, and to pleaſe the people, they gave way to the ſending out of twelve Colonies. Gracchus thus fruſtrated, departed into Africk with Flaccus his Collegue, intending to plant a Colony where Carthage ſtood; but was diſappointed therein alſo, Wolves, it's ſaid, removing the bounds of the intended City by night, as they were laid by day, whereupon the South-ſayers pronounced the deſign unlawful. Having been twice Tribune, he ſtood for it the third time, and had many voices; but his Collegues offended by his vehement carriage, got Minucius Rufus choſen into his place, who reſcinded many of his Laws. Gracchus inraged hereat, when the Aſſembly was met, went up to the Capitol, accompanied with Flaccus and his Friends privily Armed. There Attilius the Crier of Opimius the Conſul taking him by the hand, and deſiring him to ſpare his own Country, was ſlain. He then went about to excuſe the fact to the People, but could not be heard, and ſo together with Flaccus, and his other Confederates got them home, the Conſul keeping ſtrict watch all night in the City. After this they were cited by the Senate to come and give an account of their actions, but they betook themſelves to the Aventine Mount, where fortifying themſelves, they offered in vain liberty to all ſlaves that would come in to them. But the Conſul ſending a party againſt them, Gracchus fled into a Grove beyond Tiber, and procured his Slave to kill him, who inſtantly after he had cut off his Head, run himſelf through with the bloody Sword. Flaccus flying to a Friends houſe was betrayed and ſlain: and of their party, through the ſevere inquiſition of the Conſul, were put to death three thouſand perſons, 11 years after the death of the elder Gracchus. In the Conſulſhip of this Opimius was there ſuch a temper of the air called Coctura, that Wine being congealed through the heat of the Sun into a conſiſtency of Hony, kept good for near 200 years, and from him had the name of Vinum Opimianum, being ſtill preſerved in Plinius (a) his time, though (b) Paterculus denieth there was any in his, which was long before.

Caius attempteth other ſeditious acts.

A.M. 3884.
Ol. 164. ann. 4.
V. C. 631.
Ptol. Phyſc. 26.

Is deſtroyed with his party.

(a) Plin. l. 4. c. 4. & 14.
(b) Lib. 2. c. 7.

13. The death of Gracchus (whoſe Head was not Sacroſanct, as Florus imagineth, being out of the Office of Tribune) for the preſent allayed the diſtempers of the Commonwealth. For, preſently after was a Law made, that one might

The diſtempers of the State ſomething allayed thereby.

Lege Appianum de bello civili lib. 1.

ſell his Land, which the elder Gracchus had forbidden, whereby the poor, partly by purchaſe, and partly by conſtraint, were again diſpoſſeſſed. Afterward the Law for diviſion was fully abrogated by Sp. Borcus, and the grounds left to their antient Owners, with this condition, that a Tribute out of them ſhould be paid to the people, and this divided man by man. But not long after another Tribune abrogated the Tribute it ſelf, and ſo nothing was left remaining to the poor.

An horrid Peſtilence in Africk.

Livii Epitom. lib. 60.

Oroſius lib. 5. cap. 11.

14. During theſe Domeſtick troubles the Sardinians rebelled, and were reduced by L. Aurelius, and the Fregellans were puniſhed with the loſs of their City by L. Opimius the Prætor. Upon Africk fell ſuch a Peſtilence, as for its Original, and effects, was ſtrange and wonderful. It aroſe from an infinite number of Locuſts, which having overſpread the ground, and deſtroyed not only Corn and other Fruits, but even Trees and dry things themſelves, at length by a wind were driven into the Mediterranean Sea, and there putrifying corrupted the Air. Hence enſued a moſt fearful Plague, both of Men, Cattle and Fowls. In Numidia, where Micipſa was now King, eight hundred thouſand died; upon the Sea-Coaſts about Carthage and Utica two hundred thouſand; and in Utica it ſelf thirty thouſand Soldiers there lying in Garriſon, fifteen hundred being reported to have been carried out in one day through one Gate alone. Two years after, Q. Metellus the Conſul ſubdued the Iſlands Baleares, and reſtrained Piracy there maintained, and at the ſame time was carried on the War, called Bellum Allobrogicum; which hence aroſe. The Salies in Gall beyond the Alps invaded the Naſſilians, the friends of the People of Rome, and for this were chaſtized by Fulvius, and ſubdued by C. Sextus Calvinus. Teutomalus their King flying out of the battel, was received, and protected by the Allobroges, who alſo invaded the Ædui, friends of Rome, and drew into Confederacy the Arverni. Firſt, Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus overthrew them, and (by the uſe of Elephants eſpecially) ſlew twenty thouſand, and took three thouſand Priſoners. After him Q. Fabius Maximus (Grandſon of Paulus Æmilius, by his Son adopted into the Fabian family) defeated them, with the Arverni and Ruteni, in a bloody battel, wherein one hundred and twenty thouſand are reported to have been ſlain, and taking Bituitus (or Betultus) King of the Arverni Priſoner, obtained the ſirname of Allobrogicus. Theſe Allobroges inhabited about the Countries now called Daulphine and Savoy: the Ruteni nearer to the Sea; the Arverni more toward the North; the Ædui in Burgundy, and the Saloii or Sayles in Piemont. Now was Gallia Narbonenſis reduced into a Province.

The Allobrick War.

Livii Epitom. lib. 60, 61. Florus lib. 3. cap. 2.

Cæſar de bello Gallico lib. 1.

Affairs of Thrace very obſcure.

Livii Epitom. lib. 53, & 55. Florus lib. 3. cap. 4. Velleius lib. 2. cap. 8.

15. But the Scordiſci, a People of Galliſh Original, inhabiting Thrace, defeated the Roman Army under Cato the Conſul, yet were afterwards driven back into their own Country by Didius the Prætor, and the Conſul Druſus; and after this gave occaſion of a glorious Triumph to Minutius, of which honour Metellus alſo had partaken. Theſe tranſactions of Thrace are of all others moſt unknown; either becauſe they are confounded with thoſe of Illyricum, Pannonia, Myſia, or Macedonia; or becauſe what has been written of that ſubject in particular, hath miſcarried. Now we arrive at two Wars both together, and carrying noiſe ſufficient with them through the variety of events, and fulneſs of Hiſtory: viz. that with Jugurtha, and the other with the Cimbri and Teutones. Now to know the Original of the former, it's neceſſary to fetch things a little higher.

The original of the War with Jugurtha.

Lege Salluſt. de bello Jugurthino. Oroſium l. 5. c. 15. Florum l. 3. c. 1. Livii Epitom. lib. 62, 64, 65, 66.

16. Maſaniſſa King of Mumidia, that old and conſtant friend of the Romans, left three ſons: Gulaſſa, Maſtanabal, and Micipſa, of whom the laſt (his Brothers being dead) obtained the Kingdom alone. He had two ſons, Hiempſal and Adherbal, with whom he brought up Jugurtha his brother Maſtanabal's ſon in the ſame condition, and receiving Letters from Scipio out of Spain, who gave him large commendations (and under whom he ſerved with his Uncle's Auxiliary forces) he adopted him. When Micipſa was dead, Jugurtha murdered Hiempſal, and attempted to do as much for Adherbal, who fled to the Romans for ſuccour. By this time avarice and injuſtice had ſo much poſſeſſed the City, that Jugurtha ſenſible of it, ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome with full hands, who ſo wrought upon the Senate, that might overcame right, and it was decreed, that ten Commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to divide the Kingdom betwixt them. The Commiſſioners thinking they might lawfully imitate thoſe that ſent them, were bribed to beſtow the richeſt and beſt Peopled part upon Jugurtha, who therewith not ſatisfied, after their departure, fell ſodainly upon Adherbal, beſieged him in Cirtha, and at length getting him into his hands made him away. For this, War was at length decreed againſt him by the Senate, and committed to the management of L. Calpurnius Beſtia the Conſul, in the 643*d.* year of the City, the ſecond of the 167*th Olympiad*, the ſeventh of Ptolomy Lathurus, the 25*th* of Joh. Hyrcanus, P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica, and the ſaid Calpurnius being Conſuls.

A. M. 3894. U. C. 643.

Fighting with ſilver weapons he conquereth all oppoſition.

17. Calpurnius invaded Numidia with great fierceneſs, and took in ſome Towns, but was preſently ſtopped in his career, being allured with the golden balls of Jugurtha; ſo that a Treaty of Peace was ſet on foot. The Senate was moved hereat, and at the power of M. Scaurus, who accompanying the Conſul as his Friend and Counſellor, was guilty of the ſame crime. The People were perſwaded to ſend L. Caſſius Longinus the Prætor to fetch Jugurtha to Rome upon the publick Faith, to diſcover his Complices, whereof he had by Gold procured many in the Senate it ſelf. Caſſius perſwaded him to caſt himſelf upon the Peoples mercy, and he came to the City in a mourning habit. But coming into the Aſſembly to do as he was Commanded, Bælus the Tribune bade him hold his Peace, being alſo bribed to put off the buſineſs, and delude the People. At this time there was one Maſſina the Son of Guluſſa his Couſin-German at Rome, who when he had murdered Adherbal eſcaped out of Africk. Him Albinus the Conſul, (who gladly would have had to do with Numidia) perſwaded to beg the Kingdom of the Senate: but Jugurtha having ſome notice hereof, procured him to be killed, and conveyed away the murderer into Numidia. Hereupon within a few days he was commanded to be gone, and being out of the City, he looked back upon it, and uttered theſe words, O City that wouldſt be ſold if there was but a Chapman for thee. This he ſaid, as having himſelf experience of the corruption of its Inhabitants; ſo horribly were they now degenerated from the fidelity and abſtinence of the preceeding age.

But is humbled by Metellus.

18. Albinus followed him with an Army, and at firſt ſeemed to be very ambitious of finiſhing the War, before the creation of new Conſuls. But upon ſome account he prolonged it, and his Brother, by virtue of ſome compact, withdrew from Suthul, where the treaſure of the Kingdom lay, when he was about to beſiege it. The Centurions alſo were ſo corrupted, as Jugurtha was ſuffered to break into the Camp, whence beating out the Army, he either forced, or by former agreement, brought Albinus to ſubmit unto moſt diſhonourable terms. In this condition Metellus the following Conſul found affairs and the Army ſpoiled for want of diſcipline. But bringing the Soldiers into good order, within the ſpace of two years he overthrew Jugurtha ſeveral times, outed him of ſeveral Towns, and chaſed him further than his own borders, which conſtrained him to ſubmit and beg Peace; but the conditions thereof he brake, and the former hoſtility returned. Now was there one C. Marius, Legatus or Lieutenant to Metellus, who by his good demeanour won much upon the Soldiers, for being deſirous of the Conſulſhip, he took all ways to purchaſe their favour. He calumniated Metellus privily to the Merchants at Utica, avowing that he was able with half of the Army, and that within a few days, to take Jugurtha. By theſe Speeches he procured many complaints to be written to Rome againſt Metellus, and getting leave to go thither, obtained his deſire, being created Conſul, and had the management of the War committed to him, which now was even ended. Nothwithſtanding, the People was ſo grateful to Metellus, that at his return, being certified what he had done, they both granted him a Triumph, and beſtowed on him the ſirname of Numidicus.

Marius by undermining Metellus getteth the Conſulſhip.

Several of the Metelli obtained ſirnames from Countries conquered.

Conſule Val. Max. l. 7. c. 1. exemp. 1. Patercul. l. 1. c. 11. Ciceron. de Finibus lib. 4.

19. This was the fourth Metellus, who from the Nation ſubdued, obtained a ſirname. The firſt was Q. Cæcilius Metellus ſirnamed Macedonicus, of whom we have formerly ſpoken. Much is ſaid of this mans felicity, whereof this is chief, that when he died, he had, of four Sons, ſeen three Conſuls, and the fourth Prætor. Of theſe, the firſt was Q. Metellus ſirnamed Balearicus from his ſubduing the Baleares, who was Conſul in the 631*ſt* year of the City: the ſecond L. Metellus, who was Conſul in the 635*th* year: the third M. Metellus, Conſul in the 639*th* year, the ſame wherein his Father died: and the fourth C. Metellus of Prætorian rank. But the third of this name who obtained a ſirname was L. Cæcilius Metellus, ſirnamed firſt Diadematus, becauſe having an Ulcer in his forehead, he kept it bound a long time, and afterwards Dalmaticus, from the Dalmatians whom he ſubdued to get him a Triumph; this People having nothing offended. He was Son to L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus, who was Conſul in the 612*th* year. Laſtly, the fourth thus ſirnamed was this Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, who was Conſul, together with M. Junius Silanus in the 645 year of the City.

20. Marius, after ſome time, took the City Capſi, a place very rich and ſtrong, and after this another called Mulucha. Jugurtha finding himſelf too weak, drew in to his aſſiſtance Bocchus King of Mauritania his Father in Law, by the help of whoſe Horſe he very much wearied the Roman Army. Coming to raiſe the Siege at Cirta, before which Marius was ſat down, what by the number of the Horſe reported to be ſixty thouſand, and what by heat and duſt, the Romans were ſorely diſtreſſed, and the fight continued dangerous and terrible to them for three days. Then a Tempeſt of Rain fell, which ſpoiled their Enemies Weapons, and relieved Marius his Men, almoſt killed with thirſt; and the courſe of fortune changing, the two Kings were defeated and fled. In another Battel Marius, as it's ſaid, killed ninety thouſand, after which Bocchus began to repent of his enterprize, and ſent to Rome to enter into a League, which he could not procure, but obtained pardon of his fault. Not long after, Marius took Jugurtha in an Ambuſh, whither he had drawn him by ſpecious pretences, and delivered him up to Sylla his Quæſtor, who had brought over ſome Forces gathered in Italy. Sylla having little or no skill in matters of War before, under him got that skill, which afterwards he uſed againſt his General. Jugurtha being led in Triumph by Marius with his two Sons, was after, by order of the Senate, put to death, and ſo the War ended, after about ſeven years continuance. Numidia was not now made a Province, as ſome have thought; for we find other four Kings, on which it was beſtowed, viz. Hiempſal, Hiarbas, and Juba, concerning whom we may have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. Now is to be deſcribed the War with the Cimbri.

Marius overthroweth Jugurtha and Bocchus.

Taketh Jugurtha, who is led in Triumph, and put to death.

21. The Cimbri inhabited the Cherſoneſus, from them named Cimbrica, (now Holſatia) and were a vagabond People. With a ſort of Germans called Teutones (from Teuto or Tuiſco the Patriarch, or reputed god of that Nation) they brake into Illyricum in the 641 year of the City, and there put to flight Cn. Carbo the Conſul, to whom the Province had fallen by lot. Some three years after they made an irruption into Gall and Spain, but being repelled, ſent to Silanus the Conſul, deſiring ſome ground wherein to plant and ſettle themſelves. This being denied by the Senate, they betook themſelves from intreaties to force, and ſetting upon the Conſul, put him to flight, entertaining M. Scaurus ſent againſt them into Gall in the ſame manner. Scaurus was ſucceeded by the Conſul L. Caſſius Longinus, who purſuing the Tigurins (now Switzers) to the Ocean, was circumvented by them, and ſlain, with L. Piſo, a Man of Conſular Dignity, his Lieutenant. After him Cæpio the Conſul made War upon the Tectoſages or Toloſans, whoſe chief City Toloſe (now in Gaſcoigne) he took, and therein a great Treaſure, which ſome ſaid was taken out of the Temple at Delphos by the Galls. His command was continued to him for the following year, as Proconſul, in conjunction with Manilius (or Mallius) his Succeſſor. Theſe two could not agree, but divided the Army, and parted the Province betwixt them. At length they were overthrown in a bloody Battel by the Cimbri, to whom the Teutons, Tigurins, and Ambrones, another People of Gall joyned themſelves: eighty thouſand Men were ſlain, and forty thouſand Lackies and Drudges, as alſo both the Camps taken. Cæpio for this was caſt into Priſon, where he died, theſe great defeats being charged upon his ſacrilege, of which thoſe Galls that were guilty, were ſtill followed and conſumed by one plague after another. After this, the Cimbri made another Expedition into Spain; but being thence repelled by the Celtiberians, returned into Gall, whence, with the Teutons and Ambrones, they reſolved to paſs over the Alpes into Italy.

The occaſion of the War with the Cimbri, by the Greeks called Κιμμέριοι.

Lege Florum l. 3. c. 3. Livii Epitom. l. 63, 65, 67, & 68. Oroſium l. 5. c. 16. Paterc. l. 2. c. 12.

22. C. Marius having vanquiſhed Jugurtha, was in his abſence made Conſul the ſecond time, to manage the War againſt the Cimbri. Whilſt they continued in Spain, he waged War againſt their friends the Toloſans, whoſe King Copilus was taken by Sylla his Lieutenant. Being created Conſul again the following year, he neglected to fight till their fury was abated. In his fourth Conſulſhip they were ready in three Bands to paſs over the Alpes, which he conſidering, attended their Motions. His Army was almoſt oppreſſed with thirſt, the Teutons and Ambrones lying betwixt it and the water, which made him deſirous to ingage with them, and coming to fight, in two days he utterly deſtroyed them, taking Priſoner Theutobocchus their King. The Cimbri eſcaped him, and got over into Italy, though Which Marius diſpatcheth.

A. M. 3904.
Ol. 169. an. 4.
V. C. 653.

though it was Winter, and the Alpes were covered with Snow, being in vain oppoſed by Catulus, both at the Alpes and the River Atheſis near Verona. To Catulus did Marius joyn himſelf now the fifth time Conſul, for carrying on the War, and being challenged to give Battel, ſlew one hundred and forty thouſand, and took ſixty thouſand. Their Wives reſiſted, fighting from the Chariots, and when they ſaw all deſperate, killed firſt their Children, and then themſelves. The third Band of the Tigurines came to nothing; and ſo an end was put to this War, on the third of the month Sextilis, as Plutarch writeth, after it had continued twelve years, in the 653 year of the City, C. Marius the fifth time, and M. Aquilius Nepos being Conſuls, the former whereof was counted the preſerver of his Country, aud contented himſelf with one Triumph. And his Collegue put an end to the ſecond Servile War in Sicily, which now had laſted almoſt four years.

In Mario.

The ſedition of Saturninus.

Vide Appian. de bello civili. l. 1. Flor. l. 3. c. 16. Livii Epitrm l. 69. Oroſium l. 5. c. 17. Velleium Paterculum l. 2. c. 15.

23. Theſe dangers abroad did not ſuppreſs domeſtick troubles. There was one L. Apuleius Saturninus, who having been Quæſtor at Oſtia during a dearth, was put out of his place by the Senate, for which he conceived great diſpleaſure againſt it, and to ſhew it, procured the Tribuneſhip. By his help eſpecially Marius obtained the fourth Conſulſhip. But after his year was out, Metellus Numidicus being Cenſor, would have removed him from the Senate, but he was hindred by his Colleague; and to revenge this, he ſtood to be Tribune the ſecond time. Now was Marius Conſul the fifth time, and there being nine of the ten Tribunes choſen, and A. Nonius ſtanding in competition with him, by the aſſiſtance of Marius he murdered him, and got the place. Now being again in power, he preferred a Law for dividing of ſuch Lands as Marius had recovered in Gall, and compelled the Senate to ſwear to it, which Metellus refuſing to do, he ſet him a day to anſwer it before the People; but for fear of him and Marius, Meetllus fled to Smyrna. Saturninus being Tribune the third time, and finding C. Memmius to ſtand for the Conſulſhip; he alſo made him away to prefer Glaucius the Prætor, a Man moſt addicted to his own Party. At theſe things the Senate being ſtartled, took up reſolution, and Marius now the ſixth time Conſul, ſeeing him in a falling condition, withdrew himſelf from his friendſhip. The Conſuls were, as in dangerous times, impowered by the Senate to ſee that the Common-wealth received no damage. Marius therefore with his Collegue L. Valerius Flaccus, ſet upon Saturninus in the publick meeting-place, and drove him and his followers into the Capitol, where for want of water (Marius having cut the Pipes) they were forced to yield. This they did upon his faith given for their ſafety; for Saturninus and Glaucius much relied upon him, not ſticking to give out, that they were but the actors of his deſigns. Notwithſtanding, they were killed in the Court-houſe by the Equites, which brake in amongſt them; and Metellus, through the labour of his Son eſpecially, was re-called, with the general applauſe of the People.

He is ſlain with his complices.

A. M. 3905.
V. C. 654.

Lege Appian. de bello civili lib. 1. Livii Epitom. lib. 71. Paterculum l. 2. c. 13, 14.

24. For the ſpace of about eight years after, there was not any open Sedition; yet great diſſatisfaction amongſt thoſe of the Senatorian Order. For, it lay under great grievances, by reaſon of the Power of Judicature, which was by Gracchus his Law brought down to the Equites, by whom they were cruelly, and deſpightfully uſed, their Lives, Liberties, and Eſtates being wholly in their Power. The Common-wealth was even bought and ſold, the Publicans, who farmed the Cuſtoms, and publick Revenues, being, as Equites, both Judges and Parties. It hapned, that thirty years after Gracchus his Law, M. Livius Druſus the Tribune caſt in his mind how to reſtore the Fathers to their ancient Power, and yet not offend the Equites. He preferred therefore a Law, that becauſe the Senators were reduced to a ſmall number, as many Equites ſhould be added to them, and the Power of Judicature committed to this Body. But herewith neither Party was ſatisfied. Not the Senators, becauſe they diſdained that the other ſhould be equal to them, and neither the Equites, for that they feared the Power would at length be wholly removed from them. Cæpio alſo, one of Druſus his Collegues, (not that Cæpio, as ſome miſtake, who had been formerly Conſul, had propoſed ſuch a Law, which took not, he himſelf being condemned, and dying in Priſon as was ſaid) oppoſed him, and coming into the Senate, there accuſed ſome of the chief of unlawful ſeeking for Offices. Druſus to withſtand his endeavours, by the favour of the People propoſed again the Agrarian Law, and that the Allies and Confederates of Italy, now Poſſeſſors of the Lands, might not be aggrieved; he gave them hopes to make them free of the City. Great concourſe there was, and as great contention. Q. Marcius Philippus the Conſul oppoſed the Law for diviſion of Lands, and for that was ſoundly buffeted by a Traveller. Druſus in this particular diſappointed, ſtill bent his mind how to make good what he had offered to the Italians; but going home, accompanied with a great multitude, he was ſtabbed in the Court of his own houſe, it's unknown by whom, the Knife being left in his body, and died within a few hours. He was a Man excellently accompliſhed, both with underſtanding and morals, whoſe good intentions had not the fortune to be rightly underſtood by the great ones, but to diſſatisfie all Parties. And ſtill more unfortunate he was in that great and dangerous War, which by his means (though not intentions) was kindled, and which being foreſeen or feared, might perhaps have no ſmall influence into his death.

Druſus the Tribune labouring to reconcile the Fathers, and Equites, inlargeth the breach.

And is ſtabbed.

A. M. 3914.
Ol. 172. an. 2.
V. C. 663.

The occaſion of the ſocial War.

Strabo lib. 5.
Velleius lib. 2. cap. 15, 16, 17.
Cicero pro Archia.
Appian. ut ſupra.

25. This War is called by divers names. Sometimes Bellum Sociale, becauſe of the Aſſociates of the People of Rome, who managed it: ſometimes Bellum Marſicum, from the Marſi, who began it: and otherwhiles Bellum Italicum, from Italy the Seat of it, Corfinium a City of the Peligni, being before all others choſen for the place of the Conſpiracy. The occaſion of it was the diſdain conceived by the Italians, becauſe they were not admitted to the freedom of the City, which had been partly promiſed them thirty ſix years before by Flaccus the Conſul, who being earneſt for it, was diverted into Gall by the Senate, and afterwards joyned himſelf in the Tribuneſhip with the younger Gracchus, to no purpoſe endeavouring with him the paſſing of it; with whom alſo, as is formerly ſhewn, he loſt his life. Now again, their expectation was heightned by Druſus; but then was he murdered, and all the great ones baniſhed who ſtood for them, by a Law which the Equites by force of Arms obtained, who hoped that having the Power of Judicature in themſelves, the profit would be great which would ariſe in ridding away their Enemies. They alſo thought they had reaſon enough to expect this Priviledge from that City, which was maintained both in its ſubſiſtence and Empire by their valour, they ever ſending out Forces double in number to thoſe of the Romans. Upon theſe grounds they reſolved to procure by force what could not be by fair means obtained, ſending Meſſages to and fro, and for the performance of what was agreed on, receiving Hoſtages from one another.

Preparations for it.

The Romans receive many blows.

26. This being known late enough at Rome, ſo buſied with its private ſeditious conteſts, Spies were ſent out into the ſeveral quarters. One of them ſeeing a young Man of Aſculum carried into another City as an Hoſtage, therewith acquainted Servilius the Proconſul, who going to Aſculum, and chiding the Citizens, was ſet upon and ſlain, together with all the Romans. After this, the Conſpiracy being quite diſcovered, all broke out into open Rebellion: The Marſi, Peligni, Veſtini, Marrucini, Ferentani, Hirpini, Picentes, Pompeiani, Venuſini, Apulians, Lucanians, and the old Enemies of the Romans, the Samnites. They thought good firſt to ſend to Rome to complain; but the Meſſengers could not be admitted without repentance for what was already done. Hereupon the War was committed to both the Conſuls, L. Julius Cæſar, and P. Rutilius Lupus, to whom were added Cn. Pompeius Strabo (Father to Pompey the Great) C. Marius, who had been ſix times Conſul, L. Sylla Licinius Craſſus, C. Perpenna, Q. Cæpio, Q. Metellus Pius, (Son to the Numidian) M. Marſellus, Val. Meſſala, and T. Didius, who were all ſent with Proconſular Power. The Forces on either ſide amounted to one hundred thouſand fighting Men. Rutilius the Conſul quickly loſt his life, falling into an Ambuſh laid for him by the Marſi, and many other blows did the Romans receive; ſo that they were forced to liſt ſuch as once had been Slaves. The Bodies of the Conſul, and thoſe of ſeveral others being carried into the City, the ſight of them ſo diſcouraged the People, that the Senate made a Decree, that thenceforth the ſlain ſhould be buried where they died, which as a prudent example was followed by the Enemy.

27. None ſucceeded Rutilius all the year, for that Cæſar could not come to a new Election, but his Army was committed to Marius his Lieutenant, and Q. Cæpio. Cæpio was killed not long after, being intrapped by Popedius, one of the Italian Generals. Marius now alone commanding the Forces, did good Service, as did alſo Sylla. For the following year, Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato were made Conſuls. Now the Senate thought fit to make ſuch Italians free of the City as had not revolted, which thing eſtabliſhed thoſe, who ſomething wavered in their minds, and took off the courage of the other already ingaged; yet they choſe them not into any of the thirty five Tribes, but placed them by themſelves behind all; ſo that as in voting they could not hinder the reſt, ſo ſeldom were they called to vote at all, which afterwards conſidered, though not at preſent, wrought ſome diſturbance. Cato the Conſul did very good Service, but thereof boaſted ſo much, that he compared himſelf to Marius, for which as he was fighting againſt the Marſi, he was killed in a croud by Marius his Son. Pompey overthrew the Picentes and Aſculani. Having long beſieged Aſculum, he defeated the Enemy which ſallied forth, killed eighteen thouſand of the Marſi, took three thouſand, and being got into Aſculum, cauſed all the Officers and Principal Men to be beaten with Rods, and then beheaded. Sylla his Succeſſor in the Conſulſhip overthrew the Samnites, and ſtormed two of their Camps, by which ſucceſs elevated, he went, ſtood for, and carried that greateſt Office. This War was ended by him, after it had endured above two years, in the 666 year of the City, he the ſaid L. Cornelius Sylla, and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Conſuls.

A. M. 3917. Ol. 173. an. 1. V. C. 666.

Sylla endeth the War.

28. What the Italians could not get with armed hand, was given them Conquered; at firſt to all, except the Lucanians and Samnites, and ſhortly after to them alſo, but ranked by themſelves in the ſame manner as the former. Not long after this, which was a kind of Civil War, there were ſtirs in the City about Uſury, which being rigorouſly exacted by the Creditors, Aſellio the Prætor, who withſtood it, was murdered by them. Yet hitherto theſe Seditions in the City were managed but by private Perſons, or in a private manner, but now came it to that paſs, that the Heads of the Factions got whole Armies to themſelves, and carried on their intereſts in open War one againſt another, their own Countrey being as the prize and reward of the Victory, ſuch were the manners and behaviour of thoſe who, through the infirmity of the Government, were not able to bear that greatneſs of fortune, which from the temperance and moderation of their Fathers had deſcended upon them. But an occaſion to the firſt Civil War was miniſtred by that with Mithridates, which began e're the Social or Italian ended.

After which freedom of the City is given to the conquered Italians, having been before this denied to them.

SECT. V.

From the War with Mithridates and firſt Civil War, to the combination of Pompey, Craſſus, and Cæſar, termed by Varro Tricipitina, which proved the ruine of the Popular Government, Containing the ſpace of twenty eight years.

Mithridates King of Pontus.

Juſtin. l. 37. Strabo l. 10.

1. MIthridates was King of Pontus, (a Countrey of Aſia, ſo called becauſe it lieth upon the Euxine Sea) thought by ſome to have been deſcended from one of the ſeven Perſians, who conſpired againſt the Magi that had uſurped after the death of Cambyſes. He was ſirnamed Eupator and Dionyſus, being a Man of a vaſt mind and ambitious ſpirit. Succeeding his Father, who was a friend of the People of Rome, at thirteen years of age, within two years he made away his Mother, who was left Partner with him in the Kingdom, and after her his Brother alſo, and in his youth he ſubdued the Kings about Phaſis beyond Caucaſus. Thirty years after his coming to the Kingdom, he thought of no leſs than the Empire of Aſia, the Romans, as he fancied, being now ſufficiently imployed in the Cimbrian and Italian Wars. He began with Paphlagonia, parting it betwixt himſelf and Nicomedes King of Bithynia, and being checked for this by the Romans, and commanded to deſiſt, he pretended it was his Fathers Inheritance, and to amend the matter he ſeized on Galatia too. Then caſting his Eye upon Cappadocia, he cauſed to be murdered Ariarathes King thereof, and his Siſters Husband, and when ſhe married to Nicomedes, he drove out his Forces, and pretended to ſeize upon it for the uſe of her Son, whom then he murdered alſo, and beſtowed it on one of his own Sons. The Cappadocians refuſed to obey him, and called out of Aſia Ariarathes one of their former Kings Sons; but him did Mithridates drive away, and he ſhortly after died. Nicomedes afterwards procured one to counterfeit himſelf the Brother of Ariarathes, and beg the Kingdom of the Memnon apud Photium.

His vaſt deſigns, and great attempts.

Strabo l. 12. Juſtin. lib. 38.

People of Rome; and he ſent his Wife thither to aver that ſhe had three Sons by Ariarathes. Mithridates hereupon ſent one to the Senate to affirm, that he whom he had placed in Cappadocia was alſo the Son of Ariarathes.

The Senate interpoſeth,

2 The Senate knowing well the aim of both, took from Mithridates Cappadocia; and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes, who had got it into his hands, and left theſe two Kingdoms to their own liberty. But the Cappadocians proteſted that they could not live without a King, and being therefore allowed to chuſe one from amongſt themſelves, made choice of one Ariobarzanes. Mithridates ſorely repining to be thus overruled, procured Tigranes the King of Armenia and his Son in Law to be an Enemy to the Romans, and perſwaded him to expel Ariobarzanes, whilſt he did as much by young Nicomedes, who now had ſucceeded his dead Father. Both of theſe Princes fled to Rome for relief, which was decreed them, and Commiſſioners were appointed to re-eſtabliſh them, whereof Manius Aquilius was chief. This being performed, they perſwaded both the Kings to invade Mithridates. Nicomedes did it, though unwillingly, whilſt Mithridates oppoſed him not, that he might have an advantage againſt him; only he ſent Pelopidas to the Commiſſioners to complain of him. They conſidering that Mithridates was a powerful Prince, returned this Anſwer, That they did neither like that he ſhould moleſt Nicomedes, nor Nicomedes him; for the former was not convenient for the Roman Common-wealth. He nothing moved with this Anſwer, re-invaded Cappadocia, ſending Pelopidas back with a bold expoſtulation. They hereupon raiſed a conſiderable Army againſt him on their own heads, without any decree of Senate or People. Nicomedes ingaging firſt of all with him was put to flight, though Mithridates his main Body never ingaged, and next after him Manius was diſcomfited. Then ſeized Mithridates upon Bithynia, Phrygia, Miſia, Lycia, Pamphylia, and other Provinces, as far as Ionia. He took alſo Q. Oppius and Aquilius, the later whereof he killed by melted Gold poured into his mouth, being ever wont to upbraid the Romans with avarice and corruption.

And reſtored the King he had caſt out.

But he again recovereth many Countries.

A. M. 3917.
Ol. 173. an. 1.
V. C. 656.
Selencid.

3. The Romans hereupon decreed a War againſt him, though they were now imployed in the Italian; and L. Cornelius Sylla, and Q. Pompeius Rufus being Conſuls, it fell by lot unto the former. But whilſt he was yet imployed in finiſhing the Italian War about Nola, C. Marius, who had been ſix times Conſul, either moved by a deſire of profit, or of glory, perſwaded P. Sulpitius, Tribune of the People, to prefer a Law for transferring the command againſt Mithridates to himſelf. He drew the People of Italy to his Party, by promiſing them that had been of late made free of the City, equal Priviledge with the reſt, which were diſtributed into thirty five Tribes; ſo that the thing was carried on by ſtrong hand, and Pompey's Son, Son in Law of Sylla, was killed in the heat of contention. Sylla hearing of this, haſted to the City, eaſily perſwading his Army to any thing, for that his Soldiers were unwilling that any other ſhould go that Expedition, from which they promiſed themſelves ſo great matters. To him his Collegue Pompey joyned, and though Marius and the Tribune made all oppoſition poſſible, with ſome difficulty they entred the City, and Marius with his complices betook themſelves to their heels. Sylla ſuffered no harm to be done to the Citizens, but reverſed what Sulpitius had done, regulated the Senate, and procured Marius, with Sulpitius, and ten others, to be declared Enemies to their Country, whom it might be lawful for any to kill, and unlawful to harbour; their Goods alſo being ſet to ſale.

Sylla hath the charge of the War decreed againſt him.

Conſule Appianum de bello civili lib. 1. Patercul. l. 2. cap. 17, &c. Plutarch in Mario & Sylla. Livii Epitom. l. 77.

Which Marius ſeeking unjuſtly, is driven from the City, and declared an Enemy.

4. Sulpitius was found and put to death. Marius hid himſelf in the Fens of Minturnum, and being diſcovered, a Gall was ſent to kill him, but could not do it, he was ſo daſhed at his preſence; ſo that being conveyed out of that place, he eſcaped into Africk. To him Cethegus and others, who had fled into Numidia, joyned themſelves, expecting an opportunity to invade their own Country. Pompey the Conſul, to ſecure Italy, was appointed to receive the Army of Cn. Pompey, who had done ſuch good Service in the Marſian War; but the Soldiers unwilling to leave their old General, who alſo took it heavily, made away the Conſul. For the year following L. Cornelius Cinna and C. Octavius were Conſuls, whereas Cinna, as ſome think, corrupted, was altogether for the new Deniſons, and recalled Marius, with the reſt of the Exiles; but he was driven away by his Collegue, and L. Merula was put in his place. He then going about to the Italian Cities, by giving them freſh hopes of equal Priviledge, and pretending that he ſuffered theſe things for their ſakes, got much Money. Marius alſo coming over to him, they raiſed a conſiderable Army, wherewith Cinna ſat down before the City. Marius took Hoſtia by force, and Cinna being not able to do any thing at Rome, ſtormed Ariminum. The Conſuls, for that they could not recall Sylla, ſent for Metellus then lying in Samnium, but he differing with them about ſome conditions, had them granted by Marius, to whom then he joyned himſelf. In the mean while the City it ſelf was near being betrayed to Marius by Appius Claudius a Tribune of the Army, who being intruſted with the Janiculum, thus requited him for former kindneſs.

Sect. 5.

Recalled by Cinna.

5. Though he and Cinna brake in, they were repelled by Octavius, and C. Pompey the Proconſul, who ſhortly after was killed with a Thunder-bolt. Marius after this took in ſeveral Towns about Rome where Proviſions lay, and Cinna, by promiſe of liberty, drew many Slaves out of the City, which the Senate underſtanding, leſt the People ſhould make diſturbance within, ſent to him about an agreement. He refuſed to admit of any addreſs made to him as a private Man, ſo that they were forced to treat with him as Conſul, and deſired he would ſwear to abſtain from Blood. This he flatly refuſed to do; but promiſed, that wittingly and willingly he would not be the cauſe of any Mans death; ſo he was received, and the Law abrogated for baniſhing Marius, and his Aſſociates. Upon their entrance began plundering and ſlaughters in all places. Octavius, though having the Oath both of Cinna and Marius, refuſing to fly from his charge, was killed, and his Head ſet upon the Roſtra, to which was afterwards added that of Antonius, (Grand-father to the Triumvir) an excellent Orator, who for a good ſpace defended himſelf by his eloquence from the Soldiers, and ſeveral others. None were ſpared, either for dignity, worth, or age. The dead bodies, being mangled and abuſed otherwiſe, were left to be torn in pieces by Dogs and Fowls, none daring to bury them. All Sylla's Friends were killed, his Houſe defaced, and his Goods put to ſale, he being judged and declared an Enemy. Merula, though he never ſought the Conſulſhip, but had it put upon him, and Catulus, having their days ſet them to anſwer, deſtroyed themſelves.

Getteth into Rome, and there cruelly rageth with Cinna his Collegue.

How the People carried it to proſcribed Eſtates and Perſons now and at other times.

6. Thus cruel were Cinna and Marius; but however they raged againſt their Country-men, the common People ſhewed much Abſtinence and Juſtice at this time. For when they had expoſed the Wealthy Houſes of the proſcribed Perſons to be plundered by them, none were found that would inlarge their own fortunes, or take a ſhare out of the publick calamity. They abſtained now from other Mens Goods, how indigent ſoever they were; although when accuſtomed to ſuch Tragical ſights, the People of Rome, as it happens, grew more hard-hearted. For it carried not it ſelf with the ſame moderation afterwards, in the Proſcription made by Sylla, when many were found that bought the Goods of the Proſcribed Perſons. And yet in that made by the Triumvirs, few would be inticed to make ſuch Purchaſes; and afterward when Cremona was taken, and the Citizens were expoſed to ſale by the Soldiers; the Italians bravely diſdained to make Slaves of their Country-men, born as free as themſelves were.

7. Cinna and Marius having thus ſatisfied their bloody minds, made themſelves Conſuls for the following year: But Marius died e're the months end, having born this Office now ſeven times; a Man more profitable to his Country in the time of War than of Peace. To him ſucceeded Valerius Flaccus, whom Cinna ſent into Aſia, to ſupply the room of Sylla there. But he by this time had done the work, and was coming home to revenge the former injuries, having ſubdued Mithridates in leſs than three years, killed one hundred and ſixty thouſand of his Men, recovered Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, Aſia, and other Countries, which he had got into his hands, taken his Navy from him, and forced him to be content with his own Inheritance. Theſe things are to be declared in order.

A. M. 3917.

8. After Mithridates had taken Aquilius with the reſt, and ſeized upon Aſia, and other Countries, (whilſt Sylla was at Rome, ſetling things there againſt Marius and his Faction, as is before ſhewed) he ſent his Letters abroad into all the Cities of Aſia, willing them at one day prefixed, to kill all Italians and Romans, with their Wives and Children, and caſt them out unburied; then to ſeize on their Eſtates, taking one part to themſelves, and reſerving the other for his uſe. This was accordingly done, and eighty thouſand according to ſome, according to others one hundred and fifty thouſand periſhed in one day. Then went he into the Iſland Cous, where getting great Treaſure into his Hands, there laid up by one of the Cleopatraes, he departed to Rhodes, and all manner of ways attempted to take the City, though Mithridates cauſeth eighty thouſand Italians and Romans, or more in one day to be killed.

Valer. Max. l. 9. c. 2. Ext. exemp. 3. Plutarch in Sylla.

though without ſucceſs; ſuch was the conſtancy and fidelity of the Rhodians towards the Romans, amongſt other Confederates which univerſally revolted. Then ſent he Archelaus his General into Greece, leaving Pelopidas in Lycia to carry on the War there, he himſelf providing Forces, and puniſhing ſuch as he found inclinable towards the Romans.

9. Archelaus firſt recovered Delos, which from the Athenians had revolted to the Romans, then joyned he to himſelf the Achaians, Lacædemonians, and Bæotians. After this he was fought by Brittius, who had put to flight Metrophanes ſent alſo into Greece from the King; but having freſh Supplies, Brittius withdrew himſelf to the Piræus, or Haven of Athens, which ſhortly after Archelaus took in with his Fleet. Now Sylla arrived in Greece with five Legions, and ſome Companies of Horſe, and having furniſhed himſelf with Money and Proviſions in Ætolia and Theſſaly, marched into Attica againſt Archelaus, almoſt whole Bæotia, with Thebes the chief City, revolting to him in his paſſage. He beſieged Archelaus in the Piræus, a very ſtrong Place, as fenced with a Wall almoſt forty Cubits high, conſiſting of ſquare Stones, and built by Pericles during the firſt motions of the Peloponneſian War. Having alſo beſieged Athens it ſelf, he ſpent the whole Summer in the Siege, and at length took it, the Inhabitants being unable to make any more reſiſtance through famine, which ſo far prevailed, as they made meat of ſodden Leather, and fed upon the Bodies of dead Men. The Piræus was alſo ſhortly after taken, and the Walls thereof demoliſhed, with the Arcenal, and all the Rarities therein deſtroyed. Then Sylla followed Archelaus through Bæotia, and fought with him through Cheronea, in a Place ſo ſtraight, that no way being open for flight, he ſlew ſo many, that of one hundred and twenty thouſand not many more than ten thouſand remained, this being an Army ſent over by the King out of his new Provinces.

Sylla arriving in Greece,

Vide Appian. in Mithridaticis, & Plutarch in Sylla.

Taketh Athens and the Piræus, and overthrows Archelaus the Kings General once,

10. Mithridates put divers Princes of his newly conquered Provinces to death, for fear they ſhould kill or betray him, by which cruelty he loſt all Gallogræcia. Epheſus alſo, and other Towns revolted from him, whereof ſuch as he recovered he uſed cruelly, and afterwards fearing a general defection, to purchaſe favour he ſet the Greek Cities at liberty. Some that conſpired his death were diſcovered, and upon ſuſpition were ſixteen hundred Men made away. Then ſent he another Supply to Archelaus of eighty thouſand Men, which with the other ten thouſand remaining of the former Army, were routed by Sylla near Orchomenes, and about fifteen thouſand being ſlain, the reſt betaking themſelves to their Camp were alſo killed or taken, a vaſt ſlaughter having been made. Archelaus having loſt his Son Diogenes hid himſelf in a Fen, and thence fled to Chalcis once more. After this Sylla chaſtized the Bæotians for their fickleneſs (for they would ſtand to neither Party long) and took up his Winter Quarters in Theſſaly, providing himſelf of Shipping, becauſe he heard nothing of Lucullus, whom he had ſent into Ægypt to procure a Navy. Now at this time was Flaccus, who had ſucceeded Marius, ſent into Aſia by Cinna to ſucceed Sylla. Him Fimbria his Quæſtor killed in a quarrel about lodging, being hated by his Soldiers, and he headed his Army, with which he ſeveral times fought, and that proſperouſly, againſt Mithridates his Son, and drove the King himſelf into Pergamus, and thence to Pitane, where he took Ship and fled to Mitylene, and might have been taken if Lucullus would. Then did Fimbria harrace Cappadocia, and burnt Ilium the Daughter of Troy, for that the Inhabitants had given up themſelves to Sylla, and not to him; ſo that though a Roman and ſo akin to them, he is ſaid to have uſed them worſe than did Agamemnon himſelf. This hapned to Ilium in the latter end of the 173 Olympiad, about one thouſand and fifty years after the firſt taking it by the Greeks.

Appian. ut ſupra. Oroſius lib. 6. cap. 2. Florus l. 3. c. 5.

And again,

11. Mithridates receiving intelligence of the blow he had received at Orchomenus, wrote to Archelaus, to procure his peace on as good terms as he could. To a Peace Sylla was not now averſe, being in great want of Money, and receiving no recruits from the City, where he was declared an Enemy, and deſiring above all things to carry back a good Army into Italy to revenge himſelf. He offered Peace therefore on theſe conditions: That he ſhould deliver up all his Navy, all Fugitives and Captives, reſtore the Inhabitants of Chios, and others whom he had carried into Pontus, remove his Garriſons from all places whither he had brought them ſince the breach of the Peace, pay all the Charges of the War, and be content with his Fathers Kingdom. All theſe Conditions were agreed to ſave parting with Paphlagonia, but the Ambaſſadors ſaying they could have had better terms of Fimbria, drove Sylla into a great diſpleaſure, with a compariſon ſo odious to him. Shortly after Mithridates himſelf met him, and found him ſo reſolute, as he gladly accepted

Forceth Mithridates to beg Peace.

A. M. 3921.
Ol. 174. an. 1.
V. C. 679.
Seleucid. 229.
L. Cor. Cinna 4. Cn. Papirio Carbone 2 Coſſ.

cepted all the terms. So ended the firſt War with Mithridates, being concluded by Sylla three years after his coming into Greece.

12. Sylla required of Fimbria the Army to be delivered up to him, as held by no Authority; but was anſwered, as having as little himſelf. Yet the Army denied to fight againſt that of Sylla, and forſook Fimbria, who thereupon ſent a Slave to murder Sylla, which was diſcovered. He begged pardon, and it was granted him, ſo he would take Ship and depart out of Aſia; but he ſaid he had a better way, and going to Pergamus, there deſtroyed himſelf. Sylla gave him to be buried, ſaying, he would not imitate the barbariſm of Marius and Cinna towards his friends at Rome, whom they deprived both of Life and Burial; yet he kept in this mind but a while after his arrival there, whither he now haſted, having fined Aſia grievouſly for its revolt, and ſetled Affairs according to preſent occaſions. He took Athens in his way, whence he carried with him the Library of Apellicon the Teian (in which were moſt of the Books of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, then not vulgarly known) bought by him of the Poſterity of Neleus, to whom Theophraſtus had given it. He wrote to the Senate, to which he recounted all the great Services he had done, and then how he had been rewarded by the Party of Marius, telling them plainly, he would come and revenge both himſelf and the Publick, by puniſhing the Authors of the injuries, not medling with any other, either old or new Citizens. The Senate hereat affrighted, ſent to treat with him, offering their endeavour for his ſatisfaction, if he would preſently make known his mind. Cinna they ordered to ſtop his Leavies; but he only returned them a plauſible Anſwer, and proceeded, deſigning himſelf and his Collegue Carbo Conſuls again for the following year, that there might be no need of going to Rome to a new creation. He paſſed over ſome of his Forces into Dalmatia, there to fight Sylla; but the hindermoſt were driven back by a Tempeſt, and they refuſed abſolutely to fight againſt their Country-men; ſo that thoſe, who as yet had not paſſed the Sea, refuſed to go aboard. Hereupon he going to ſpeak with them, an Officer who made way before him ſtruck one of them, who ſtruck him again, for which offence he commanding him to be laid hold on, a Tumult aroſe, wherein he himſelf was ran through, and ſo periſhed in his fourth Conſulſhip, and the 670 year of the City, a Man worthier to have dyed by command of the Conqueror, than the fury of the Soldiers. Carbo then continued Conſul alone all the remaining part of the year.

Appian. Plutarch in Sylla.

Fimbria's Army revolteth to him.

He marcheth for Italy againſt his Enemies there.

13. Cinna and Carbo had by a Law abrogated Sylla's command, and procured War to be decreed againſt him, before the Senate was affrighted into the offer of a mediation. He anſwered, that he would never be reconciled to ſuch wicked Perſons, as they deſired he ſhould; but if the People of Rome would give them indemnity, he ſhould not oppoſe it; yet he thought thoſe that would come to him might be more ſafe, ſeeing he had at his devotion ſuch an Army. Hereby declaring ſufficiently what his intentions were, he alſo demanded reſtitution of his Eſtate, his ancient Dignity and Honours; but the Meſſengers coming to Brunduſium, and there hearing of Cinna's death, and the diſturbance of the Common-wealth, returned back to him. Then croſſed he the Sea to Brunduſium with a Fleet of ſixteen hundred Ships, and ſixty thouſand Men. Being landed, Metellus Pius, who had abſented himſelf from Rome for fear of Marius and Cinna, came to him, as alſo Pompey, afterwards ſirnamed the Great, who though his Father was no friend to Sylla, yet coming now to him with ſome Forces, became afterwards his greateſt favourite. Beſides theſe came Cethegus, who having joyned with Cinna, now begged pardon. C. Norbanus and L. Scipio the Conſuls, with Carbo, made all preparation for reſiſtance. The firſt tryal at Arms was at Canuſium, where Norbanus loſt ſix thouſand Men, and fled to Capua. Scipio, through the treachery of his Army, came with his Son into the Power of Sylla, who diſmiſſed them both. After this Sylla ſent to Norbanus to treat of Peace; but (perhaps) being not thought ſerious, had no anſwer returned back.

Landeth at Brunduſium.

Defeateth Norbanus.

14. He then paſſed on in Italy, making havock of all things, as Carbo did, who getting into Rome, procured Metellus, and the reſt that joyned with Sylla, to be declared Enemies to the State. Both Parties ſent up and down the Italian Cities, labouring both by fair means and foul to procure Forces; and ſo all this Summer was ſpent, wherein the Capitol was burnt none knoweth how. For the following year Papirius Carbo the third time, and Marius, Son (but adoptive as

A. M. 3922.

Sect. 5.

A. M, 3923.
Olymp. 174.
ann. 3.
V. C. 672.

Entreth Rome.

moſt probable) to the old one, were Conſuls; the latter being but twenty ſeven years old. In the Spring was Carinas the Lieutenant of Carbo overthrown by Metellus, and Marius himſelf by Sylla, and beaten into Præneſte, where being cloſe beſieged, and deſpairing of his own ſafety, he wrote to Brutus, then Prætor at Rome, that he ſhould under ſome pretext call together the Senate, and kill thoſe his Enemies; P. Antiſthius, another Carbo, L. Domitius, and Mucius Scævola the High-Prieſt, which was with cruelty enough performed. Metellus by this time having overthrown another Army of Carbo's, Pompey defeated Marcius another of that Party, Sulla marched to Rome, which he eaſily entred, many of the oppoſite Faction being fled. Their Goods he ſet to ſale, and willing the People to be of good cheer, for that he was neceſſitated thus to act, he left a ſufficient Garriſon, and departed to Cluſium, where he and his Officers ſeveral times overthrew Carbo's Armies. Carbo ſent to Præneſte to relieve Marius his Collegue eight Legions, which Pompey meeting in a ſtraight place, ſlew many of them, and moſt of thoſe that eſcaped, departed to their own homes. After this, Carbo and Norbanus in a Fight with Metellus had ten thouſand of their Men ſlain, and ſix thouſand yielded, whereupon many fell off to Sylla's Party, as alſo all Gall within the Alps. Norbanus fled to Rhodes, where fearing to be given up, he killed himſelf; Carbo into Africk, though he had thirty thouſand Men at Cluſium, and other Forces, which were then broken in pieces by Pompey. Carinas, with other Commanders, attempted to break through, by the help of the Samnites, and relieve Marius; but this being with no effect, they then made for Rome it ſelf.

15. A bloody Battel was fought at the Gates, where many thouſands were ſlain on both ſides. Yet Sulla had the better. Carinas and Marcius were taken, and their Heads ſent to Præneſte to be ſhewed to the Inhabitants, at which ſight, underſtanding how things had paſſed, they yielded up the Town to Lucullus, and Marius killed himſelf, whoſe Head was ſet up in the Pleading Place at Rome. All his Faction in Præneſte were put to death, and all the Natives with the Samnites; the Romans only with the Women and Children were ſpared, who loſt all they had, the Town (the richeſt at that time of all others) being plundred. Norba a little after was taken, and burnt to the ground by a Fire which the Inhabitants kindled over their own heads, ſome one way, and ſome another, deſtroying themſelves. So came Italy into the Power of Sylla, who in the improvement of his Victory, ſhewed what fury and revenge, backed with Power, are able to do.

Getteth all Italy into his Power.

Lege Appian. de bello civili l. 1. Plutarch in Sylla. Patercul. l. 2. Valerium Max. lib. 9. c. 2. Exemp. 1. Florum lib. 3. c. 21. Oroſium lib. 5. cap. 20, 21. Livii Epitom. l. 89.

Publiſheth Tables of Proſcription.

16. Having ſent Pompey into Africk againſt Carbo, and given him a charge thence to paſs into Sicily againſt others of that Party, he called the People together, and told them that he would put them into a better condition if they would obey his commands, but he was reſolved to proſecute his Enemies with all ſorts of calamities. So he did in a larger meaſure than any before him. He put to death eight thouſand together in the Villa publica, a large houſe in the Campus Martius, made for the reception of the Ambaſſadors of Enemies; and liberty was given to his Soldiers to kill all they met, till Furfidius putting him in mind that he ought to leave ſome to Reign over; he then firſt of any Man publiſhed Tables of Proſcription, wherein were proſcribed firſt of all eighty Senators, and ſixteen hundred Equites, to which he afterwards added more, promiſing two Talents to thoſe that ſhould diſcover them, and threatned ſuch as by whom they were harboured or concealed. Of thoſe out-lawed Perſons ſome were ſlain in their Houſes, others killed in the Streets, and others proſtrate at his feet; thoſe that fled, their Goods were ſeized on. Marius, a Man of Conſular Dignity, and Brother to Sylla's great Enemy, had at the Sepulcher of Catulus his Eyes firſt pulled out of his Head, and then his Hands and Legs cut off at ſeveral times, that he might die by degrees. But not only againſt private Perſons, but Cities alſo did he rage, whereof ſome, after the Inhabitants were ſold, he cauſed to be demoliſhed. Many were turned out of their Poſſeſſions, which were given to his Creatures. Pompey drove Carbo into Sicily, and thence into Corcira, where being taken and brought to him, after he had inveighed againſt him in an Aſſembly, he cauſed his Head to be cut off, and ſent it to Sylla.

And rageth cruelly againſt Perſons and Cities.

17. Both the Conſuls being now deſtroyed, Sylla withdrew himſelf out of the City, and willed the Senate to create an Inter-rex, which they willingly did, hoping they ſhould have a new election of Conſuls, and named Valerius Flaccus.

He maketh himſelf Dictator in perpetuum.

Sect. 5. He then wrote to him to aſk the People, that ſeeing the neceſſity of Affairs required ſo great an Officer, a Dictator might be created, and that not for any limited time, but till all evils ſhould be redreſſed: and now he ſpared not to mention himſelf. This the People was forced to yield to, as being in his Power, and ſo this Office, which for the ſpace of one hundred and twenty years (ever ſince the years after Hannibals quitting of Italy) had been intermitted, was conferred on him without any limitation of time. A gilded Statue on hore-back was erected to his memory near the Roſtra, with this Inſcription, To L. Cornelius Sylla the happy General; for he would be called Fœlix, and ſometime Aphroditus or Beautiful. This hapned in the third year of the 174 Olympiad, the 672 year of the City, 80 before the Birth of Chriſt.

His actions while ſuch.

A. M. 3925.
Ol. 175. an. 1.
V. C. 674.
Seleucid. 233.

A. M. 3926.
V. C. 675.

He layeth down his Power,

18. That a ſhew of the Common-wealth might remain, he permitted Conſuls to be made, which were M. Tullius Decula, and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella; yet did he plainly Reign alone, having twenty four Axes carried before, as the Kings in old time, with a great Guard continually at his heels, abrogating old Laws, and enacting new at his pleaſure. He regulated the Conſulſhip, ordering that none ſhould be capable of it without paſſing firſt through other Offices. He overthrew the Tribuneſhip, by making thoſe that bore it incapable of any other truſt. To the Senate he added three hundred out of the Equites, to the People ten thouſand out of the Slaves of the proſcribed, making them free, and calling them after himſelf Cornelii; and to twenty three Legions he aſſigned much Land in Italy to oblige them to him. For the following year he gave way to have Conſuls alſo, but joyned himſelf with Q. Cæcilius Metellus, which courſe the Emperours afterwards imitated. The year after, when the People, to pleaſe him, deſigned him Conſul again, he waved it, and created Servilius Iſauricus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher; and then, to the aſtoniſhment of all Men, laid down his Dictatorſhip, and though he had done ſuch, and ſo many horrid things, yet offered to give an account of his actions.

And dieth.

A. M. 3927.
V. C. 676.

A difference betwixt the Conſuls about his Burial, and confirmation of his acts.

19. None accuſed him except one young Man, whoſe reviling language made him ſay, that this for the time to come would keep any one from laying down ſuch Supream Power; which Cæſar indeed ſeemeth to have been aware of. Not long after he went into the Country, where minding nothing but his Pleaſure, he not long after died at Puteoli of the Lowſie diſeaſe, his Body being putrified, and all turned into Lice, as Plutarch writeth. And this was the end of L. Cornelius Sylla, a Man born of the Noble Family of the Cornelii, (which of late had been Eclypſed, through the lazineſs of his Anceſtors) being the ſixth in diſcent from Cornelius Rufinus, one of the moſt eminent Captains in the War with Pyrrhus. As his life was pernitious to his Countrey; ſo his death brought alſo trouble to it, the two Conſuls and their Factions falling out about the Honour which was to be given to him at his Funeral. Catulus prevailed againſt Lepidus, and he was carried in great State through the City, and firſt of any of his Family was burned, being fearful, as Cicero thought, leſt he himſelf ſhould be dealt with as he had uſed Marius, whoſe Bones he had cauſed to be digged up, and thrown away. After the Funeral, the Conſuls fell into a greater diſſention. Lepidus would reſtore the Grounds given away by Sylla, and aboliſh his Laws. The Senate was fearful of another War, and cauſed them both to ſwear, that they would not decide the Controverſie by the Sword; but Lepidus was reſolved not to return out of his Province, till the new creation was over, and when he ſhould be out of his Office begin a War, as then diſcharged from his Oath. Hereupon the Senate ſent for him, and when he came, he would have brought his Forces into the City, but being oppoſed by Catulus and Pompey, a fight inſued, wherein he had the worſt, and then fled into Sardinia, where he died the ſame year with Sylla.

Livii Epitom. lib. 89.

Sertorius riſeth in Spain.

20. The Civil diſſentions died not with him; for, though Pompey had ſuppreſſed Carbo in Sicily, M. Brutus in Gall, Cn. Domitius, and Hierba King of Numidia in Africk, who were preparing for War, (and for this triumphed, being neither Conſul nor Prætor, and ſcarcely twenty ſix years of age) yet a more dangerous War was now depending, raiſed in Spain by Q. Sertorius. This Man being one of Cinna's Faction, joyned with Carbo againſt Sylla, and having taken Sueſſa, thence paſſed into Spain, which fell to him by lot as Prætor. Thence he drove out ſuch as were for Sylla, and joyning the Celtiberians to himſelf, ſtifly reſiſted Metellus, who was ſent againſt him, whereby obtaining a great name, he choſe three hundred of his friends, whom he called a Senate, in oppoſition and deſpite to that at

Sect. 5.

Appian de bello civili lib. 1. Plutarch. in Pompeio & Sertorio. Florus lib. 3. cap. 22. Livii Epitom. lib. 90. Alii.

at Rome. And now being made ſtronger by part of Lepidus his Army, which Perpenna had led thither, he deſigned no leſs than the invaſion of Italy. The Senate afraid of this, ſent Pompey againſt him, a young man, but of great eſteem, who paſſing the Alps in imitation of Annibal, but another way, at firſt received ſome loſs, and in the Spring following had no ſucceſs, (though Perpenna and Herculeus were ſeveral times beaten by Metellus) but was reduced into great ſtraights, and wrote to Rome for a ſupply. Lucullus Conſul for the following year procured it to be ſent him, leſt the War that was renewed with Mithridates ſhould be committed to him if he came back into Italy, which he affirmed elſe he would. Being now ſupplied with men and money, he, and his aſſiſtants fell upon the places ſubject to Sertorius; yet did they this year no great matters. But many of Sertorius his Army came over to them, being aggrieved that he made the Celtiberians his Guard, as diſtruſting themſelves, and upon ſuſpition of the alienation of their minds, being cruelly uſed by him.

Is murdered by Perpenna.

21. The year following Pompey and Metellus being more bold, made excurſions into ſeveral places, and with more ſucceſs; yet no conſiderable battel was there fought. Indeed it needed not. For, Sertorius now grown lazie, ſpent his time with Women, and falling into an humour of cruelty had put many to death, whereby he wrought his deſtruction from his own party. Perpenna fearing it might fall to his lot to be made away amongſt the reſt, reſolved to prevent it, and ſo inviting him to a Feaſt, murdred him after he had beſotted him and his attendants with Wine. This was the end of this great Captain, who for ſome ten years had ſtoutly reſiſted ſuch as had been ſent againſt him, being rather Superiour to them all, and admired by the Spaniards as another Hannibal. Perpenna with much ado was owned as his Succeſſor, and not long after was overthrown, and taken in battel by Pompey. He offered, if his life might be ſpared, to diſcloſe certain things of conſequence in private unto Pompey; but ~~he to his~~ great commendation, commanded him to be killed, leſt accuſing any man he ſhould bring the State into further trouble. So ended this War in the 681 year of the City. M. Tarentius Varro that vaſt * Scholar (being the moſt learned of any, either Greeks or Romans) and Caius Caſſius Varus being Conſuls. Appius Claudius in Thrace, and after him Scribonius Curio fought proſperouſly againſt the Scordiſci and Dardanians at this time: ſo did Servillius againſt the Pirates of Cilicia expelling them the Seas, and taking ſeveral of their Towns; as alſo Coſconius againſt the Dalmatians. But theſe were inconſiderable matters in compariſon of that War which now was renewed with Mithridates.

A. M. 3932. Ol. 176. an. 4. V. C. 861.

* Vir doctiſſimus undecunque Varro. Livii Epitom. l. 99, 91. Oroſius lib. 5. cap. 23.

The War with Mithridates renewed.

Upon what occaſion.

22. Sylla, upon this departure for Italy, had left Murena behind him in Aſia, to ſettle ſuch things as were not yet compoſed, with the two Legions that belonged to Fimbria. Murena being ambitious of a Triumph, had catched at all occaſions to renew the War, and had one preſented to him after this manner. Mithridates waging War with them of Colchos and Boſphorus, who had revolted from him; the former deſired and obtained his Son for their King. This proved the deſtruction of the young man, for his Father thinking it to have been procured by his ſeeking, put him to death, having ſent for and bound him with Iron Chains, though he had done him eſpecial ſervice againſt Fimbria. Againſt the Boſphorians he made then great preparations, inſomuch that every one thought he deſigned another War againſt the Romans. Archelaus was now at this time out of favour, for that he was thought to have granted too much unto Sylla in the Treaty of Peace, and therefore fled to Murena, and ſtirred him up to invade Mithridates, who neither had reſtored the intire poſſeſſion of Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes. Murena did ſo, ſlighting the mention of Peace, which was objected to him. Mithridates ſent to Rome, to complain of Sylla, and expecting the return of his Ambaſſadors, ſtirred not, though the other paſſing over the River Halys fired three hundred of his Villages. Afterwards came Callidius from Rome, who though he ſhewed no Decree of the Senate, yet ſaid, it was the pleaſure of the Fathers, that all acts of hoſtility ſhould be forborn, and afterwards he talked with Murena alone. Yet did not Murena forbear, ſo that the King judging that War indeed was intended, reſolved to look to himſelf, and paſſing over the River overthrew Murena in battel, who fled into Phrygia. This Victory brought many over to the Kings party, and hereupon he drove all Murena's Garriſons out of Cappadocia. Sylla now dictator, was not well pleaſed he ſhould be thus diſturbed, and therefore ſent A. Gabinius to command Murena in good earneſt to forbear, and reconcile the King to Ariobarzanes. Mithridates gave him his Son of four years of age for an Hoſtage, and received part of Cappadocia.

Conſule Appianum in Mithridaticis.

The King overthroweth Murena.

And the ſecond War endeth.

So things were ſetled again, and the ſecond War, as Appian ſaith, ended in the third year. But ſome ſeven years after another was begun.

The War again breaketh out and why.

Mithridates recovereth Bithynia.

23. Preſently after the laſt concluſion, he ſent to Rome to have the conditions of the League recorded, but the thing was neglected. Ariobarzanes ſent alſo to complain, that he kept the greater part of Cappadocia from him, whereupon Sylla commanded him to quit it, which accordingly he did. Afterward he ſent again to deſire that the League might be recorded; but Sylla being now dead, the matter was not as much as reported to the Senate. Hereupon he underhand procured Tigranes King of Armenia his Son-in-law to invade Cappadocia, whence he led away three hundred thouſand perſons, and there built a City, to be the Metropolis of the Kingdom, which from himſelf he named Tigranocerta, i. e. the City of Tigranes. L. Magius, and L. Fannius, who had fled to him from Fimbria's Army, perſwaded him to ſend into Spain, and joyn in league with Sertorius, which he did, and had granted to him Bithynia and Cappadocia, receiving from him as a Captain M. Varius (or Marius) one of his Officers. Being now without hope of pardon, he made all preparations poſſible, and got together an Army out of divers Countries, conſiſting of one hundred and forty thouſand Foot, and ſixteen thouſand Horſe, wherewith the following Spring he invaded Bithynia, which Country, Nicomedes being dead without iſſue, had a little before given by teſtament to the People of Rome, which thing inraged him. Cotta the Governour, a man of little courage, fled to Chalcedon, and he got it all into his hands.

Appian ut ſupra.
Plut. in Lucullo.

Lucullus beſiegeth him beſieging Cyzicus.

And forcing him to flye, purſueth him into his Kingdom,

A. M. 3932.
V. C. 681.

24. In the 680 year of the City, L. Licinius Lucullus and M. Aurelius Cotta being Conſuls, the former of them was ſent againſt Mithridates with one Legion out of the City, to which were joyned thoſe two that belonged to Fimbria, and two more, ſo that in all he had an Army of thirty thouſand Foot, and one thouſand ſix hundred Horſe. He found the King before Cyzicus a City of Propontis, and preſently beſieged the beſieger. He drove him to ſuch ſtraights by the help of L. Manius (who now again revolted) that though having a great deſire to the place, he laboured much to take it, yet through extreme famin he was forced firſt to ſend away the Horſe, and ſick Footmen, into Bithynia, whereof fifteen thouſand were intercepted, and then to fly himſelf with the reſt that could eſcape the great ſlaughter made of them in their flight. During this double ſiege, Eumachus one of Mithridates his Captains made incurſions into Phrygia, ſubdued the Piſidæ, and Iſauri, and endeavoured to do the ſame by Cilicia, till he was repelled by Deiotarus one of the Tetrarchs of Gallogræcia. But Lucullus improved his ſucceſs on land by ſeveral Victories at Sea, wherein he took divers of Mithridates his Commanders, and haſted into Bithynia to overtake him. He, flying with all ſpeed for fear of this, ſuffered moſt grievous ſhipwrack, and had been caſt away, but that he was received into a Pirate's Veſſel, to which he was glad to commit himſelf in ſo great a danger, and at length, after many difficulties, got into his own Kingdom, whither now Lucullus purſued him, having in his way taken in Bithynia and Paphlagonia. He made all poſſible preparations for reſiſtance, ſending for aid to Tigranes his Son-in-law, and to his own ſon reigning in Boſphorus; and he ſent Diocles with great gifts to the Scythians; but he ran away to Lucullus. In the ſpace of a year he got together forty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe, with which force he once or twice repelled the Romans, and ſtruck ſome terror into them. But Lucullus ſending out ſome Horſe for proviſions, he alſo ſent a party to interrupt them, which fighting in a diſadvantageous place was worſted. Being now deſtitute of Horſe, he thought of removing from Cabira, where he had wintred; and communicated his intention to his friends. They not expecting the ſign began to pack up, and ſend their baggage out of the Camp before day, which the Army taking notice of, thought much they ſhould flye without any warning given, and in great fear and diſorder breaking out of the Trenches ran away. The King went about to hinder them, but none taking notice of him, he was born down in the crowd, and being got on Horſeback betook himſelf alſo to flight, and might have been taken, but that the Romans were too buſie in plundering the Camp, though warned by their General to forbear.

And into Armenia.

25. Mithridates firſt fled to Comana, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes, who admitted him not to his preſence, but cauſed him to be entertained like a King, though in fenny and unwholſome places. All Pontus, except a few places, yielded to Lucullus, to whom alſo Machares King of Boſphorus ſent a Crown of Gold, and purchaſed the Title of his Friend and Allie. After this Lucullus purſued Mithridates into Armenia, intending to fall on Tigranes King thereof, if he gave him him occaſion by defending his Enemy. Tigranes at this time was a very potent Prince, having conquered ſeveral Nations. He wreſted Aſia from the Parthians, tranſported many thouſands of Greeks out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, into a City built by him near Euphrates, and called Tigranocerta; he obtained Syria and Paleſtine, diſplacing the Kings thereof, as was acknowledged by Lucullus. This made him intollerably proud, ſo that when he rode, he would have four of thoſe Kings he had ſudued to run beſide him like Lackies, and ſtand before him with their hands folded in token of ſubjection, when he ſate on his Throne. Lucullus ſent to him Appius Claudius his Wives Brother, to demand Mithridates; but he was then buſied in Phœnicia, in reducing ſome places, which the Meſſenger made an opportunity in his abſence, ſecretly to withdraw from him many, whom his intollerable pride had rendred impatient. At his return he gave a negative anſwer, and therefore Lucullus with two Legions and ſcarcely three thouſand Horſe, paſſed over Euphrates, being not acknowledged a General, becauſe he had not given him the title of King of Kings.

Sect. 5.

Where he overthroweth in battel Tigranes the King, who protected him.

A. M. 3935. Ol. 177. an. 4. V. C. 685. Q. Hortenſio Nepote Q. Cæcilio Metello Coſſ.

26. Tigranes had no good intelligence of his coming, for he hanged him that firſt brought the news, as a diſturber of the Peace; but when he perceived it was ſo indeed, he ſent Mithrobarzanes with two thouſand Horſe to interrupt his paſſage, left Manceus to guard Tigranocerta, and went himſelf up and down levying Forces. Whilſt he was bringing two hundred and fifty thouſand Foot, and fifty thouſand Horſe, the former was beaten back, and the later could not defend the City. Mithridates adviſed him not to hazard all in a battel, but rather ſtarve the Romans, as they had done him at Cyzicus, but he ſlighted the motion, and jeered at the ſmallneſs of their number, ſaying, that if they were Ambaſſadors they were very many, and if Soldiers, very few. But Lucullus pitching upon an Hill, ſent his Horſe to provoke and draw out the Enemy, that he might break his ranks, and then ſetting upon the carriage beaſts, cauſed them to drive the Foot amongſt the Horſe, whereby a great confuſion was made, and great execution continued all the day. Tigranocerta was taken by the means of certain Greeks, who being out of jealouſie diſarmed by Mancæus, took Clubs, and ſetting upon him and his men, got the better, and received the Romans within the Walls. After this, another great Army was raiſed, and committed to the conduct of Mithridates. They then endeavoured to incompaſs Lucullus, but were croſſed in their expectation, and both parties continued without any great matter performed, till want of victuals forced them to depart. Then went Tigranes further into his Kingdom, and Mithridates marched away into his own, being purſued by Lucullus.

Dion Caſſius. Hirtius de bello Alexandrino.

27. Mithridates overthrew Fabius, who had been left in Pontus by Lucullus, and after him Triarius, who being ſent with a new ſupply, out of a deſire of glory ventured to fight ere the General came. He loſt in one engagement twenty four Tribunes, and one hundred and fifty Centurions (which numbers were ſeldome heard of in an overthrow of the Roman Armies) and ſeven thouſand in all were ſlain near the Mountain Scotius, about three miles diſtant from Zela a City of Pontus. Lucullus having heard of the Kings intention to ſet upon Triarius, procured the Soldiers of Fimbria to march, who through the procurement of P. Clodius mutined againſt him, as formerly againſt Flaccus by the means of Fimbria. But Mithridates taking away all the neceſſaries he could carry, and deſtroying the reſt, departed into Armenia the leſs. Lucullus would gladly have followed him, and might have put an end to the War, but that now by the procurement of A. Gabinius the Tribune, Manius Acilius Glabrio that years Conſul, was appointed his Succeſſor, and an order made for diſbanding of Fimbria's Soldiers. This being known, Lucullus was ſlighted by his Army ſo much, that hardly could his men be drawn to ſtay, though they marched no further againſt Mithridates; ſo that the King began to recruit himſelf, and Tigranes waſted Cappadocia. Shortly after, Glabrio arrived in his Province, and ſent about to give notice, that the Senate was diſpleaſed with Lucullus for prolonging the War, diſbanded his Army, and would confiſcate the eſtates of ſuch as ſhould diſobey it's order. Hereupon all the Army forſook him, except ſome few poor men, who had no cauſe to regard the threatnings; and Lucullus being outed of his command, Mithridates recovered almoſt his whole Kingdom, and did much hurt to Cappadocia; Glabrio not as much as coming to the Army, but loitering in Bithynia. This hapned in the eighth year after Lucullus had undertaken the War; the ſix hundred and eighty ſeventh of the City, C. Calpurnius Piſo and the ſaid M. Acilius Glabrio being Conſuls. The year following the War was committed to Cneius Pompey (afterward ſirnamed the Great) by means of C. Manilius the Tribune, who Lucullus being in a fair way to finiſh the War, is interrupted by the coming of Glabrio.

Dio. l. 35. Plutarch in Lucullo.

The War committed afterwards to Pompey.

having offended the Senate by a Law, which gave the ſame right of ſuffrages to Liberti or Freemen (once ſlaves) as to their Patrons, or ſuch as manumitted them, procured this Law alſo to paſs to curry favour with him, who now had a very great name and power, having ſcarcely finiſhed the Piratick War, which for his famous and ſpeedy Expedition, muſt be deſcribed, after we have firſt ſpoken ſomething of the War with Spartacus, that was managed whilſt Lucullus was buſie in Pontus.

Dio. lib. 36. Livii Epitom. l. 100. Plutarch in Pompeio.

The War with Spartacus.

28. Spartacus a Thracian born, was a Fencer in the houſe of Lentulus at Capua, where he perſwading about ſeventy of his condition, rather to fight for their own liberty than the pleaſure of ſpectators, they broke the houſe and fled to Veſuvius the hill in Campania, where receiving to them all fugitives, they fell down upon the parts adjacent, and robbed them. By making equal diviſion of the booty, he got together a great power of men, over whom he ſet as Captains two Fencers that were Galls by birth, called Oenomaus and Crixus. Clodius the Prætor, who was ſent againſt them from the City, they routed and put to flight, as alſo P. Varinus, whoſe Lictors and Horſe they took. Spartacus now having got together ſeventy thouſand men, and making great preparations, began to be formidable to the Romans, who therefore ſent againſt him L. Gellius Poplicola, and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus the Conſuls with two Legions. Crixus was at the Hill Garganus defeated and ſlain. Spartacus making for Gall, was beſet before and behind by the Conſuls; but one after the other he overthrew, and putting them both to flight, killed three hundred Priſoners to appeaſe the Ghoſt of Crixus. Marching then towards the Alps he was oppoſed by Caſſius the Prætor, whom he alſo overthrew, and who hardly eſcaped from the ingagement.

Conſule Appian de bello civili l. Plut. in Craſſo. Florum l. 3. c. 20. Eutrop. lib. 6. Oroſium lib. c. 24.

29. Spartacus puffed up by ſuch ſucceſs, now conſulted of no leſs than ſetting upon Rome it ſelf. At the Comitia for Prætors, when the Candidates appeared, M. Licinius Craſſus, a perſon of great Nobility, and exceeding rich, undertook the Office, and was ſent againſt Spartacus with ſix Legions. He ordered Mummius his Lieutenant with two Legions to attend the Enemies motions, but not to fight, which doing, he was worſted, and many being taken, many alſo caſt away their Arms and fled. Craſſus to terrifie others. uſed great ſeverity againſt ſuch as forſook their Colours, decimating five hundred who had firſt begun to fly; which antient kind of Diſcipline being of a long time diſuſed, he hereby revived. Spartacus having by this time paſſed to the Sea, thought of going over into Sicily; but failing of his deſign upon ſome Cicilian Rovers, he ſate down in the Peninſula of Rhegium, where Craſſus as it were beſieged him, having drawn a line through the Iſthmus from Sea to Sea, to cut off all Proviſions. Spartacus in a tempeſtuous night made a ſhift to fill up the Ditch, and get over the third part of his Army, then ingaging with Craſſus loſt twelve thouſand men. After this defeat he went toward the Petiline Mountains, and the Lieutenant and Quæſtor of Craſſus purſuing him, he faced about and put them to flight, whereby his men being encouraged, refuſed not to give the Romans battel. Craſſus now deſired alſo to fight, becauſe Pompey, who was lately returned out of Spain was reported as coming to end this War. Pitching then one againſt another, Spartacus engaged with all his forces, and made at Craſſus through the midſt of Weapons and Wounds, whom yet he miſſed, but killed two of his Centurions. At length ſuch as ſtood near him running away, whileſt he ſtood his ground manfully he was ſlain, and the reſt were diſordered and put to flight. Some that eſcaped from the battel, and made head again Pompey ſuppreſſed, three years before he undertook the War againſt the Pirates.

He is defeated and ſlain by Craſſus.

The inſolence of Pirates.

30. The Pirates who had been a little repreſſed by Servilius Iſauricus (as we ſaid before) were now grown ſo numerous and powerful, that there was no paſſing of the Seas, nor any dwelling upon the Coaſts; for they not onely took and robbed Ships on the Sea, but alſo whole Provinces on the Land; the chief place of their Rendezvous being Cilicia the Rough. Mithridates firſt ſet them on work, which finding profitable they ceaſed not when he left off, but continued their Robberies; many thouſands of ſeveral Nations, as Syrians, Cypriots, Pamphylians, the Natives of Pontus, and almoſt all others of that part of the World joyning together. For, ſeeing that the War continued, they thought it more wiſdom to damnifie others, than loſe their own Eſtates. Becauſe they made choice of Cilicia, as moſt commodious in the Mountainy and Craggy places thereof to ſecure themſelves, they all went under the name of Cilices. They had defeated ſeveral Roman Prætors. Murena did little good againſt them, and Servilius but a little repreſſed their violence; for ſo impudent were they now grown, that beſides their incurſions into Appian in Mithridaticis.

Dio lib. 36. Plutarch. in Pompeio.

Sicily and other places,which made the Inhabitants of the Coaſts forſake their habitations, they landed in Italy near Brunduſium, whence they took away ſeveral women of quality; and more then that, two Armies with their Enſigns.

Provoketh the people of Rome.

31. The People of R*ome* being very ſenſible of theſe diſgraceful loſſes, a Law was preferred by A. Gabinius the Tribune, ('tis uncertain whether at the motion of Pompey, or from his own deſire to ingratiate himſelf with him; for being none of the beſt men, he little valued the good of the Commonwealth) that ſome one from amongſt thoſe of Conſular dignity ſhould be Created General with full power for three years againſt the Pirates, to whom alſo ſhould be granted large forces, and many Lieutenants for carrying on the War. This Law little pleaſed the Fathers, who now began to be jealous of Pompey's power; but to him was the buſineſs committed, having equal authority with Proconſuls any where within fifty miles diſtance from the Sea, and full power over all perſons within that compaſs, whether Kings or others, that they might aſſiſt him in the work. The Senate permitted him to chuſe out of their body fifteen Lieutenants, to whom he might commit ſeveral Provinces to take up as much money out of the Treaſury and from the Publicans as he pleaſed; to raiſe what force he would, and take two hundred Ships. But he obtained greater things of the People, and doubled his preparations, getting five hundred Ships, one hundred and twenty thouſand Foot, and ſome five thouſand Horſe. He had alſo out of the Senate about twenty five Vicegerents, two Quæſtors, and took up ſix thouſand Attick Talents; ſo difficult a thing it ſeem'd to deſtroy ſo many Fleets as the Pirates had, in ſuch a Sea, where there was ſo many places of retreat and refuge.

Which ſendeth Pompey againſt them.

Florus lib. 3. cap. 6.

His Method.

32. He diſtributed to his Lieutenants the Mediterranean Sea, including all the Bayes, Havens, Promontories, Straights, Peninſulaes, and windings whatſoever, furniſhing them with convenient Shipping, forces, and authority; ſo that the Pirates being rouzed out of their lurking holes by ſome, might be received by the next, and chaſed by others, and none might need to ſayl too far. He himſelf like a King of ſo many Kings ſayled up and down, and viſiting, giving directions, and overſeeing, took care that not one Pirate eſcaped. By this courſe proſecuted with ſingular induſtry, in forty dayes he ſcoured all the Seas about Africk, Sardinia, Corſica, and Sicily; and the Pirates that eſcaped flocked into Cilicia, as the common receptacle. He coming to Rome about ſome neceſſary occaſions, quickly after followed them with ſixty Gallies; but though they prepared to give him battel at Sea, yet when they ſaw his Fleet at hand, ſubmitted to mercy. Then in the ſpace of forty dayes he reduced Cilicia unto Roman obedience; for though he had provided Engines of all ſorts to batter their Walls, it needed not, the greatneſs of his name, and preparation for the War had ſo terrified them, that one after another they all yielded themſelves with the furniture for their trade. Such as remained of them being above twenty thouſand he was unwilling to kill, and to let them return to their old habitations was not ſafe: therefore he removed them into another place at a good diſtance from the Sea, where he gave them Houſes and Land; and furniſhed their Seats with new habitations. Thus having taken well nigh four hundred Ships, killed ten thouſand men, and taken one hundred and twenty Forts, he finiſhed this War in three Moneths, uſing the Conquered with more clemency than did Q. Metellus in Crete, which being the other neſt of theſe Pirates, and glorying that it never underwent the yoak of any, he ſubdued, and obtained with a Triumph the ſirname of Creticus. Having ſucceeded Antonius (who died in the action, and had as large authority there as Pompey) he uſed the Pirates very roughly, and ſo much the more, becauſe hearing of Pompey's mercy, they had by a Meſſage given up themſelves into his hands.

Apian ut ſupra.
Plutarch. Dio.
Cicero pro lege Manilia.

A. M. 3938.
Ol. 178. an. 2.
V. C. 687.

With wonderfull expedition in three moneths he finiſhed the War.

The Lex Manilia. Whereby the War againſt Mithridates with vaſt power is committed to Pompey.

Dio lib. 36.

33. Whileſt he was putting an end to this Piratick War, did Manilius prefer a Law as we ſaid before, that all the Armies the Romans had any where, with the Government of all Aſia, and the War againſt Mithridates and Tigranes, might be committed to him. The Nobility conceived great indignation againſt this Law, as which did manifeſt injury to Lucullus, Glabrio, and Marcius; but eſpecially out of an high jealouſie of Pompey's greatneſs, to whom now even all the Roman Empire was ſubject, having theſe Provinces laid to his former, with the ſame power of Peace and War, and making what friends and enemies he pleaſed, and chiefly for that he had Juriſdiction over all Armies whatſoever, which things had never before been conferred upon any ſingle perſon. But the Commons with great alacrity imbraced the Law; Cicero the Prætor preſſing it exceedingly, who having formerly ſet himſelf to defend the Nobility, now had betaken himſelf to the vulgar ſort. And C. Julius Cæſar (who of late had been Quæſtor) is ſaid to have favoured it, that he might have the people more inclined afterwards to commit extraordinary commands to himſelf.

A. M. 3939. V. C. 688.

34. It being now the 688 year of the City, the ſixty fourth before the birth of Chriſt, the fourth of Ariſtobulus King of Judæa, M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus being Conſuls, Pompey undertook the expedition. He firſt ſent to Mithridates, offering him good terms; but he ſleighted them, becauſe he hoped to have Phraates the Parthian on his ſide; yet when he heard that he had firſt made a League with him, on the ſame conditions as were offered to Sylla and Lucullus, he himſelf then ſent and asked peace. Pompey commanded him to lay down Arms, and deliver up all Fugitives; who fearing they ſhould be given up, and the other Soldiers mutining for being about to be deprived of their help, a great trouble inſued, which he evaded, by ſaying that he onely ſent to make an eſpial, and by ſwearing that he would never be reconciled to the Romans, becauſe of their inſatiable avarice. Then marched Pompey into Galatia, where meeting with Lucullus, much ado there was betwixt them. Lucullus ſaid the War was finiſhed, and that the Commiſſioners ſent from Rome were to decide the buſineſs, and when Pompey would not hear of this, he reviled him with an immoderate thirſt after power; Pompey again objecting covetouſneſs to him, ſo that the accuſations could on neither ſide be denyed. Lucullus gave out commands as yet in power, but Pompey by his Edicts forbade them, nulled all his Acts, and at length drew away moſt of his men. But at his return he was received with great honour by the Senate, carrying with him amongſt his booty gotten in Pontus, many * books, wherewith he furniſhed his Library, which ever ſtood open to Greeks eſpecially. He alſo firſt brought * the Cherry-Tree out of Pontus (from a City of which Religion it was called Ceraſus) into Italy.

Idem ibid. Plutarch. in Pompeio & Lucul.

He offereth the King terms to no purpoſe.

Stirs betwixt Lucullus and him.

* Iſidorus Orig. l. 6. c. 3.

* Plin. l. 15. cap. 25.

35. Mithridates had now got together a conſiderable Army; but coming to ingage with Pompey was inferiour to him in all skirmiſhes. Pompey conſidering how the King had waſted all the Countrey on purpoſe to ſtraighten him for Proviſions, went into Armenia the leſs, ſubject to Mithridates, who fearing he might get that Countrey into his hands, followed him thither. Firſt here Mithridates had hopes to ſtarve him; but was diſappointed with conſiderable loſs, and was himſelf encompaſſed with a Trench one hundred and fifty furlongs about. Hearing that Marcius was joyned to Pompey, who had Proviſions at will, he fled away, having firſt killed all ſuch as were ſick, and uſeleſs, about him. But Pompey purſued, and prevented him from paſſing over Euphrates; then forced him to fight in the night, being ſurprized, and at unawares. The Moon being low, and on the backs of the Romans, ſo lengthened their ſhadows, that his Soldiers thinking him nearer than they were, ſhot moſt of their Arrows without doing any execution. He loſt many thouſands; but he himſelf brake out with eight hundred Horſe, whereof but three hundred ſtayed with him. Then wandring through the Woods with his Horſe in his hand, he lighted of ſome Mercenaries, and about three thouſand Foot, by which he was conveyed into a Caſtle where he had laid up much Treaſure. Hence he ſent to Tigranes, who refuſed to receive him, laying to his charge, that by his means Tigranes his ſon (by the daughter of Mithridates) had rebelled againſt him, and offered one hundred Talents for his head. He fled therefore to Cholcos, which formerly he had ſubdued.

Dio. Appian. & Plutarch. ut ſupra.

He defeateth Mithridates,

Who flieth to Cholcos.

36. Pompey followed him to Cholcos, thinking he would not have ſtirred thence; but he paſſed into Scythia, where partly by force, and partly by perſwaſion, he made the Princes thereof of his party, beſtowing his daughters in marriage upon them. For he had now vaſt deſigns in his head, though outed of his Kingdom, even no leſs than of paſſing through Thrace, Macedonia, and Pannonia, and ſo over he Alpes into Italy. Pompey departing from Cholcos, and eſcaping the ambuſhes laid for him by the Albanians and Iberians, marched into Armenia againſt Tigranes, who was reſolved now not to fight, for that having had three ſons by Mithridates his daughter, two of them upon provocation he had already killed, and he that remained rebelling alſo, was now after an overthrow received from his Father, fled to Pompey. This ſon prevailed that his Ambaſſadors were not heard, who came to ask Peace. But Pompey marching againſt the City Artaxa, Tigranes yielded it up him, and afterwards, without ſending any beforehand, came into his Camp, and giving up himſelf with all he had into his hand, made him umpire betwixt him and his ſon, who would not ſo much as riſe up to him, or give him any reſpect, thoug Pompey uſed him very civily. Pompey left him his inheritance of Armenia, with a great part alſo

And thence into Scythia.

Tygranes ſubmitteth to Pompey.

Patercul. l. 2. c. 37.

alſo of Meſopotamia (allowing the Son to reign in Gordena and Sophena, and expect the reſt after his Father's death) but deprived him of all the Provinces he had ſubdued, and fined him ſix thouſand Talents of Silver for the charge he had put the People of Rome to in the War. So, he not onely quitted part of Cappadocia and Cilicia, but alſo all Syria and Phœnicia from Euphrates to the Sea, which he had got into his hands, with part of Cilicia, after he had ejected Antiochus Pius, as it is ſaid before in the reign of this unfortunate King. Tigranes the Son was very refractory, unwilling his Father ſhould have the treaſure adjudged to him by Pompey, that he might be able to pay his fine. Being minded to make away his Father, and for that caſt into Priſon; where therein alſo he ſollicited the Parthians againſt the Romans, he was reſerved for a Triumph, and after that killed in Priſon. The old King payed more than his fine, and gave ſomething to every Officer and Soldier, after which he was accounted a Friend and Allie of the People of Rome.

The conditions ſet him.

Liv. Epitom. l. 101.

His rebellious Son put to death.

37. Pompey reſtored Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, gave him alſo Sophene and Gordene, with Cabala a City of Cilicia, and others. After this with ſome adoe he forced the Albanians and Iberians to beg Peace, and then paſſing over the Mountain Taurus, made War upon Antiochus Comagenus, and alſo Darius the Median, either for that he had helped Antiochus, or made War againſt Tigranes, or Aretas King of the Nabathæan Arabs. Then Phraates the Parthian affrighted at this great atchievements begged Peace, which he granted not, but ſent Afranius into Gordiene, to drive out his forces, and reſtore it to Tigranes, who about it had warred with the Perſian. Phraates hereupon invaded Armenia, and Tigranes ſent to Pompey for aid, who being unwilling to begin a War with Phraates without an order from Rome, ſent three Commiſſioners to agree them. Antiochus ſon of Antiochus Pius, to whom Lucullus granted Syria his inheritance, thought firſt of betaking himſelf to the Parthian; yet upon ſecond thoughts, reſolved to caſt himſelf upon the good nature of Pompey. But he having obtained it without a ſtroak, put him beſide it, commanding him to content himſelf with Comagena, though he had never ill deſerved of the People of Rome: for knowing he was not able to right himſelf, he excuſed the matter, ſaying, it was not fit that Syria, whence Tigranes had baniſhed the poſterity of Seleucus, ſhould now rather fall to it being conquered, than to the Romans, who were Conquerours. He refuſed flatly to give Antiochus what before he could not keep (for he had layn in a corner of Cilicia fourteen years, all the time that Tigranes enjoyed it) leſt he ſhould again render it lyable to the incurſions of the Jews and Arabians. Therefore having overcome the Ituræans and Arabians, he reduced Syria into the form of a Province.

A. M. 3940.
V. C. 689.

Appian ut ſupra.
Dio l. 37.
Plutarch ut prius.

Pompey reduceth Syria into a Roman Province.

Appian.
Juſtin l. 40.
A. M. 3942.
Ol. 179. an. 2.
V. C. 691.
Seleucid. 250.

38. Mithridates, in the mean time had ſent to Pompey to ask Peace, offering to pay tribute; but being willed to come to him, he flatly refuſed, and made great preparations to renew the War. After this Caſtor his Governour of Phanagoria a Port Town of Pontus revolted, and calling the People to their liberty, took the Caſtle held by Mithridates his Sons, whereof four he ſent to Roman Garriſons. Hereupon ſeveral places fell off, which made him put many perſons to death, amongſt whom were divers of his own friends, and one of his Sons. Seeing alſo that many revolted, and his new Army had no heart to the ſervice, he ſent to the Princes of Scythia to haſten their ſupplies, ſending his daughters to them with a convoy of five hundred Horſe; but theſe men killing the Eunuchs who had moleſted them about the King, carried away the Women unto Pompey. Yet ſuch a courage ſtill he had, as to think of paſſing through Scythia and Iſtria, and joyning with the Galls of Europe to invade Italy, hoping there to find many enemies of the Romans; though Pompey coming out of Syria had through ambition done what he condemned in Lucullus, having reduced his Kingdom into the form of a Province, whilſt he was yet alive, and provided for new oppoſition. But his Army was ſtartled at the news of his intentions, hating the tediouſneſs of the journey, and having ſmall hope to conquer thoſe in Italy, whom at their own doors they could not withſtand. Yet ſuch was his authority, as for a while they were quiet, till his own Son whom he had moſt loved, and deſtined his ſucceſſor, became the procurer of their defection and his death.

Appian.

Mithridates deſigning in his mind great things,

39. This was Pharnaces, who either out of apprehenſion that this attempt upon Italy would cut off all pardon from his Family, or upon other grounds, conſpired againſt him. The Plot was diſcovered, and though his Complices were tortured and put to death, yet was he pardoned, and betook himſelf to the fugitive Romans, ſhewing them their danger in caſe Italy were invaded, and then to the Army, which with ſmall trouble he drew to his party. Mithridates coming to ſpeak to them, his Oroſius l. 6. c. 5.

Dio lib. 37.
Florus l. 3. c. 5.
alii.

His Son Pharnaces draweth the Army from him.

his own guard forſook him, his Horſe as he fled was killed under him, and Pharnaces ſaluted King, having a piece of Parchment put about his head in form of a Diadem. Mithridates ſeeing this from a high room, ſent divers to ask leave to depart, who not returning, he himſelf often deſired it of his ſon, but in vain, who bidding him dye, he cried out, and prayed, that he might hear one day the ſame words from his own Children. Then came he down to his Wives, Daughters, and Concubines, to whom when he had given poyſon, fearing he ſhould be delivered up to the Romans, he took ſome himſelf; but having uſed much his body to Antidotes (ſuch as yet are named from him) it would not work, though he walked much for that purpoſe, whereupon he wounded himſelf, but this not diſpatching him ſoon enough, he called one Bitætus (or Bithocus) a Gall, who, the wall being broken, had got in, by whoſe hand partly, and partly by his own, he diſpatched himſelf. A man, as one ſaith, neither, without good heed, to be omitted nor ſpoken of; in War moſt eager and fierce, and alwayes of notable valour. Sometimes in fortune, all times in courage of higheſt rank; in direction a good Captain, in execution a good Soldier, in hatred to the Romans another Hannibal; finally, the greateſt King after Alexander in the judgment of Cicero. This end came he to, after the War had firſt commenced juſt twenty years; for it began when Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato, and ended now when M. Tullus Cicero the Orator, and C. Antonius Nepos were Conſuls, in the 691 year of the City, the ſecond of the 179 Olympiad, and the firſt of the reign of Hyrcanus, 61 years before the birth of Chriſt. A. M. 3942.

He killeth himſelf.

A. M. 3942.
Patercul. l. 2. c. 18.

40. Pompey, when the firſt tidings of his death came to him, was near Jericho, marching towards Jeruſalem againſt Ariſtobulus King of Judæa, who had diſplaced his elder Brother Hyrcanus and uſurped the Kingdom. Hyrcanus complained of his Brother to Pompey at Damaſcus, who came thither to anſwer for himſelf. Pompey uſed them both kindly, telling them, that as ſoon as he had diſpatched ſome affairs he would come into their Country, which after he had ſetled Syria, ſubdued the Arabians with the Ituræans, and reduced Pontus into a Province, (all in a ſhort time) he now performed, being much incenſed by Hyrcanus againſt the other. He ſent to Ariſtobulus to come to him, and deliver up all his Holds, which he did with much regret, and afterwards withdrew himſelf to Jeruſalem, to prepare for War. Pompey ſuſpecting ſome ſuch matter, delayed not to follow him, who then came out to meet him; but though the City was entred without oppoſition, his Soldiers fortified the Temple and ſtood out, which made him be delivered into cuſtody. The Temple being very ſtrong by it's ſituation, was after much labour taken in the third money, Fauſtus the Son of Sylla having firſt mounted the Walls. Twelve thouſand Jews were ſlain, of the Romans very few. Pompey entred the Holy of Holies, but medled with nothing, reſtored Hyrcanus to the Prieſthood and Government (yet with command not to wear a Diadem) and took Ariſtobulus along with him, making Judæa tributary to Rome, as is more largely related in it's proper place. After this, leaving Syria with two Legions to Scaurus his Quæſtor, he fully ſubdued Cilicia, and thence returning into Pontus, ſetled things there, beſtowing the Kingdom of Boſphorus upon Pharnaces. At his return he wintred at Epheſus, whence having ſubdued many Princes, and joyned others as Allies to the State of Rome, having taken one thouſand Caſtles, nine hundred Cities, and reſtored thirty nine; having planted Colonies in eight Cities and Countries, and ordered the policy of ſuch as through the Continent of Aſia belonged to the Romans; and having magnificently rewarded his Soldiers he returned into Italy, and at Rome triumphed two dayes together very glorioſly, leading amongſt other Captives Ariſtobulus King of Judæa, after he had ſpent five years in his Eaſtern Expedition.

Pompey invadeth Judæa, where he ſetleth matters betwixt Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus the two brothers.

Joſeph. Antiq. l. 15. c. 9. & l. 14. c. 5, &c. & de bello l. 10. c. 5.
Livius lib. 102.
Plutarch in Pompeio.
Tacitus Hiſtor. l. 5. c. 9.
Florus l. 3. c 5.
Dio l. 37. p. 36. C.

A. M. 3444.
V. C. 693.

41. The ſame year wherein Mithridates died, and the Temple of Jeruſalem was taken, hapned a moſt dangerous conſpiracy at Rome, by the means of L. Sergius Catalina, a Patrician by degree, but one of a debaucht and infamous life. Some years before he had been accuſed of inceſt with Fabia a Veſtal Nun; but by the means of Catulus was acquitted; ſuſpected alſo to have murdered his Son for the love of Aurelia, who would not marry one that had Children. Having contracted by this looſeneſs of life a vaſt debt, he grew deſperate, and ſought for power and command, that he might if poſſible obtain the Soveraignty over all; but being alſo ſuſpected hereof, he twice received a repulſe in ſtanding for the Conſulſhip. The later time it was carried from him by Cicero, whom he would have killed in the Comitia, and railed at as a foreiner and upſtart, becauſe he was born but of an Equeſtrian family at The conſpiracy of Cataline.

Lege Salluſt. de Conjuratione Catalinæ.
Oroſium l. 6. c. 3. & 6.
Appian de bello civili lib. 2.
Dionem l. 37. p. 42. E.

Arpinum a Town in Puglia, a Province (now) of the Kingdom of Naples. Hereby driven into extream diſdain and rage, he fell into that courſe wherein formerly he had been ingaged with Piſo for the deſtruction of his Country, to whom alſo L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus (being denyed the Conſulſhip which they had ſought by indirect means two years before) joyned themſelves, and anew plotted the deſtruction of the Conſuls and Senate, the burning of the City, and overthrowing of the Commonwealth, with Lentulus, C. Cethegus, and others. This Lentulus had been Conſul ſeven years before, and now was Prætor (as alſo Cethegus) being driven on by a vain confidence he had in the Books of Sibylla, which he would often ſay did portend that the Soveraign power, ſhould be in the hands of three Cornelii, viz. Sylla, Cinna, and himſelf.

Velleium Patercul. l. 2. c. 34. 35.

Livii Epitom. lib. 103.

Diſcovered by the means of Fulvia.

42. The plot was diſcovered by Fulvia a Courtiſan, to whom Q. Curius one of the Conſpirators (a man that for his debaucheries had by the Cenſors been removed out of the Senate) blabbed it out, while he boaſted to her, that ſhortly he ſhould be a very conſiderable man. She gave intelligence to Cicero, who out of them two got the whole matter, how, and where they had met, and what deſigns they had in hand, particularly for his own deſtruction to be brought about by L. Vaſgunteius a Senator, and C. Cornelius of Equeſtrian rank, under pretence of a kind viſit. He appointed guards to the ſeveral parts of the City, and on the eighth of November (as the year then went) called the Senate together, whither came Cataline amongſt the reſt; but none of the Senators would come near him, ſo as that part of the bench whereon he ſate, was wholly void. Cicero, whether fearing him, or angry to ſee him there, made his firſt Oration againſt him, wherein he commanded him to depart the City. He went away late in the night with three hundred Armed men, and Lictors carrying Axes and Rods before him as a Magiſtrate, into Etruria, gathering Souldiers all along, intending to return and make prey of the City, which upon his departure he had given order to burn, as alſo to kill Cicero, which Lentulus and Cethegus took upon them to do, as ſoon as he ſhould come to Fæſulæ. In the mean time the Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, who were come to Town to accuſe their Magiſtrates, were alſo drawn in, to ſtir up the Galls againſt the Commonwealth; but declaring it to Fabius Sanga their Patron (it was the cuſtom for each Nation or State to have one in the City) it came to Tullie's ear, and ſo was prevented.

Cicero maketh his firſt Oration againſt him.

His ſecond.

Third.

Fourth.

Catalines complices put to death,

And he himſelf ſlain.

43. The day after Cataline's departure, the Conſul made his ſecond Oration, wherein he congratulates the People, and Commonwealth, concerning his abſence. The Senate judged Cataline an Enemy, and Manlius, with whom in Etruria he had joyned; they deprived Lentulus of his Office, by whom the Ambaſſadors had been drawn in, who confeſſed they had often heard from him what he idlely conjectured out of Sibylla's Books. Cicero's third Oration declareth what was done in the Senate. The times being very dangerous, he propounded to the Fathers to conſider what courſe was to be taken with Lentulus, Cethegus, Stalius, and Caſſius, all whom he having ſecured, this bred a great diſturbance; for the Slaves and Dependents of the two former got together a great company of Artificers, and indeavoured to break in upon the back-ſide of the Prætor's houſe, and reſcue their Lords. This being known, the Conſul haſted out of the Senate-houſe, and appointed a watch to be ſet, then returning, asked the opinions of the Senators. Silanus deſigned Conſul for the enſuing year, being firſt asked his opinion, according to the cuſtom, was for putting them to death, and ſo were divers others, till Nero diſſwaded it, judging it better to ſecure them till Cataline were ſuppreſſed, and the thing better ſifted out. Of this opinion was C. Julius Cæſar, ſomething ſuſpected to be privy to the deſign. He would have them diſperſed in ſeveral Towns in Italy by the Conſuls appointment, afterwards to be tryed, and not put to death altogether unheard. This ſeemed very plauſible, till Cato (great Grand-Son to M. Porcius Cato the Cenſor) very earneſtly preſſed the contrary, falling foul upon Cæſar as a ſuſpicious perſon. Then the Conſul made his fourth Oration, wherein he ſo diſputeth of the two contrary opinions, as he evidently inclineth to ſeverity, as fearing what the guilty party might do the night following out of neceſſity and deſperation. Hereby the Senate was induced to put them to death as ſurprized in the fact, which Cicero ſaw done accordingly ere the houſe aroſe. After this Cataline was overtaken by C. Antonius, the other Conſul, near the Alps, as he was going into Gall to perfect his Levies, and there fighting moſt valiantly was ſlain. His men alſo fought it out to the laſt, ſcarcely one of them being taken. So was quaſht this moſt dangerous conſpiracy, by the vigilan-

Sect. 5.

cy eſpecially of Cicero the Conſul, who wrote an Hiſtory thereof which is loſt. Publick thanks for his great care and pains were given to him, and, at the inſtance of Cato, with divers acclamations of the people, he was firſt of all others ſtiled Father of his Country.

C. Julius Cæſar beginneth to be eminent.

Lege Suetonium in Julio.

His birth.

The foundation of his Military ſkill.

Made Quæſtor.

44. Now began C. Julius Cæſar to be very eminent, two and was years after theſe ſtirs ſent as Prætor into the further Spain. He was born in the ſix hundred and fifty fourth year of the City, C. Marius the ſixth time, and L. Valerius Flaccus being Conſuls, the ſame that the Sedition about Saturninus hapned, on the twelfth day of the Month Quinctilis, afterward from him named July by Antonius his Law. His Father was C. Julius Cæſar, who never aroſe higher than the Prætorſhip, and dyed ſuddenly at Piſæ, as his ſhooes were drawing on in the morning: his Mother was Aurelia, the Daughter of C. Cotta; and Julia the Wife of Marius was his Aunt. In his youth having Marryed Cinna's Daughter (by which he had Julia) refuſing to put her away, he was in great danger, being with much adoe ſpared by Sylla, who as it were foretelling what trouble he would bring to the State, ſaid, that in Cæſar were many Marii. The foundation of his Military ſkill he laid in Aſia, under M. Thermus the Prætor, by whom being ſent into Bithynia to fetch away the Navy, he ſtayed with Nicomedes the King, to whom it was ſuſpected that he proſtituted himſelf. Afterwards in the taking of Mitylene he deſerved well, and ſerved under Servilius Iſauricus in Cilicia; but not long. For, hearing of Sylla's death, and hoping to make his fortune out of the diſſentions raiſed by Lepidus, home he came; but not finding a convenient opportunity, and having to no purpoſe accuſed Dolobella, to ſhun the Envy thereby contracted, he went to Rhodes to hear Apollonius, whence ſayling in Winter; he fell into the hands of Pirates, and was forced to purchaſe his freedom with fifty Talents; to revenge which, he procured ſome ſhips, and took ſome of them, whom he nailed to Croſſes, though without leave from the Prætor, who would have ſold them. After this he gave a ſtop to Mithridates his Lieutenant, and ſaved divers Cities in Aſia. He aſſiſted Pompey the Conſul, and others, in reſtoring the Tribuneſhip which Sylla had broken. Shortly after he was made Quæſtor, and ſent into further Spain, where going about to adminiſter Juſtice, he came to Gades, and ſaw Alexanders image in the Temple of Hercules. It troubled him exceedingly, to conſider that he himſelf had done no memorable thing at that age wherein Alexander had conquered the World, and thereupon he earneſtly deſired to be recalled, that being in the City, he might catch at ſome opportunity for his own advancement.

Joyneth with factious perſons.

Made Ædilis.

45. Having got leave to return ere his time was out, he joyned preſently with the Latine Colonies in demanding the freedom of the City, and had incited them to ſome deſperate deſign, but that the Senate for fear of the worſt, retained the Legions ſome time, which were raiſed for Cilicia. He was ſuſpected to have been of the party of M. Craſſus, of P. Sulla alſo, and Autronius (who having been deſigned Conſuls, were found to have indirectly ſought for the Office, and ſo according to Law forfeited their places to the diſcoverers) in the beginning of the year to ſet upon the Senate, and kill whom they pleaſed. Craſſus being made Dictator, he was to have been Maſter of the Horſe-men under him, and all things being ordered according to their pleaſure, the Conſulſhip was to have been reſtored to the other two. Some have affirmed (whom Suetonius citeth) that he alſo conſpired with Cn. Piſo, that the one in the City, and the other abroad, ſhould riſe, which was prevented by Piſo's death. Being after this Ædilis, he ſo managed the buſineſs of publick buildings, and ſhews, that all was aſcribed to him, and nothing to his Collegue; by which means, and others, he procured the favour of the People, and eſſayed by the Tribunes to get Ægypt aſſigned to him, which, now having expelled the King, he thought would afford him an opportunity of an extraordinary command. But he was croſſed by the great ones, whom that he might vex, he reſtored the Trophies erected by Marius over the Cimbri, which Sulla had cauſed to be pulled down, and ſuborned thoſe who accuſed Rabirius. By his means eſpecially the Senate had ſuppreſſed Saturninus the ſeditious Tribune, and now being brought before Cæſar as his Judge, he was ſo ſevere againſt him, that nothing ſo much helped the man in his appeal from him to the People.

Getteth by bribery the High Prieſthood.

46. After his repulſe as to Ægypt he ſtood for the High-Prieſthood, and by large ſums (ſuch corruption were thoſe times arrived at) bought ſo many voices as he carryed it from two moſt powerful men and his Seniors, having more ſuffrages out Joyneth again with ſeditious men.

Goeth Prætor into Spain.

A. M. 3944. V. C. 693.

out of their two Tribes, than they had out of all the reſt beſides. Then being Prætor, he ſtood for the complices of Cataline ſo earneſtly, as he drew to his party the Brother of Cicero the Conſul, and divers others. After this he aſſiſted Cæcilius Metellus the Tribune in preferring turbulent Laws, till both of them by a decree of the Senate were diſplaced, and yet then would he ſit, and execute his Office ſtill, till forced to withdraw: then, out of policy he reſtrained the multitude which flocked to him, and offered to reſtore him by ſtrong hand, of which the Senate taking notice, gave him thanks with great commendations, and re-inveſted him in his Office. After this, he fell into another danger, being accuſed by Vettius and Curius, as a partner of Cataline; yet, appealing to Cicero that he had diſcovered ſomething to him, he came off, and revenged himſelf upon his accuſers. Then obtained he by lot, as we ſaid, the Government of Spain, and having contracted a vaſt debt, put off his Creditors for that time, by the interpoſition of ſureties. Coming into his Province he ſpent not his time in adminiſtring Juſtice, but pierced farther into the Country, and ſubdued certain people before this untouched, ſeeking matter for a Triumph, which then to obtain he haſted to Rome. But it being now the time for the Conſular Comitia, he had an extraordinary deſire to that Office, and begged of the Senate, that he might ſtand for it by proxy, for that he could not himſelf be preſent, it being againſt the cuſtom for any that was to Triumph to enter the City ere that day came; for which as yet he was not provided. This, though againſt the Laws, was not without precedent, but could not now be granted. Therefore he reſolved rather to loſe his Triumph than miſs of the Conſulſhip, and coming to Town, ſtood for it himſelf.

Obtaineth the Conſulſhip by the means of Pompey.

Idem ibid Plutarch in Pompeio, Cæſare, & Lucullo Velleius Patercul. l. 2. c. 20. Appian de bello civili lib. 2. Dio lib. 37. pag. 35. At Livii Epit. lib. 103.

49. Great conteſts hapned about this Office, and he had not carryed it, but that Pompey at this time ſtood in need of it. For, the great ones envying his fame, refuſed to confirm thoſe conditions which he had granted to the Kings, Governors, and Cities of Aſia. Lucullus his Predeceſſor in the War with Mithridates, who ſince his return had given up himſelf wholly to idleneſs and luxury (for he firſt brought into Rome the extravagancy of buildings and feaſting) they ſtirred up, by his authority to promote their oppoſition, and he preſently fell upon him, together with Metellus Creticus, who bore him malice alſo ever ſince the Piratick War. Lucullus bade him report his matters ſingly, and not as a Soveraign Lord expect they ſhould all be confirmed without any conſideration: and whereas he had reſcinded ſeveral of Lucullus his acts, he deſired of the Senate that this might be conſidered of, whether juſtly done or otherwiſe. Cato, Metellus Celer, the Conſul, and Craſſus, defended Lucullus, who boaſted that the victory over Mithridates was his own; and he obtained that his decrees which Pompey had repealed might be in force, and thoſe that Pompey made in reference to the Conquered Kings ſhould be null: and he hindred, by the help of Cato, a Law which he would have preferred about dividing grounds to his Souldiers. Pompey being thus uſed in the Senate, betook himſelf to the Tribunes, one whereof (L. Flavius) that the Law for the grounds might more eaſily paſs, would have given the ſuffrage to all Citizens, but Metellus the Conſul ſo earneſtly oppoſed it, that though the Tribune caſt him in priſon, yet would he not depart from his former ſence, which pertinaciouſneſs of him and others, when Pompey ſaw, he deſiſted, repenting too late that he had diſbanded his Armies, and expoſed himſelf thus to the malice of his Enemies.

Pompey and Craſſus Made friends, and they three make the conſpiracy, called the Tricipitina.

A. M. 3946. Ol. 180. an. 2. V. C. 695. Hyrcani 5.

48. At this time came C. Julius Cæſar to Rome to ſtand for the Conſulſhip. Pompey joyned with him, upon condition that he procuring the Conſulſhip for him, he would confirm his acts. And whereas Pompey and M. Craſſus had formerly been at odds ever ſince their joynt Conſulſhip which they executed with great diſcord; Cæſar now made them friends, and not only ſo, but they all three conſpired together, that nothing ſhould be done in the Commonwealth which diſpleaſed any one of them; which conſpiracy, ſay Writers, was pernicious to the City, the World, and at length to themſelves. This conſpiracy of theſe three principal perſons, Varro (who wrote four hundred and ninety Books) deſcribed in one Book, and called it τρικάρανον, Tricipitina, or Three headed. Diodorus Siculus fetcheth the Original of Cæſarean matters from this year, wherein he travelled into Ægypt, when young Ptolomy Dionyſus was King. With this conſpiracy alſo Aſinius Pollio begun his Hiſtory of the Civil War. For the falling out of Cæſar and Pompey, did not, as moſt have thought, procure the Civil Wars; but rather their Conjunction, which was deſigned to break in pieces the power of the Nobility, as Plutarch obſerveth in the life of Cæſar. This was the ſix hundred and ninety fourth year of the City, the firſt of the one hundred and eightieth Olympiad, Herodes being Archon at Athens, the fifty and eighth year before the birth of Chriſt, A. M. 3945. Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and L. Afranius being Conſuls.

Sect. 6.

SECT. VI.

From the beginning of the Tricipitina or firſt Triumvirate, to the abſoluteneſs of Julius Cæſar.

Containing the ſpace of ſixteen years.

Cæſar and alſo his adverſaries purchaſe the Conſulſhip.

Velleius l. 2. c. 33. Appian belli civilis l. 2. p. 435. Strabo lib. 12. p. 558. Plutarch in Cæſare, Lucullo, & Pompeio. Livii Epitom. l. 10.

His acts therein.

By inveigling the People he procureth Gall for five years.

1. CÆSAR by the help of Pompey obtained the Conſulſhip; but not without the aſſiſtance of money alſo. There were two other Competitors, L. Lucerius and M. Bibulus, whereof he was much for the former, having agreed with him, that becauſe he was leſs in favour, but very rich, he ſhould give money for them both through the Centuries. But the Grandees underſtanding this, and fearing if he had him for his Collegue he might do what he liſted, they cauſed Bibulus to offer more, they themſelves contributing to the expence, which corruption Cato denyed not to be for the good of the Commonwealth, now brought by the means of ſuch evil members into abſolute danger and neceſſity. Cæſar confirmed Pompey's acts according to agreement, neither Lucullus nor any other oppoſing it, and Pompey procured, that what honour Lucullus had promiſed to certain men of Pontus, ſhould not be confirmed by the Senate, filling the City with Souldiers, and by force caſting him and Cato out of the Forum. In this his firſt Conſulſhip he ſold alliances with Rome, and alſo Kingdoms; and, to procure the favour of the Commons, preferred a Law for dividing certain grounds in Campania (which had been preſerved to defray publick charges) to ſuch Citizens as had three children or more. This he cauſed to paſs by force, and compelled all Plebeians to ſwear to obſerve the Law, and the Senators alſo, though Cato urged them to refuſe; for they did it to ſave their lives, he having cauſed the People to decree, that it ſhould be capital for any to deny it. He had recourſe to the People in all caſes, making little uſe of the Senate, which he ſeldom called together. Bibulus his Collegue having oppoſed his actions for ſome time to no purpoſe, kept himſelf at home, and ſtirred not for the remaining part of the year. Cæſar then governed alone, and was much courted by the Equites or Knights, who having farmed the cuſtom, deſired an abatement of the rent. The Senate refuſed to remit any thing, but he did their buſineſs for them, procuring the People to abate a third part. By this and other wayes of ſhews and largeſſes, he ſo inveigled the multitude, that he got Gall to be decreed to him for five years, with four Legions, and for the remaining part of the year, ſpent it in ſeeking how to eſtabliſh himſelf for the time to come.

He marryeth his Daughter Julia to Pompey, and otherwiſe provideth for his own intereſt.

Euſeb.

2. Knowing how conſiderable a man Pompey was, to bind him faſter to him, he gave him in marriage his Daughter Julia. He procured two of his own creatures, A. Gabinius and L. Calpurnius Piſo (whoſe Daughter he had Marryed after Cornelia's death) to be deſigned Conſuls for the following year, as alſo Vatinius and Clodius Tribunes, though the later had abuſed his Wife (for he was a perſon exceedingly looſe that way) having in womens clothes crept into the meetings proper only to that Sex, for which he was accuſed as a breaker of the ſacred cuſtoms by Cicero. He appeared not againſt him though he put away his Wife, nay he helped him to his place, as it's thought, out of oppoſition to the Orator (who was wont to declame againſt the combination of the three great ones, as pernicious to the Commonwealth) and in way of requital for the help he had afforded him in the procurement of Gall, whither, when the time of his Conſulſhip was expired, he departed. This year was Titus Livius the Hiſtoriographer born at Padua.

Clodius the Tribune.

3. Clodius out of malice to Cicero ſeeking for the Tribuneſhip, whereas he was a Patrician, thereby uncapable of the place, he procured himſelf to be adopted by a Plebeian, and ſo with the loſs of his former dignity obtained it. Then did he prefer a Law, that whoſoever had put to death any Roman Citizen unheard, water and fire ſhould be forbidden him, which amounted to as much as baniſhment; and ſet Cicero his day of appearance, for putting to death Cethegus, Lentulus, and others of Catalines conſpiracy unheard. Pompey at firſt ſtood ſtifly for the accuſed, ſaying, he would rather dye himſelf than Tully ſhould be hurt; but Cæſar took him off, becauſe Cicero having deſired to go his Lieutenant into Gall, upon Clodius his ſeeming willing to be reconciled, had changed his reſolution, and hereby diſpleaſed him. This is certain, that he who was wont to defend others ſo earneſtly, was very timorous in his own cauſe (which hapned alſo to Demoſthenes) and choſe rather to depart the City, and late at night, than undergo his tryal, after that Pompey had forſaken him, and the Conſuls would give him little hopes. After his departure Clodius baniſhed him by decree of the People four hundred miles from Italy, demoliſhed his Villages and his Houſe, on the plot whereof he built a Temple to Liberty, and ſet his goods to ſale. He went to Theſſalonica a City of Macedonia, being by Letters of the Senate commended to ſuch Kings, or Governours, as into the Dominions of whom he might have occaſion to come.

Baniſheth Cicero.

A. M. 3947.
V. C. 696.

4. Clodius having thus rid himſelf of Cicero, for that Cato's preſence was very troubleſom to him, ſent him alſo out of the way, under colour of doing him honour. He preferred a Law againſt Ptolomy King of Cyprus (Brother to Auletes of Ægypt) for the ſpoiling him of all his eſtate, and reducing that Iſland into a the form of a Province, though this man had nothing ill deſerved. He was indeed very vicious, if that could have given them any right to what he had; but the truth was, Clodius had been taken by the Pirates, and ſending to him for money to redeem him, he would part but with two Talents, and therefore he took this occaſion to be revenged on him and Cato both together. The King hearing of Cato's coming, killed himſelf, and ſome ſaid that he caſt his treaſures into the Sea. Cato ſold his goods, and brought a great ſum of money into the treaſury. But, by this time Pompey repented that he had forſaken Cicero; for, Clodius wanting other matter now to work on, vexed all the great ones, and repealed ſome things which he had done, ſo that now he ſet himſelf to have him recalled. Clodius withſtood it, but thereupon the Senate paſſed a Decree, that nothing ſhould be heard before his reſtitution was propounded. Lentulus the Conſul propounded it on the Calends of January; but the matter being hindred, ſeveral wayes, was brought down to the People on the eighth before the Calends of February, where was great endeavour uſed by T. Annius Milo and P. Sextius two other Tribunes for his reſtitution. Clodius their Colleague taking ſome Fencers belonging to his Brother Appius, fell upon the multitude and killed many: The Tribunes were wounded, and Q. Cicero Brother of the baniſhed (newly returned from Aſia, which he had governed three years) lay for dead amongſt the ſlain. Now the People began ſeriouſly to bethink themſelves. Milo ventured to draw Clodius by force to judgment, and Pompey poſſeſſing himſelf of the Forum, put the People to their ſuffrages, who with univerſal conſent voted his reſtitution. The Senate decreed honour to ſuch Cities as had entertained him, and that his Houſe and Villages ſhould be re-edified at the publick charge. So Cicero who had been baniſhed the year before about the Calends of April, returned this year in the month Sextilis, or, the day before the Nones of September, and therefore was abſent about ſixteen months. As Plutarch more rightly computeth than * Simpſon, who ſtrangely forgetting himſelf, blaming him, for ſaying he returned in the ſixteenth month, contended that from the firſt of April to the month Sextilis or Auguſt of the following year, intervene but fourteen months. Now P. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Cæcilius Metellus were Conſuls.

Sendeth Cato to ſpoil the King of Cyprus moſt unjuſtly of his eſtate.

Lege Plutarchum in Catone Minore.

Cicero recalled

A. M. 3948.

5. But Cæſar, as we ſaid, obtained of the People Gall within the Alpes and Illyricum with three Legions; and the Senate added Gall without the Alpes (which in part we now call France) with another Legion. This gave occaſion to a War of ſuch conſequence as none at this time was greater, and being deſcribed by the Captain himſelf in his celebrated Commentaries, we ſhall be more particular and large in the Account we are obliged to give of it. His firſt work was to repel the Helvetii (les Helvetiens & Suiſſes) who having burnt their Houſes and reſolved to ſeek out more convenient Habitations, intended to paſs over the Rhone, and ſo through his Province. But before he come to ſhew how this was done, at the entrance of his work he gives his Reader a ſhort deſcription of Gall in this manner.

The occaſion of the Gallick War, written by Cæſar himſelf.

6. All

Sect. 6.

His Geography of Gall.

Cæſar de Bello Gallico lib. 1.

6. All Gall is divided into three parts, whereof the Belgæ inhabit one, the Aquitani another, and thoſe which they call Celtes, and we (Romans) call Galls a third, all which, differ each from other in Maners, Language and Laws. The River Garumna or Garonne ſeperates the Galls from the Aquitanes, and Matrona, and Sequana (Marne and Seine) bound them from the Belgæ. The Belgæ are moſt Warlike as being at moſt diſtance from the Civility and Politure of the Province, and leſs frequented with Merchants or acquainted with ſuch things as are imported to render effeminate mens minds, as alſo being ſeated next to the Germans beyond the Rhine, with whom they have continual Wars. For which cauſe alſo the Helvetians excel the reſt of the Galls in valour, being in daily conflicts with the Germans, for defence of their own territories, or by invading theirs. The part inhabited by the Galls, begins at the River Rhone, and is bounded with the Garonne, the Ocean and the Confines of the Belgæ; and reaching alſo to the Rhine as a limit from the Sequani, it ſtretcheth Northward. The Belgæ take their beginning at the extreme Confines of Gall, and inhabit the Country which lyeth along the lower part of the Rhine, inclining to the North and the riſing Sun. Aquitain ſpreadeth it ſelf betwixt the River Garonne and the Pyrenæan Hills, as far as the Ocean which lyeth toward Spain, between the West and North.

Miſliked by Monetus.

Monetus Jeſuita in Geographia Galliæ veterus Recentiſq; ſegmenti Octavi Celticæ latercullo. 3.

7. This diviſion of Gall hath by reaſon of the Authority of the Author, been eſteemed a Rule for the Geography of that Country; and yet a late accurate Surveyor of it thinks himſelf obliged to hint ſeveral either faults in it, or miſtakes of thoſe that ordinarily read it. For, he contends that by all theſe words laid together it is not to be underſtood that Cæſar makes a threefold diviſion of Gall, but that the Celtick was twofold as including Gallia Narbonenſis, though not expreſſed. And he accuſeth Cæſar of want of diligence in aſſigning the Borders of Gallia Celtica towards the East, where he writes that By the Sequani and Helvetii it reaches to the Rhine, as if the Sequani in any part bordered upon the Rhine, or the Helvetii, at a further diſtance, were ſeated on that River. And as improperly he writes that the Celtick Gall took its beginning from the River Rhone. For the Rhone except in a very little tract at the Lake Lemanus gives no limit or bound to Gall, but perpetually cuts through it, from Geneva to the Sea of Marſeilles. Such faults Monetus findes with Cæſars's beginning of his Commentaries, as to his Geography. And we ſhall ſee he makes other Exceptions to his Narratives, both as to Countries, Nations, and his very own Acts. Let us firſt hear as compendiouſly as we can what Cæſar ſaith.

Orgetorix ſtireth up the Helvetians.

8. Amongſt the Helvetians Orgetorix was moſt Eminent both for the Nobility of his Deſcent and Riches, and in the year when M. Meſſala and M. Piſo were Conſuls, out of ambition to reign, moved the Nobility to a Commotion, and perſwaded the State as an eaſie matter for them, who in valour excelled all other Nations, to invade their Neighbours with their whole power, and make themſelves Maſters of all Gall. He did the more eaſily perſwade them becauſe the Helvetians were ſhut up on every ſide, by the ſtrength and Nature of the place they inhabited. On the one ſide with the depth and breadth of the River Rhine, which divides their Country from Germany; on the other ſide with the high ridge of the Mountain Jura which runs betwixt them and the Sequani; and on the third part they were flanked with the Lake Lemanus, and the River Rhone parting their Territories from the Roman Province. Being thus ſtraightned they could not eaſily inlarge themſelves, or make War upon the bordering Countries; and thereupon being men wholly bent to Arms, and War, were diſcontented as having too little roome for their multitude of People, and the fame they had obtained for their valour; their Country containing two hundred and forty miles in length, and in breadth one hundred and eighty. They reſolved to make preparation for an Expedition, for which purpoſe they bought a great number of Carts and Horſes for Cariages, ſowed much Corn that they might have plenty in their Journey, and made peace with the confining Countries. For this they thought two years would be ſufficient, and in the third inforced their ſetting forward by a ſolemn Law, appointing Orgetorix to give order for what remained.

9. Here we ſee that the ſtraitneſs of their Country, and its inability to nouriſh and ſuſtain their Multitudes, was the great motive of this deſign of the Helvetians, as the like hath been to moſt other Nations for tranſmigration; and if Monetus be heard, they had much more reaſon afforded from that inconvenience than Cæſar imagined. For, whereas he here writes that their Country contained two hundred dred and forty miles in length, and one hundred and eighty in breadth, he affirms him to make it bigger by two thirds than it really was. Indeed the Helvetians themſelves in their Geographical Carts give out that from the Town of Geneva to the Acronian, or Lake of Conſtance, may be found the length aſſigned by Cæſar, and from Jura and the Rhine to the Alps that border upon them, the breadth of eighty miles; but he affirms they will never prove it to any Foreigner that knows the ways, but that their firſt aſſertion exceeds all belief. Then they challenge that Country lying at the roots of the Alps which the Rhæti (Griſons) the Nantnates and Lepontii will not yield them, as neither will the Latobrigi (* Vaudois or Vauſſois) that are adjacent to the Lake Lemanus, the Confederates indeed of the Helvetians, but not of their Body or Nation. To the Latobrigi he ſaith, of right belongeth as far as from the Mountain Jura and the Weſt, to the Veragri and the Eaſt, whatſoever ground lyeth upon the Lake, as far as the Region of Berne toward the North; although Cæſar in his running diſcourſe, and intent upon ſomething elſe, aſſignes it all to the Helvetians. But he either having ſeen theſe places but once, and but for a few dayes, or diſturbed with the noiſe and cares of the Helvetian War, or for that, after the Gallick and Civil Wars were over, he publiſhed his Commentaries at a long diſtance, ſpeaks little conſiderately and accurately of this Country and many others.

* Peuple du pais de Vaux.

And they other people.

10. But Orgetorix, ſtill acted by his ambitious deſign, communicated it to two of his Neighbours, and perſwaded Caſticus one of the Sequani, and Dumnorix one of the Ædui, to ſet up alſo for themſelves, and get the Soveraignty of their Countries. But his practiſes were diſcovered, and when he ſhould have been called to account he was found dead, not without ſuſpicion that he killed himſelf. However the Helvetians purſued their former deſign of leaving their Country; and when they thought themſelves prepared, ſet fire to all their Towns, in number twelve, and four hundred Villages, beſides private Buildings, and burnt all the Corn but what they carried along with them, that all hope of return being taken away, they might the more readily undergo all hazards; and order was given that every man ſhould carry with him ſo much meal as would ſuſtain him for three moneths. They perſwaded the Rauraci, Tulingi, and Latobrigi to do the like and go along with them; as alſo the Boii, who once dwelt beyond the Rhine, but were now ſeated in the Territories of the Norici, and had taken the Capital Town of that Country. There were only two wayes which gave them paſſage out of their Country, the one through the Sequani very narrow and difficult, between the Hill Jura and the River Rhone, through which a ſingle Cart could hardly paſs, and having an high Mountain hanging over, ſo that a ſmall force might eaſily hinder them: The other was through the Roman Province far eaſier and readier, the River Rhone running betwixt the Helvetians and the Allobroges (who lately had been brought into obedience to the People of Rome) giving paſſage in divers places by Fords. Now the utmoſt Town belonging to the Allobroges, and bordering upon the Helvetians was Geneva, where there was a Bridg leading to the Helvetians. They doubted not to perſwade the Allobroges (who ſeemed yet but little affected to the people of Rome) or at leaſt to force them to give them paſſage. Being now ready for a march, they appointed a day whereon to meet on the Banks of Rhone, which was on the twenty fifth of March, L. Piſo and A. Gabinus being Conſuls.

11. Here Monetus again reprehends this great Man as unskilfully delivering that there were onely two ways through which the Helvetians could paſs to their Neighbour Nations, ſo as to come to the Country of the Santones, on which they intended to ſeize. It's certain, ſaith he, that the Allobroges both then and now were paſſable by two ways, as well by the Helvetians as other Nations, and thoſe leading through the Borders of the Latobrigi; and that the Sequani were paſſable by as many; of which certainly the Helvetians would have choſen the moſt commodious. Of the two ways leading from the Latobrigi to the Allobroges, one lies beneath the Weſtern Head of the Lake Lemanus and Geneva, through which the Helvetians attempted to paſs, as ſhorter; where yet the Rhone is ſeldome fordable, as always ſwelling with the waters flowing out of the Lake; and the other lies above the Eaſtern Head of the Lake in the Territories of the Veragri, where the Rhone is not deep, but eaſily fordable. From the Latobrigi alſo to the Sequani lies two ways. That of which Cæſar ſpeaks at the root of the Mountain Jura and the right hand Bank of the River Rhone; and another almoſt ſix leagues diſtant from it, toward the Weſt, in the Straits of Jura, leading to Pons Ælius, now Pontarlier and Veſontio, or Bezanzon. And beſides there was ſtill another leading from the Helvetians to the Sequani, and that was through the Territories of the Tulingi their Conſederates, the moſt large and even, but longer and more turning than the reſt, by the Confines of the Lingones and Ædui. And ſo there were not onely two, but five ways, by which the Helvetians might have paſſed out of their own Bounds, as well by the Sequani as Allobroges contrary to what Cæſar delivers, who is neither more to be believed when he writes that the Rhone runs betwixt the Borders of the Helvetians and Allobroges, giving paſſage in certain places by Fords. For the Rhone doth not touch the Helvetians but the Latobrigi; as alſo doth the Lake Lemanus: and as for the Latobrigi, though in this Expedition and War they were aſſociate to the Helvetians, yet were they no portion of their Nation, Cæſar himſelf being witneſs where he delivers, that the Helvetians perſwaded them, as alſo the Rauraci and Tulingi their Neighbours to joyn with them in the Expedition. Moreover what he writes concerning the Rhone being fordable near to its paſſage out of the Lake Lemanus, will not eaſily go down with any that are acquainted with thoſe places. But to proceed.

They ſend to Cæſar to deſire a paſſage.

He denies them.

12. Cæſar having notice of the deſign of the Helvetians poſted from Rome into Gall, and came to Geneva, where he brake down the Bridge, and raiſed Forts throughout the Province, there being but one Legion in thoſe parts. They having intelligence of his Arrival ſent their Ambaſſadors, the choiceſt of their Nobility, to deſire his permiſſion to paſs peaceably through the Province, having no other way to go. But he remembring how L. Caſſius the Conſul was ſlain, his Army defeated, and his Soldiers put under the Yoke, thought it not fit to grant their requeſt; for he did not think that men ſo ill affected would forbear to offer wrongs and injuries, if permitted. However for the better gaining of time, and raiſing ſufficient Forces, he took ſpace to deliberate till the Ides of April. And in the mean time with that Legion he had ready, and the Soldiers that came out of the Province, he made a Ditch and a Wall of ſixteen foot in height from the Lake Lemanus that runneth into the Rhone, to the Hill Jura, which divideth the Sequani from the Helvetians, being in length nineteen miles. The work being perfected, he diſpoſed Gariſons, and fortified Caſtles to hinder them if they went about to break out by force. At the day appointed for return of the Ambaſſadors he utterly denied to give any leave to paſs through the Province, as having neither Cuſtom nor Precedent from the People of Rome to warrant him in that kind. And if by force of Armes they would indeavour it, he ſaid he ſhould uſe his endeavour to oppoſe them. Here again Monetus asks the queſtion what need there was of ſo long a Wall and Ditch, ſeeing that Cæſar a little before had ſaid, that this Paſſage was ſo ſtraight that a ſingle Cart could ſcarcely get through it? Was it for that he would draw this Fortification from the Bank of the Lake toward the inward Champion of the Latobrigi, the better to keep off the Helvetians from paſſing the Fords of the Rhone, and from the Town of Geneva? But a little after Cæſar ſhall confeſs openly that the Helvetians entred theſe Fords, and yet broke not through his Fortifications; and when he ſo writes will manifeſtly contradict himſelf. Let us hear it as it comes in order.

They attempt a paſſage in vain.

13. The Helvetians fruſtrated of their former hope, went about, ſome with Boats joyned together, others with Flats whereof they made ſtore, and the reſt by Fords where the River was ſhallow, ſometimes in the day and oftentimes by night, to break out; but being beaten back by the help of the Fortification, the concourſe of Soldiers and multitude of Weapons, deſiſted from that attempt. Now, ſaith Monetus, the Northern Bank of the Lake Lemanus, and the declining Horn of the Mountain Jura, by this their vicinity make that Region of the Latobrigi, whom Cæſar not rightly calleth Helvetians, of the form of a Wedge, through which the Wall that was nineteen miles in length muſt be drawn in a tranſverſe line, at diſtance from the ſtraights of the ſaid Wedge, and the Rhone at that place iſſuing out of the Lake Lemanus, from the Mountain Jura to Lemanus, towards the inward Regions of the Latobrigi; that by that Fortification the Helvetians might be excluded from that other way that lay to the Sequani, more remote from the ſtraights of that way. But beyond that Wall fortified with a Ditch on this ſide at a longer diſtance the Weſtern Head of Lemanus was left, and from that Head the Rhone iſſueth forth, which being ſo, let us ſee, ſaith he, how little conſiſtent Cæſar is with himſelf, who muſt neceſſarily be ſaid to have ſpoken contradictions, or elſe at that time the ſite of Jura, Lemanus and the Rhone were otherwiſe than now, although he repreſents it the ſame as at this day is found. For, if when the Helvetians vetians indeavoured to gain the Bank of the Rhone, they were prevented by a Ditch and a Wall lying ſo far before it, and yet this Fortification was not broken thorough by them, (the Legions driving them back from it.) then muſt the Helvetians by flying in the Air or by paſſages under ground, have got to the Rhone ſo fortified, and attempted their paſſage by Boats joyned together, the Romans being utterly ignorant which way they came. But if that Fortification of Cæſar was on this ſide the Paſſage of the Rhone, from the Lake, and conſequently on this ſide the whole Bank of that Lake, why is it ſaid that a Wall was raiſed from Lemanus as far as the Mountain Jura? And why ſo long a Wall in ſo ſtraight a Paſſage, that a ſingle Cart could ſcarcely paſs through it? Then with what prudence could Cæſar raiſe a Wall of Stone on this ſide, and not beyond the River, of which he deſired to have the Command, and ſo might, his deſign being aſſiſted by the great convenience of the ſoil?

14. There was only another way left (Cæſar proceedeth) through the Sequani, which they could not paſs, it was ſo narrow, but by the favour of the Country. They themſelves could little prevail as to that matter, and therefore they ſent to Dumnorix an Æduan to deſire his mediation, who having married the Daughter of Orgetorix an Helvetian, being of good authority in his Country, and ambitious of Dominion, undertook the buſineſs and procured them leave to paſs, each Nation giving the other pledges, that the Sequavi ſhould not interrupt the Helvetians in their Journey, nor they offer any injury to the Country. Cæſar now having intelligence that they would paſs through the Territories of the Sequani and Ædui on the Confines of the Santones, who were not far diſtant from the borders of the Tholoſans, a People of the Province, and knowing how ill the conſequences might be, left T. Labienus his Lieutenant to defend the Fortifications and poſted into Italy, where he raiſed two Legions and took three more out of their Winter quarters, near to Aquileia, with which five Legions he haſted back again into Gall, and though oppoſed in his return by certain Nations, got into the Country of the Allobroges, and ſo into that of the Sabuſians that were the firſt beyond the Rhone, bordering upon the Province. By this time the Helvetians having paſſed the Straights and Frontiers of the Sequani, waſted the Country of the Ædui, who thereupon ſent and complained to Cæſar, as alſo did the Arabarri, who had alliance and dependency with the Ædui. In like manner did the Allobroges quit their farms and poſſeſſions beyond the Rhone, and fled to him, complaining they had nothing left but the ſoile of the Country. Cæſar therefore ſeeing it was not convenient to linger any further, till the Allies of Rome were ſpoiled of their fortunes and ſtrength, and the Helvetians were come to the Santones, when he heard that they were to paſs the Arar (Soane) runing through the Confines of the Ædui and Sequani, about the third Watch of the Night he fell upon them with three Legions, and ſurprized part of them, which had by the aſſiſtance of Flats and bridges made of Boats got over; ſlew many of them, and the reſt eſcaped to the woods. Of the four Cantons into which the Helvetians were diſtinguiſhed, this was the Tigurine (of Zurick) which Canton alone had formerly ſlain L. Caſſius the Conſul, and put his Army under the yoak. But now Cæſar took revenge not only for the publick, but his particular loſs, for in that battel with Caſſius they ſlew alſo L. Piſo the Grand-Father of L. Piſo his Father in Law.

They are defeated by Cæſar.

15. Now as Cæſar purſued the Helvetians, ſo Monetus purſues him. Here he ſaith he layes down two things that look little like truth, whereof one is that leave was obtained for the Helvetians to paſs through the Country of the Sequani by the mediation of Dumnorix the Æduan; the other is the ſtory of their paſſage through the inward Territories of the Sequani; not by the outward ſtraights of the Mountain Jura, and the Rhone which they neither paſſed by Fords nor Boats. The firſt he ſaith, he ſhall never perſwade a prudent man to believe. For it was not in the power of the Sequani to grant them leave, who were then after a ſervile manner oppreſſed by Arioviſtus, a moſt proud German King, who would never have ſuffered the Armed Helvetians, a moſt numerous and fierce People to have paſſage throgh his Dominions. To obtain this leave, the Addreſs was not to be made to the Sequani, who had no power over their Countries, or themſelves in their own hands, but to Arioviſtus, from whom there could be no hope, that leave ſhould be obtained. But of this fiction convenient for the time, Cæſar ſerved himſelf, to prevent the diſgrace that muſt fall upon him and his men, the Helvetians having broken through his fortifications, during his abſence in Italy. For its both falſe and fabulous to believe that they paſſed through the Straits of Jura to Pons Ælius, and Veſontio, without acquainting Arioviſtus, and that the Sequani durſt attempt it, or could obtain leave. But Cæſar was aſhamed to acknowledge that the Helvetians in his abſence broke through his Trenches, and thence conceived great hatred againſt them, and to be revenged, obſtinately purſued them which way ſoever they turned from him, and the Roman Province through the Territories of the Ædui. Two things perſwade that they paſſed between Jura and the Rhone. They would not venture to provoke Arioviſtus, nor endanger being ſtopped by him in their Journey. And the way by the Rhone was better and ſhorter, and one only Legion at the Wall, eſpecially in the abſence of Cæſar, could not hinder their paſſage. Their paſſage through theſe Straits is atteſted by their waſting of the Territories of the Sebuſiani, Ambarri, Ædui; and the complaints thereof made to Cæſar, but no devaſtation made in the borders of the Sequani. But for certain Reaſons he adds moſt things are otherwiſe written by Cæſar than indeed they were, of which we ſhall admoniſh the Reader in our Commentations, as fit occaſion preſents it ſelf. So bold is Monetus, and bold he is indeed as well in his own aſſertions as refuting what hath been written by others. It were well if he were as perſpicuous.

16. Cæſar after this overthrow, paſſed the River Arar and carryed over his Army, to purſue the reſt of the Helvetian Army. They much daunted at his ſudden coming, ſent their Ambaſſadors (for he had got over the River in one day which they could ſcarcely paſs in twenty) who yet, as the cuſtom is, were not wanting to urge all the Conveniences on theirs, and all the inconveniences on the other ſide. Cæſar made anſwer ſuitable to the ſtate of his Affairs, and Divico chief of the Ambaſſadors replyed with ſo little ſatisfaction, that the next day they removed their Camp, and ſo alſo did Cæſar. But he ſent all his Horſe before, to the number of four thouſand, which he had raiſed in the Province, and drawn from the Ædui and their Aſſociates. This was to eſpy which way the Enemy took, and they falling in upon the Reere, were forced to ingage with the Cavalry of the Helvetians in a diſadvantagious place, and thereby loſt ſome few of their Company. With this ſucceſs they were elevated, and thereupon ſeveral times made Sallies. But Cæſar kept back his men, judging it enough for the preſent to keep the Enemy from harrying and ſpoiling the Country, and for fifteen dayes ordered his march in ſuch a manner, that there were not above five or ſix miles betwixt his Army and the Reere of theirs. In the mean time Cæſar finding no forage, preſſed the Ædui daily to bring in Corn, according to their promiſe; for, the River Arar ſtood him in ſmall ſtead at that time, by reaſon that the Helvetians had taken their Journey, clear from the River, and he would by no means forſake them. But the Ædui delayed to bring any in, and thereupon Cæſar called to him beſides others, their chief Magiſtrates (who had the Name of Vergobret and power of life and death over their Subjects) for this year Divitiacus and Liſcus, whom he blamed exceedingly for not ſupplying him in ſuch a place and condition, where he could have none elſe, and when for their ſake, and at their requeſt he had undertaken the War.

17. Liſcus gave out ſuch words as hinted that Dumorix the Brother of Divitiacus, though a private perſon, had more Authority with the People, than they the Magiſtrates, and having ambitious deſigns was a great Enemy to the Romans. Cæſar in the Aſſembly would not make any inquiry, but privately got the whole matter out of him; how by keeping Taxes low he had obtained his wealth and Authority at home, and by Marriages Contracted friendſhip with other Nations. How he wiſhed well to the Helvetians, but hated the Romans, and eſpecially Cæſar, becauſe that by their coming into Gall, his power was weakned, and Divitiacus his Brother reſtored to his antient Honour and Dignity. Beſides this it was found that the route of Cæſars Horſe came by his means, for he commanded the Troops which the Ædui ſent to his Aſſiſtance, and from their diſorder the reſt of the Cavalry took the fright. He had a great mind to puniſh him, but durſt not do it without acquainting his Brother, who upon breaking it to him, burſt out into tears, imbraced Cæſar, and though he had deviſed the ruine of him as well as of the Romans, yet he obtained that he ſhould be ſpared as well for Brotherly affection, as for avoiding a general alienation and diſtaſt of Gall. Cæſar now having intelligence that the Helvetians were lodged under an Hill, ſent a party to get poſſeſſion of the Top; but by the Cowardiſe of P. Cauſidius, one who had been counted a great Souldier in the Army of L. Sylla, and afterwards with M. Craſſus, was prevented of his purpoſe. He commanding the Diſcoverers his fear cauſed him to imagine that the Helvetians were poſſeſſed of the Top, and ſo acquainted Cæſar; whereas Labienus who was ſent for that purpoſe, had gained it, and in vain expected Cæſar to come and aſſiſt him, according as they had agreed. The Enemy being diſlodged, Cæſar followed and incamped within three miles of him; the day following the Army being to be paid in Corn. Two dayes after being but eighteen miles diſtant from Bribracte (the ſame with Auguſtodunum, Auguſta Julia Æduorum, Flavia, Florentia and Pollia, now Autun in the Duchy of Burgundy) a great and opulent City of the Ædui, he turned aſide from the Helvetians and made towards it.

Cæſar marcheth toward Bibracte.

18. Hereupon the Helvetians turned back, and fell upon the Romans in their Reer, which Cæſar perceiving, drew his Forces to the next Hill, and ſent his Horſe to ſuſtain the charge of the Enemy. In the middle of the Hill he made a triple Battel of four Legions of old Souldiers. Upon the higheſt ridge he placed two other Legions newly raiſed, together with the Aſſociate Forces. The whole Front of the Hill he filled with men, and beſtowed the Carriages ſo as to be guarded by the uppermoſt Battalions. The Helvetians alſo placed their Carriages for beſt ſecurity, and having beaten back Cæſars Horſe with a thick thronged Squadron, put themſelves into a Phalanx, and preſſed under the firſt Battel of the Legions. To take away all hope of flight, he ſent away firſt his own Horſes and then the reſt, and after ſome incouraging words, began the Battel. His Souldiers with the advantage of the Hill, by their Piles, eaſily brake the Phalanx, and then with their Swords came to a furious cloſe. The Piles of the Romans falling on the Targets of the Galls, ſtruck them through and joyned them together, ſo that they were glad to caſt them away, and retreat to an Hill a mile off. Thither they were purſued, and a furious charge was made on both ſides, not one man being ſound to have turned his Back, although the fight continued from one a clock, till the Evening. And it was kept ſtill on Foot, at the Carriages of the Helvetians, till it was far in the Night, and then after a long Conflict the Baggage was taken together with their Camp, and therein a Son and a Daughter of Orgetorix. About one hundred and thirty thouſand perſons were ſaved out of the Battel, who, marching all the Night, came the fourth day into the Confines of the Lingones; there being no purſuit made after them, by reaſon of the wounds of the Souldiers, and the burial of the ſlain wherein three dayes were ſpent.

Gives the Helvetians a great Overthrow.

19. Cæſar ſent to the Lingones (les Langrois) forbidding they ſhould ſupply them with any ſort of neceſſaries, or he would eſteem of them as of the Helvetians themſelves, and after three dayes followed with all his Forces. The Helvetians ſeeing in what condition they were, ſent to treat of their rendition, and then were commanded to come up to that place, and there attend his pleaſure. He required their Arms, their Servants, and Hoſtages to be delivered up, as alſo the fugitives. But while theſe things were performing, about ſix thouſand men of the Canton called Verbigene, either out of deſpair of Life, or hoping to eſcape in ſuch a multitude, in the beginning of the Night, left the Helvetian Camp, and made towards the Rhine, and the German Confines. Cæſar commanded thoſe through whoſe Territories they paſſed to bring them out, as they alſo tendered his diſpleaſure, and being brought back, dealt with them as Enemies. All the reſt, the conditions performed, he received to mercy, and commanded then the Tulingi and Latobrigi to return into their Countries. He ordered the Allobroges to ſupply them with Corn, and willed the Helvetians to reedifie their Cities and Towns, that the Germans, invited by the richneſs of the ſoil, might not remove thither and become near Neighbours to the Province of Gall and the Allobroges. The Ædui deſired that they might take the Boij, knowing them to be men of great Valour, to dwell in their Country, and he permitting it, they gave them lands, and the ſame liberties and privileges as they themſelves injoyed.

Who yield themſelves.

20. In the Helvetian Camp was found a Liſt or Regiſter written in Greek, Containing by Pole the whole Number that left their Country; how many of them were able to bear Arms, and the Boyes, Old Men and Women were alſo inrolled by themſelves. The Summary whereof was, that the whole Number of the Helvetians amounted to two hundred ſixty and three thouſand; of the Tulingi to thirty ſix thouſand, the Latobrigi to fourteen; the Rauraci to twenty three, and the Boij to thirty two. Of theſe there were that bare Armes ninety two thouſand, and the Total of all was three hundred and ſixty eight thouſand. A view being taken by Cæſars appointment of thoſe that returned home, there were found one hundred and ten thouſand perſons. So many Cæſar ſaith he found, which if ſo Monetus finds fault both with his Narrative and his Cruelty. Its certain, he writes, both from Cæſar and others, that from the Mountain Jura to the Rauraci on this ſide the Rhine, is the longeſt extent of the Helvetian Borders, which yet is not an Interval of thirty French Leagues, or ſixty Roman Miles; and as for the breadth, their Territories were much more Contracted where moſt large. Whence neceſſarily either Cæſar or his Books have been abuſed, and whence alſo it may be gathered, that two hundred and ſixty three thouſand Souls could hardly proceed out of ſo ſmall a Country. And whereas he writes that after the Battel of the three hundred and ſixty thouſand Helvetians and Aſſociates, only one hundred and thirty thouſand perſons remained, it follows that the Number of the Armed men being but ninety two thouſand, there muſt have been killed by him almoſt two hundred thouſand perſons that were weak, helpleſs or unfit for War. By this he muſt have procured great Infamy for his Cruelty, or elſe there is a great miſtake and error Committed by him in his Account, or by the Tranſcribers of his Copies.

The Eſtates of Gall open to him the condition thereof.

21. But the Eſtates of Gall, he ſaith, Congratulated his victory, and procuring leave to call an Aſſembly, after they had conſulted together deſired ſecrecy, and by their Deputies revealed to him their grief. Divitiacus the Æduan told him, that Gall was divided into two Factions; that the Ædui were the Head of the one, and the Arverni of the other, each contending many years for the Principality. The Arverni with the Sequani their Clients hired the Germans to take their Part, of whom one hundred and twenty thouſand had paſſed the Rhine, with that ſucceſs that the Ædui oppoſing them received an utter overthrow, both of Nobility and Senate. With theſe loſſes they were ſo broken, that having formerly ſtruck a great ſtroke throughout Gall, they were now forced to deliver up the chiefeſt of their State to the Sequani, and to bind themſelves by Oath never to ſeek their releaſe or freedom, nor the aid of the People of Rome, nor uſe means to free themſelves from their Soveraignty. Only he himſelf refuſed to take the Oath, and give up his Children, but fled to Rome and craved aid of the Senate. Yet for all this, the victory became more grievous to the Sequani than to the Ædui; for Arioviſtus King of the Germans was planted in their Territories, and being already poſſeſſed of a third part of their Country (the beſt part of Gall) now required them to forgoe another third part, for twenty four thouſand Harudes, who being lately come over to him, Lands and Poſſeſſions were now to be allotted them. By this means it would come to paſs in ſhort time that all the Galls would be driven out by the Germans, who were allured by the goodneſs of the Country, betwixt which and theirs there was no compariſon. Arioviſtus having once defeated the Galls in Battel proved a cruel Tyrant, whom they could not bear, but muſt forſake their Habitations, as the Helvetians did, if Cæſar and the People of Rome by their Authority or Arms afforded them no relief, and hindred not the Germans from tranſporting any more Colonies into Gall. But if Arioviſtus ſhould know any thing of this Complaint, he would rage cruelly againſt them, eſpecially the Sequani, who were in his Power.

He undertakes their quarrel againſt Arioviſtus the German King.

22. Cæſar diſmiſſed them with good words, and concluding that it was neither honourable nor ſafe for the People of Rome to have ſuch troubleſom Neighbours as the Germans, and eſteeming the inſolency of Arioviſtus intolerable, reſolved to prevent ſuch miſchief with all ſpeed. He ſent to him to appoint ſome indifferent place for a Parly about ſome publick affairs which nearly concerned them both. To this he anſwered, that had his occaſions required Cæſars aſſiſtance, he would have farthered them with his own preſence, and he thought it as reaſonable, that if it were in his power to pleaſure the Romans, Cæſar ought not to think much of the like labour. He ſaid plainly he durſt not come into thoſe parts of Gall which were in Cæſars Hands, without an Army; and that an Army was not to be drawn up without much trouble and expence. The thing he moſt wondered at was, that Cæſar had to do in that part of Gall which the Law of Armes had made his Inheritance. Now the Reader muſt know, that in Cæſars Conſulſhip the People of Rome had vouchſafed to eſteem of Arioviſtus as a King in his Dominions and as of a Friend to their Commonwealth. Cæſar therefore returned, that for as much as he ſo requited the honour done to him by the State and himſelf, he would let him know that he required, that he ſhould not tranſport any more Troops of Germans over the Rhine into Gall. In the next place, that he ſhould deliver up the Hoſtages of the Ædui, and ſuffer the Sequani to do the like, and ceaſe all Hoſtilities againſt the Ædui, and their Aſſociates; if not, he would not neglect the injuries done to them, being injoyned by the Senate to take care of their Friends and Confederates. Arioviſtus replied, that the Law of Nations allowed a Conqueror to rule a conquered Nation as he pleaſed. That the People of Rome thought fit to order their matters as they themſelves pleaſed; and why ſhould they direct him more than he did them. That Cæſar had much wronged him, in that his coming thither had made the Tribute of the Ædui much leſs than formerly. That he would ſtill retain their Hoſtages: That he would make no unjuſt War upon them or their Aſſociates, but if they failed of their Tribute, the Society of the Romans would come too late. In concluſion, that no man ever contended with him but to his own deſtruction. And try when he would, he ſhould find the Germans invincible and moſt exerciſed in Armes, having for fourteen years had no Houſe over their Heads.

Arioviſtus his Anſwer to Cæſar's demands.

Cæſar's men affrighted at the Report concerning the Germans.

23. At the ſame time Ambaſſadors from the Ædui complained, that the Harudes, lately tranſported into Gall, waſted their Borders, and that though they gave up Hoſtages they could not buy their Peace of Arioviſtus. And others from the Treviri brought News of an hundred Townſhips of the Suevi that were come to the Rhine to ſeek a paſſage into Gall, under the conduct of Naſna and Cimberius two Brothers. Hereupon Cæſar reſolved to uſe all expedition to prevent the conjunction of the Suevi with Arioviſtus, who, he underſtood, after three days journey, was with all his Force gone to take in Veſontio, the ſtrongeſt Town of the Sequani. Knowing the place to be well provided, and ſo fitted that he that Commanded it might prolong the War at his pleaſure, he prevented him by taking the Town and therein left a Gariſon. There as he reſted a few days to furniſh himſelf with Corn and other neceſſaries, the Romans enquiring of the Galls and Merchants concerning the Germans, received ſuch an account concerning their Stature, their Courage and their Experience in War, that they were ſeized with a wonderful fear and conſternation. From the Tribunes and Commanders of Horſe and ſuch as for friendſhip followed him from Rome, and had ſmall or no skill in War, it proceeded even to the old experienced Soldiers. And many ſtuck not to tell Cæſar that whenſoever he ſhould give Command to march and advance the Standards, the Soldiers would refuſe to do it.

He Reproves them at a Council of War.

24. Upon this Cæſar called a Counſel of War, and admitting all Centurions of what degrees ſoever to it, exceedingly blamed them for this their fear. He ſhewed how vain it was from former experience, when the Cimbri and Tentoni were vanquiſhed by Marius, and in the late ſervile Tumult in Italy, though then they were not a little aſſiſted by what they had learnt of the Romans; and from what had been done againſt them by the Helvetians, who had had the better of them in divers conflicts in their own Country, and at their own dores, as well as in Gall, though the Helvetians were not able to contend with the Romans. Indeed they had beaten the Galls, but theſe had been wearied with continual Wars, and ſurprized when diſperſed; and Arioviſtus muſt not think to inſnare the Roman Armies with the like ſubtilties. He told them that ſuch as pretended the want of Corn and dangerouſneſs of the ways, ſeemed arrogant and to direct their General; that the Sequani and Lingones had undertaken that charge, and Corn was now ripe every where in the Fields. He ſhewed they had no reaſon to diſobey his Orders; for he was neither Unfortunate nor Covetous, as his ſucceſs againſt the Helvetians and the whole courſe of his Life could ſhew, and therefore he was reſolved to diſlodge by the fourth watch of the Night, though it were with the tenth Legion alone as a guard, of which he had no doubt or ſuſpition, having chiefly cheriſhed and put moſt truſt in it, and that deſervedly for their Valour. The effect of this was, that the tenth Legion gave him thanks for his good opinion, and aſſured him of their readineſs; and then the reſt made means by the Tribunes and Centurions of the firſt Rancks to give him ſatisfaction. This being taken, and Divitiacus having upon viewing the ways reported, that in fetching a compaſs of fifty miles he might carry the Army through open and Champion Countries (for the Soldiers were frighted at the Woods) in the fourth Watch of the Night, according to his former ſaying, he diſlodged.

25. Continuing his March, the ſeventh day he received a Meſſage from Arioviſtus lying but twenty four miles off the place, that now being out of danger he was content to treat, and Cæſar refuſed not the offer. The fifth day following was appointed for the Parly, but Arioviſtus refuſed to meet if any Foot-men came, admitting only of Horſe to attend each Party. Cæſar not willing to break upon this account, reſolved to ſet on Horſes the tenth Legion which he could moſt truſt. The Legion he placed two hundred paces from a Mount on which they were to meet, and the Horſe of Arioviſtus ſtood at the ſame diſtance; and according

He and Arioviſtus parly, ing to his deſire they brought ten Perſons each along with them, and diſcourſed on Horſe-back. Cæſar began,by ſhewing him the unuſual favour conferred on him by the Romans through his means. He declared how of a long time they had had Friendſhip and Alliance with the Ædui, who long before that had held the Principality of Gall. That they were kind to, and cheriſhed their Allies, and therefore could not permit that to be forced from them, which when they entred into a League with the Romans they quietly poſſeſſed; and then he required the ſame things he had formerly done by his Meſſengers. Arioviſtus made little anſwer to Cæſar's demands but ſpake much of his own vertues and valour. He laid the blame of his Actions upon the Galls themſelves, who had incited him and provoked him to their own loſs. He affirmed that he was ſeated in Gall before the Romans came thither. That that part of it was his Province, in which they ought to give him no diſturbance, no more than he gave them in theirs. If his Tributaries would pay their Arrears they ſhould have Peace, if not, he regarded little that they had the Romans for their Friends. If Cæſar would not be gone out of the Country, he ſhould take him for an Enemy. And if he killed him he ſhould perform a very acceptable ſervice to many great men at Rome, as he well underſtood by Letters and Meſſages received from them. If he would depart and leave him the poſſeſſion of Gall he would well reward him; and what War ſoever he would have undertaken, ſhould be proſecuted without either his peril or charge.

To no purpoſe.

26. Cæſar replied as to many things, and ſhewed that he could not deſiſt from the courſe he had taken; which while he was doing, he was told that Arioviſtus his Horſe approached nearer the Mount, and aſſaulted his men with ſtones and other weapons. Hereupon he brake off the Parly, but forbore to charge the Germans, leſt it ſhould be ſaid that under pretence of an enterview he had intrapped them: But the Army upon hearing how Arioviſtus and his men demeaned themſelves, were more provoked to fight. Arioviſtus two days after ſent to Cæſar to give him another meeting, or that he would ſend him Commiſſioners to treat concerning thoſe things that were left imperfect. This later Cæſar refuſed not to do; but as ſoon as Arioviſtus ſaw the Meſſengers, he asked wherefore they came thither, and whether they were not ſent as Spies, and he commanded them to be put in Irons. Then did he remove and get two miles beyond Cæſar, and there he incamped himſelf to cut off all Proviſions that might be ſent to the Romans from the Ædui and Sequani.Cæſar for five days together ſtood prepared to give him Battel if he ſhould offer it. But he kept his Army within his Camp, and daily ſent out his Horſe to skirmiſh with the Romans. The Germans were wont to exerciſe themſelves with this manner of fighting. They had ſix thouſand Horſe-men, and as many ſtrong and nimble Foot,whom the Horſe-men ſelected out of of the whole Army, every man one for his defence; theſe they had with them in Battel, and unto them they reſorted for ſuccour. If the Horſemen were overcharged, theſe ever ſtept in to help them. If any was wounded or unhorſed they came about him and relieved him. If the caſe required that they ſhould either haſt forward or ſpeedily retire, their continual exerciſe had brought them to that ſwiftneſs, that hanging on the Mane they would keep pace even with the Horſes.

27. Cæſar to prevent the deſign of Arioviſtus of intercepting entercourſe betwixt him and his Friends, drew out his men in three Bodies,and with one of them, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition the Germans could make, fortified a ſecond Camp about five hundred paces beyond them. Arioviſtus attacqued this ſecond leſſer Camp to no purpoſe, but would not bring out his Army to a battel becauſe they had a cuſtom, that the Women by caſting of Lots and South-ſaying ſhould declare whether it was good for them to fight or not; and they found by their Art that they could not get the victory, if they fought before the New-moon. The next day Cæſar, to make a ſhew, becauſe his Legionary Soldiers were few in compariſon of the Germans, placed all his Auxiliaries before the leſſer Camp, and putting his Legions in a triple Battle, marched and provoked the Germans to fight. They ſet every Tribe and People by themſelves in like diſtance and order of Battle. There were the Harudes, Marcomanni, Tribocei, Vangiones, Nemetes, Seduſii and Suevi; and they invironed their whole Army with Carts and Cariages, that there might be no hope of flight. And in them they placed the Women, that by their Tears and Hands ſtretched out they might move the Soldiers ſo to demean themſelves, that they might not be brought into the thraldom dom of the Romans. Cæſar aſſigned to every Legion a Legatus and a Quæſtor, that every man might have a witneſs of his valour; and perceiving where the Germans were weakeſt, he began the Battel from the Right Wing.

Cæſar gives him a great overthrow.

28. The Romans charged fiercely, and the Germans came on ſo ſpeedily, that the Legions had no leiſure to caſt their Piles, but betook themſelves to their Swords, which the Germans received according to their manner in the form of a Phalanx. But many Legionary Soldiers were obſerved to leap upon the Phalanx, to pull up the Targets that covered it, and to wound and kill thoſe that were underneath. The left Wing of the Germans was overthrown and put to flight; but in the mean time the left of the Romans was overcharged with an unequal number. This being perceived by P. Craſſus a young man who commanded the Horſe, he ſent the third Battalion to releive their fellows; by means whereof the fight was renewed and the Enemy was put to flight, and never looked back till they came to the Rhine about fifty miles off, which ſome paſſed by Swimming and by Boats, and the reſt were killed by the Horſemen. Arioviſtus lighting upon a Bark tyed to the ſhore recovered the other ſide, but both his Wives periſhed, and of his two Daughters the one was ſlain and the other taken. Cæſar in the purſuit recovered his two Meſſengers he had ſent to him. The noiſe of the ſucceſs drove back the Suevi that were come to the Banks of the Rhine, whom the Inhabitants of that Quarter finding terrified, ſtreight purſued, and ſlew a great number of them. Cæſar having thus ended two great Wars in one Summer, brought his Army into their wintring Camps in the Country of the Sequani ſomewhat ſooner than the year required, and leaving Labienus to command them went into the hither Gall (as the Romans called it) to hold the publick Aſſemblies. And thus with this war he concludes the firſt Book of his Commentaries, having done theſe things in the Conſulſhip of his two Creatures, Piſo and Gabinius.

Cæſar de Bello Gallico lib. 2.

The Belgæ whence deſcended.

29. While he was yet in his Winter Quarters, he was continually alarmed with news of the motions of the Belgæ, who were the third part of the further Gall. They were, he ſaith, deſcended from the Germans, who paſſing over the Rhine time out of mind, and finding the Country very fertile drove away the Galls, and ſeated themſelves in their poſſeſſions. They alone kept the Cimbri and Teutoni from entring into their Country, and thereupon they challenged Authority, and boaſted much of their feats of Armes. Upon notice of Cæſars ſucceſs they thought themſelves in danger as well as their Neighbours, and being excited and incouraged by ſome of them, thought themſelves highly concerned to give ſome ſtop to that progreſs the Roman power had made in Gall. Cæſar upon notice raiſed two Legions, and when Summer came on ſending them away by Q. Pedius his Legate, followed himſelf as ſoon as there was forage for the Army. Within fifteen days he came to the Borders of the Belgæ, which being unexpected, the Rhemi who lay next to Gall (Celtick he means) ſubmitted themſelves and all they had to the Roman Empire, affirming they were innocent as to the Conſpiracy of the reſt of the Belgæ. Of them the Bellovaci (les Beauvaſois) exceeded all others, in power, authority and numbers, being able to make an hundred thouſand fighting men, out of which they promiſed ſixty thouſand to this undertaking, and in that reſpect they demanded the Adminiſtration of the whole War. Here again Monetus is difficult of belief, though a Jeſuit, affirming that if Cæſar (or the Embaſſadors of the Rhemi, he ſhould have ſaid, if from them he had his information) ſaid true, they muſt have had vaſt Territories which could afford an hundred thouſand fighting men, and indeed far larger than he can find in his Geography. But he ſaith Cæſar himſelf puts him out of belief of it, who makes none of the neighbour States to be their Clients, but ſets them down as Clients of the Ædui. He affirms that Cæſar is wont to increaſe the Power of certain Nations above meaſure, to make way for his own glory, which would receive augmentation from ſo valiant and warlike People being vanquiſhed by one or two Battels. Yet he denies not but that the Bellovaci were always moſt famous amongſt the Belgæ, of which there ſtill remain eminent evidences in the ſingular priviledges of their chief Town, which now is Beavois.

A Conſpiracy of them and other Nations.

30. Next to them lay the Sueſſones (Les Soiſſonois) Inhabitants of a large and fruitful Country, whoſe King Divitiacus had lately poſſeſſed a great part of theſe Territories and alſo of Britain, and was the moſt powerful King within Gall. At preſent Galba was their King, and on him, for his Juſtice and Prudence, they una-nimouſly

Sect. 6. nimouſly beſtowed the management of the War; they had twelve Walled Towns, and promiſed to ſet forth fifty thouſand men. The Nervii (the People of the Territory now called Henalt by the French from the River Hene) who were moſt barbarous amongſt them all, and dwelt fartheſt off promiſed as many. The Atrebatii (the People of Artois) fifteen thouſand. The Ambiani (the People of the Territory of Amiens) ten thouſand. The Vellocaſſii or Veneliocaſſii (inhabiting the Territory of Rouen) and the Veromandui (the People of Vermandois) as many. The Morini (Bolenois, Guinois, Oiſiens maritime & de terre-ferme) five and twenty thouſand. The Menapii (Gueldrois, Clevois & Juliers) nine Thouſand. The Caletes (Les Cauchois, le peuple de Caux) ten thouſand. The Aduatici twenty nine thouſand. The Eburoni (Les Liegeois) Condruſi (le peuple des Ardenes) and others called Germans forty thouſand, as was reported. Cæſar received Hoſtages from the Remi, and after that to provide againſt the multitudes of the Enemy, he perſwaded Divitiacus the Æduan to enter the Territories of the Bellovaci and waſte them, thereby to divert them and hinder the Confederates from uniting in one Army. And to ſecure himſelf againſt their great valour, as it was repreſented to him, he reſolved not to be too haſty in giving them battle; but firſt by skirmiſhing with his Horſe to try what they could, and what his own men durſt do.

They aſſemble together.

31. But finding them all aſſembled together, and at no great diſtance, he haſted and paſſed over the River Axona (Aine) which parted the Rhemi from the other Belgæ, and there incamped. No Enemy here could come on his Back, and he might receive Proviſions from Rheimes and other Cities; but that he might command the paſſage back he fortified a Bridge, and cauſed Titurius Sabinus, a Legate; to intrench himſelf ſtrongly on the other ſide. The Belgæ in their way indeavoured to take in Bibrax (Beurai en Retelois) a Town of the Rhemi, and had done it, but that upon notice given by the Governor, Cæſar ſent him ſpeedy relief. Diſappointed here they then made towards Cæſar, who finding his own men no whit inferior to them, by ſeveral skirmiſhes drew them out, placed himſelf conveniently for a Battel on a riſing ground, and leſt the Enemy ſhould by their multitudes incompaſs him, he drew a Ditch behind his Army from one ſide of the Hill to another, ſix hundred paces in length, the ends of which he fortified with Bulworks, and therein placed ſtore of Engines. There was a little Mariſh betwixt the Armies which neither party would adventure to paſs over to the other, but skirmiſhes were maintained betwixt the Horſe, in which Cæſar having the advantage thought it ſufficient, and ſo retired to his Camp. The Belgæ immediately took the way to the River Axona, either to break the Bridge, take the Fort held by Titurius, or cut off Proviſions from Cæſar; but Cæſar followed with a ſtrong party, and cutting off many of their men, hindered their deſign. In which being prevented, as alſo in their attempt upon Bibrax, when now their proviſions began to fail, they reſolved to break up and go to their ſeveral homes; where if he invaded any of them they could be ſupplied, though they intended to waſte the Country where-ever he came, and thither to haſte from all parts to give him battel, rather than in a ſtrange and unknown place. The Councel was the rather imbraced, for that the Bellovaci having intelligence that Divitiacus with a great power of the Ædui approached their Borders, haſted homeward to defend their Country.

They retreat.

32. In a tumultuous manner they returned, ſtriving who ſhould be gone firſt, ſo that Cæſar perceiving them to fly rather than retreat, at firſt ſuſpected ſome deſign, and conteined his Army within his Camp; but at length finding the truth he ſent ſome Parties after, who made great ſlaughter of them as they fled, ſo long as the light continued. The day following he ſtill gave the chaſe that they might not have time to take breath, and led his Army into the Territories of the Sueſſones, wherein he came to Noviodunum, which he attempted to take by ſurprize; but in regard of the breadth of the Ditch, and the height of the Wall, was forced to beſiege it. Yet when the Inhabitants ſaw the Vineæ (little Hovels made for ſhelter of the Soldiers) the Mounts raiſed, and the Turrets built with ſuch expedition, afrighted at the greatneſs of the works, they deſired to yeild, and by mediation of the Remi obtained their ſuit. Having received beſides others, two Sons of King Galba for Hoſtages, he took the Sueſſones to mercy, and led his Army againſt the Bellovaci, who deſiring the ſame favour, with Hands ſtretched out according to their cuſtom, he granted it at the ſuit of Divitiacus; for he ſpake well of the Common People as drawn into the Confederacy by the Arts of their Nobility. But their State being populous and powerful more than others, he required five hundred Hoſtages, and marched into the Coaſt of the Ambiani, who without delay gave up themſelves and all they had into his Power.

33. But the Nervii that bordered upon them were another ſort of men. There was no recourſe of Merchants to them, neither did they ſuffer any Wine, or what elſe might tend to riot, to be brought into their Cauntry. They were a ſavage people and of great valour, often upbraiding the reſt of the Belgæ, for yielding their Necks to the Roman yoke, and openly affirming that they would neither ſend Ambaſſadors nor take peace upon any condition. They all aſſembled on the farther ſide of the River Sabis (Sambre) and there attended the coming of the Romans. With them were joyned the Atrobates and Veromandui, and they expected a Power from the Aduatici. Cæſar paſſing the River had ſome skirmiſhes with them, and indeavoured to fortifie himſelf; but they made ſuch ſudden onſets, and were ſo ſwift both in their coming and retiring, that they ſeemed, he ſaith, to be in and out of the Woods at the ſame time, and gave him no leiſure to prepare for a Battel by his wonted methods. He had all parts to play at one time; the Flag to be hung out to give warning, the Trumpet to be ſounded for the Charge, the Soldiers to be called from their work of Intrenchment; and ſuch as were gone to fetch Turf and Materials for the Rampire, to be ſent for, the Battel to be ordered, the Soldiers to be incouraged, and the Signet to be given; the moſt of which were cut off by ſhortneſs of time and aſſaults of the Enemy. But theſe things he tells us were ſupplied by the experience of his Soldiers, who could as well preſcribe to themſelves what was to be done as any Commander could teach them. And notwithſtanding Cæſar had given order to every Legate not to leave the work or forſake the Legions, till the Fortifications were perfected; yet in extremity of danger they exſpected no countermand, but ordered all things according to their own diſcretion.

34. Cæſar had time only to deſire the tenth Legion to remember their antient valour, and be couragious; and to give the ſign of Battel, the Enemy being within a weapons caſt. In the Fight, the Legions that ſtood in the Left Wing had the better at firſt, and put to flight their Enemies; but thoſe of the Right were ſorely diſtreſſed and diſordered, inſomuch that the Belgæ got into the Camp. The Enſigns were crouded together into one place; the Soldiers of the twelfth Legion were ſo thick thronged on an heap, that they hindered one another; all the Centurions of the fourth Cohort were ſlain, the Enſign-bearer killed, the Enſign taken, and the Centurions of the other Cohorts either ſlain or ſore wounded. Cæſar ſeeing them turn tail, and matters to be almoſt deſperate, took a Target from one of the hindmoſt Soldiers, and preſſing to the Front of the Battel, called the Centurions by name, and incouraging the reſt, commanded the Enſigns to be advanced toward the Enemy, and the Maniples to be inlarged, that they might with more facility uſe their Swords. By his preſence being incouraged, his men recovered themſelves, and he cauſed two Legions that were oppreſſed to joyn back to back, and thereby making two Fronts they ſecured each other. But the whole face of things was changed by the coming in of the tenth Legion, which T. Labienus, having won the Camp of the Nervii, ſent to the aſſiſtance of their fellows. Now the wounded men began to fight afreſh; the Horſe ſtrove with extraordinary valour to wipe away the diſhonour of their former flight; nay the Boyes and Scullions perceiving the Enemy amazed, ran upon them unarmed, not fearing their weapons.

35. Howbeit, as amazed as they were, they ſhewed ſuch manhood, that as the foremoſt were overthrown, the next in place beſtrid their Carcaſes; and fought upon them; and theſe being likewiſe overthrown, and their bodies heaped one upon another, they that remained poſſeſt themſelves of the mount of dead Carcaſes, as a place of advantage; thence threw their weapons, and intercepting the Piles returned them back to the Romans. But the Battel was however thus ended, and the Name and Nation of the Nervii was well nigh deſtroyed; of five hundred Senators, but three men being left, and of ſixty thouſand fighting men ſcarcely five hundred. The Elder ſort, with their Women and Children, being before conveyed into Iſlands and Bogs, Cæſar, upon their ſubmiſſion pardoned, granting them the free poſſeſſion of their Towns and Country, and Commanding their Neighbours not to offer them any wrong. The Aduatici being on their way to aſſiſt the Nervii, when they heard of the defeat of their Friends, returned, and put themſelves, and all they had into one Town, very ſtrong by its ſituation. They were diſcended from the Cimbri and Teutoni, who in their journy into Italy left ſuch Carriages as they could not conveniently take along with them on this ſide the Rhine, and ſix thouſand men to look to them. They after the death of their fellows were many years diſquieted by their Neighbours, and ſometimes invading their States, and ſometimes defending themſelves, at length procured peace, and choſe this place to ſettle themſelves in, which ſome think to have been about Doway or Bolduc in Brabant.

Cæſar overthroweth them.

36. Cæſar laying ſeige to the place, at firſt they deſpiſed him; and when they ſaw the Vines framed, the Mount raiſed, and a Tower built afar off they ſcoffed, and demanded with what hands and with what ſtrength, eſpecially by men of that ſtature (for the Romans were but little in reſpect of the Galls) a Tower of ſuch huge and maſſy weight ſhould be brought to do execution. But when they beheld the Tower removed, and approaching, they were aſtoniſhed, and ſent to treat with this complementing meſſage, that they believed the Romans did not make war without the ſpecial aſſiſtance of the Gods. They ſubmitted all they had to Cæſar's mercy, but deſired that their Arms might not be taken from them, for fear of their Neighbours. Yet he thought fit to require them, ſaying he would take the ſame care for them as he had done for the Nervii, that they ſhould not be moleſted. However when they gave up their weapons they concealed a third part, and in the Night, thinking to ſurprize the Fortification of the Romans, they ſet upon it, but were beaten back with the loſs of four thouſand. The next day Cæſar brake into the Town, and finding none make defence, he ſold all the People, with the Spoil, to the number of fifty three thouſand bondſlaves. At the ſame time P. Craſſus ſent him information, that the Veneti, Unelli, Oſiſmi, Curioſilitæ, Seſuvii, Aulerci and Rhedones, being maritime Cities that lay to the Ocean, had ſubmitted to the People of Rome. The fame of this Cæſars ſucceſs in Gall produced ſo great effects, that beyond the Rhine ſeveral Nations ſent and ſubmitted. But haſting into Italy he placed his Army in its Wintring Camp, and willed the Ambaſſadors to come to him in the beginning of the following Summer. The Winter Quarters he took up next to thoſe places where his Wars had been, amongſt the Carnutes, Andes and Turones. For his Atchievements, upon the ſight of his Letters, a ſupplication was decreed for fifteen days, which honour had formerly happened to no man.

Taketh the Town of the Advatici.

Cæſar de Bello Gallico, lib. 3.

37. Cæſar going into Italy, gave order to Ser. Galba, with the twelfth Legion and Part of the Horſe, to march into the Territories of the Nantuates, Veragri and Seduni, which extended from the Rhone and Lemanus, to the tops of the higheſt Alpe, to clear them from Theives and Robbers, who intercepted thoſe that trafficked that way. Two Cohorts of his Legion he placed amongſt the Nantuates, and with the other took up his Winter Quarters in Octodurus, a Town of the Veragri, in a narrow Valley, over which hung mighty Hills. Here he thought himſelf ſecure becauſe of the Hoſtages theſe Nations had given up, and for other reaſons; but they taking it to heart, that they ſhould be ſo deprived of their Children, and that the Romans ſhould lay theſe their Territories to their Province, and moreover incouraged by the ſmallneſs of the number Galba had brought, reſolved to aſſault his Camp. And this they did with ſuch fury, that by their numbers they overpowered the Romans and put them to great diſtreſs, which had been followed by their ruine, had not the advice of P. Sextus Baculus, the Primiple of that Legion, and C. Voluſenus Tribune of the Soldiers, men of ſingular courage and wiſdom interpoſed. They ran to Galba, and told him there was no hope of ſafety if they did not break out upon the Enemy himſelf, which being reſolved the Soldiers by their Centurions were commanded to ceaſe fighting, to receive ſuch weapons as were caſt into the Camp, and having taken a little breath, upon the watch-word given, to break out. This they did with ſuch courage and alacrity, that the Enemy ſurprized was eaſily put to flight, and beaten from the ſeveral Gates at which they iſſued, and of thirty thouſand loſt the third part. Galba glad of the ſucceſs, yet conſidering he wanted Forage, and that he had met with difficulties he never dreamed of, burnt the Town, and the next day returned without oppoſition, and brought the Legion ſafe into the Nantuates, and thence to the Allobroges, where he wintered.

The Adventures of Galba.

38. The Belgæ being now overthrown, the Germans driven out, and the Seduni, who lived amongſt the Alps ſubdued and vanquiſhed; Cæſar, who was gone into Illyricum imagined not but that Gall would be in repoſe; but there ſuddenly fell out another commotion. P. Craſſus wintring with the ſeventh Legion in the Country of the Andes (Anjou) near to the Ocean, and wanting Proviſions, ſent out the Prefects of Horſe and Tribunes to demand Corn of the next Cities and States; particularly of the Unelli or Venelli (Normans about Caen) the Curioſolitæ (thoſe of Cornovaille) and Veneti (people of Vanes) of moſt authority of all Nations in that Tract. For they had great ſtore of Shipping, with which they traded into Britain, had moſt skill in Navigation, had command of all the Ports on theſe Seas, and of thoſe that uſed them, as their Tributaries. The Veneti retained the Meſſengers ſent to them, hoping thereby to recover the Hoſtages they had given to Craſſus. And the reſt followed their example, and made a League to maintain their liberty againſt the incroachments of a Stranger. Thus united they ſent to tell Craſſus, that if he would have his Meſſengers returned, he muſt ſend back their Hoſtages; whereof he certified Cæſar. He reſolving to chaſtize them for breaking the Law of Nations in caſting the Meſſengers into Irons, gave order for Ships and Gallies to be made upon the Ligeris, (Loire) and they on the other ſide made as effectual preparations as they could to maintain what they had done. And the Veneti incouraged themſelves from the nature of their ſoil, which was defended by Arms and Greeks of the Sea, and by their experience in Maritime affairs, wherein, as in the knowledge of Ports in their quarters, they thought they were far ſuperior to the Romans.

The Maritime Cities unite againſt Cæſar.

39. Cæſar by chaſtizing them, reſolved to prevent the like inſolency of ſuch as had ſubmitted. And conſidering how quick the Galles were to make a war, he ſent into all parts, where he thought there might be danger, Forces to hinder their riſing and union with the Veneti. He made D. Brutus cheif Admiral of the Navy, and of thoſe Ships he had got together from the Pictones (Poiteuins) Santones (Saintongeois) and other Provinces which continued quiet, with orders to make for the Veneti with what ſpeed he could, and he himſelf marched thitherward with the Foot-Forces. But do what he could, the Tides were ſo much their Friends, being ſituated in Points and Promontories, and their Ships ſo accommodated to the nature of the Sea, that they could in danger, remove themſelves from one Town to another, and they deluded him the greateſt part of the Summer. Yet, he tells us, that inſtead of Cables they made uſe of Iron Chains, and raw Hides and Skins for Sails, either for want of Linnen Cloth, or ignorant of the uſe of it, or becauſe Sails of Linnen would hardly ſerve to carry Ships of that burthen, or endure the tempeſtuouſneſs of theſe Seas, and the violence of the Winds. If they wanted Linnen, how great is the alteration we find at this preſent time in that Country which affords ſo much Linnen, that thence (from Morlaix in Britany and other places) are we furniſhed with Sails for our Fleets, to its great advantage: and their Linnen we now find ſufficient to carry Ships of the greateſt burthen, to indure the tempeſtuouſneſs of thoſe Seas, and the violence of Winds.

The Veneti too cunning for him at Sea.

40. The Romans took one Town after another; but the Veneti ſtill conveyed themſelves to the next; ſo that Cæſar ſeeing it loſt labour, attended the coming of his Navy. And when it came there was but ſmall hope of ſucceſs againſt two hundred and twenty Sail of Ships, of ſuch height and ſtrength, that his could do no execution upon them. But this device made amends for thoſe Inconveniencies. The Romans had provided themſelves of ſharp Hooks or Sicles, which putting upon long Poles, theſe they faſtned to the Tackling which held the Main Yard to the Maſt; then forcing away their Ship with force of Oars, they cut the Tackling and the Main Yard fell down. Thus the Galls loſt the uſe of their Shipping, and ſo the Controverſie fell within the compaſs of Valour, in which the Romans being ſuperiours obtained the Victory; for to their natural Valour was added a deſire of Glory, they fighting in the ſight of Cæſar, and the whole Army; for all the Hills and Cliffs, which afforded proſpect into the Sea, were covered with the Roman Forces. Their Main Yards coming by the Board, their Enemies with fury took many of their Veſſels, at the ſight of which the reſt fled, but on a ſuddain were becalmed, ſo that the Romans coming up with them fought Ship to Ship, and eaſily maſtered them. Of ſo great a Navy very few eſcaped after eight hours fight, by the advantage of the Evening, and ſo the War ended with the Veneti and the other Maritime Nations. For all ſorts of People, young and old, that were fit either for Council or Action were preſent at the Battel, and all the Shipping they could make ingaged. Theſe that remained, not knowing how to diſpoſe of themſelves, yeilded to Cæſar, who to terrifie other Barbarous People from violating the Law of Nations, put to death all the Senate, and ſold the ordinary ſort for Slaves.

Yet he defeats them.

41. In the mean time L. Titurius Sabinus, with his Forces entred the Territories of the Unelli. With them joyned the Aulerci and Eburones (People of Maine, Nor- mans of Aulanſon Sees and Evereux) and Lexobii (People of Liſieux) having ſlain their Senate becauſe they would not countenance the War. They were headed by Viridorix, one of the Unelli, who marched and offered battel to Sabinus. He counterfeited himſelf fearful to ſuch a degree, that they were thereby moved to attacque his Camp, which being placed upon an Hill, he cauſed his men to take the advantage of the upper ground, and of the Enemy his being burthened with Turff and other Materials for filling up the Trenches, and iſſuing forth at two Ports, they fell upon them, and did ſuch Execution, that they ſlew great numbers, and chaſing their Horſe ſuffered very few to eſcape. Upon the noiſe of theſe two Victories obtained much at the ſame time, all the Cities and States yeilded themſelves to Titurius; for as the Galls were eager to undertake a War, ſo were they weak in ſuffering, and impatient of, the Conſequents and Calamities thereof.

Sabinus his good ſucceſs.

42. At the ſame time it happened, that M. Craſſus coming into Aquitain, found he was to uſe no ſmall diligence; for the Country was large and Populous, and there L. Valerius Præconius, the Legate was ſlain, and the Army overthrown, and thence L. Manlius was forced to fly with the loſs of his Carriages. Having made what proviſion he could, he invaded the Sontiates who preſently raiſed very conſiderable Forces and oppoſed him in his march, but the Roman Soldiers, deſirous to ſhew what they could do, without their General and the reſt of the Legions, under the Conduct of a very Young man, put them to flight, and ſlew a great number; and then he beſieged their chief Town, which he attacqued with Vines, Turrets and Mounts. The Towns-men defended themſelves both by ſallying forth and undermining, wherein the Aquitains were very ſkilful. But ſeeing the induſtry of the Romans they offered to ſurrender, which being accepted, it was expected they ſhould deliver up their Arms. In the mean time Adcantuanus, their Governor or chief Magiſtrate, iſſued out at another Port with ſix hundred devoted Companions, whom they called Soldurii, the manner of whom was to enjoy all good things in common with their choſen friends, and if any misfortune befell them, either to dye with them, or preſently to kill themſelves; neither was it ever known in the memory of man, that any of them refuſed to dye when his Friend was ſlain. But making a noiſe they were diſcovered and driven back again into the Town, by the Soldiers that kept that Fortification; where, according to his deſire, the Governor was taken in the number of the ſubmiſſive multitude.

Adoleſcentulo Duce.

Craſſus taketh the Town of the Sontiates.

43. The Barbarous Galls allarmed at the taking this Town, aſſembled their Forces together, and got aid out of Spain and the adjoyning Countries, with ſuch Commanders as had got experience in Sertorius his Wars. Craſſus being come into the Confines of the Vocates and Taruſates, theſe began, according even to the Cuſtom of the Romans, to take place of advantage, to fortifie their Camp, and to intercept the Enemy from neceſſary intercourſes. Craſſus perceiving this, reſolved it was moſt expedient to give them battel, and prepared for it; but when he offered it they refuſed, hoping to end the War without bloodſhed, and if for want of Proviſions the Romans retreated, they intended to fall upon them when they were weary and out of heart. Craſſus perceiving their drift, reſolved to ſet upon them in their Camp, and this his reſolution was heartily received by his men, and put in execution. As they were with all alacrity attacquing one part of the Fortification, ſome of the Horſe informed Craſſus, that the Rampire at the Decumane Port was weak, and would admit an eaſie entrance. This place was eaſily ſurpriſed and entred by four Cohorts, which making a noiſe, and coming on the Backs of the Galls ſo unexpectedly, put them into a fright, and this fright drove them over the Rampart to ſhift as they could for their lives. But the Country being Champion, the Horſe purſued them with ſuch execution, that of fifty thouſand which came out of Aquitain and Spain, ſcarcely the fourth part remained.

Gives the Galls a great overthrow.

Moſt of Aquitain thereupon ſubmits.

44. This ſucceſs of Craſſus had ſuch effect, that moſt part of Aquitain ſubmitted, and of their own accord gave him Hoſtages. Amongſt them were the Tarbelli, Bigerriones, Preciani, Vocates, Taruſates, Eluſates, Garites, Auſci, Garumni, Sibuſates and Cocoſates. Only ſome few that lived farther off, truſting upon the coming in of Winter, held off and did not ſubmit themſelves. To this enumeration Cæſar maketh of People ſubdued thus by Craſſus we muſt alſo reckon the Sontiates, which make up the number of twelve; and now, if you will believe him, they were all ſeveral People or Nations, or as ſuch he repreſents them. But Monetus the Geographer will tell you, that but three of them were truly People; that the reſt in no ſort were ſuch, but of Towns or Villages, and for the aſſiſtance of young Beginners he takes the pains to enumerate them. The Auſcii, Bigerriones, and Tarbelli were People. The Cocoſates, or Coſates, were no other than the Citizens of Cocoſſium or Coſſium, now Baſas the Metropolis of the Vaſates or Baſadois. The Eluſates were alſo Townſmen of Eluſa, now Euſe a Town at the bottom of the Territories of the Auſcii, (les Auſciois, and Armagnaquois) neither of old nor now ſo big as Cæſar would have it. The Garites, or rather Gaurites, were Inhabitants of the Valley of Gaura, in the Country of the Convenæ or Comingeois, the County of Gaure, of which ſome Towns are at this day reckoned unknown to the Romans, as Baumont, Granate, and Gimont. The Garumni inhabited a Village, or Villages, in the Valley adjoyning to the Mountains of St. Beat at the head of the River Garumna, or Garonne.

45. The Preciani were Inhabitants of ſome ignoble Valleys near the Garumni, in the Territories of the Convenæ. The Sibuſates alſo poſſeſſed a Ground no whit famous, called now Sebouſan, or Sibouſan, in the Confines of the Convenæ. The Sontiates, or rather Sottiates, as Pliny hath it, were Inhabitants of the Mountains of Sotti, now Mons de Saut, in the Grounds of the Weſtern Bigerri, or Bearnois. The Taruſates were the Townſmen of Taruſa, now Tartas, in the Borders of the Tarbelli, Baionnois, or Baſques. And laſtly, the Vocates in Pliny Baſobacates, were Inhabitants of the Town of a Vaſates not now ſtanding, in a Ground where at preſent is a Village. But Cæſar, though the Summer was well nigh ſpent; yet for as much as all Gall was at peace, only the Morini and Menapii ſtood out in Arms, and had never either ſent Ambaſſadors, or otherwiſe treated of Peace, hoping yet the War would quickly be at an end, invaded their Territories. They managed their matters far otherwiſe than the other Galls; for upon his approach they conveyed themſelves and Goods into the Woods and Boggs, and thence ſkirmiſhed with the Romans. Cæſar ſet his Men at work, who with admirable ſpeed, cutting down much Wood, cleared the Ground, and by that means took their Goods and Cattel; but they themſelves fled into the thicker Woods, of which they had plenty. Now fell abundance of Rain, which ſo diſtreſſed the Soldiers, that they could neither work, nor lie under their Tents of Skins; and therefore he burned and ſpoiled their Country, and placed his Army amongſt the Aulerci, Lexovii, and other late ſubdued Cities, therein to winter.

Sueton. in Julio. Appian belli civilis lib. 2. Plutarch in Pompeio, & in Craſſo.
Dio lib. 39. p. 108.
Patercul. l. 2. c. 46.

Great confluence to him at Luca.

46. Now by this time Cæſar had got great ſtore of Wealth, wherewith he not only paid his debts, but made him great ſtore of friends by Gifts and Contributions. Herewith he corrupted the Ædiles, Prætors, Conſuls, and their Wives. Paſſing over the Alpes this Winter to Luca, where he took up his head Quarters, ſo great concourſe was made to him, that there were preſent two hundred Senators, amongſt whom were Craſſus and Pompey, and ſo many Proconſuls and Prætors, that one hundred and twenty bundles of Rods have been ſeen together at his Gates. He fearing he might be recalled, procured Pompey and Craſſus to obtain the Conſulſhip for the following year, and continue him his imployment in Gall for other five years. Cato perſwaded L. Domitius to ſtand for the Conſulſhip, telling him he ſhould contend not for Magiſtracy, but for liberty, againſt the Tyrants. But Pompey fearing Cato's vehemency, leſt, having the whole Senate in his power, he ſhould perſwade the People to what was beſt, ſent ſome armed Men upon Domitius as he went down to the Forum, who killed the Slave that carried the light before them, and diſperſed them all, Cato being the laſt that fled, who received a wound on his Arm whilſt he fought for Domitius. Pompey and Craſſus having thus by force obtained the Conſulſhip, bore themſelves nothing more moderately afterwards.. The People being about to give Cato the Prætorſhip, Pompey pretended a ſtrange ſight from Heaven, and diſmiſſed the Aſſembly; then corrupting the Tribes with Money, he procured Antias and Vatinius to be choſen Prætors. Now by the help of Trebonius the Tribune they procured Laws, which continued to Cæſar (as they had agreed) his Government in Gall for other five years, aſſigned Syria to Craſſus with the Parthian War; and to Pompey all Africk, and the Spains with four Legions, whereof two he lent to Cæſar for the Gallick Wars. Pompey being permitted to govern his Provinces by Deputies ſtayed at Rome, where he ſpent his time in Shows and Paſtimes. Craſſus much rejoyced in his part, ſcarcely being able to contain himſelf abroad and at home, but contrary to his wonted gravity, breaking forth into childiſh expreſſions of joy. For, he ſleighted the thoughts of Syria and Parthia, as one who would ſo order his affairs, that the exploits of Lucullus againſt Tigranes, and of Pompey in the War with Mithridates, ſhould ſeem but toys, extending his hopes as far as Bactria, the Indians, and the utmoſt Ocean.

Pompey and Craſſus, according to agreement, obtaine the Conſulſhip by force, and continue to Cæſar his Command for other five years.

A. M. 3950.
Ol. 181. an. 2.
V. C. 699.
Hyrcani 9.

Craſſus againſt the minds of all Men reſolving to go againſt the Parthians.

47. The Tribunes hindred all they could the Conſuls from raiſing Men, and laboured to repeal the Laws made for their Expeditions. Pompey was herewith well enough contented, having ſent his Lieutenants into his Provinces, and being unwilling

Plutarch. & Dio ut prim.

ling to leave the City, as he pretended, becauſe of the charge of Proviſions committed to him, which Cicero, in way of recompence for his labour in his reſtitution, had procured him from the Senate, that ſo he might have authority all over the Roman Empire. But Craſſus betook himſelf to force, which when the Tribunes ſaw themſelves unable to withſtand, they deſiſted, but loaded him with curſes, and when he made the accuſtomed prayers in the Capitol for proſperous ſucceſs, they ſpoke of unlucky auſpicia and prodigies which had hapned. Atteius the Tribune laboured to hinder him from going, many exclaiming againſt it as an unworthy thing, that he ſhould fall with War upon thoſe who had nothing ill deſerved of the Romans, but were at peace with them. This made him fly to Pompey to conduct him forth, at the ſight of whom thoſe who came to ſtop him gave way. But Atteius meeting him, earneſtly exhorted him to deſiſt, and when that would not do, ſent a Viator to lay hold of him; but the reſt of the Tribunes not permitting this, and the Viator not quite diſmiſſing him, Atteius got before to the Gate, where he had ſome fire ready, and as Craſſus came by, throwing his Odours upon the Coals, devoted him with horrible and bitter curſes, invocating certain terrible and unheard of gods. Theſe ſecret and ancient execrations the Romans thought to be of that force that no man ever eſcaped deſtruction to whom they were denounced, and that they alſo proved unfortunate to the denouncer, and therefore they were ſeldom uſed, and Craſſus was blamed on the behalf of the City. * Florus calleth this Tribune Metellus, and others write, that the Tribunes generally thus devoted him, but it appeareth, * from Cicero, that P. Atteius was principal in this Action.

* Lib. 3. c. 11.
* Lib. 1. de Divinat.

Rifleth the Temple of Jeruſalem,

Lege Plutarch. in Craſſo. Dionem lib. 40. Florum l. 3. c. 11. Oroſium lib. 6. cap. 13. Velleium lib. 2. cap. 40. Strab. lib. 16.

48. Craſſus in his march rifled the Temple of Jeruſalem, and took away the Treaſures which Pompey touched not. He ſpent many days in weighing the Treaſure of the Idol, called Atargatis by the Syrians, and by the Greeks Derceto, the Goddeſs of Hierapolis, otherwiſe called Edeſſa, and Bambyce, and Magog by the Syrians. In his whole paſſage he ſhewed more covetouſneſs than valour, liſting Men, and then for Money diſcharging them. He neglected his opportunities of falling on the Parthians unprovided, and the friendſhip of the Armenian King, who offered him to invade Parthia through his Kingdom, as alſo of refreſhing his Army in ſome City, (as Caſſius adviſed him) till he had certain news of the Parthians, or elſe paſſing down the River to Seleucia, where he might have had Proviſions by water, and could not be compaſſed in by the Parthians. This latter Counſel he rejected by the cunning inſinuations of Abgarus the Oſroenian (otherwiſe called Angarus, Mazares, Mazarus, Marachus, Macorus, Ariamnes, and * Acharus by ſeveral) the Regulus, or Petty Prince of the Arabians, who having formerly been a Friend and Ally of the Romans, had now applied his mind to the Parthian, and feeding Craſſus with Money, to conceal his treachery, gave him notice of whatſoever was done. He perſwaded him to leave off thoughts of Seleucia and Cteſiphon, and go ſtraight againſt the Surenas and Sillax the Kings Captains. This he did, and thereby firſt loſing his Son, a choice young Man, he himſelf was by the Surenas circumvented under pretence of a Treaty, and either ſlain by his Enemies, or killed by ſome of his own Men, to prevent his falling into their hands. This hapned at Sinnaca, a City of Meſopotamia, on the ſixth of the Ides of June, as Ovid informeth us; twenty thouſand Men were ſlain, and ten thouſand taken, according to Plutarch, (not to name other accounts) ſo that the Eaſt being almoſt deſtitute of Forces, many Provinces thereof revolted; but by the care, induſtry, and valour of C. Caſſius the Quæſtor of Craſſus (the ſame who afterwards with Brutus killed Julius Cæſar) Syria was appeaſed. This King of Parthia, againſt whom Craſſus miſcarried, (called Orodes, Herodes, and Hyrodes) was ſomething ſkilled in the Greek Tongue, and other learning. Artabazes, or Artavaſdes, the Armenian, (that firſt offered kindneſs to Craſſus) had reconciled himſelf to the Parthian, who was now with him. He being alſo learned, (for he wrote Tragedies, Orations, and Hiſtories) part of Euripides his Bacchæ was repeated, and the head of Craſſus was brought in as it were by chance, and thrown at their feet. But the Surenas was afterwards puniſhed for his treachery, being killed by his Maſter, who envied him his glory. And Orodes himſelf having loſt his Son Pacorus, in a Battel againſt the Romans, and fall'n into that kind of Dropſie, called Anaſarca, Phraates (or Phraortes) his other Son, gave him Aconitum, or Wolfs-bane, which working ſo upon him, as with it ſelf it brought out the humour, and gave him eaſe, he made ſhort work of it, and ſtrangled him with his own hands.

And is ſlain.

* In Tacitus (Annal. l. 12.) is written Abbarus, but Lipſius noteth upon it, that in the Vatican Copy 'tis ever Acharus, and was common to all the Arabian Kings, as Ptolomy to thoſe of Ægypt, in Appian 'tis Ἄκβαρος

A. M. 3952.
U. C. 701.

Whereby one Head of the Tricipitina is cut off.

49. Thus periſhed Craſſus, (a) (who was ſo rich, that he would have none ſo accounted, but he that could by his own Revenues maintain an Army) and one of the Heads of the Tricipitina was hereby cut off. This laid the foundation of the Civil War

(a) Cicero Offic. lib. 1.

War betwixt the other two, for he, whilſt he lived, ballancing them, when he was gone, Cæſar muſt bring under Pompey before he could be Chief. Whilſt Craſſus warred againſt the Parthians, Gabinius, who had been Conſul when Cicero was baniſhed, reduced (b) into his Kingdom Ptolomy Auletes, whom his Subjects had expelled. Then was he Proconſul of Syria; but at his return being accuſed, eſpecially for making War upon Egypt, (which was ſuppoſed to be forbidden by the Verſes of Sibylla) and ready to be torn in pieces by the People, he was yet acquitted by corrupted Judges (or Lælius the Tribune) of Treaſon, but baniſhed, as upon other accounts, ſo chiefly for that he had ſcrewed out of his Province one hundred thouſand Drachma's, or Denarii, and was afterwards recalled by Cæſar.

(b) Idem Epiſtolis ad Quintum fratrem & ad Atticum Dio lib. 39. Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 1. Exemp. 3.

(c) Cæſar Comment l. 4.

Cæſar de bello Gallico lib. 4.

50, The Winter after Cæſar his Action againſt the Morini aud Menapii, Pompey and Craſſus being Conſuls, two German Nations, the Uſipetes and Tenchtheri paſſed with great multitudes over the Rhine, not far from the place where it falleth into the Sea. They had been ill treated for many years by the Suevi, the greateſt and moſt warlike Nation amongſt the Germans, who had one hundred Pagi, which yearly afforded to their Wars a thouſand Men apiece; the reſt living at home maintained themſelves and them, and ſucceeded them in the War the following year. By this means both Tillage and experience in War was continued. No Man had any Ground peculiar to himſelf, neither might they abide longer than a year in one place. They lived chiefly upon Cattel and Milk, and uſed much hunting; being for that, and becauſe they were not urged to any thing againſt their diſpoſition, ſtrong and of large ſtature. Their Bodies were but covered in part, and that but with Skins and Hides, and they waſhed them in the Rivers. Merchants frequented their Ports; not ſo much to bring them any Commodities, as to buy what they got in War. Oxen they cared not for, though the Galls would purchaſe them at any rate; but made uſe of their own rugged ugly Cattel, which by uſe they rendred tame and fit for ſervice. They often forſook their Horſes in Battel, which being taught to ſtand in one place, and ready again to receive them, they fought on foot. Furniture of Horſes they eſteemed a baſe thing. They admitted no Wine as that which would effeminate them. They thought it inhanced their reputation as to valour, to have the bordering Territories lie waſt, as being not to be reſiſted by many States. And it was reported, that one way the Country lay waſt from them ſix hundred Miles together.

51. Next to the Suevi inhabited the Ubii, a State alſo great and potent, ſomewhat more civil than the reſt, by reaſon of their entercourſe with Merchants, and with the Galls. Theſe the Suevi had much brought under, though they could not drive them out of the Country; as alſo they handled the Uſipetes and Tenchtheri beforementioned, who for three years were forced from their Poſſeſſions to wander through the Continent of Germany, and at laſt fell upon the Menapii, inhabiting either ſide of the River Rhine. They being terrified thereat, forſook all their dwellings on the German ſide, and betook themſelves to that of Gall, to hinder them from farther paſſage. And they did ſo far hinder them, that they counterfeited a Retreat to their old habitation; but their Horſe, after three days Journey, ſpeedily returned, and ſurprized, and ſlew ſuch as upon their abſence were returned to the farther ſide. Theſe being ſlain, and their Shipping taken, they got over the River before the other Menapii had notice of their coming, eaſily diſpoſſeſſed them, and lived that Winter upon the ſpoil. Cæſar having notice of theſe things, and knowing the fickle humour of the Galls, and how they took their meaſures from light and idle Stories, haſted to his Army ſooner than he was wont to do.

The Germans paſs the Rhine.

52. He found what he had ſuſpected, that the Germans were invited by ſome Galls to come farther into the Country, and they proceeded as far as the Confines of the Eburones and Condruſi, who were under the protection of the Treviri. Yet Cæſar thought fit to diſſemble the matters, and incourage the Princes now got together in their loyalty. But he reſolved to oppoſe the Germans, who in his march ſent their Ambaſſadors, deſiring, that being forced out of their Habitation, they might have leave to fix in Gall; and ſeveral things they propounded, as Cæſar believed, to ſpin on the time till their Horſemen were returned, which were gone for ſpoil and proviſion over the Moſa. He gave them truce for one day, but notwithſtanding that Truce, they ſet upon and defeated a Party of five thouſand Horſe. Then did he not think it ſafe to hearken to them any more, eſpecially ſeeing that by that fraudulent Act they gained reputation amongſt the Galls, to whom he durſt not give ſpace to think upon it. He reſolved to fall upon them even in their Camp, which when he communicated to the Legates and Quæſtors, a very fortunate accident hapned. For the next morning the chiefeſt of them came to excuſe their late practice, and to de-

He defeateth them.

ſire a further Truce. He detained them in hold, and marched with his Army in a triple Battle (the Horſe behind the Foot, becauſe lately diſcouraged) to the Camp of the Germans. At firſt the Soldiers found ſome reſiſtance, but upon the ſcreeking of the Women and Children, who running away, were purſued; the Men alſo took themſelves to their heels, and ſuch as had eſcaped the Fight, coming to the confluence of the Moſa, and the Rhine, what through fear, wearineſs, and the force of the water, were all drowned. In the Conflict the Romans loſt not a Man, yet the number of the Enemy, with Women and Children, was four hundred and thirty thouſand. He gave leave to them he had kept in hold to depart; but they fearing the cruelty of the Galls, for the miſchief they had done them, deſired they might continue with the Romans, which Cæſar granted.

And paſſeth the Rhine.

53. The German Horſe that was abſent at the overthrow, fled into the Confines of the Sicambri, who refuſed to give them up, upon Cæſars demand; ſaying, that if the Germans were forbidden Gall, why ſhould the Romans challenge any Authority in their Territories? But Cæſar thought fit they ſhould ſee that the Romans could paſs the Rhine as well as they; eſpecially being deſired by the Ubii, who had alone accepted of his friendſhip, to ſend them aid againſt the Suevi. To paſs the Rhine he reſolved, but to do it by Boats, was neither ſafe, neither for his own honour, nor for the Majeſty of the People of Rome; and therefore, notwithſtanding the difficulty in ſo large, deep, and ſwift a River, yet he reſolved to try to make a Bridge, which if it ſucceeded not, he determined not to paſs over at all. But within ten days that the Timber began to be cut and carried, the Work was ended, and the Army tranſported; leaving then a ſtrong Party at either end of the Bridge, he invaded the Sicambri, receiving in the mean time many Ambaſſadors, and requiring Hoſtages. The Sicambri, at the perſwaſion of the Uſipetes and Tenchtheri, had forſaken their Country, and betaken themſelves into Woods and Deſerts. He waſted their Territories, and marched to the Ubii, to whom he had promiſed aid againſt the Suevi. By them he underſtood that the Suevi, upon rumor of the Bridge, had ſent all their Wealth, with their Wives and Children, into the Woods, and reſolved, that all that were able to bear Arms ſhould make Head, and give Battle to the Romans in the middle of their Country. But Cæſar having terrified the Germans, been revenged upon the Sicambri, and ſet, as he ſaith, the Ubii at liberty, (the things he deſigned) and ſpent eighteen days beyond the Rhine, having done enough for his own Honour, and the good of the Common-wealth, returned into Gall, and brake up the Bridge.

54. Before this he had underſtood, that in moſt part of the former Wars the Galls had received their Supply out of Britain. Though the Summer was ſo far ſpent, that it would not ſuffer him to finiſh a War, yet he thought it would be to good purpoſe, if he came only to view the Iſland, to underſtand the quality of the Inhabitants, and to know their Coaſt, their Ports and Landing places. Hereof the Galls were altogether ignorant; for ſeldom any but Merchants did travel to them. Neither had they diſcovered any thing but the Sea-Coaſt, and thoſe Regions which were oppoſite to Gall. Calling Merchants together from all Quarters, he neither could underſtand of what quantity the Iſland was; what Nations, or of what power they were that inhabited it; what uſe or experience of War they had; what Laws or Cuſtoms they uſed; nor what Haven they had to receive a Navy of the greater Ships.

Britain,

The name whence derived.

Conſul. Cambdenum in Britania.

55. Britain, or Britany, which alſo is Albion, being in Greek ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΣ, ΑΛΒΙΩΝ, and ΑΛΟΥΙΩΝ, was by the Romans called Britania and Romania. It is moſt probable, ſaith Cambden, that the Inhabitants were called Britains from their painted Bodies, for whatſoever is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient Country ſpeech they call Brith, having been of old much given to paint themſelves, as many Writers do teſtifie. Now the Ancient Greeks, who ſailed by the Coaſts, underſtanding that the Nation was called Brith, might unto it add Tania, (which word in Greek, as the Gloſſaries ſhew, betokeneth a Region) and thereof make the compound name Βριτανία, that is Britons-Land, which is corrupted into Βρετανία, but by Lucretius and Cæſar the two firſt Romans that make mention thereof is truly called Britania. In confirmation of this opinion Cambden obſerveth, that in the names of well-nigh all the ancient Britains, there appeareth ſome ſignification of a colour, which no doubt (he ſaith) aroſe from this kind of painting. The Red colour is of the Britains called Coch and Goch, which in his judgment lieth couched in theſe names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The Black colour called Du, ſheweth it ſelf in Mandubratius, Cartimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunus. The White colour called Gwin, in Veautius and Immanuentius. The Wateriſh called Gwellwe in Vellocatus, Carvilius and Suella. The Blew, which they call Glaſs in Cuniglaſus, and he proceedeth further. But this Learned Man coming to ſpeak of the time wherein Britain came to be known abroad, denieth that the Britains were with Hercules at the rape of Heſione; that Ulyſſes was ever in Britain; that the Britains beſtowed any Preſents upon Cato; that King Alexander the Great, or Hannibal, was ever in the Iſland; he doubteth whether ever the Ship of Hiero, mentioned by Athenæus, came hither; yet thinketh that the Britains were mingled with the Cimbri and Galls, in their Expeditions into Italy and Greece.

Cambdens Arguments that Britain was but known lately.

56. But as the Romans, Galls, and Spaniards, were unknown to Herodotus, and the ancient Greek Geographers, ſo of this mind he ever was, that it was late e're the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britains name. For he judgeth that little Book of the World, which goeth abroad under the name of Ariſtotle, and maketh mention of the Britains, of Albion and Hierne, to be of latter days by far than that Philoſopher, as the beſt learned Men (ſaith he) have judged. He accounteth Polybius the ancienteſt Greek Writer that mentioneth the Britiſh Iſles; who yet knew nothing of them: then doth he, in reference to other Nations, count it but a fable that Himilco the Carthaginian, being commanded by his Superiours to diſcover the Weſtern Sea-Coaſts of Europe, entred into this Iſle many years before that time. And the firſt Latin Author to his knowledge that made mention of Britain was Lucretius, in his Verſes concerning the difference of Air. Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Cæſar no man denieth: at what time we are taught out of Cæſar himſelf, that Divitiacus King of the Soiſſons, and the moſt mighty Prince of all Gall, Governed Britain, which, as alſo appeareth from Cæſar, is only to be underſtood of the Maritime Coaſts. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Britain had experience of no Forreigners rule; for neither Dionyſus, (or Bacchus) nor Hercules, nor any other worthy, or Demi-god have we heard (ſaith he) to have attempted War upon that People. Now Cæſar, who for his noble Acts is called Divus, was the firſt that ſubdued the Britains, and forced them to pay a certain Tribute. From his time (ſaith Cambden) and no further off muſt the Writer of our Hiſtory fetch the beginning of his Work, if he throughly weigh with judgment what the learned Varro hath in time paſt written, (viz. of the three diſtinctions of times which we have formerly mentioned, Uncertain before the Flood, Fabulous before the Olympiads, and Hiſtorical ſince the beginning of them) and my ſelf already heretofore ſignified. This moſt learned Man mentions this diviſion of Varro, becauſe that the Britiſh Hiſtory of Geffrey of Monmouth taketh its beginning three hundred and thirty three years before the firſt Olympiad. This Hiſtory we muſt abſolutely diſclaim as utterly fabulous in reference to King Brutus, and other fictions depending on his Story. But whether or no Britain was not known abroad till ſo late time as our Antiquary judgeth, muſt be examined for the honour of our Country, ſaving ever that reſpect which is due (and that juſtly) unto his name, and will not be at all diminiſhed, ſeeing the conteſt is betwixt him alſo, and Bochartus himſelf.

The contrary aſſerted.

57. The controverſie is decided clearly againſt Cambden, if two things can but be made out. 1. That the Caſſeterides or Iſlands of Tinne were known very anciently, and 2. That the Caſſiterides were no other than the Britiſh Iſles. The firſt is proved from the Teſtimony of many, that the Phœnicians were wont to trade to the Caſſiterides, and thence to fetch plenty of Tinne. Strabo affirmeth it, and that they firſt traded thither alone from Gades, hiding from others this courſe of Traffick, in ſo much that a certain Phœnician Sailor being chaſed by a Roman Veſſel, choſe rather to run his Ship aground, and ſuffer Shipwrack, to cauſe his purſuers to miſcarry, than to reveal the matter, for which fidelity, having eſcaped himſelf, he had his loſs made up out of the publick Treaſury at his return to Carthage. Pliny alſo writeth, (b) in the Chapter of the firſt Inventors, That Midacritus firſt carried Lead from the Iſland Caſſiteris. For Midacritus is to be read Melcarthus, or Melicartus, the Phœnician Hercules, according to Sanchoniathon, whom the Phœnicians make Author of the Weſtern Voyages. (c) Herodotus acknowledgeth he knew not where the Caſſiterides were; but that there were ſome then he acknowledgeth alſo, whence Tinne came to them the Greeks, and from him it appeareth, that they were ſituate in the utmoſt limits of Europe. The Phœnicians being unwilling that any ſhould know them but themſelves, the Greeks bought Tin and Lead, either of them, or the Veneti, or Narbonenſes, to whom it was wont to be carried by Land in a journey of thirty days, as Diodorus telleth us. (d) Dionyſius Pæriegetes mentioned them under the name of Heſperides, and ſo doth Tzetzes.

Lib. 3. p. 175.

(b) Lib. 7. c. 56.

(c) L. 3. c. 115.

(d) Videſis apud Bocharti Canaan l. 1. c. 39.

Feſtus Anienus ſpeaketh of them under the name of Oeſtrymnedes, expreſly of the ſailing of the Phœnicians to them, and that Hamilco, who was ſent from the Senate of Carthage to diſcover the Weſt, came thither, as he himſelf recorded, whom Feſtus profeſſed to follow in the deſcription of the Weſt, having made his Collections out of the depth of the Punick Annals. Theſe things conſidered, prove ſufficiently, that the Caſſiterides were known in very ancient times.

58. For the ſecond, that the Britiſh Iſles are thoſe Caſſiterides or Stannaries, there needs no proof, Cambden himſelf confeſſing, nay proving by many Arguments, that the Iſlands of Silly lying off from the Promontory of Cornwal eight Leagues, and in number one hundred and forty five, are the very ſame that from the plenty of Tin were called Caſſiterides, from their ſite Heſperides, and Oeſtrymnides, from Oeſtrymnis the Promontory of the Artabri, now Gallitia in Spain, over againſt which they lie. Now for the conſequence of the thing, can any imagine that theſe Iſlands ſhould be ſo long known, and not Britain it ſelf to which they lie ſo cloſe, and from which they are deſervedly called Britiſh Iſles? And what reaſon is there to think, (as Cambden doth) that ſuch dream as believe that Hamilco came hither? It's a wonder he ſhould ſay, that there's nothing for it but a Verſe or two of Feſtus Anienus; when Feſtus ſaith, that he read the ſtory of the whole Navigation, deſcribed by Hamilco himſelf in the Punick Annals. Cambden himſelf contendeth, that from the Caſſiterides was Lead firſt of all carried into Greece, whence it followeth, that they were known before the time of Homer, who maketh mention of the Metal. As for what he urgeth concerning Polybius, that he was utterly ignorant of theſe Parts, if it were granted that he was, yet the Phœnicians, who in the Heroick times ſent out Colonies into the Ocean beyond Gades, knew theſe Coaſts ſufficiently. But Cambden miſtook the Hiſtorian, as may appear from all that paſſage read together, which only importeth, that as it was not known whether Aſia and Africk on the South ſide were terminated by the Sea, ſo neither whether the Sea flowed about the Northern parts of Europe that lie above Narbon; which truly at this day we know not certainly, though in ſo much light. That this interpretation is to be made, and that Polybius did not mean, that in his age whatever lay above Narbon was unknown, and that they dreamed who ſpoke or wrote any thing of it, hence appeareth. For he himſelf accurately deſcribed the Fountains of Rhodanus, with Corbilon upon Ligeris, and many other places of Gall above Narbon. And in his third Book he promiſeth he would write of what lay beyond the Sea, and what was there remarkable, nay, (which is eſpecially to be noted) of the Britiſh Iſles, and making of Tin. That he performed his promiſe in the Books that are loſt, appeareth from Strabo*, who telleth us, That Polybius deſcribing the Regions of Europe, ſaid, he would let paſs the Ancients, and inquire into ſuch as reprehended them, as Dicæarchus, and Eratoſthenes, who laſt of all had handled Geography, and Pytheas who had impoſed upon many. For, he (Pytheas) ſaid, he had not viewed all the Soil of Britain; but the Iſland was above forty thouſand (Stadia or Furlongs I ſuppoſe) in compaſs,

His Arguments refuted.

* Lib. 2. p. 104.

59, From this place it appeareth, that ſeveral whom Polybius calleth τȣς ἀρχαίȣς or Ancients, wrote of theſe Parts, before eitheir Dicæarchus or Eratoſthenes, Pythæas, or himſelf. Now Eratoſthenes, who, as he ſaith, was the laſt that handled Geography, Suidas writeth to have been born in the 126 Olympiad, which was celebrated in the thirty ſeventh year of the Seleucidæ, the ſeventh of Antiochus Soter, the ninth of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and the 478 year of the City, when Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Genutius Clepſina were Conſuls, Pyrrhus then warring in Sicily, two hundred and ſeventy four years before the birth of Chriſt. But Dicæarchus boaſteth in Athenæus, that he had Ariſtotle for his Maſter; and then Pythæas, who was cited by both, muſt needs have preceded them, Yet theſe Writers were but of late in compariſon of Orpheus the moſt ancient Poet, one of the Argonautæ, by whom Cambden himſelf affirmeth Britain to have been deſcribed. Although in truth Orpheus was not Author of thoſe Poems fathered on him, but Onomacritus an Athænian Poet, who lived under the Piſiſtratidæ, as both (a) Clemens Alexandrinus, and (b) Tatianus inform us; yet two advantages we have hereby. For firſt, Cambden is inconſtant, denying that Britain was known to the ancient Greeks; and ſecondly, this Iſland muſt have been known then long before the former Geographers; for the Piſiſtratidæ were baniſhed Athens in the third year of the ſixty ſeventh Olympiad, the twelfth of Darius Hyſtaſpis, the 244 of the City, (at the ſame time that Tarquinius was baniſhed) five hundred and eight years before the birth of Chriſt, though they write that he flouriſhed in the fiftieth Olympiad, in the firſt year whereof Piſiſtratus indeed got the Sovereignty over the City. Theſe things ſufficiently prove, that Britain was known of old old to ſeveral Nations, though we mentioned not what Bochartus probably conjectureth concerning the Etymology of the name. The Phœnicians trading hither for Lead or Tin, might juſtly call it Barat-Anac, that is, The Land of Lead or Tin, as the Greeks Caſſiteris; and this might eaſily be changed into Bretanica. Anac ſignifieth both Lead and Tin, no places in the World are ſo fruitful of either as the Britiſh Iſles. And it may ſeem no wonder that the Word ſhould be ſo altered, ſeeing that from Phœnice are derived Pœnicus, Punicus, Puniceus, and Pœnus. He alſo giveth other marks of the Phœnicians their planting in thoſe Iſlands, in the thirty ninth Chapter of the firſt Book of that excellent Work entituled Canaan, concerning the Colonies and Language of that People, to which we refer the ſtudious in Antiquity, having thus far in ſome ſort ſeemed to vindicate the honour of our Country. Now to return to the courſe of our Hiſtory.

(a) Stromat. l. 1

(b) Orat. contra Græcos pag. 173. Edit. unà cum Athenagora & Theophylo.

60. Cæſar ſent out C. Voluſenus with a Gally to diſcover what he could concerning the quality of the Iſland, and its Inhabitants, with order ſpeedily to return, and get all his Ships together on the Coaſt of the Morini; in the mean time his reſolution being known, many private States of the Iſle ſent and ſubmitted themſelves, offering to give Hoſtages, and he returned back the Meſſengers with good words. E're Voluſenus returned, who durſt not go aſhoar, the Morini ſubmitted, and being unwilling to have an Enemy at his back, he received them and their Hoſtages. Eighty Ships of Burthen he thought ſufficient to tranſport two Legions. He divided the Gallies to the Quæſtor, the Legates and Commanders of the Horſe, appointing other eighteen Ships of Burthen which lay wind-bound at another Port for the Horſemen. In the third Watch he put to Sea, commanding his Horſe to follow, which was but ſlowly performed. About the fourth hour of the day he arrived upon the Coaſt, where he fonnd all the Cliffs poſſeſſed by the Forces of the Enemy. The Place where he arrived was ſuch, that the Hills lay ſo ſteep over the Sea, that a Weapon might eaſily be caſt from the higher ground; and therefore he thought it not fit to land, but caſt Anchor till the reſt of the Navy were come up. Then after a Counſel called of the Legates and Tribunes, wherein he required a quick obedience to Orders, he removed eight Miles further unto a plain and open Shoar.

61. The Britains ſent their Horſe and Chariots (which they commonly uſed in War) before, and followed with the reſt of their Forces. Cæſar found that his Men did not uſe the ſame courage as formerly in landing, for the Ships were ſo great, that they could not be brought near the Shoar, and the Soldiers were forced to wade deep with their heavy Armour, in places unknown; whereas the Britains well knowing where they were, managed their matters with great advantage. He cauſed the Gallies to be rowed toward the Shore, with which the Britains unacquainted, and thence offended with Slings, Engines and Arrows, began to give back. But ſtill the Soldiers lingering, by reaſon of the depth of the Sea, the Enſign-bearer of the tenth Legion deſiring the Gods that it might fall out happily to the Legion, told the Soldiers, That if they would forſake their Eagle, and betray it to the Enemy, for his own part he would do his duty both to the Common-wealth, and to his General. Therewith he caſt himſelf into the Sea, and carried the Eagle towards the Enemy, at which ſight the Romans exhorting one another not to ſuffer ſuch a diſhonour to be committed, all leaped out of the Ship, and were followed by others near at hand with great alacrity. The Fight on both ſides was very eager, the Romans ſtrugling with great diſadvantages, and keeping with the Enſign they firſt met. The Britains over-powred them, till Cæſar cauſed the Ship-boats and ſmaller Veſſels to be manned with Soldiers, and where he ſaw need, ſent them in to the reſcue. Having got footing on Land, his Men made Head together, charged the Enemy, and put them to flight. But the Horſemen were not able to purſue, nor take the Iſland; which thing (he ſaith himſelf) was only wanting to Cæſars wonted fortune.

Cæſar invadeth Britain.

62. But the Britains being overthrown in this Ingagement, ſent and ſurrendred themſelves, gave ſome Hoſtages, and promiſed that others ſhould be delivered, excuſing themſelves by ignorance for what was done amiſs, and caſting the blame upon the Multitude. Their People they commanded to return to their Quarters, but the Governours and Princes came out of all Parts, and commended themſelves and their States to Cæſar. Peace was hereby concluded, and four days after that he was come into Britain, the eighteen Ships appointed for the Horſemen put out to Sea with a gentle Wind, but, were ſo diſtreſſed with a Tempeſt, that when they were within view of the Roman Camp, ſome were forced to return to the Port from whence they came, others were driven to the Weſtward, and there caſting Anchor, took in ſo much water, that they were forced to direct their courſe back again to the Coaſt of Gall.

Sect. 6.

Moreover the Fleet that Cæſar brought over with him, as well Gallies as Ships of burthen, were miſerably diſtreſſed by the Tide, of which the Romans were ignorant; many were ſplit and rent in pieces, and the reſt loſt both Anchors, Cables, and other Tackling, and became altogether unſerviceable. Hereat the whole Army was exceedingly troubled, there being no Shipping to carry them back, nor Proviſions to ſuſtain them; for here in the Iſland they could not continue. And the Britiſh Princes knowing this; beſides, that they wanted Horſe, and conſidering the ſmallneſs of their Camp, (for Cæſar had tranſported his Forces without ſuch neceſſary Carriages as they uſed to take with them) they reſolved to intercept their Proviſions, keep them in till Winter, and ſo ſtarve them; concluding, that if they were cut off, no Man would ever after adventure to bring an Army into the Iſland.

The manner how the Brittains fought from their Chariots.

63. Cæſar gueſſed that the event of the loſing of his Shipping would be ſuch, eſpecially when he ſaw that they brought not their Hoſtages; therefore he fetcht in Corn out of the Fields, and ſo repaired his Ships, that he loſt but twelve of the number, the reſt being made able to abide the Sea. But the ſeventh Legion being ſent out for Corn, were ſet upon by the Britains, and over powered; which Cæſar ſuſpecting from a greater duſt than was uſually diſcovered in that Quarter, haſted thither, and found his Men incompaſſed with their Horſemen and their Chariots. Their manner of fighting in Chariots was to ride up and down, and caſt their Weapons as they ſaw advantage, and with the terror of their Horſes, and the ratling of their Wheels, to diſorder the Ranks; and when they brought themſelves within any Troops of Horſe, they forſook their Chariots, and fought on foot; in the mean time the Drivers would go a little aſide, and ſo place them, that upon occaſion they might have an eaſie paſſage, and help their Maſters. In all Fights they performed both the nimble motion of Horſemen, and the firm ſtability of Footmen, being ſo ready with daily practice, that they could ſtop in the declivity of a ſteep Hill, turn ſhort, or moderate their going as they pleaſed, and run along the Beam, and reſt upon the Yoak or Harneſs of their Horſes, and return as ſpeedily again when they thought fit.

He returns.

64. Cæſar came in to the reſcue in very good time; upon which the Enemy ſtood ſtill, and his Men received courage; but having ſtaid ſome time in the place, he thought not fit to provoke the Enemy, or give him Battel, and ſo drew off back again to his Camp. After this, by tempeſtuous weather, the Romans were kept in their Camp, and all Action prevented. But in the mean while the Britains incouraged one another from the ſmallneſs of the Roman Forces, and reſolved to attacque their Camp. Cæſar gave them battle before the Camp, and eaſily defeated them, of whom great ſlaughter was made, though he had with him but forty Horſe; and their Towns were burnt far and near. The ſame day they ſent to treat, and Cæſar required double Hoſtages to be brought over to him into Gall. For the Æquinoctial being at hand, he thought it not ſafe to put to Sea in Winter, and therefore a little after midnight he ſet ſail, and brought all his Ships ſafe to the Continent, only two of Burthen, not able to reach the ſame Harbour, put in ſomewhat lower in the Land; and when the three hundred Soldiers that were in them went on ſhoar, they were ſet upon by the Morini, but relieved at length by a Party of Horſe which Cæſar ſent. The next day he ſent T. Labienus againſt theſe revolted Morini, who having not whither now to eſcape, their Fenns and Boggs being dried up, fell under the power of his mercy. Q. Titurius and A. Cotta, two other Legates alſo, after they had waſted the Territories of the Menapii, who were retired into thick Woods, returned to Cæſar. He placed the wintering Camp amongſt the Belgæ, to which two only of the States of Britain ſent Hoſtages, the other neglecting. Theſe things being related by Cæſars Letters, the Senate decreed a Supplication for thirty days. Now the Ceremony of Supplication was this. After the Magiſtrate had publickly proclaimed that the General had happily and ſucceſsfully adminiſtred the Affairs of the Common-wealth, the Roman People cloathed in white, and crowned with Garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and there Sacrificed, to gratulate the Victory in his Name; and in this time they were forbidden all other buſineſs but what appertained to this Solemnity. At firſt it laſted but one or two days, then came to four, five, ten, afterward to fifteen in honour of Cæſar; and for his further Honour was now increaſed to the number of twenty.

65. Cæſar going into Italy from his Winter Quarters, as every year he was wont to do, when L. Domitius and Appius Claudius were Conſuls, gave order to his Legates to build as many Ships as they poſſibly could, and repair the old; and the new ones he would have lower and flatter for lading and unlading, and tranſporting Horſe, and all of them made for the uſe of Oars. From Gall within the Alps he paſſed to Cæſar de bello Gallico lib. 5.

Illyricum, where the Piruſtæ infeſted the Province, whom having terrified into a compliance, and received Hoſtages, he deputed certain Perſons to compound differences, and puniſh the guilty, and ſo he returned the ſame way he came to his Army into Gall. After his Arrival he went to the Treviri, whom he ſuſpected of a deſign to revolt, becauſe they came not to the Aſſembly of Eſtates, and for other reaſons. Amongſt them Indutiomarus and Cingetorix contended for Superiority, of whom the latter preſently came over to Cæſar; but the former reſolving upon War, ſecured all perſons unable to bear Arms in the Wood Arduenna, which being very large, began at the Rhine, and ran through the Treviri to the Borders of the People of Rheims: But finding all the chief to fall off, leſt he ſhould be left alone, he alſo ſubmitted. Cæſar reſolving upon another Expedition into Britain, accepted of two hundred Hoſtages, and reconciled the chief of the Treviri to Cingetorix, whom he found to be for his Intereſt; which ſo vexed Induciomarus, that of no friend he became to the Romans a bitter Enemy. Having ſetled matters there, he came back with the Legions to the Port Itius, (now of Calis) where finding things in good readineſs, and Horſe to the number of four thouſand, he reſolved to take over with him ſome of the Galls from among the chief Men of every City that were come to him. And he pitched in particular upon Dumnorix the Æduan, knowing him to be a Man deſirous of change, greedy of Rule, of courage and reſolution, and one of greateſt Authority. He was very unwilling to go, and when Intreaties could not prevail for his ſtay, he endeavoured to make a diſturbance, and when that would not do, he fled, but by Cæſars order was killed reſiſting, by thoſe that were ſent to purſue him.

The ſecond Expedition into Britain.

66. Cæſar having left Labienus in the Continent with three Legions, and two thouſand Horſe, to ſecure the Roman Intereſt, with five Legions, and as many Horſe as he left behind him, imbarqued in a Navy of in all above eight hundred Veſſels, and put out about Sun-ſetting with a ſoft South-wind. The Wind continued till mid-night, and then he was becalmed; but was carried with the Tide till morning, when he perceived the Iſland to lie on his right hand. By rowing as the Tide changed, he endeavoured to reach that place where he formerly landed, and this he did by the great induſtry of the Soldiers, who by Oars made the great Ships of Burthen to keep way with the Gallies. Arriving at high Noon, he found the Britains had been on the Coaſt, but upon ſight of ſo huge a number of Ships, they retired, and hid themſelves in the Woods. Having fortified his Camp, and left a Guard for his Ships, in the third Watch of the night, he marched towards them, and found them at twelve Miles diſtance, where at a River they made ſome oppoſition, but were beaten back and retired into a Wood. The Place was ſtrongly fortified both by Art and Nature, and ſeemed to be made for a defence in their Civil Wars. For all the Entrances were cloſed with great Trees laid overthwart the Paſſages. They endeavoured to hinder the Romans from entring the Fortification. But the Soldiers of the ſeventh Legion with a Teſtudo and a Mount took it, and drove them out of the Woods without any loſs; but being ignorant of the Place, he would not ſuffer them to purſue, reſolving to imploy the remaining part of the day in the further fortifying of his Camp.

67. The next day early he ſent out his Forces in three Companies to ſeek them out, but received news in a ſhort time from Q. Atrius, with whom he had left ten Cohorts and the charge of the Shipping, that the whole Navy by an hideous Tempeſt was either ſore beaten or caſt on Shore. Cæſar called back the Legions, and found that forty Ships were loſt, and the reſt not to be repaired but with great induſtry and pains. He choſe Carpenters and Shipwrights out of the Legions, cauſed others to be ſent for out of Gall, and wrote to Labienus to provide what Shipping he could. And how laborious ſoever it was, he thought fit to take up all the Ships on Shore, and bring them within the Fortification of his Camp; in which work, and fortifying the Camp, were ſpent ten days without intermiſſion either of day or night; and returning to the Place whence he came, he found the Britains in great numbers aſſembled, and the management of the War conferred on Caſſivellaun, whoſe Kingdom was divided from the Maritime States, by the River Thames, beginning at the Sea, and extending it ſelf for fourſcore Miles into the Iſland. He had made continual War with his neighbour States; but, upon coming of the Romans, they all forgot their home-bred quarrels, and caſt their whole Government upon him, as the fitteſt to direct in the War.

Britain, by whom inhabited.

68. Now, the inner part of Britain was inhabited by ſuch as were reported to be born in the Iſland, and the Maritime Coaſts by ſuch as came out of Belgia, either to make Incurſions or Invaſions; and after the War was ended, they continued in the Poſſeſſions they had gained, and were called by the Names of the Cities from whence they came. The Country was very Populous, and well inhabited with Houſes, much like unto them in Gall. They had great ſtore of Cattel, and uſed Braſs for Money, or Iron Rings weighed at a certain rate. In the Mediterranean Parts was found great quantity of Tin; and in the Maritime Parts Iron, but they had but little of that: their Braſs was brought in by other Nations. They had all ſorts of Trees, as in Gall, except the Fig and Beech. Their Religion would not ſuffer them to eat either Hare, Hen, or Gooſe; notwithſtanding they had of all ſorts, as well for novelty as variety. The Country, ſaith he, is more temperate, and not ſo cold as Gall. The Iſland lieth Triangular, whereof one ſide confronteth Gall, of which ſide that Angle wherein Cantium (or Kent) lies, is the uſual Place of landing from it, and pointeth to the Eaſt, and the other Angle to the South. This containeth about fifty Miles. Another ſide lieth toward Spain, and the Weſt, the ſame way that Hibernia, (or Ireland) being an Iſland half as big as Britain, and as far diſtant from it as Gall. In the mid way, betwixt Britain and Ireland, lieth Mona, (now Angleſey) and many other Iſles; of which ſome write, that in Winter time, for thirty days together, they have continual night, whereof we learned nothing by enquiry; only we found by certain meaſures of Water, that the Nights in Britain were ſhorter than in the Continent. The length of this ſide, according to the opinion of the Inhabitants, containeth ſeven hundred Miles. The third ſide lieth to the North, and the open Sea, ſaving that this Angle doth ſomething point towards Germany. This is thought to contain eight hundred Miles; and ſo the whole Iſland in circuit two thouſand. Of all the Inhabitants, they of Cantium are moſt courteous and civil, all their Country bordering upon the Sea, and little differing from the faſhion of Gall. Moſt of the In-land People ſow no Corn, but live upon Milk and Fleſh, cloathed with Skins, and having their Faces painted with a blew colour, that they may ſeem more terrible in fight: They have the hair of their Heads long, and all the parts of their Body ſhaven except their upper Lip. Their Wives are common to ten or twelve, eſpecially Brethren with Brethren, and Parents with Children; but the Children that are born, are put to them unto whom the Mother was firſt given in Marriage.

69. The Britiſh Cavalry and Chariots gave a ſharp oppoſition to the Roman Horſe in their march; but, Cæſar tells you, ſo as the Romans got the better every way, driving them with great ſlaughter to the Woods and Hills, and being too venterous in the Purſuit, they loſt certain of their own Men. After ſome intermiſſion of time, when the Romans little thought of them, and were buſied in fortifying their Camp, the Britains, from out of the Woods, ſuddenly charged upon ſuch as kept Watch before it. Cæſar ſent out two of the chiefeſt Cohorts of two Legions to aſſiſt their fellows. However he confeſſeth, that Q. Laberius Durus, a Tribune, was ſlain; and the Britains were repelled with more Cohorts which he ſent to relieve the fotmer; and he adds, that the Soldiers upon the Watch firſt ſet upon, and terrified with a ſtrange kind of Fight, while the Cohorts ſent to their relief fought with a Lane or Alley betwixt them, brake through, and came to their fellows. He owns farther, that the Fight happening in the view of all the Camp, it was plainly perceived, that the Legionary Soldiers, neither able for the weight of their Armour to purſue the Enemy, nor yet daring to go far from their ſeveral Enſigns, was not a fit Adverſary to conteſt this ſort of Enemy; and that the Horſe likewiſe fought with no leſs peril, in as much as the Enemy would retire back of purpoſe, and when they had drawn them a little from the Legions, they would then light from their Chariots, and incounter them with that advantage which is betwixt a Foot-man and an Horſeman. Beſides, they never fought thick and cloſe together, but thin, and at great diſtances, having ſtations of Men to ſuccour one another, to receive the weary, and to ſend out freſh Supplies.

Cæſar encounters with the Britains.

70. The next day they made a ſtand upen the Hills afar off, and ſhewed themſelves not ſo often, neither were they ſo buſie with the Roman Horſe as the day before. But about noon Cæſar ſent out three Legions, and all his Horſe to forage, and they made a ſudden aſſault upon the Foragers, and fell in cloſe with the Enſigns and the Legions. The Romans charged ſo fiercely, that they beat them back, and the Horſe incouraged by having the Legions behind them, put them to flight, and did great execution, giving them no reſpite to make Head, or forſake their Chariots. After this overthrow all their Auxiliaries forſook them; neither did they afterward contend with the Romans, with any great power. But Cæſar knowing their deſign, led his Army to the River Thameſis, and the Confines of Caſſivelaun, which River was paſſable by foot but in one place, and that very hardly. At his arrival he found a great a great power imbatteled on the other ſide, and the Bank fortified with many ſharp Stakes, and many other were alſo ſtuck under the water. Theſe things being diſcovered by the Captives and Fugitives, Cæſar put his Horſe before, and cauſed the Legions to follow preſently after; and notwithſtanding they had but their heads above water, the Soldiers proceeded with that violence, that the Enemy was not able to ſuſtain the Charge, but left the Bank, and betook themſelves to flight. Caſſivellaun having no courage to contend any further, diſmiſs'd moſt of his Forces, and retaining only four thouſand Chariots, obſerved the motions of the Romans, keeping the Woods whither he had driven the People and Cattel out of the Fields; and as their Horſe made any Sallies for Forage or Booty, he ſent his Chariots out upon them, and put them to great peril, in ſo much that the Horſe durſt never venture further than the Legions; neither was there any more ſpoil made in the Country, than what the Legionary Soldiers made themſelves.

71. In the mean time the Trinobantes, being almoſt the greateſt State in the Country, ſent to Cæſar their Ambaſſadors, to offer ſubmiſſion, and that Mandubratius might be ſent to reign amongſt them, and be protected from Caſſivellaun; for, his Father Imanuentius holding that Kingdom, had been ſlain by Caſſievllaun, and he had fled to Cæſar into Gall. Cæſar requiring forty Hoſtages from them, and Corn for his Army, ſent Mandubratius to them. After this the Cenimagni ſeeing how the Trinobantes were delivered from all violence, as alſo the Seguntiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Caſſi, yielded themſelves. From them he underſtood that the Town of Caſſivellaun was not far off; that it was fortified with Woods and Boggs, and well ſtored with Men and Cattle. Now the Britains call, ſaith he, a Town, ſome thick Wood incloſed about with a Ditch and Rampire, made for a place of Retreat, when they ſtand in fear of incurſions from the Borderers. Cæſar marched and found it well fortified both by Art and Nature. He aſſaulted it at two ſeveral places, and the Enemy unable to keep it, withdrew himſelf by a back way, and ſo he took it; therein he found great ſtore of Cattle, and ſlew many of the Britans.

73. In the mean time Caſſivellaun ſent into Kent, wherein were four ſeveral Kings, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax; them he commanded, with all the power they could make, to ſet upon the Camp where the Roman Navy was drawn up. The Kings obeyed his Order, but by a Sally made out upon them, were overthrown, many of their Men ſlain, and Lugotorix a great Commander taken Priſoner. The ill ſucceſs of this Attempt concurring with the former loſſes, and eſpecially the revolt of the fore-named States, moved Caſſivellaun to deſire peace. Cæſar was reſolved to winter in the Continent for fear of Commotions in Gall; and conſidered that the Summer was far ſpent, and might eaſily be lingred out. He therefore appointed what Hoſtages he would have, and what yearly Tribute the Britains ſhould pay to the Romans; and gave a ſtrict charge to Caſſivellaun to do no injury to Mandubratius, or the Trinobantes. Having received the Hoſtages, he found his Ships repaired, and at twice tranſported his Army over into Gall, which he was conſtrained to do, becauſe of the number of his Priſoners, and that ſome Veſſels were caſt away.

73. This is the account which Cæſar himſelf gives us of his two Expeditions into this Iſland, of the behaviour of the Britains, and the ſucceſs. We have no relation of the Britains themſelves to compare with it, who probably would have told us ſeveral paſſages; which either he did not obſerve, or wittingly omitted. As to the main of the Affair, other Writers have agreed, that he rather affrighted the Inhabitants, than performed any great matter. Tacitus ſaith, he rather ſhewed than delivered Britain to the Romans. Eutropius writes, That in his firſt Expedition he was wearied with bitter fight, and ſeized with an adverſe Tempeſt; but Lucan (indeed no great friend to the Family of the Cæſars) ſings how he ran away in a fright from the Britains, whom he had ſought out. To ſpeak indifferently, his Narration of this Britiſh War is ſomething odd and different from other parts of his Hiſtory, in the boldneſs of Style, and vigour of Spirit, wherein he excelled. In relating the Skirmiſhes that hapned in the march of the Romans, he makes rather excuſes why his Men did no better, than any thing elſe. He acknowledgeth, that the Legionary Soldiers, by reaſon of their heavy Armour, and becauſe they durſt not go from their ſeveral Enſigns, were not a fit Adverſary to conteſt this kind of Enemy. And yet he alſo acknowledges, that his Horſe fought with no leſs danger, by reaſon of the advantage the Britains received from the nimble management of their Chariots, and their manner of fighting and ſuccouring one another. He confeſſeth that his Horſe was put to great peril, and for that Caſſivellaun ſent his Chariots by unknown ways, and ſurprized them, they durſt never adventure farther than the Legions, neither was there

Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis

The ſucceſs of Cæſar queſtioned.

Sect. 6. there any more ſpoil made in the Country than what the Legionary Soldiers made themſelves.

74. It's to be feared, that had not the Revolt of the Trinobantes, and other States happened, Cæſar would have been put more to his invention to excuſe his want of ſucceſs, and by reaſon of the temptation accompanying ſuch as write Commentaries of their own Acts, to make fairer gloſſes and flouriſhes than poſſibly the ſeverity of truth might require. However, wanting direct matter to oppoſe him, we ſhall not undertake the buſineſs. Suetonius tells us the report went, that he came over into Britain to ſeek for Pearls, to which the relation made by Pliny doth bear ſome teſtimony, who writes, that being returned victorious out of the Iſland, he dedicated Cambden in Brit. a Breaſt-plate made of Britiſh Pearls to Venus Genetrix in her Temple. The place where he landed is believed to have been Deal, where the Coaſt is flat, and eaſie of acceſs, and ſome riſings of ground are to be ſeen, which the Inhabitants call Romeſworke. He paſſed the River near Otelands in Surrey, at a place called Coway Stakes, from the Stakes which Beda in his time ſaid were ſtill to be ſeen, as big as a Mans Thigh, and covered with Lead, ſticking in the bottom of the River. The Town of Caſſivelliun is thought to have been Verulam, in the Hundred of Caiſhow, afterward a famous Municipium of the Romans. To conclude this matter concerning Cæſars Expeditions into Britain, I know no Hiſtorical Relations Authentick, before thoſe that he hath made; neither do I think, that we have any thing certain concerning Britiſh Affairs before his time, except what I have ſaid concerning the Caſſiterides, and that Divitiacus King of the Sueſſiones had Dominion here. As for them that will have a Brute, let them have a Brute if they will; but give leave to them that will have no Brute, to have no Brute; as he ſaid concerning the May-pole. Now Cæſar again in Gall. let us follow Cæſar into Gall.

75. Having held a Councel of the Galls at Samarobrina, he found that by reaſon of the ſcarcity of Corn which had followed a drought, there was more neceſſity of diſperſing his Army into their Winter Quarters, than there had been the years before. To ſeveral Officers he gave ſeveral Legions to be placed in ſeveral Countries, yet all within an hundred Miles, except that where L. Roſcius ſetled, in a quiet and peaceable part. This was, as the preſent Copies have it, amongſt the Eſſui. But our Geographer Monetus tells us, that in Cæſars Commentaries ſeveral forged People are put for true and genuine, by unskilful Tranſcribers or Interpreters; and he inſtanceth in this place, where he ſaith, That inſtead of Eſſui is to be read Seſuvii, the word being corrupted firſt, by tranſpoſing the two former Letters, and one put out of the middle. He tells us, That the Aulerci Diablintes, or Diablitæ, being one, were divided into two private People, viz. the Selſuvii, (now thoſe of the Territory of Sees in Normandy) who poſſeſſed the upper and Northern Parts, whoſe Metropolis was Noviodunum, now Sees; and the Arovii, inhabiting the lower and Southern, (now the People of the Territory of Alanſon) whoſe chief Seat was Vagoritum or Alangon. Now he gives a reaſon why Cæſar calls this Tract of theirs quiet and peaceable. Becauſe in the bordering Nation of the Carnutes reigned Taſgetius, a great lover of Cæſar, who contained the neighbouring Nations in the bounds of peace.

76. Cæſar indeed continues his Narration by telling us, that there was now among the Carnutes a Man of great Birth called Taſgetius, whoſe Anceſtors had born the chief Rule in their State. That this Man for his ſingular valour and good will towards him, (for he had done him very good ſervice in all his Wars) he reſtored to the Dignity of his Fore-fathers. But before he had reigned three years, his Enemies, by a conſpiracy of divers of his Citizens, killed him in the open Streets; which thing was complained of to Cæſar. He fearing, that in regard ſo many Men had an hand in the Murther, the City, at their inſtigation, might revolt, commanded L. Plancus immediately to march thither with his Legion from his Quarter in Belgium, and there to winter; with Orders to apprehend ſuch as were Ringleaders in the death of Taſgetius, and ſend them to him. Bur fifteen days had ſcarcely paſſed after the Legions were ſetled in their wintering Camps, but a Commotion happened; and Sabinus and Cotta, who wintered amongſt the Eburones, were attaqued by Ambiorix and Catinulcus, who commanded that People, at the inſtigation of Induciomarus of Triers, who owed Cæſar an ill turn, and now thought it a fit time to pay him. The Romans ſo well defended themſelves, that they could not compaſs their ends, which when Ambiorix perceived, he betook himſelf to a fraudulent practice. Having deſired that ſome might be ſent to treat with him, he pretended he was conſtrained to do what he did by the People, the Galls having univerſally agreed to fall upon the Romans in their diſperſed Quarters that day; he pretended great love and gratitude to Cæſar for great benefits received from him, and in way of return adviſed, that foraſmuch as there was a great number of Germans coming, they would remove from that Camp, and joyn themſelves either to Q. Cicero or Labienus, of whom the one was not paſt fifty miles off, and the other but a little farther. And he affirmed by Oath, that they ſhould have ſafe paſſage through his Territories.

77. A Council of War met to conſult what to do, where by the vehemence of Titurius Sabinus it was carried that they ſhould diſcamp: and all things were diſpoſed in ſuch ſort, as to make the Soldiers believe they could not ſtay without danger, and that the danger might be augmented by being wearied with watching. As ſoon as it was light they began their march, in length, and with as much Baggage as they were able to carry; and ſome two miles off were way-laid by the Galles, who in the Woods had placed two Ambuſcados. Titurius now ran about like a diſtracted man, and ſo fearfully and after ſuch a manner did he diſpoſe his Cohorts, as if all things had gone againſt them, as it happeneth for the moſt part to ſuch as are forced to conſult in the inſtant of Execution. Cotta, who had thought what would happen, and was againſt the Journey, did all things required, both from a General and a private Soldier, and it was proclaimed that the Romans ſhould forſake their Baggage, and caſt themſelves into an Orb. This was not to be reproved; but the Enemy then conceived hope, out of apprehenſion that they were diſcouraged and poſſeſſed with fear. And though they made briſk ſallies with good execution, yet the Galles by advice of Ambiorix gave way to them, purſued them in their retreat, and then by their miſſile Weapons ſorely diſtreſſed them as they ſtood in their Orb. Many being killed, and ſome excellent Soldiers wounded, Titurius the cauſe of all the miſchief went over to Ambiorix his Friend, and intreated him to ſpare him and his Soldiers, and he gave him good words till he was incircled about and ſlain. The Galles then crying out victory with a great noiſe, aſſaulted the Romans and routed their Troops. Cotta was ſlain, and moſt part of the Soldiers with him. The reſt returned to their Camp, amongſt whom L. Petroſidius, the Eagle-bearer, when he ſaw himſelf overcharged, caſt his Eagle within the Rampire, and fighting with great courage within the Camp was killed. The reſt with much ado indured the fight till Night, and then deſpairing of ſuccour killed themſelves. Some few eſcaped; and by unknown ways through the Woods got to Labienus, and acquainted him how all things had fallen out.

Titurius and Cotta defeated and ſlain.

78. Ambiorix puffed up with this ſucceſs, uſing all ſpeed imaginable, got to the Aduatici his Neighbours, and from the late ſucceſs eaſily perſwaded them, the Nervii and others, to purſue their good fortune, and to attacque the Camp where Cicero wintered. Many Soldiers ſent out upon Forraging, they cut off, and violently attacqued the Camp, which the Romans as valiantly defended, and that for ſeveral days together, ſtill making preparations by Night for the defence of the following Day. In one Night were built one hundred and twenty Towers. No reſt was given to ſick or wounded. Stakes hardned with fire were prepared, many mural Piles made, the Towers floored, and Pinacles and other devices framed. Cicero himſelf though ever ſickly and of a weak Conſtitution, reſted not by night till the Soldiers of their own accord by way of intreaty compelled him to ſpare himſelf. The Nervii ſeeing things not to ſucceed, indeavoured by fair words and the like Arguments to deceive Cicero as Ambiorix did Sabinus, but in vain. And when this would not do, they drew a Ditch and a Rampire round about the Camp, according as they had learnt by converſation with the Romans and from Fugitives. They had no Iron Tools for this purpoſe, but cut the Turf with their Swords, gathered Earth with their Hands, and carried it away in their Mantles; yet was the Rampire eleven foot high, and the Ditch fifteen foot deep, and the Fortification of fifteen Miles in circuit, finiſhed in leſs than three hours, whereby may be gathered what multitudes of People there were at the ſeige. And they provided Towers, Hooks and ſtrong Penthouſes for ſafeguard, as the Captives inſtructed them.

Cicero beſieged in his Camp.

79. The ſeventh day of the ſiege they caſt hot balls of Clay out of Slings, and burning Darts upon the Cabbins of the Romans, which being thatched with Straw, after the manner of the Galles, took fire, and the day being windy, it was carried over all the Camp. Then did they with all their force with ſcaling Ladders, and ſuch Engines as they had, attacque them, but by the great valour of the Roman Soldiers who attended their Fortification, and never looked back at the burning of their Wealth, they were repulſed, and a Tower they had made was burned. The Centurions of the third Cohort drew back their men from the place, and

and bid the Enemy enter if they thought good; but none durſt adventure to make a trial. Here was remarkable the valour of two Centurions Pulſio and Varenus, who were at perpetual contention amongſt themſelves who ſhould be firſt preferred, coming on apace to the Dignity of the firſt Orders. Pulſio iſſued out upon the Enemy, and drew the other after him, and they were both difficultly ingaged, and each ſaved the others life, and came off upon ſuch equal terms, that it could not be diſcerned who had got the greateſt honour.

Relieved by Cæſar.

80. But the ſeige daily growing hotter, and many Meſſengers having been ſent with Letters to Cæſar, but intercepted, and ſome of them tortured to death before the Camp, at length one of them being a Gall, of the Nation of the Nervii, by his Habit and Demeanour eſcaped their obſervation, and reached Cæſar with the Letters. He ſent for ſeveral Legions that lay neareſt in Quarters; but Labienus being in a manner allready beſeiged by the Treviri; he could get but two; however with them he marched, uſing all celerity, and hired a Gall to convey a Letter to Cicero of his coming, which he did by tying it, according to his directions, and throwing it into the Camp. It hapned to ſtick on a Turret, and there ſtuck for two days, but at length diſcovered and read, being in Greek Characters, it brought no ſmall joy to the beſeiged, which was confirmed in them ſhortly by the ſight of the fires. The Enemy upon diſcovery hereof raiſed the ſeige and went toward Cæſar, of which Cicero ſent him notice by his former Meſſenger. He perceiving himſelf much overmatched in numbers (he having but ſeven, and the Galls ſome ſixty thouſand men) fortified his Camp, and by counterfeiting fear, drew the Enemy over a Valley before his Camp, to a place very diſadvantageous for them. They were confident of Victory, and made ſome briſk attempts; but he ſallied out upon them from all Ports at once, eaſily put them to flight with great ſlaughter, and not thinking fit to purſue them into the Woods, went to the Camp of Cicero, whom he incouraged, together with his valiant Legion, and comforted them in the revenge of the loſs lately ſuſtained through the temerity of Sabinus the Legate. The report of Cæſars victory put a ſtop to ſeveral Deſigns of the Galles, of attacquing other Wintring Camps of the Romans; but upon the noiſe of the overthrow of Sabinus, great Combinations had been made, and Reſolutions taken for proſecuting that Advantage, and now they were ſtill promoted by Induciomarus, who beſtirred himſelf all manner of ways againſt the Roman Intereſt. He cauſed a Council of Arms to be called, which according to the manner of the Galles was allways the beginning of a War, being ſuch as conſtrained all men of years, by the Common Law of the Land to aſſemble together prepared; and he that came laſt was in the ſight of all the reſt put to death with exquiſite torture. His firſt attempt he told them ſhould be to take the Camp of Labienus in the Marches of the Treviri, amongſt the men of Rheimes. And accordingly he beſeiged him, who counterfeited fear the more eaſily to draw him on, but when he and his men inſulted, he cauſed to iſſue out the Horſe which he got in readineſs, which with ſome Cohorts eaſily put the Braggadocio's to flight, and killed Induciomarus as they had it given in eſpecial charge, before any other execution performed. His Head was brought into the Camp from the Foard of a River wherein he was ſurprized; which being known, the Eburones and Nervii departed home, and afterward Cæſar had Gall better ſetled and quiet.

Induciomarus killed.

Cæſar de Bello Gallico lib. 6.

81. But for all this he found reaſon to fear greater commotions, and therefore to let the Galles ſee what the Romans could do, he raiſed new Forces, and procured Pompey the Proconſul, foraſmuch as he continued at the City, about publick buſineſſes, to recall to their Enſigns, and ſend to him ſuch Soldiers as he had raiſed in Gall within the Alps when he was Conſul. By this means, before Winter was ended, three Legions were inrolled, and brought unto him, whereby that number of Cohorts was doubled which was left with Titurius. Though Induciomarus was dead, the Treviri gave the Government to his Kindred, and drew Ambiorix into their ſociety. The Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii and all the Germans beyond the Rhine were in Arms; the Senones being ſummoned came not, but were in Council with the Carnutes and other neighbouring States. Cæſar therefore thought it beſt to begin betimes and ſurprize them; and ſo he did the Nervii, whom ſodainly invading he waſted their Country, took a great number of men and Cattel, and cauſed the People to come in and give Pledges; which buſineſs having ſpeedily ended, he brought back the four Legions into their wintering Camps.

82. In the begining of Spring he called a General Aſſembly of all the States in Gall; from which the Senones, Carnutes and Treviri only abſenting themſelves, he took it for a Defection. That he might ſeem to ſet all other things apart, he transferred the Council to Lutetia, a Town of the Pariſii, who were Confines to the Senones, and in the memory of their Fathers had united their State unto them, but were held cleer of this Confederacy. The ſame day he marched, and by great journies came into the Territories of the Senones, who ſurprized with his ſodain Arrival, ſued for pardon, and obtained it by mediation of the Ædui: and the Carnutes obtained the like favour by means of the Remi, upon giving Hoſtages as the other had done. Now did Cæſar bend his indeavours to reduce the Treviri and Ambiorix. He underſtood that he had friendſhip with the Menapii (People of Geldres and Cleve) who being incloſed with Bogs and Woods, had never ſent to Cæſar about any contract of Peace. Them he invaded, and by waſting the Country brought them to ſubmit; and he accepted of their ſubmiſſion, on condition that they would not receive him into their Country, or any Meſſengers from him.

Labienus defeateth the Treviri.

83. In the mean time the Treviri were got together to attacque Labienus, who was come into their Confines, and they expected the arrival of ſome Germans to their aſſiſtance. Betwixt them and Labienus there was a River, and he being poſted on an advantagious ground, did all he could to draw the Enemy over to fight before the Germans ſhould come to them. And by counterfeiting fear, and pretending to fly and forſake his Camp, he drew them over; and then turning head defeated them, and took in their whole State. For the Germans hearing of their overthrow returned home, and with them went the Kinſmen of Induciomarus, the Author of the Defection, who being gone, the Government was given to Cingetorix, and he from the beginning had been true and faithful to the Romans. Cæſar being come from the Menapii to the Treviri, paſſed over by Bridge again into Germany to chaſtize ſuch as had ſent ſuccours and ſupplies to them, and that Ambiorix might have no entertainment againſt them. He found by the information of the Ubii, that the Suevi had been the Offenders, and they upon his coming had retired to their utmoſt Confines, where was a Wood of an infinite greatneſs, called Bacenis, which ſerved for a Rampire and defence to keep the Cheruſci from the incurſions of the Suevi, and the Suevi from the injuries of the Cheruſci. At the entrance of this Wood they expected the coming of Cæſar, who here makes a ſtop without entring, and inſtead of an attack, gives us a more profitable account concerning the Cuſtoms and manner of Life both of Galls and Germans.

The Cuſtoms of the Galls.

84. As for Gall, not only in every City, Village and Precinct there were Factions and Parties; but almoſt in every particular Houſe. Before Cæſar came into Gall, the two great Parties were of the Ædui and Sequani, of whom the later got the better, till he by his Power and Intereſt repaired the Authority of the other, and alſo brought the Remi into repute; ſo that at this time in Power and Authority the Ædui excelled all other States, and next unto them were the Remi. Throughout all, there were but two ſorts of men of any Reckoning or Account. For the Common-people were in the condition of Servants, and of no value in themſelves, nor admitted to the publick Councils, but kept under by Debts, Tributes, or oppreſſion of the great ones, and putting themſelves into the ſervice of the Nobles, who had the ſame power over them as Lords injoyed over their Slaves. The two ſorts were one of the Druides and another of thoſe Cæſar calleth Equites. The Druides managed matters of their Religion which they expounded, and gave order for the publick and private Sacrifices. To them being held in great veneration, the Youth reſorted for Learning, and they determined almoſt all Cauſes betwixt publick and private Perſons. Controverſies both Criminal and Civil they decided, rewarded the virtuous and puniſhed the wicked. If any, either private man or State, did not obey their Decree, they interdicted him their Sacrifice; and this was the greateſt puniſhment amongſt them. For ſuch as were thus interdicted, were reckoned in the number of impious and wicked men; every man left their Company, and avoided to meet or ſpeak with them, leſt they ſhould receive any hurt by their Contagion: neither had they any benefit of the Law, though deſiring it, neither was any Reſpect or Honour communicated to them.

The Druides,

85. Over all the Druides one preſided with chief Authority, who was ſucceeded by him that next excelled, and if equals pretended, they went to election, which ſometimes was attended with force and Arms. They met at a certain time of the year in the Confines of the Carnutes, being the middle part of Gall, where they ſate in a ſecret place, and determined Controverſies from all quarters. The Art and Learning of the Druides was firſt found out in Britain and was thought thence to have been tranſlated into Gall; and in Cæſars time ſuch as would attain to the perfect knowledge of that Diſcipline, travelled hither to learn it. The Druides were exempt from Warfare, Tribute and all other Duties incumbent upon other men, which allured many to the Profeſſion. They were ſaid to learn many verſes, and ſome to have applied themſelves to that learning twenty years. To commit any thing to writing it was unlawful; in other publick and private buſineſſes they made uſe of Greek Letters, but they ſeemed to do it, that their knowledge might not become common and vulgar, and that their Scholars might not truſt ſo much to writings as to their memory, it happening for the moſt part, that men relying upon Books and Papers, in the mean time omit the benefit of good remembrance. Their indeavour was chiefly to teach that the ſouls of men do not dye, but remove out of one Body into another, which they thought very important to ſtir men up to virtue, and to neglect the fear of death. They alſo diſputed and delivered many Traditions to the Youth concerning the Stars and their motions, the magnitude of the Earth and the World, the nature of things, and the might and power of the Gods.

Their Learning had its original here in Britain.

What they taught.

The Equites.

86. The other ſort of men amongſt them were Equites, who upon all occaſions, as before Cæſar his coming there never wanted, were converſant in War, each according to his Power and Wealth being attended with Clients and Followers, which they eſteemed the only note of Nobility and Greatneſs. The whole Nation was much addicted to that they accounted Religion. If ſick, or ingaged in War, they would either ſacrifize men, or vow the oblation of themſelves. Uſing herein the miniſtery of the Druides, they conceived that the Immortal Deity could not be pleaſed but by giving the life of one man for another, and to that purpoſe they had publick Sacrifices appointed. They burned men in Images made of Oſiers. The Execution of Thieves and Robbers they thought moſt pleaſing to the Gods, but wanting them they ſpared not the Innocent. They chiefly worſhipped Mercury as the Inventor of all Arts, the Conductor in all Voyages, and having great power in all Merchandize and gain of Money. Next to him they preferred Apollo, Mars, Jupiter and Minerva, having the ſame opinion of them as other Nations. They vowed to Mars the ſpoil of an Enemy they were to incounter, and ſuch Beaſts as they took they ſacrificed; other things they laid up in ſome ſacred place, heavy puniſhment being inflicted upon any that either kept back, or took them away.

The Religion of the Galles.

Other Cuſtoms.

87. Being made believe by the Druides that they were deſcended from the God Dis, they boaſted themſelves in their deſcent. For that reaſon they determined the ſpaces of time by the number of Nights, not of Dayes, obſerving their Nativities and the beginnings of their Months and years, ſo as the Day followed the Night. Contrary to the cuſtom of other Nations they ſuffered not their Children to come publickly unto them till fit for War. To the Portions of their Wives they added as much of their own; and the uſe of all the mony was laid apart, and together with the principal Coin to the Surviver. They had power of life and death both over Wives and Children. The death of great men was wont to be inquired into by the Kindred, and a ſuſpected wife was examined by torture; if guilty, put to death by fire and all other torments to be imagined. Their Funerals, as their Life, were magnificent and ſumptuous, and with the Corps was burned whatſoever the man delighted in, not ſparing living Creatures: Nay, not long before the time that Cæſar wrote, the cuſtom was to bury ſuch Clients and Servants with him as he had favoured in his Life-time. Such Nations as were careful, prohibited by a ſpecial Law, the communicating of Rumors or Reports concerning matters of State, to any but a Magiſtrate; it being found that raſh and unſkilful men had been put upon dangerous attempts by ſuch reports. The Magiſtrates kept ſecret what they thought fit, and what not they publiſhed; but it was not lawful, except in State Aſſemblies, to ſpeak of State Affairs.

The Cuſtoms of the Germans.

88. The Germans, Cæſar adds, did much differ from the Galles in their courſe of Life, for they had neither Druides nor Sacrifices. Nor Gods did they worſhip but ſuch as they could ſee, and by whom they were manifeſtly benefitted, as the Sun, Vulcan, and the Moon. In hunting, or in War they ſpent their lives, being from their Childhood inured to labour. They liked of ſuch as continued longeſt beardleſs amongſt them, ſome thinking it to conduce to their Stature, others to their Strength and Sinews. Before twenty years of age they held it abominable to know a Woman; and ſuch matters could not be hid; for they bathed themſelves together in Rivers, and uſed Skins and other ſmall coverings on their Reins, but were naked on the reſt of the body. They uſed no Tillage, the greateſt part of their Food being Milk, or Cheeſe, or Fleſh. Their Magiſtrates and Princes every year alotted certain portions of Lands to Kindreds and Tribes that inhabited together, where and as they thought convenient; and the next year appointed them in a new place; and this they thought they did for ſeveral good reaſons. In caſe of War a State made choice of Magiſtrates to have the command with power of Life and Death; but in time of peace they had no common Magiſtrate, but the Principal Perſons of the Regions and Pagi interpreted the Law, and determined Controverſies.

89. Theft committed out of the Confines was commended as an exerciſe of the Youth. Such as would not follow their Great men in an exploit publickly declared, were held in the number of Traitors, and had never any credit afterward. Strangers they religiouſly protected from all injuries, to ſuch every mans Houſe being open and his Table common. The time was when the Galls excelled the Germans in valour, and made War upon them, and by reaſon of the multitude of People, and want of Ground, ſent many Colonies over the Rhine into Germany. By that means thoſe fertile places of Germany lying near the Wood Hercynia (known by the name of Orcinia to Eratoſthenes and other Greeks) were poſſeſſed by the Volcæ Tectoſages, who in Cæſars time ſtill there inhabited and retained their antient opinion of Juſtice and Military Glory. The Germans ſtill continued in the ſame poverty and patience as in former times, uſing the ſame Diet and Apparel; but the Galls having knowledge of other neighbouring Nations, lived in a more plentiful manner, and had by little and little been overthrown and weakned, ſo that at this time they ſtood not in compariſon with the Germans. The Hercynian Wood was nine days journey over; for they had no difference, he ſaith, of ſpace, but by days and journeys, as at this day in thoſe Countries they reckon not how far it is to ſuch a place by Miles or Leagues, but ſay it is ſo many hours to ſuch a Town or City. It began at the Confines of the Helvetii, Nemetes and Rauraci, and ran along the Danube as far as the Daci, whence it declined to the left ſide, and by reaſon of its large extention, bordered on many other Countries. No German could ſay that he himſelf had gone, or heard that any other had reached to its beginning, though therein he had travelled threeſcore days. In this Wood, he ſaith, were many ſorts of wild Beaſts not to be ſeen in any other place. He inſtanceth in one like a Hart, and the Beaſts called Uri ſomewhat leſſer than an Elephant. But moſt remarkable was that other ſort called Alces and remarkable indeed, not for being like a Goat, ſomewhat bigger and without Horns, but having their Legs without Joynts, ſo that when they took their reſt, they neither ſate nor lay upon the ground, but leaned againſt Trees; and if they chanced to fall could not riſe again. The Hunters therefore, to catch them, were wont either to undermine or ſo far cut the Trees, that with their weight, leaning upon them, they might bear them down and fall with them. And who would not but give mony now to ſee this rare ſort of Beaſt?

Colonies ſent out of Gall into Germany.

Cæſar quits Germany.

90. But Cæſar thought fit to return, and no further purſue the Suevi; but to leave ſome terror behind him, he cut down part of the Bridge next to the Ubii, the length of two hundred foot, and in the end of that which remained built a Tower of four ſtories, and left a Gariſon of twelve Cohorts with young C. Volcatius Tullus to defend it. He himſelf, as the Corn ripened, went forward to the war of Ambiorix, by way of the Wood of Arduenna, the greateſt in Gall, extending from the Banks of the Rhine, and the Confines of the Treviri, to the Seat of the Nervii, and carrying a breadth of five hundred miles. He ſent before him L. Minutius Baſilius with all the Cavalry, who ſurprized Ambiorix, and took all his Horſes and Chariots; but he himſelf eſcaped on Horſeback, being aſſiſted in his flight by the Woods, that were about his Houſe; for the Galles to avoid heat did commonly build near to Woods and Rivers. The People had by Ambiorix his advice betaken themſelves into Woods, Bogs, Iſlands and other places of Refuge. Cativulcus King of one part of the Eburones being drawn in by him, curſed him for it doing, and not able by reaſon of his age to undergo the trouble of War or Fight, drank the juice of Yew (whereof was great ſtore in Gall and Germany) and poyſoned himſelf.

Ambiorix defeated.

91. The Eburones being ſo diſperſed that Cæſar could do no good upon them, he gave notice to the Neighbouring Nations, that all men ſhould have liberty to ſack and make a ſpoil of their Country, for he durſt not ſuffer the Legionary Soldiers to ſtragle from their Enſigns. Upon the noiſe of this, the Sicambri dwelling in Germany next to the Rhine, ſent over a Party of two thouſand Horſe, which got

Sect. 6.

got great booty, being bred and born in Theft and War. But being by one of the Captains informed, that in a place called Vatuco the Romans had left all their Baggage, they took him for their Guide, and went alſo thither. For there Cæſar had placed it, having divided his Army into three Parties, and ſent them to ſuch Quarters as he thought convenient, he himſelf going to the River Scaldis (now the Scelde) to hunt out Ambiorix, but with purpoſe to return after ſeven days. There he had left Q. Cicero with the fourteenth Legion newly raiſed, and two hundred Horſe for a guard. Of theſe, five Cohorts went out to gather Forage with three hundred old Soldiers that had been left, becauſe infirm. The Sicambri having firſt attempted to break into the Camp, ſet upon theſe Romans as they returned. And they cut off moſt of them that belonged to the Cohorts, being raw and unexperienced; but the old Soldiers ſo diſcreetly ordered their matters, that they brake through their Enemies and got to the Camp. The Sicambri now out of hope to take the Camp, returned with their Booty over the Rhine, and Cæſar alſo returned ſeaſonably; for the Soldiers were in ſuch fear, that they would not believe but that the Legions were cut off. The Country being moſt grievouſly depopulated he brought his Army back to Duro cortum in the State of the Remi, where an Aſſembly was called to queſtion the conſpiracy of the Senones and Carnutes. By order taken therein, Acco the great Ringleader was put to death, as others had been, had they not eſcaped. This done, Cæſar diſperſed his Troops into their Wintering Camps, and having made proviſion of Corn went into Italy, to hold the Aſſemblies as he was wont.

Acco put to death.

Stirs in the City.

See Appian. de bello civil. l. 2.

92. Now with Cæſar let us make for Italy and, a ſtep further than his Journey, to Rome it ſelf. There we ſhall find him deeply concerned while he was fighting with the Galls; for, his Daughter Julia, the Wife of Pompey, while he was thus imployed, died in Childbed, and the Infant with her. Hereby was the Bond of Friendſhip betwixt them diſſolved, and their mutual emulation and envy which thereby had been reſtrained, now wanted but an occaſion to vent it ſelf. The following year produced great ſtirs in the City, and thoſe no leſs in Gall. For now were the times ſo altered, that Rome could not be found in Rome. Nothing was managed by antient equity and moderation, all Offices were purchaſed by Money, or elſe by Stones, Clubs, or Swords; and the inconveniences of popular Government now grew ripe, the name of a Free-State, or Commonwealth, covering the greateſt injuſtice, diſorder, and oppreſſion of the Peoples liberty. The Conſuls being debarred by the power of the Tricipitina from leading out Armies, or waging Wars according to the antient right and cuſtom, made up their Markets out of the publick Revenue, or their Offices by indirect practices, and therefore none of honour would ſeek after the Conſulſhip. Pompey connived at this, hoping that a neceſſity of affairs would draw upon him the Dictatorſhip, as ſome of his Creatures, though not in his name, did not ſtick to hint. This year eſpecially was there ſuch an horrid contention amongſt the Canditates (all or moſt men of large Conſciences) that for a long time no Conſul could be elected; and this heightned the matter, that T. Annius Milo, one of them, being at great enmity with Clodius, killed him as he met him in the way not far from the City. This fact the People ill reſented, and naughty, and diſſolute perſons, under pretence of ſearching for Milo's Friends, committed many outrages in Rome. This turned indeed all mens eyes upon Pompey, as the fitteſt perſon to redreſs thoſe evils; but whilſt they thought of making him Dictator, Cato drew the Senate to this reſolution, that he ſhould be made Conſul alone, that he might be called to an account for his male adminiſtration if need were, and ſo he was made ſole Conſul, without any Precedent at all. Firſt, he ſate in Judgement alone, and examined Milo's caſe; he alſo made inquiſition after ſuch as had by indirect means procured Offices. Milo was defended by Cicero, or rather ſhould have been; for the Orator was ſo terrified by Pompeys Soldiers, and Clodius his Friends, that he could not proceed, and is therefore ſaid to have written that Oration afterwards, which is now extant. Milo then was baniſhed, with ſeveral others for other Crimes. Pompey having hitherto as it were executed the Office of Dictator, took to him a Collegue, Q. Scipio Metellus, whoſe Daughter Cornelia he had married. Theſe things being heard in the further Gall, and a rumour ſpread that Cæſar, who was now in Italy, would be there retained by the motions in the City, many of the Natives conſpired for the recovery of their liberty, and choſe Vercingetorix for their Captain.

Milo killeth Clodius.

Pompey made Conſul alone. His Acts.

A.M. 3953. Ol. 182. ann. 1. V. C. 702. Ante Chriſt. 50. Idem ibid. Plutarch in Pompeio. Livii Epitom. lib. 107.

The Galls hearing of theſe ſtirs rebel.

93. Cæſar

Cæſar de bello Gallico, lib. 7.

93. Cæſar in Italy heard of the death of Clodius, and of a Decree made by the Senate touching the Aſſembly of the young Soldiers of that Country; whereupon he reſolved to raiſe Men in all the Province. The Galles hearing of theſe things, added other rumours, and that Cæſar, detained by troubles at Rome, could not return to his Army. They ſtirred up one another now to make haſt, and recover their ancient liberty: And the Carnutes made themſelves the chief of the War, and for fear of diſcovery, not daring to take, and receive Hoſtages, they ſtrengthned their Covenants by Oaths and mutual Collation of their Military Enſigns, the moſt religious and binding Ceremony amongſt them. And the Carnutes began the work by falling upon ſome Roman Citizens that lay about their own concerns at Genabum, whom they ſlew, and ſeized their Goods. The report thereof was quickly ſpread throughout Gall, by that ordinary means whereby they were wont to ſignifie any extraordinary matter. It was by an out-cry and ſhout, which begun by ſome, was taken by others, and delivered to the next, and ſo went from one to another ſo ſpeedily, that what was done at Genabum at Sun-riſing, was, before the firſt Watch of the night, heard in the Confines of the Arverni, which was above one hundred and threeſcore Miles.

The Galles again revolt.

94. In like manner Vercingetorix, of the Nation of the Arverni, being the Son of Celtillus, and named King by his People, though they had ſlain his Father for attempting to ſet up a Kingdom, perſwaded them to revolt, and though oppoſed and caſt out of the Town of Gergovia by his Uncle Gobantio, and thoſe of the contrary Party, got together a great Force, and expelled his Adverſaries by whom he had been caſt out. The Senones, the Pariſii, Pictones, Cadurci, the Turones, Aulerci, Lemovices, Andes, and all the reſt that bordered upon the Ocean quickly joyned in confederacy with him. He took Hoſtages of them, rated every City, and made proviſion of Horſe eſpecially. To extraordinary diligence he added extraordinary ſeverity, and the Bituriges ſided with him, their Patrons the Ædui having in vain attempted to protect them from him. Beſides this, Lueterius, one of the Cadurci, united the Rutheni to the Aruerni, and farther proceeding, received Hoſtages from the Nitiobriges, and the Gabali, and laboured to break into the Roman Province, and proceed toward Narbo.

95. Cæſar having heard thoſe things in Italy, as ſoon as he underſtood that matters were brought into better ſtate in Rome by the means of Pompey, made what haſt he could, and underſtanding in his Paſſage of Lueterius his Deſign, went himſelf to Narbo, and prevented him. He marched to the Helvii, and thence over the Hill Gebenna, though the Snow was five foot deep, into the Confines of the Arverni, who therewith exceedingly ſurprized, betook themſelves for ſuccour to Vercingetorix. Knowing what Vercingetorix would do, with wonderful celerity, he paſſed to the Lingones, and got the Legions together before the Arverni could have any notice of it. This being known, Vercingetorix laid ſiege to Gergovia, a Town held by the Boii, whom Cæſar had left there after the Helvetian War, and given the Juriſdiction of the Place to the Ædui. Cæſar was now in perplexity, whether he ſhould long to aſſiſt the Friends of Rome, or by drawing out his Army from its Winter Quarters ſooner than ordinary, expoſe it to hardſhips and danger for want of the uſual Proviſions.

96. But reſolving to adventure all hazards, rather than deſert his Allies in their neceſſity, he ſent Orders to the Ædui to make ſupply of all neceſſaries as far as poſſible, and by a Meſſage incouraged the Boii with news of his coming. In his Paſſage he took by ſurrender Vellaunodunum, a Town of the Senones. Genabum, now Orleans, was a City of the Carnutes upon Ligeris, over which lying a Bridge, the Townſmen were about to paſs over it, and eſcape by night; but he being aware of it, had appointed two Legions to watch, who burnt the Gate, took the Place, with moſt of the People, ſet it on fire, and ſacked it; which done, he paſſed over into the Territories of the Bituriges. There he reſolved to become Maſter of Noviodunum, (now Vierſon) and when he was about it, Vercingetorix his Forces ſhewed themſelves, who having heard of his March, left the Siege of Gergovia, and went to meet him. But he ſent out firſt his own Horſe to charge them, and then four hundred Germans, who put the Galles to flight, and many of them being ſlain, the reſt retired to the Army. Hereupon the Towns-men yielded, having delivered thoſe that ſtirred up the People unto Cæſar.

Cæſar takes Noviodunum.

The Galles waſt their Country.

97. Vercingetorix, upon ſo many loſſes received, with much adoe perſwaded the Galles to lay waſt their Countrey, to cut off all forrage from the Romans, and to prevent their taking refuge in any Towns, to burn them all; and none eſcaped but Avaricum, (now Bourges) at that time the faireſt City in Gall, incircled with a River and a Bog, which the Bituriges, proſtrating themſelves at the feet of all the Galles, deſired and obtained to defend. Cæſar, after the taking of Noviodunum, reſolved to attempt this Place, and accordingly ſat down before it, and made preparations for an Aſſault in that narrow place, where it was approchable. Vercingetorix followed and incamped himſelf fifteen Miles off to intercept all the Foragers he could. And Cæſar was really diſtreſſed for want of Corn, and the Army ſubſiſted meerly by Cattel fetcht afar off, which made him offer to the Legions to raiſe the Siege, but they ſtoutly and generouſly refuſed. To remove this diſtreſs, he himſelf left the Siege, and attempted to ſurprize the Enemy; but by reaſon that he had placed himſelf upon a convenient ground, not willing to expoſe his Men to danger in ſuch diſadvantages, he retreated without any thing done, and gave order for re-inforcing the Siege of the Town. And the Galles took as great care to fortifie it, by the addition of ten thouſand Men choſen out of all their Forces. For, being perſwaded that it was their main buſineſs to make this Town good againſt the Romans, they thought it not fit to commit the common ſafety of Gall to the Bituriges.

Sect. 6.

98. And the Garriſon all manner of ways poſſible defended the Place, both by mining the Mounts, erecting Towers, and making Sallies where and when the caſe required, being incouraged by the goodneſs of their Wall, which was framed ſo, both of Wood and Timber, that the Stone kept it from burning, and the Wood from the violence of the Rams. The Romans raiſed a Mount in the ſpace of five and twenty days of three hundred and thirty foot in breadth, and fourſcore in heighth. This Mount, when it began to touch the Wall, did the Beſieged by a Mine ſet on fire, and great conteſt there was about it, till the fire was at length quenched by the Romans. The Beſieged finding that nothing would do, but the Siege increaſed every day in vigour, reſolved to quit the Town, and get through the Mariſh to Vercingetorix, but were hindred by the Women, who when they could not prevail with them to ſtay, cryed out, and ſignified their flight to the Romans. Thereupon they deſiſted from their purpoſe. But Cæſar having perfected his Works, took the advantage when a Rain fell, and the Walls were ſlenderly manned, to make an Aſſault, which the Legions carried on with that ſucceſs, that they took the City, and made ſuch ſlaughter in revenge for what had been done at Genabum, that ſparing neither Sex nor Age, of forty thouſand, or thereabouts, ſcarcely eight hundred came ſafe to Vercingetorix, who received them in the night with great ſilence, for fear of a Sedition through the commiſeration of the People.

Cæſar taketh Avaricum.

99. Vercingetorix comforted the Galles for the loſs of Avaricum, by laying the blame upon the Bituriges, by calling them to witneſs, that the keeping of it was againſt his opinion, and telling them that he was in a way to unite all Gall together, and now he firſt perſwaded them to be at the pains to fortifie their Camp to prevent an Aſſault of the Romans. For the accompliſhment of his Promiſe of uniting Gall, he omitted no endeavour, and commanding each State to ſend in their Supplies, and getting together all the Archers, of whom there was great ſtore, he ſpeedily repaired his loſſes at Avaricum. At this time aroſe a great controverſie amongſt the Ædui, about the election of their Annual Magiſtrate. There were two, of whom each pretended to be duly elected, Cotus and Convictolitanis, and the matter muſt come to a Civil War, if Cæſar did not take it up. Fearing the conſequence might be otherwiſe bad, and that one Party might be drawn to ſide with the Galles againſt the Romans, he went and decided the Controverſie in behalf of Convictolitanis, as legally choſen, and then marched by the River Elaver againſt the Arverni, and notwithſtanding the watching and great diligence of Vercingetorix, having by a Bridge got over his Army, laid ſiege to Gergovia.

100. In the mean time Convictolitanis being corrupted by the Arverni, perſwaded ſome young Noble-men to revolt from the Romans, and draw their State from the ſociety with them, as Enemies to the liberty of Gall; and by lying ſtories told how the Romans had cut off their Brethren, the Princes, and ſome Horſe-men, they induced ten thouſand Men that were to be ſent from the Ædui to Cæſar, to march for Gergovia, to joyn with the Arverni. Cæſar having notice of this from his friends, took along with him four expedite Legions, and met with the ten thouſand Men, and ſhewing to them the Princes, whom they believed to be ſlain; when they ſaw they were abuſed, they caſt down their Arms, and ſubmitted. But their Countrymen not knowing thereof, and being led by covetouſneſs, or by anger and raſhneſs, robbed and killed divers Roman Merchants; for it was natural to the Nation to take a light Hear-ſay for a certain Truth. When they underſtood how things had gone, they then diſowned what had paſſed, as wanting publick Authority; called to account count ſuch as had robbed the Romans, expoſed to ſale the Goods of ſuch as had been Authors of the Revolt, and ſent their Ambaſſadors to Cæſar to excuſe themſelves. This they rather did to recover ſuch of their Men as were in Cæſars Hands, who though he underſtood well enough, that out of fear of puniſhment, and to avoid greater inconveniences, they under-hand ſtudied how to raiſe a War, and ſolicited other States to a League and Alliance to that purpoſe, yet gave them good words, caſting the blame upon the common People.

Fruſtrates the Deſign of the Galles.

101. While Cæſar was abſent, the Galles had violently aſſaulted the Camp before Gergovia, and put the two Legions to great extremity to defend it, till he, having received the News, made all haſt imaginable, and arrived before the riſing of the Sun. Fearing a greater Revolt of the Galles, and that he ſhould be incompaſſed by them, he thought to raiſe his Siege and be gone, but his purpoſe was diverted by a diſcovery he made of an opportunity to advance the Service upon the Town. An Aſſault was made in purſuance of this Diſcovery, wherein the Romans were too hardy, and the Enemy ſo vigilant and induſtrious, that he over-charged them on all hands, to their loſs of ſix and forty Centurions, after which they beat them off, and they ſecured their flight as well as they could, as well as Cæſar can make it, who confeſſeth, that few leſs than ſeven hundred of his Souldiers were wanting. But he tells us that the next day he rebuked his Army, foraſmuch as they themſelves judged how far they were to go, and what they were to do, neither would they ſtop upon ſounding a Retreat, nor hearken to the Tribunes or Legates that would have kept them back. Yet he attributed the ſucceſs the Enemy had, not to his valour, but the in-equality of the Ground and Place where they fought. To evidence this, he ſaith, he drew out the Legions ſeveral times, and skirmiſhed ſucceſsfully where the Ground was indifferent, and then thinking it ſufficient to abate the pride of the Galles, and incourage his own Men, he removed his Camp into the Territories of the Ædui, the Enemy refuſing to make after him. Yet ſtill did the former Revolters amongſt the Ædui ſo beſtir themſelves, that for all this that State revolted; which Defection, procured by the means of Litavicus eſpecially, was perfected by two other Noble-men, whom Cæſar had had with him, viz. Virdumarus and Eporedorix, who deſired to be gone, under pretence of putting a ſtop to it; and Cæſar diſmiſſed them, though he perceived their intentions, leſt he ſhould ſeem to be injurious, or give any ſuſpicion of fear. They burnt and waſted the Country, and uſed other Arts to terrifie the Romans. Cæſar knowing he was to uſe Expedition before all their Forces could unite, marched with incredible celerity, and got his Army over the Loire, (the Foot paſſing with their Arms and Shoulders above water) and having refreſhed it with Corn and Cattle, reſolved to march toward the Senones.

Cæſar receives a Repulſe.

102. At this time Labienus, with four Legions, coming to Lutetia, a Town of the Pariſians, built in an Iſland in the River Sequana, (as Cæſar deſcribes it) and being to paſs the River, by making a ſhow to attempt it in ſeveral places, deceived and divided the Enemy, and gave them a notable defeat. But, for all this, the Revolt of the Ædui being known; in a Council of all Gall aſſembled at Bibracte, Vercingetorix was choſen general, and the Ædui diſappointed in their expectation of having the chief Command; ſo that if they had not been already engaged in the War, they would have thought again of Cæſar. He perceiving the Enemy to be ſtronger in Horſe than himſelf, and the Paſſages to be ſo ſhut up, that he could not ſend into the Province nor Italy, procured Horſes from ſuch States in Germany as he had quieted the year before, with ſuch light-armed Footmen as were uſed to fight amongſt the Horſe, whom he furniſhed with Horſes he took from the Tribunes, the Roman Equites, and the Evocuti. Reſolving then to protect the Roman Province, Vercingetorix made Head againſt him, as having a notable opportunity, with his Horſe, and perſwading his Men that ſo indeed he had, they required that this Reſolution might be ſtrengthened with an holy Oath or Imprecation. Let him never be received under any Roof, nor have acceſs to his Wife, Children or Parents, that did not twice Charge through the Army of the Enemy. The thing being approved, and every one forced to take the Oath, he divided his Cavalry into three parts, whereof two Bodies ſhewed themſelves on either ſide, and the third began to oppoſe Cæſars Front. Cæſar cauſed his Horſe to be divided alſo into three Parties, and to charge the Galles, having received the Carriages within the Legions, which he ſo placed, as to ſuccour the Horſe upon occaſion. The Germans having poſſeſſed themſelves of an Hill, forced the Galles to give ground; and the advantage was ſo proſecuted, that all the Horſe was routed, and many Priſoners taken of good note. After this Vercingetorix marched towards Aleſia, a Town of the Mandubii, and Cæſar following him in his Rear, as long as the day would give leave, ſlew ſome three thouſand of his Men, and, the next day following, incamped alſo before Aleſia, which was ſited on the top of an Hill, in a very eminent place, and not to be taken but by a continued Siege. At the foot of the Hill ran two Rivers on each ſide of the Town: Before the Town lay a Plain of three Miles in length: The other ſides were incloſed with Hills, at a reaſonable diſtance, of equal height with the Town.

Cæſar beſieges Aleſia.

103. Cæſar reſolved to incloſe the Town with a Ditch, and a Rampire, and the whole circuit contained eleven Miles. At the Camp, ſited in a convenient place, were made three and twenty Caſtles, well manned both day and night. The Work being begun, there happened a Fight betwixt the Horſe on both ſides. The Romans were over-powered, till Cæſar ſent the Germans to their Relief, and drew out the Legions for their Refuge, with which animated, they routed the Galles, and driving them back into their Camp, killed many, and took very many Horſes. Vercingetorix upon this, thought beſt to diſmiſs all the Horſe before the Fortifications were perfected by the Romans, and he ſent them away in the night, every Man to repair to his own State, and to ſend all to the War that were able to bear Arms, and to procure his ſafety who had ſo well deſerved of them; but in caſe they were negligent, fourſcore thouſand Men he affirmed ſhould periſh with him in that place. He husbanded his Corn, which would ſerve, at the former rate, but thirty days, meaſuring it out ſparingly; and the Cattel he delivered to the Soldiers by Poll, whereof there was great ſtore brought from the Mandubii. All the Forces which he had placed before the Town he received within the Walls, and ſo purpoſed to attend the Supplies of Gall.

Vercingetorix, his preparations for reſiſtance.

104. Cæſar underſtanding this from Fugitives and Priſoners, took a prodigious courſe to fortifie himſelf. He drew a Ditch of twenty foot in breadth, and depth, as broad at the bottom as the top. At forty foot diſtance from this he made two Ditches of fifteen foot in breadth and depth, the innermoſt whereof drawn through the Fields, and the lower ground he filled with Water out of the River. Behind them he made another Ditch, and a Rampire of twelve foot, which he ſtrengthened with a Parapet and Pinacles, and with great boughs of Trees cut like to an Hartſ-Horn, which were ſet where the Hovels were joyned to the Rampire, to hinder the Enemy from climbing up. He made Towers round about the whole Work in the diſtance of fourſcore foot one from another; and his deſign of having the diſtance of forty foot betwixt the Ditch firſt mentioned, and the other Work, was, that the whole Body of the Romans might not eaſily be incloſed with an Army, which he thought to prevent by taking in ſo great a circuit of ground, and leſt the Enemy, in a ſudden Sally, ſhould by night attempt to deſtroy the Works, or by day trouble the Soldiers by miſſile Weapons, as they were buſied about the Fortifications.

The prodigious Works of Cæſar.

105. But the Roman Forces being imployed both in fetching Materials for the Works, and ſupply of Corn, were much weakned, and the Galles, by ſallying out of divers Ports, attempted to deſtroy the Works. That therefore the Fortifications might be made good with the leſs number of Men, he ſtill thought fit to add unto them. He made Trenches round about them of five foot deep, wherein he planted either the Bodies of Trees, or great firm Boughs ſharpened into many Pikes and Snags, and bound together at the bottom, that they might not be eaſily plucked up. There were of theſe five Ranks ſo combined and infolded one in another, that which way ſoever the Enemy ſhould enter upon them, he muſt neceſſarily run himſelf upon a ſharp Stake. Theſe they called Cippi, before which, in oblique courſes, after the manner of a Quincunx were digged holes three foot deep, narrow at the top. Theſe they ſet with round Stakes, of the bigneſs of a Mans Thigh, with ſharp points hardened with fire, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtuck not above four fingers out of the Earth, and, for the better faſtening of them, they ſtuck a foot within the ground; the reſt of the Holes, for the better ordering of the matter, were hid with Oſiers, and bruſhy Wood. Of theſe were eight Courſes, three foot diſtant one from another, and theſe they called Lilies, from the reſemblance they had to the Figure of that Flower. Before theſe were Galthrops of a foot long, faſtened in the Earth, and headed with barbed Hooks of Iron, beſtowed up and down in all places at a reaſonable diſtance; and theſe they called Stimuli. The inner Fortifications thus finiſhed, he followed the level ground as much as the nature of the place would permit, taking in fourteen Miles in circuit, and made the like Fortifications in all Points againſt the Enemy without, as he had done againſt the Town; that if he were driven upon occaſion to leave the Works, he might quit the Camp without danger, a few Men being able to defend it. Things thus appointed, he commanded, that every Man ſhould have in readineſs Forrage and Proviſion of Corn for thirteen days.

Numbers of Soldiers furniſhed by the Nations of Gall.

106. In the mean time the Galles having ſummoned a Council of the Princes and chief Men of every State, reſolved to raiſe an Army, but not as Vercingetorix adviſed, of all that were able to bear Arms, leſt the Multitude ſhould be ungovernable, and want Proviſions; but to proportion a number to every State. Of the Ædui, and their Clients the Seguſiani, Ambivariti, Aulerci, Brannovices, and Brannovii, they require five and thirty, or as ſome read, five and twenty thouſand. Of the Arverni, and their Clients, the Heleuteri, Cadurci, Gabali, and Vellaunii, as many. Of the Senones, Sequani, Bituriges, Santones, Ruteni, Carnutes, twenty one (or two) thouſand. Of the Bellovaci ten thouſand. As many of the Lemovices. Eight thouſand of the Pictones, Turoni, Pariſii. Of the Helvetii and Sueſſiones eight thouſand. Of the Ambiani, Mediomatrici, Petrocorii, Nervii, Morini, and Nitiobriges, five thouſand. They required of the Aulerci, Cenomani, as many. Of the Atrebates four thouſand. Of the Bello-Caſſi, Lexovii, Aulerci, Eburones, three thouſand. Of the Rauraci and Booi three (ſome Copies have thirty) thouſand. Of the States bordering upon the Ocean by the Cuſtom of Gall, called Aremoricæ, as the Carioſolites, Redones, Ambibarri, Caletes, Oſiſmii, Lemovices, Veneti, and Venelli, ſix thouſand.

Great Errors as to Names and Numbers in Cæſars preſent Copies.

107. Such are the names of the States, and the number of Soldiers charged upon them, as we now find in Cæſars Copies. But that the Text is corrupted, Monetus tells us, loudly inveighing againſt the Tranſcribers and Correctors of the Copies for bringing in ſuch confuſion into a few words written by Cæſar, and committing ſuch miſtakes in the Numbers. For the Names, that of Heleuteri is commentitious, there never having been ſuch a People in Gall, no not in Europe. In ſtead of Heleuteri he reads Helvii, who were Neighbours to the Velauni and Arverni. He obſerves, that ſome People of theſe that are named are placed far from their own native and proper Seats. As the Ambivariti and Aulerci are here put as Neighbours and Clients of the Ædui, whereas they were far diſtant each from the other, and thoſe were far from being Clients to, and joyned in ſociety with them. For the Ambivariti were the ſame we now call Brabanters upon the Meuſe. And the Aulerci, as now, were ſeated at the mouth of the Sequana, or Seine, partly that People called Cenomani, (or Manceaux) and partly Cimbroceltæ, or Normans. Therefore for Ambivariti is to be read Ambarri, which was a Neighbouring People, and Clients to the Ædui, now divided into the Charolois and Maconnois.

108. The Boii he affirms ought not to be joyned with the Rauraci, but with the Seguſiani and Ambarri, with whom they were Clients of the Ædui, being ſeated in the Country of Bourbon, as it's now called, near the Seguſiani. More abſurdly ſtill are the Lemovices, by ſome ignorant Tranſcriber or Annotator put amongſt the Aremorican States, or thoſe upon the Ocean. For nothing is more erroneous in Geography, than that they, being a Mediterraneous People, and ſituated Southward near the Pictones, an hundred French Leagues from the Ocean, ſhould be placed in the Shore thereof amongſt the Oſiſmii and Venelli; from whom they are ſeparated by two great Provinces of Poitiers and the Aremorican Britain. Inſtead of Lemovices, who are to be left in the place formerly aſſigned them in Cæſars Enumeration, Eburovices are rather to be read, the Country of whom lay by the Lexovii, at the mouth of the Seine. Further, whereas Aulerci and Cenomani are divided in this Enumeration, they ought not, but to be joyned together, being one and the ſame People. But this Error is too often committed in the Text of Cæſar, of ſevering the Cognomina of certain People from the Names themſelves. For as Cenomani, Diablintes, (or Diablitæ) and Eburaici, or Eburovices, were the Cognomina of the Aulerci; ſo were Cubi and Vibiſci of the Bituriges. In like manner the Volcæ, one People, had ſeveral Cognomina, being from Narbon to the Rhone called Arecontici, and thoſe of Toulouſe and toward the South Tectoſages; and both by the Romans were called Provinciales, becauſe of the Province of Narbon, proper to the Romans.

109. But yet further he obſerves, that Nations moſt diſtinct in ſituation and original, are in this Enumeration joyned for contributing Soldiers to this Social War. As the Ambivariti upon the Meuſe, and the Seguſiani upon the Loire; the Senones ſeated at the Seine, and the Santones at the Garonne, the Pictones at the Weſtern Ocean, and the Helvetians at the Rhine, and the Oriental Alpes; the Sueſſiones not far diſtant from the Northern Ocean, and the Nitiobriges not far from the Garonne, and the Mediterranean; the Caletes ſeated upon the very Shore of the Northern Sea, and the Lemovices toward the South near the Petrocorii. How he at large amends this place, and endeaendeavours to reſtore it to it ſelf, is too teadious here to ſhow though from what we have ſaid already it receiveth light. As to numbers of Soldiers, what is more incredible, he demands, than that upon the Boii and Rauraci ſhould be impoſed thirty thouſaud Men, as ſome Copies have it, and upon the Bello-Caſſi, Lexovii and Eburones, populous Nations, no more than three thouſand; upon the Sueſſiones, Ambiani, Nervii, Morini, Mediomatrici, Petrocorii, and Nitiobriges, ſeven powerful People, but five thouſand men; and as many upon the Cenomani alone, a People contained in narrow Bounds? Other Inſtances of the like in-equality might be made.

Sect. 6.

The Generals of the Galles.

110. But whatſoever theſe Numbers were, the Bellovaci refuſed to give theirs, declaring that they would not ſerve under any Man's command, or make War in any other than their own Name. Yet Comius, one of the Atrebates, perſwaded them to ſend two thouſand Men, which Comius having ſerved Cæſar faithfully in Britain, had been rewarded by him, by freeing his State from all Duties to the Roman Empire, reſtoring them to their ancient Laws, and by giving to him the Morini. But he would not for all this be wanting to the general conſent of Gall, now bent to redeem its liberty and reputation in War. Having already muſtered eight thouſand Horſe, and two hundred and forty thouſand foot in the Confines of the Ædui, they gave the Command to Comius of Arras, Vindomarus and Eporedorix, both Ædui, and Verguſilaunus of the Arverni, the Couſin-german of Vercingetorix; and as well Officers as Soldiers were full of hope, in conſideration of their Numbers both within and without Aleſia, whither they marched.

Propter ejus ſingularem, ac nefariam crudelitatem.

111. In the mean time they that were beſieged in the Town, the day being paſt by which they expected relief, knew not what courſe to take. Some were for a Surrendry, and others for Sallies to be made upon the Enemy; but above all, the Speech of Critognatus, a Nobleman of the Arverni, was ſo remarkable for its ſingular and nefarious cruelty, that Cæſar thought fit to give an account of it in his Commentaries. The Deſign of it was to perſwade them to hold out as their Fore-fathers did in a War againſt the Cimbri and Teutones, who being ſhut up within their Towns, and brought to the like neceſſity, ſatisfied their hunger with the Bodies of ſuch as were unfit for War; neither did they yield themſelves to the Enemy. Nay if they had not had ſuch an Example, he would have it begun now, and to be left to Poſterity, no War being like to this. For, the Cimbri left the Country, and the Laws and Liberties all intire, whereas the Romans would bring them to ſlavery and bondage, as they had ſufficient evidence by the manner wherein they treated already that part of Gall which they had reduced into a Province. Having delivered their ſeveral Opinions, they reſolved, that ſuch as through Age, or other Infirmities, were unfit for War, ſhould depart the Town, and that they ſhould try all means before they yielded to Critognatus his opinion: and yet if the matter ſo required, to conſent unto it; and to attend their Succours, rather than yield to any ſurrender or condition of Peace.

The Reſolution of ſuch as were beſieged in Aleſia.

112. However, in the mean time the Mandubii, who had received the Army into their Town, were themſelves thruſt out with their Wives and Children, and coming to the Roman Trenches, deſired with Tears to be received and nouriſhed with Bread, though on condition of ſlavery, but Cæſar rejected them. Now all the Gallick Forces came to the relief of Aleſia, and though they appeared ſo numerous, yet Cæſar drew out his Horſe, and cauſed it to ingage the Enemy. Herein he had the better, by means of the Germans; but was attacqued both by them that were newly arrived, and thoſe in the Town, who with Hurdles indeavoured to fill up the Ditches, and with other Inſtruments of a Siege to ſcale the Works, but were forced to retire with loſs; for, ſome fell unwittingly upon the Galthrops, others falling into the Holes, were ſtruck through their Bodies with ſharp Stakes, and others died by Mural Piles caſt from the Rampire, and the Towers. Being repelled twice with great loſs, they fell into conſideration what courſe they were beſt to take, adviſing with them that were beſt acquainted with the Nature and ſituation of the Place.

The Galles repulſed.

113. This done, the Captains choſe out ſixty thouſand of thoſe States, which had the greateſt repute for courage, and attacqued the Roman Camp at the declivity of an Hill, where they might beſt maſter the Works, giving diverſion at the ſame time in other places. But the Induſtry and Fortune of Cæſar ſurmounted all difficulties, by ſending Supplies where there was need, and being aſſiſted by the conduct of Labienus, who having got together thirty nine Cohorts, charged the Enemy with great execution. Threeſcore and fourteen Enſigns were taken and brought to Cæſar, and very few of ſo great a number returned ſafe into their Camp. They in the Town, diſcouraged, drew back their Forces from the Works, which being known, the Galles preſently fled out of the Camp, and if the Soldiers had not been wearied, they might eaſily, in the opinion of the Conqueror, have deſtroyed all their Enemies. However, the Horſe being ſent out about mid-night to fall upon the Reer, ſlew and took a great number. The next day Vercingetorix calling a Council, told them he had not undertaken the War for his own Intereſt, but for the common concern, and publick liberty; and ſeeing they muſt neceſſarily yield to fortune, he offered either to ſatisfie the Romans by his Death, or to be delivered up to them alive. Ambaſſadors were ſent to Cæſar, and upon his Command the Captains were brought to him, ſitting in the Fortifications before the Camp, and Vercingetorix amongſt the reſt, with whom their Weapons were delivered. The Ædui and Arverni being reſerved, of whom he diſmiſſed twenty thouſand Captives, of the reſt he gave throughout the Army every Man a Priſoner by way of booty. He marched to the Ædui, and received them, having been ſo kind to them and the Arverni, out of hopes by their means to bring in other States. Thither did the Arverni ſend their Ambaſſadors, and promiſed to obey his Orders. He required a great number of Hoſtages, and ſent the Legions into their wintering Camps: He himſelf determined to winter at Auguſtodunum or Bibracte. The Atchievments of this year being known at Rome, a Supplication for twenty days was injoyned.

Cæſars wonderful atchievments before Aleſia.

114. Such account Cæſar himſelf gives of this Action before Aleſia, and therewith concludes his Commentaries of his Wars in Gall. His Works and Fortifications being ſuch as he deſcribes them, though in down-right Language, without ornament of Rhetorick, hath ſtupified all Readers with admiration, as too great for a Man to effect. The ſingle Work to incompaſs the Town was wonderful; but doubled with another without to keep the Galles from raiſing the Siege doth double the wonder. Hereby he did beſiege, and was beſieged, took the Town, and overthrew the Enemy in the Field. The Galles in this War were acted by a natural and generous heat to preſerve the liberty of their Country, though they failed therein, and the unfaithfulneſs of any of them in not ſtanding to their former Ingagements cannot be excuſed. Above all others Vercingetorix was remarkable both for his Valour and Conduct, the manner of whoſe delivery Plutarch deſcribeth. Being armed at all Points, mounted on an Horſe, and furniſhed with a rich Capariſon, he came to Cæſar, and rode about him, as he ſate in his Chair of State; then lighting, he took off his Capariſon and Furniture, and diſarming himſelf, laid all on the ground, and went and ſate down at his feet, and ſaid never a word. Cæſar at length committed him as a Priſoner of War to be led as a Captive in his Triumph, which the Civil Wars prevented.

Florus his error about the Place.

115. Florus alſo writes of his coming as a Supplicant to the Camp, and caſting down his Ornaments and Arms before Cæſars Knees with theſe words: Take them, thou haſt overcome a Valiant Man, O Man moſt valiant! But where this Camp was, this Writer was vilely miſtaken. You have heard Cæſar all along tell his own ſtory. Certainly he knew what Town it was he took, and about the Siege of which the great ſtreſs of the War lay. He himſelf ſaith it was Aleſia, but Florus writes that it was Gergovia, a Town of the Arverni; that here is was where ſo great Munitions were raiſed; where Vercingetorix was taken, and the War being in a manner finiſhed, all Gall was reduced to the obedience of the Romans. Now could Cæſar be ignorant what Towns he took, or which he was forced to quit? (as he did Gergovia) and two hundred years almoſt after his death Florus muſt undertake to correct what he had written. But this he did out of his forgetfulneſs, or rather his impudence, in falſifying Hiſtory, according to his Cuſtom, as we cannot but obſerve upon occaſion.

The Galles again raiſe Commotions to no purpoſe.

Hirtius.

116. Roman Writers ſpeak of Gall as now ſubdued; but for all that, Cæſar could not paſs the Winter in quiet; though having reſted no part of the former Summer, he was deſirous to refreſh his Soldiers. For the Galles concluded, that though the Roman Army could not be maſtered in one place, and altogether; yet if they raiſed Commotions in divers places, Cæſar ſhould not be able to proſecute all at once. To prevent the effect of this Conſultation, Cæſar leaving M. Antonius with charge of his Winter Garriſons, with all ſpeed invaded the Bituriges, and making no uſual ſigns of an Invaſion,, by Fires prevented all relief which one City could afford unto another, and thereby ſurprizing many thouſands of ſuch as lay in the Fields, conſtrained them to ſubmit. He drove the Carnutes to great extremity, by forcing them into the Woods in the violence of cold weather; from which not able to defend themſelves, they were ſcattered abroad, and with the loſs of a great part of them, diſperſed into the neighbouring Cities.

Sect. 6.

117. This, notwithſtanding the Bellovaci, under the conduct of Corbeus and Comius the Atribatian, levied Men, with reſolution to invade the Sueſſiones. Cæſar thinking not only his Honour, but his ſecurity concerned to ſave his Allies, which had well deſerved of the Common-wealth, with three Legions marched againſt them. The Galles he found ſeated on the higher ground, from which they would not deſcend, notwithſtanding the ſmallneſs of the number of the Romans compared with theirs; and Cæſar conſidering their multitudes, would not attacque them with ſuch diſadvantages, but ſtrongly fortified himſelf to make them believe he was fearful, and thereby to draw them down to Battle. Yet we are told that he ſaw it neceſſary to ſend for three Legions more, the coming of which while he expected, the Enemy defeated by an Ambuſh a Party of the Rhemi, which was appointed to guard the Foragers, and killed Vertiſco the Prince of their State, and Captain of their Horſe, while, though an old Man, and ſcarcely able to ſit on Horſe-back, he too greedily purſued them. And on the other ſide the Germans, whom Cæſar had ſent for from beyond the Rhine to fight, intermingled with his Horſe-men, boldly paſſed the Mariſh that lay between the Camps, and routed ſuch flying Parties of the Galles as they could meet.

Are defeated.

118. The Galles, upon hearing of the coming of more Legions, were diſcouraged, and ſent away by night with their Carriages ſuch among them as were infirm or wanted Arms, fearing ſuch another Siege as had been at Aleſia. Cæſar perceiving they would all be gone, and that the Mariſh would hinder the Purſuit, made Bridges over it, and poſſeſſed himſelf of a ridge of an Hill which ran betwixt the Mariſh and the Enemies Camp; and ſo ordered his Battel, that thence the Engines might play amongſt the thickeſt of them. They being fearful to ſtay, and not knowing how to ſecure their retreat from Cæſar, who ſtood ready to purſue them, caſt up a great heap of Faggots betwixt the two Camps, and ſet them on fire, thereby to intercept his ſight when they fled, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that though he ſent out the Horſe after them, as ſuſpecting their Deſign, yet his Men were afraid to venture into the thick flame and ſmoak, and the Bellovaci eſcaped to a place ten Miles off; whence, by laying Ambuſhes both of Horſe and Foot in divers places, they did the Romans great diſpleaſure in their foraging. Corbeus choſe out of his whole Army ſix thouſand Foot, and lay in Ambuſh with them in a place ſo incompaſſed with a River and Woods, that the Romans coming thither ſhould be taken as in a Toile. But Cæſar by a Captive got notice of it, and ſent his Horſe-men to the place, ſo ordering his matters, that being readily attacqued by the Enemy, they were ſuccoured firſt by light Foot-men, and he himſelf was preſently at hand with his Legions. Upon knowledge hereof the Galles would have fled, but could not, being themſelves caught in the trap they had laid for the Romans. Yet they adventured to enter the River, and the Woods, but were all overtaken and ſlain; and Corbeus refuſing quarter, but fighting and hurting many Men, exaſperated therewith the Victors ſo much, that they could not forbear to throw their Darts at him, and diſpatch him.

They ſubmit.

119. By ſome few that eſcaped through the Woods, the Galles incamped at eight Miles diſtance, perceived the miſery they were in, for Cæſar would be ſuddenly upon them; they called a Council by ſound of Trumpet, and ſent their Ambaſſadors to him, to whom they accuſed Corbeus, as Author of the Revolt. Cæſar told them it was an eaſie matter to caſt the blame upon the dead; and he put them in mind how the Pellovaci had ſtood moſt ſtifly in their opinion, and would not be reduced, when the other States had ſubmitted. Nevertheleſs he was ſatisfied with the puniſhment which they had brought upon themſelves; for they lamented, that beſides the loſs of their Horſe-men, many thouſands of their choiceſt Foot were cut off, ſcarcely any eſcaping to bring tydings of the ſlaughter. The reſt of the States having ſtaid to ſee what ſucceſs they would have, when they ſaw that they were admitted to give Hoſtages, ſubmitted themſelves, and did ſo too; only Comius having, upon his revolt from Cæſar, been almoſt aſſaſſinated by procurement of Labienus would truſt his life with no Man, but kept himſelf with the Germans, whom he had procured to aſſiſt in the War. Cæſar perceived that no Nation now ſtood againſt him, the moſt warlike being ſubdued. And therefore he diſpoſed of his Forces into ſeveral parts of Gall. He himſelf invaded the Country of Ambiorix, which he harraſed with Fire and Sword, on purpoſe to make him hated by his People. Having ſlain, and taken Priſoners a great number of Men, he ſent Labienus with two Legions amongſt the Treviri, the Country of whom, by reaſon of its nearneſs to Germany, being daily inured to War, was not much unlike it in rudeneſs and ſavagneſs of its Inhabitants. Neither did they obey Cæſars Commands at any time longer than he had an Army in their Country to compel them.

120. In the mean time a new War was raiſed in the Territories of the Pictones, a part of which State renounced their obedience. But they were happily reduced by C. Fabius, who before had received many Cities by compoſition, and now in an encounter cauſed the death of above twelve thouſand Men; after which he went againſt the Carnutes, and the other States, the power of whom he knew to be cruſhed by that overthrow. Giving them no reſpite, he ſpeedily brought them to ſubjection; for the Carnutes, who, though often before roughly handled, yet would never liſten to peace, now gave Hoſtages, and ſubmitted. And beſides them, the Aremorican States following their example, upon the coming of Fabius with his Legions among them, received his Command without delay. Drapes, one of the Senones, and Luterius of the Cadurci, having eſcaped from the Battel, fled toward the Province, and were purſued by Cavinius the Legate with two Legions. Perceiving that they could not upon his approach enter the Province without danger, they took Vxellodunum, a Town of the Cadurci, excellently well fortified by its ſituation. Hence, as they went to gather Forage, Cavinius fell upon them, and quite defeated their Forces, which done, he ſate down before the Town, and Fabius the next day came to his aſſiſtance.

121. E're this, Cæſar having left M. Antonius the Quæſtor with fifteen Cohorts among the Bellovaci, to prevent new Confederacies, viſited the other States, and charged them with more Hoſtages; but incouraged them with comfortable words. Yet when he came amongſt the Carnutes, he demanded Guturvatus, as Author of their Revolt, to be given up into his Hands, and Hirtius tells us, he was compelled by his Soldiers to puniſh him, who imputed to him all the dangers and loſſes they had ſuſtained by the War; ſo that being in a manner ſcourged to death, he was beheaded. Having received information from Cavinius, how Drapes and Luterius were defeated, and that the Townſ-men ſtood it out, he reſolved to go and puniſh them too, leſt occaſion ſhould be given to the reſt of the Galles to think that they wanted not ſtrength, but conſtancy and reſolution to withſtand the Romans, and other Cities truſting to the ſtrength of their ſituation, and incouraged by their Example, ſhould attempt to recover their liberty. For he was ſenſible that all the Galles knew his Power was to continue but one Summer longer; which if they conld weather out, they thought they ſhould need to fear no danger after. Coming beyond all expectation before the Town, he preſently ſaw there was no means to conquer it, but by cutting off the Water. For a River ran below the high Hill on which it ſtood, and a Spring of Water guſhed out under the Walls; with much labour and expence of Blood he cauſed Batteries to be planted, and drove them both from River and Fountain. They ſet fire to his Works, and by a Sally hindered him from quenching it. To divert them he reſolved to aſſault the Town, which apprehenſion cauſed them to retreat. And at length, by Mines, he diverted the courſe of the Spring another way; with which they were ſo daunted, that thinking it above the wit of Man, and to have been effected by the Gods, they yielded themſelves. Cæſar judging that his clemency was ſufficiently known, and could receive no blemiſh from one Act of ſeverity, for an Example to others, cut off the right Hands of all ſuch that were able to bear Arms.

Cæſar taketh Vxellodnnum.

122. While Cæſar was thus imployed, Labienus warred proſperouſly againſt the Treviri; of them he ſlew many, as alſo of the Germans, who were ready to aſſiſt any Man againſt the Romans. Cæſar having conquered, and ſubdued Gallia Celtica, and alſo Belgica, but never all this while viſited Aquitania, further than that he had made a kind of entrance into it by certain Victories obtained by P. Craſſus, with two Legions marched thither with intent to beſtow there the latter part of the Summer, and that he did alſo with ſuch ſucceſs, that all the States thereof ſent unto him, and gave him Hoſtages. This done, he went with his Horſe-guard to Narbon, and diſpoſed of his Foot into wintering places, ſo as no part of Gall was without an Army. Having ſtaid a few days in the Province, and inquired how every Man had behaved himſelf during the general Rebellion of Gall, which he had overcome by the faithfulneſs and aſſiſtance of the ſaid Province, he returned to his Legions into Belgium, and wintered at Nemetocenna. In the mean time Comius the Atrebatian lived by robbing and intercepting ſuch Proviſions as were carryed to the Roman Camps. Againſt him M. Antonius ſent out C. Voluſenus, whom he encountered, and wounded dangerouſly in the Thigh, but the Roman Horſe, out of indignation that their Commander was wounded, inforced the Fight with ſuch violence, that Comius his Party was routed. And though he himſelf eſcaped, yet he thought it beſt to ſubmit, and offer Hoſtages; which Antony received, and beſides pardoning him, granted him his his requeſt, that he ſhould not come into the ſight of any Roman, which reſolution he had taken, upon the danger he had formerly eſcaped.

The States of Aquitaine ſubmit.

123. Cæſar, being come into Belgium, bent his Indeavours to this end, that at his departure, and withdrawing of his Army, he ſhould not be conſtrained to have War, and leave troubles behind him. He therefore took this courſe, to treat the ſeveral States obligingly, by highly rewarding the Noble-men, and by burdening the Country with no new Impoſitions, by which means he eaſily kept it quiet, now tired out with many unfortunate Battels; for ſo long as a ſence of the miſeries of War remains upon an harraſed People, they liſten not to their turbulent and unquiet fancies; but when that is off, they return to their whim again, which is wont to come upon them no otherwiſe than the fits of an Ague at Terms and Periods. Winter being over, Cæſar, contrary to his cuſtom, haſted into Italy, his chief buſineſs being to commend to the Municipal Towns and Colonies the Suit of his Quæſtor M. Antony for the Prieſthood. He had ſent him before to ſue for that promotion, and made all the Friends he could; and was now ſo far ingaged, that ſome few Men were grown factious and troubleſome about it, and by putting Antony beſide his purpoſe, ſought to diſparage Cæſar now going out of his Command.

124. Yet before he came near Italy, he underſtood that Antony was made Augur. Notwithſtanding he thought fit to viſit the Towns and Colonies, to give them thanks for their appearing for him, and to recommend to them his own buſineſs. For, he intended to ſue for the Conſulſhip himſelf for the following year, being concerned that his Adverſaries made their brags that L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus had been advanced to that dignity to deprive him of all Honour and Authority, and that it was wreſted from Sergius Galba, though he had more Voices on his ſide, becauſe he was a familiar friend of Cæſar, and had been his Legate. He was received with extraordinary affection and reſpect, upon this his firſt coming from the Wars in Gall. For nothing was omitted which they could deviſe for the adorning of their Gates, Ways, and Places where he was to paſs. The People with their Children met him on the Road, Sacrifices were every where offered, the Temples and Forums were hanged with Tapeſtry, and, as if ſome great Triumph had been provided for, great expenſe was made by the Richer, and great Expreſſions by the meaner ſort.

Cæſar honourably received in Gall.

125. Having lightly paſſed through the Countries of Gallia Togata, he returned with all ſpeed to his Army at Nemetocenna, and called all his Legions out of their Winter Quarters into that of the Treviri, where he muſtered them. Of Gallia Togata he made Labienus Governour, thereby to obtain more favour and furtherance in his Suit for the Conſulſhip. He heard oftentimes that Labienus was ſollicited ſtrongly by his Enemies; and was informed, that by the prevalency of a ſmall Faction, it was carried in the Senate to take away from him part of his Army; yet would he not give credit to any thing ſaid of Labienus, nor would be drawn to act contrary to the Authority of the Senate, believing, that if the Members thereof might have freedom of Voice, he ſhould eaſily obtain what he deſired. For C. Curio, Tribune of the People, had often propounded, that if any were terrified by the Army of Cæſar, foraſmuch as the Power of Pompey kept other Perſons as much in awe, both of them ſhould disband their Armies, and ſo the City be free to uſe her own right as ſhe pleaſed. The Senate was juſt and civil enough to him, as appeared both at this time and the year before, when Marcellus, oppoſing his Dignity contrary to the Law of Pompey and Craſſus, brought in a Bill for his diſcharge, before the time of his Authority was expired. Yet did not this diſcourage his Enemies, but rather excited them to make good their Party, and compel the Senate to approve of what they had determined.

His Enemies buſie at Rome againſt him.

126. Hereupon it was reſolved, that Pompey ſhould ſend one Legion, and Cæſar another, to the War againſt the Parthians. But Hirtius tells us, it was eaſily diſcerned that both theſe Legions were taken from Cæſar; for, the firſt Legion Pompey had ſent unto Cæſar, and given it him as out of his own Number, being levied in the Province. Yet did Cæſar, though no Man doubted but that he was weakened at the pleaſure of his Enemies, ſend Pompey his Legion again, and of his own Forces he ordered the fifteenth Legion which he had in Gall within the Alps, to be delivered according to the Decree of the Senate. And in the room thereof he ſent the thirteenth into Italy, to lie in Garriſon in the ſame place whence the other was drawn. Now did he place his Army in its Winter Quarters amongſt the Belgæ and Ædui, as the beſt way to keep Gall in quiet, the former being the moſt valiant, and the latter of greateſt Authority. Then took he his Journey into Italy, whither when come, he underſtood that the two Legions which he had diſmiſſed to be according to the Decree of the Senate imployed in the Parthian War, were by Marcellus the Conſul delivered to Pompey, and kept ſtill in Italy. By this dealing was ſufficiently evident what was intended againſt Cæſar. Yet he determined to take all things patiently, as long as there was hope of determining the controverſie rather by Law than by the Sword.

SECT. VII.

Containing the Hiſtory of the Civil War betwixt Cæſar and Pompey, to the Abſoluteneſs of Julius Cæſar.

The ſpace of five years.

1. SUch is the account which Hirtius, or whoever wrote the eighth Commentary of the Gallick War, giveth us of the beginning of the Civil betwixt theſe great Perſons; but it is our part to enquire farther into the original of it. For whoſoever was the Author of that Book, who wrote moreover Commentaries of the Wars of Alexandria, Africk, and Spain, till the Death of Cæſar, was no ſmall a Friend and Admirer of him. In his Preface he tells his Balbus by whoſe daily Admonition he was conſtrained to write, that though all that read the Writings of Cæſar admired them as well as he, yet he had more reaſon to do it than others, becauſe they conſidered only in them the purity of Phraſe, and excellency of Stile; whereas he who knew with what facility and expedition he wrote, had a more particular Subject of Admiration. He was it ſeems preſent at the Gallick War, and for the General had very great Honour and Reſpect; but he had not ſo much reaſon and opportunity to underſtand the Intrigues relating to the Civil; neither was he poſſibly willing to reflect upon Cæſar, as, or where he did deſerve.

Hirtius favourable to Cæſar.

2. The Truth is, Cæſar's carriage, eſpecially in his Conſulſhip, had rendered him very diſtaſtful to the Senate. Pompey on the other ſide, by his fair demeanour, had of late gained much upon it, which Cæſar being aware of deſired leave to ſtand for a ſecond Conſulſhip in his abſence. This was granted him; but he, fearing the malice of his Adverſaries in caſe he were reduced to a private condition, further importuned the Fathers that he might have his Government of Gall prorogued, caſting about all manner of ways to keep his Army till he ſhould be Conſul. This was hindered by Marcellus the Conſul, who had ſucceeded Pompey; whereupon Cæſar laying his hand upon his Sword, ſaid, That that ſhould obtain it for him. This Marcellus was very bitter againſt him, preſſing hard that a Succeſſor ſhould be ſent him; but this was croſſed by Pompey, either out of good nature, or policy. Such were deſigned Conſuls for the enſuing year, as were moſt oppoſite to Cæſar, viz. L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Claudius Marcellus, Nephew to the former Conſul by his Brother: Curio alſo, an inveterate Enemy of Cæſar, was made Tribune. Yet all theſe, except Claudius, were drawn aſide by Money; Paulus by fifteen hundred Talents, and Curio, who was much indebted, by one hundred thouſand Seſterces. Marcellus then urging, that a Succeſſor was to be ſent to Cæſar, Curio ſtifly withſtood it, alledging, that then ought Pompey alſo to diſmiſs his Army; for that his power was equally dangerous to the publick liberty. Pompey outwardly ſeemed willing, and ſaid he would disband his Men; but Curio fell foul upon him, telling him, that promiſe without performance was nothing; and, that he might ſeem to ſtand for the good of the Commonwealth, and not curry favour with Cæſar, he deſired, that if they both refuſed to disband, they ſhould, the one as well as the other, be declared Enemies to the State.

The grounds and occaſions of the Civil Wars betwixt Pompey and Cæſar.

Appian. de bello civili lib. 2. Velleius Paterc. l. 2. c. 48.

3. Pompey exceedingly netled hereat, threatned him; but he ceaſed not to urge the thing. The Senate could have wiſhed them both reduced, but feared to disband Pompey's Army, looking upon Cæſar as the more dangerous perſon. Pompey ſent now to him for the Legion he had lent him, two being ordered into Syria to defend the Eaſtern Parts now in danger by the overthrow of Craſſus: he ſent him this Legion, and another of his own; but there being no need of them in Syria, they wintered at Capua. Thoſe that brought them into Italy did ill Offices for Cæſar, and gave out, as if his Army at his return would all revolt, which though very falſe, was believed by Pompey, who thereupon neglected to provide for ſo dangerous a War as followed. The next year C. Claudius Marcellus and L. Corn. Lentulus were Conſuls, and it was propounded to the Senate, whether both Pompey and Cæſar ſhould lay down all Power. Though once it was carried that Cæſar only ſhould, when the Conſul propounded it ſeverally, yet * Curio again putting it to the queſtion, it was carried againſt both by three hundred and forty eight Voices. Hereat the Conſuls inraged, left the City, and gave Pompey power as from themſelves to fight for his Country againſt Cæſar, which he ſeemed not altogether to approve. Now Curio perceiving himſelf in danger, and that he could do no more ſervice for Cæſar, fled unto him.

Curio laboureth hard for Cæſar.

* Conſule Appianum de [illegible] civili lib. pag. 446.

4. Cæſar himſelf tells us, that all things were carried impetuouſly and confuſedly; that leiſure was not given to his Friends to advertiſe him, nor yet to the Tribunes to avoid the danger falling upon them, nor to uſe the Right of oppoſition left unto them by Sylla; but within ſeven days after they were entred into their Office, they were forced to ſhift for their ſafety, notwithſtanding the moſt turbulent and factious Tribunes of former times were never put to look into their Affairs, nor give account of their Actions before the eighth Month. In the end they betook themſelves to that extream Act of Senate, which was never made but when the City was upon the Point of burning, or in the deſperate eſtate of the Common-wealth: Let the Conſuls, Prætors, Tribuni Plebis, and ſuch Proconſuls as are about the City, do their endeavour that the Common-wealth receive no detriment. This Senatus-conſultum was made on the ſeventh of the Ides of January; ſo that in the five firſt days in which the Senate might ſit, after that Lentulus had entered the Conſulſhip, the two Comitial days excepted, moſt heavy and bitter Decrees were made againſt the Power of Cæſar, and againſt the Tribunes of the People, famous and worthy Men, who thereupon fled preſently out of the City, and came to him, who being then at Ravenna attended an Anſwer to his eaſie and modeſt demands; if by any reaſonable courſe matters might be drawn to a peaceable concluſion.

Cæſars account of the beginning of the War.

De bello civili lib.

Dent opera Conſules, Prætores, Tribuni Pl. quiq; Proconſules ſunt ad urbem, nequid reſp. detrimenti capiat.

5. Others write, that Curio, being called to a Conſultation, would have had him preſently invade Italy; but he choſe rather firſt to make an overture of Peace, writing to his Friends, it's ſaid, to procure, though but two Legions with Gall within the Alpes and Illyricum, until he ſhould be Conſul again; which though it ſeemed ſomething reaſonable to Pompey, the Conſuls would not admit of it, Then wrote he to the Senate a menacing and bitter Letter; for ſo it is ſtiled by Cicero, who now was returned from Cilicia, his Province, which he had governed a year, and for his good Service in the Field had been ſaluted Imperator, and had a Triumph decreed him by the Senate, which theſe diſturbances hindered, he ſaying, that ſo an agreement were made, he had rather follow the Chariot of Cæſar than triumph in his own; and to effect it, he omitted no travel, writing to Cæſar, and ſpeaking unto Pompey. But Cæſar in that Letter, after an honourable mention made of his own Exploits, ſignified, that he was willing to reſign his Power, in caſe Pompey did the like; otherwiſe he ſhould retein his Forces, and ſpeedily come to revenge theſe Injuries which had been offered as well to himſelf as his Country. At the reading of theſe laſt words all cried out, that War was denounced, and they ſent L. Domitius to ſucceed him in his Command, with four newly raiſed Legions. Antonius and Caſſius the Tribunes being of Curio's Judgment, the Conſuls bad them depart out of the Senate, leſt their Perſons Sacroſanct (as the term was) by their Offices ſhould be violated; and they in a great rage departing, that night fled toward Cæſar. So began this famous Civil War, in the fourth year of the CLXXXII. Olympiad, the DCCV. of the City, XLVII. before the Birth of Chriſt; A. M. MMMCMLVI. the aforeſaid C. Claudius Marcellus, and L. Cornelius Lentulus being Conſuls.

What others write.

Cic. Ep. 11. lib. 16. Plutarch in Cicerone.

The beginning of the Civil War.

6. Amongſt other things ordained by the Senate in order to preparation for War, Cæſar writes, that two Conſular, and the other Prætorian Provinces were given to private Men, that had no Office of Magiſtracy. That Syria fell to Scipio, and Gall to L. Domitius. That into the other Provinces were ſent Prætors without conſent or approbation of the People, as had been practiſed in former years, who having made their Vows, took their Paludamenta, and went their ways. That the Conſuls (which before that time was never ſeen) went out of the City, and had their Lictors privately within the City, and in the Capitol, againſt all Order and ancient Cuſtom. That Levies were made throughout Italy, Arms were required, and Money was exacted from Municipal Towns, from Temples and Religious Places. That all Divine and Humane Rights were confounded. Provoked by theſe things things, he called the Soldiers together, acquainted them with all the Injuries he had received from time to time by procurement of his Enemies, and how they had alienated Pompey from him, of whom he had well deſerved. He lamented that the Power of the Tribunes, which former times had re-eſtabliſhed, ſhould now be ſuppreſſed by force. For Sylla having ſtripped the Tribunitial Power of all Rights and Prerogatives, yet continued to it the freedom of Interceſſion. But Pompey, who would ſeem to reſtore it to its Dignity, took away that Power which alone was left unto it. As for the Senatus-conſultum, whereby the Magiſtrates were required to take care for the ſafety of the Common-wealth, and by the Voice of which the Roman People were ſummoned to take Arms, it had never been practiſed, but when pernicious Laws were propounded, upon the violence of the Tribunes, and the mutiny and ſeceſſion of the People; when the Temples, and more eminent Places were ſeized, which Examples of former Ages had been expiated by the fortune of Saturninus, and the Gracchi. But at this preſent there was no ſuch matter attempted, no not in thought; no Law publiſhed; no tampering with the People; no ſeceſſion. Therefore he exhorted them to undertake the Defence of the Reputation and Dignity of their General, under whoſe Conduct for nine years together they had moſt happily managed the common Intereſt, fought many proſperous and victorious Battels, and ſetled all Gall and Germany in Peace. The Soldiers of the thirteenth Legion being only preſent, for the other Legions were not yet come, cried out inſtantly, that they were ready to undertake his Defence, and protect the Tribunes.

Cæſars Complaints.

Made to his Soldiers.

He goeth to Ariminum.

7. Having ſounded the minds of the Soldiers, he went, he ſaith, directly toward Ariminum, and there met with the Tribunes of the People that were fled to him; ſent for the reſt of the Legions from their Wintering Camps, and gave order that they ſhould follow him. Plutarch relates, that he had not in all above five thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe about him in Gall within the Alpes, having left the reſt beyond the Mountains to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. That conſidering how for the execution of his Deſign he needed not ſo many Men, but that his Intereſt was to come upon his Enemies on a ſudden, and ſurprize them, rather than by great Preparations to give them notice and time to make oppoſition, he commanded his Officers to go before, without any other Armour than their Swords, to take Ariminum, (the firſt City * one comes to out of Gall) with as little blood-ſhed and tumult as they could poſſible. Then committing the Army he had with him to the care of Hortenſius, one of his Friends, he continued an whole day together openly in the ſight of every Man, to ſee the Gladiators exerciſe before him. At night he went to his Lodging, and bathing his Body a little, came afterwards into the Hall, and made merry a while with them he had invited to Supper. When it was pretty late, and very dark, he roſe from the Table, and prayed the Company to be merry, and not to ſtir, for he would ſtraight be with them again; but he had ſecretly given order to a few of his truſtieſt Friends to follow him, ſome one way, and ſome another. He himſelf having hired a Carriage, made at firſt as if he would have gone ſome other way; but ſuddenly turned back again towards Ariminum. Now, when he was come to the little River Rubicon, which parted Gall within the Alpes from Italy, he ſtopped his courſe upon a ſudden.

* Now Rimini in Romania upon the Adriatick in the Popes Dominion.

His anxious thoughts at the Rubicon.

8. For, the farther he went, and nearer he came to execute his purpoſe, the more remorſe he had in his Conſcience, to think what it was he took in hand, and his thoughts were more perplexed, when he entred into a conſideration of the deſperateneſs of his Attempt. He was plunged into various thoughts, and ſpoke never a word, waving ſometimes one way, and ſometimes another, and often changed his determination contrary to himſelf. At length he fell into diſcourſe with his Friends he had with him, amongſt whom was Aſinius Pollio, telling them what miſchiefs this Paſſage over the River would breed in the World, and how much Poſterity would talk of it. But at laſt, with Courage, caſting from him all theſe Melancholick thoughts, he ſpake ſuch words as Valiant Men are wont when they attempt dangerous Enterprizes, as that a Deſperate Man feareth no danger, Come on; and paſſing the River, never ſtopped; ſo that before day-light he was within Ariminum, and took it. It's ſaid, that the night before he paſſed over this River, he dreamed that he lay with his Mother.

Plutarch.

The great confuſion in Italy upon his Invaſion.

9. The City of Ariminum being taken, and the rumor thereof diſperſed throughout Italy, as if open War had been begun both at Sea and Land, as if all the Laws of Rome had been broken, together with the extream Bounds and Limits of the State, not only Men and Women, but whole Corporations themſelves quitting their Habitations, fled from one place to another. Rome was immediately filled with multitudes that flocked thither, like droves of Cattel, being not to be commanded by any Authority of Magiſtrates, nor perſwaded by any Arguments, ſo confuſed they were, to the great danger of the City. For, in all places Men were of contrary opinions, and Tumults were raiſed by ſuch as were glad of this trouble, who could keep in no certain place, but every where fell out with ſuch as ſeemed either afraid or angry at it, and boldly threatned them with that which was to come. Pompey himſelf was amazed, but much more was troubled with the reflecting words which were given him on both ſides. Some ſaid he had done bravely, and paid for his folly, in making Cæſar ſo great and powerful both againſt himſelf and the Common-wealth. Others blamed him as having refuſed the honeſt and reaſonable Conditions offered by Cæſar, and ſuffering Lentulus the Conſul too much to abuſe him. Phæonius bade him ſtamp on the ground with his foot; for Pompey one day in bravery ſaid in the Senate, that none needed to trouble themſelves about Preparation for War; for when he liſted, with one ſtamp of his foot, he could fill all Italy with Soldiers. At this time Pompey had a greater number of Men than Cæſar; but thoſe about him, and concerned with him would never let him follow his own Determinations, bringing him ſo many lies, as if Cæſar had been already at their heels. Dion Caſſius writes, that he was affrighted by what he learnt from Labienus concerning Cæſar. For Labienus, who had been one of Cæſars greateſt Friends, and had fought valiantly under him, as his Legatus in Gall, forſook him and went to Pompey, to whom he revealed all his Secrets. A wonder it is made by Dion, what the cauſe ſhould be that moved Labienus to this Revolt. But he concludes it was, becauſe being now puffed up with his Wealth and Reputation, he carried himſelf very highly, and Cæſar diſdaining he ſhould think to equal him, did leſs reſpect him than formerly. This alteration of mind Labienus not enduring, and ſtanding in fear of what might be the conſequence of it, revolted from him.

Pompey ſendeth to Cæſar.

10. Pompey being altered in his Inclinations by this means, ſent Meſſengers to Cæſar, namely, L. Cæſar his Kinſman, whoſe Father was Legate in his Camp, and Roſcius the Prætor, who voluntarily undertook the Imployment. L. Cæſar told him, that Pompey deſired to clear himſelf, leſt he ſhould take thoſe things to be done in contempt of him, which were ordered only for the Service of the State. The good of that he ſaid he always preferred before any private reſpect, and that Cæſar was alſo obliged in honour to lay aſide all indignation and affection, for the ſake of the Common-wealth, and not to be ſo tranſported with anger and diſdain as he ſeemed to be, leſt hoping to be avenged upon them at Rome, he ſhould endamage his Country. Somewhat more he added with excuſes on Pompeys part, in all which he was ſeconded by Roſcius. Cæſar anſwered, That he had ever held the Dignity of the Common-wealth dearer than his own Life. He grieved that a kindneſs beſtowed on him by the People ſhould be ſpitefully wreſted from him by his Adverſaries; that ſix Months of his Government were to be cut off; and ſo he was to be called home to the City; and that notwithſtanding at the laſt Creation of Magiſtrates it was reſolved, that regard ſhould be had of him though abſent; Yet for the Common-wealth's ſake could he be content to undergo the loſs of that Honour. But having writ to the Senate, that all Men might quit their Armies, he was ſo far from obtaining it, that a Levy thereupon was made throughout Italy; moreover, that the two Legions, drawn from him under pretence of the Parthian War, were ſtill reteined about the City, which were alſo in Arms. He perceived well enough that all this tended to his deſtruction, and yet was he content to condeſcend to all things, and to indure all inconveniences for the good of the Publick. Let Pompey, ſaith he, go to his Government and Provinces. Let both the Armies be diſcharged. Let all Men in Italy lay down their Arms. Let the City be freed of fear. Let the Comitia be left to their ancient Liberty, and the whole Adminiſtration free to the Senate and People. For the ſecurity hereof let an Oath be taken, elſe let Pompey come near to me, or me be permitted to go nearer to Pompey, that by conference an end may be put to theſe differences.

Cæſars demands.

The Anſwer unſatisfactory.

11, The Meſſengers delivered this Anſwer to Pompey, and the Conſuls at Capua, to which, after Conſultation, they made a Reply by Writing, and the ſame Meſſengers. This was the drift of it, that Cæſar ſhould return into Gall, quit Ariminum, and diſmiſs his Army; which if he did, Pompey would then go into Spain; in the mean time, till ſecurity could be given that Cæſar would do this, the Conſuls and Pompey would not forbear to levy Men. Theſe Conditions were very unequal, that Cæſar ſhould quit Ariminum, and return into his Province, and Pompey hold Legions and Provinces belonging to others; that Cæſar ſhould diſmiſs his Army, and Pompey raiſe new Troops; that Pompey ſhould promiſe to repair to his Government, but aſſign no day for his departure; ſo that if he had not gone till Cæſars time of Government had been expired, he could not have been accuſed of breaking his word. But there being no time appointed for a conference, nor any ſhow made of coming nearer, there could be no hope of Peace. Cæſar ſeeing this, ſent out M. Antony, and others, and took in ſeveral Municipal Towns by the aſſiſtance of the Decuriones of Auximum, though Actius Varus, who held that Town, oppoſed it, making Levies of Men through the Country of Picenum.

Cæſar taketh in ſome Towns.

12. The noiſe hereof flying to Rome, ſtruck the City with ſuch terror, that Lentulus the Conſul being to deliver out Money to Pompey, according to a Senatus-conſultum, and having opened the inner Treaſury, forthwith fled away; for it was reported falſly, that Cæſar approached, and that his Horſe was near at hand. Marcellus the other Conſul, and moſt of the other Magiſtrates, followed after. Pompey departing the day before, was gone to thoſe Legions he had taken from Cæſar, and had left in Apulia to winter. In the mean time the Levies ceaſed in the City, and no place ſeemed ſecure betwixt that and Capua, where they began firſt to aſſemble. There to ſecure themſelves they preſſed for Soldiers ſuch Coloni as by the Lex Julia were placed there. The Gladiators, which there Cæſar kept in exerciſe, were by Lentulus brought out of the School, ſet at liberty, and had Horſes given them, being commanded to follow him. But afterward upon advice how ill it was ſpoken of, he diſperſed them throughout Campania for their ſafe keeping. So writes Cæſar himſelf as to the flight of the Conſuls, and Pompey out of Rome. Plutarch adds, that Pompey, wearied with the frights, fury, and madneſs of thoſe who cried ſtill that Cæſar was at hand, and ſeeing all things in tumult, concluded there was no way but to forſake the City, and commanded the Senate to follow him, and not a Man to tarry there, except he loved tyranny more than liberty, and the Common-wealth. And ſo the Conſuls themſelves, before they had offered their common Sacrifices, as was wont, upon going out of the City, fled away; as did moſt of the Senators, taking away in haſt ſuch things as came to hand, as if they had ſtoln them. And in this hurlyburly ſome even of Cæſars Friends took the ſame courſe, being out of fear, carried with the ſtream of this Tumult.

Hurliburly upon noiſe thereof.

13. Dion Caſſius having told us how the great ones were unwilling that Cæſar and Pompey ſhould meet and confer, leſt they ſhould conſpire together againſt their Intereſt; and that Pompey was unwilling to be reduced to a private Life, becauſe he knew, that in that condition he ſhould not be ſo great with the People as Cæſar would be; adds alſo, that before the Meſſengers were returned he went into Campania, where he thought he could with more convenience raiſe the War. He commanded, that all the Senate and Magiſtrates ſhould follow him, by a Senatus-conſultum having propounded Impunity to ſuch as would quit the place upon this occaſion, and having declared that he would eſteem him that continued here no other than a publick Enemy. He procured alſo a Decree, that they ſhould take along with them all the publick Money, and all things conſecrated to their Gods, thereby hoping to be able to raiſe a great Army: And almoſt all the Cities of Italy had that kindneſs for him, that a little before having heard he was dangerouſly ſick, they made publick Vows for his recovery; which was an extraordinary Honour, and happened only afterwards to them, who obtained Sovereign Authority; although it was no ſtrong Argument, that therefore they would continue conſtant in fidelity to him. And although it was decreed, that all the Treaſure and Conſecrated things ſhould be carried away, yet was neither ſort removed out of their Places. For when it was heard that Cæſar had not given any peaceable Anſwer, but blamed the Meſſengers as having falſly reported things on his ſide, and that he had many Men bold and couragious, and reſolved to make havock of all things, (as in ſuch Caſes things are uſually made worſe, and more terrible than indeed they are) affrighted therewith, before they touched them, they ran away in great tumults and diſorder. They called to mind what horrid things had been committed by Marius and Sylla, and could not think better of Cæſar, whoſe Soldiers for the moſt part were Barbarians. But in ſuch manner did Pompey leave the City, and with him moſt of the Senators; for ſome few ſtaid behind, who were addicted to Cæſar, and ſome others that reſolved to ſtand Neuters.

Pompey and the Senators leave Rome, and go to Capua.

14. Cæſar having notice hereof, went not ſtrait to Rome, for he knew that the City would fall to the Victor as a reward, and he profeſſed that he did not make War upon Rome, but for her ſake againſt his Adverſaries. But throughout Italy he diſperſed Papers, whereby he challenged Pompey to debate the matter betwixt them, and indeavoured to perſwade others to be void of fear, and to keep themſelves at home. Diſlodging from Auximum, he paſſed through the Country of Picenum, and there was moſt willingly entertained by all the Governments. But a ſtop was given to him at Corſinium by Domitius Ænobarbus, who had raiſed twenty Cohorts out of Alba, the Marſi, Peligni, and adjacent Countries. Cæſar paſſed the River, which Domitius in vain attempted to hinder, by breaking down the Bridge at three Miles diſtance from the Town; but the Party he ſent vvas beaten off by Cæſars Vanguard, vvho then ſate dovvn before the Place. Domitius ſent to Pompey to deſire aid, affirming, that Cæſar vvith two Armies, by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the Paſſages, might eaſily be ſhut up; vvhich opportunity if he neglected, he himſelf vvith above thirty Cohorts, and of Senators and Equites a great number, muſt needs run a very great danger. In the mean time he took care for effectual defence, and to incourage his Soldiers, promiſed to each Man four Acres out of his ovvn Lands, vvith a ſuitable proportion to the Centurions and Evocati; for having been of Sylla's Party he had got great Poſſeſſions.

15. Cæſar made great Works to fortifie his Camp, and begirt the Tovvn vvith Caſtles, and other Fortifications, vvhich vvhile he vvas about, the Meſſengers returned to Domitius. Pompey vvrote back that he vvould not hazard the Cauſe by driving it to ſuch extremity; and vvhereas Domitius had, vvithout his advice or conſent, ingaged in keeping Corſinium, he adviſed him, if poſſible, to quit it, and bring the Forces to him. But he diſſembled the matter, and gave out, that Pompey vvould come ſpeedily to their relief, and at the ſame time conſulted vvith his intimate Friends, hovv to make his eſcape out of the Tovvn; vvhich being at length knovvn by his demeanour, and other Circumſtances, his Men ſeized on him, and ſent to Cæſar, offering to deliver him up, and ſurrender the Place. He concluded that the importance of ſuch a Tovvn vvas not to be neglected, but kept his Men from entering that night, leſt any violence ſhould be committed, vvhich he reſolved to prevent, as good policy it vvas in his undertaking. Lentulus Spinther being in the Tovvn, came forth to him, begged pardon, and put him in mind of their former familiarity, acknovvledging the favours received from him, vvhich indeed vvere of the greateſt ſize; for by his means he had been choſen into the Colledge of Pontifices, upon leaving his Prætorſhip had obtained Spain for a Province, and had been aſſiſted by him in his Suit for the Conſulſhip.

Cæſar taketh Corſinium.

16. Cæſar interrupting him ſaid, That he came not out of his Province to do any harm, but to defend himſelf from the affronts of his Enemies; to reſtore the Tribunes of the People, vvho had been driven out of the City, to their Dignity, and to put himſelf and the People of Rome into liberty, being oppreſſed by the faction of a fevv perſons. Lentulus put into heart by this Anſwer, deſired to return into the Town to incourage others who were deſperate as to their fortunes; and the next day Cæſar ſent for the Senators, and Senators Children, the Tribunes of Soldiers, the Equites and Decuriones, a great number of which Domitius had culled out of the Municipal Towns. All theſe he protected from the Inſolencies of the Soldiers, and having a little upbraided them with their Ingratitude, diſmiſſed them in ſafety. And that he might not ſeem more ſparing of the Lives, than the Monies, of Men, ſixty Seſtertia, which Domitius had brought with him to Corſinium, and depoſited there, being preſented to him by the Duumviri of the Town, he reſtored to him; though he knew it was publick Money, and given out by Pompey to pay Soldiers. Domitius his Men he commanded to take the Military Oath to himſelf, and having ſtaid ſeven days at Corſinium, through the Confines of the Marrucini, Terentini, and Larinates, he came into Apulia.

17. Pompey having notice of what had paſſed at Corſinium, took his Way from Luceria to Brunduſium, raiſing all the Force he poſſibly could, even to the arming of Shepherds and Slaves, whom mounting, he made ſome three hundred Horſe. In the mean time ſeveral Cohorts revolted to Cæſar, and Cn. Magius of Cremona, Maſter of the Works of Pompey, was taken on the way, and brought to Cæſar. Him he ſent back with this Meſſage to Pompey, that ſeeing there was no opportunity of meeting, he was reſolved to ſeek him at Brunduſium; it highly importing the Commonwealth, and every Mans ſafety, that they two ſhould confer together: Neither could matters ſucceed ſo well at a diſtance by the Intervention of a third Party. Coming then to Brunduſium with ſix Legions, he found that the Conſuls were gone over to Dyrrachium, and Pompey was in the Town with twenty Cohorts. He knew not whether he ſtaid there to command the Adriatick, and the Coaſts of Italy and Greece, or only wanted Shipping to make his Paſſage; but he would not endure that he ſhould think he could not be forced to quit Italy, and therefore he reſolved to block up the Haven, and to take away the uſe of it from him.

Follows Pompey to Brunduſium.

18. Where the mouth of the Haven was narroweſt he raiſed great Mounts of Earth, and where the Sea was ſhallow near unto the Shoar; and farther in the deep where no ſuch Mounts could be raiſed, he placed flat Boats two together, over againſt the Mounts, of thirty foot ſquare, which he faſtened with Anchors to keep them from being toſſed with the Waves; to them thus placed he added others of the ſame ſize, and covered them with Faggots and Earth, that Men might move upon them readily, and defend them. He fenced them with Hurdles, and ſuch ſtuff, and on every fourth flote made a Tower two Stories high, to protect them from the force of Shipping and Fire. Pompey againſt them ſent out great Ships of burthen with Towers of three Stories, full of all ſorts of Munition; and every day the Parties fought with Slings, Arrows, and other caſting Weapons. Yet Cæſar, he himſelf tells us, carried matters ſo, as being willing not to let fall Conditions of Peace. Wondering that he heard nothing from Magius, he ſent Caninius Rebilus, one of his Legati, to Scribonius Libo, (whoſe Daughter Pompey's Son had married) to whom he was allied, and an inward Friend, to perſwade him to mediate a Reconciliation, and procure that Cæſar might ſpeak with Pompey. It might be, he ſaid, that both of them might yield to lay down their Arms upon equal Conditions, and then the greateſt ſhare of the Honour would fall to Libo. Having heard Caninius Libo went ſtraight to Pompey, and within a while returning, brought word, that nothing could be done towards an agreement, becauſe the Conſuls were abſent. Whereupon Cæſar reſolved to trouble himſelf no more about a Treaty, as he often had done, but to prepare vigorouſly for War.

19. The Work being half perfected, after nine days, the Ships that had tranſported the Conſuls, and the other part of the Army, returned, and thereupon Pompey began to fit himſelf for his departure, either moved by theſe Works of Cæſar, or elſe purſuing his former Determination. And the better to retard the proſecution of Cæſar, he ſtopped up the Gates, Streets, and Paſſages, ſunk Ditches croſs the ways, and therein ſtuck ſharp Piles and Stakes, which he covered lightly with Hurdles and thin Earth, leaving only two ways free, which led to the Haven, and theſe too he fenced with a ſtrong Paliſado of huge and ſharp Stakes. Then did he command the Soldiers to get aboard without noiſe or tumult, leaving here and there upon the Walls, and in the Towers, ſome of the readieſt Slingers and Archers, to be called away upon warning when the Soldiers were ſhiped; appointing Veſſels of burthen to take them in at a convenient place. The Citizens of Brunduſium being diſobliged by the affronts received from Pompey, and the injuries from his Soldiers, gave notice to Cæſar of their departure, as they were running here and there, from the tops of their Houſes. Cæſar prepared to ſcale the Walls, but Pompey weighed Anchor, and the light armed Soldiers got to the Veſſels e're his Men could mount them. Then were they ſeaſonably advertiſed of the blind Ditch by the Inhabitants, and avoiding the danger, were brought a great compaſs about, and came to the Haven. There, by Skiffs and Boats, they ſeized two Ships with Soldiers, which ſtuck by chance upon the Mounts Cæſar had made.

Pompey follows the Conſuls to Dyrrachium.

20. This flight of Pompey, accompanied with all the Circumſtances, is eſteemed the beſt Stratagem that he ever uſed in all his life, and indeed he had made it evident to Cæſar, if it had not been for the Information given by them of Brunduſium. However, his quitting the Place is cenſured but for a faulty reſolution, though handſomly carried. Cæſar marvelled much, that lying in a ſtrong City, and expecting his Army to come out of Spain, and being Maſter of the Sea beſides, he would leave Italy. Cicero alſo blamed him for abandoning Italy, therein following the Example of Themiſtocles rather than of Pericles; whereas this troubleſome time and affair was rather to be compared with that of Pericles than of the other; Cæſar himſelf having ſhewed that he was afraid of the time in that he ſent to Brunduſium to treat with Pompey. But ſo as Dio obſerves, did Pompey quit his Countrey, in ſuch a manner, as was both in deliberation and action contrary to his former practice, when he came into Italy out of Aſia; and therefore he procured a Fortune and Reputation contrary to his former. For he who once diſmiſſed his Soldiers from Brunduſium, that they ſhould not moleſt the Citizens, now carried others out of Italy to moleſt them, and he who before had carried the Riches of the Barbarians to Rome, now carried all things from it he could to other places; and deſpairing utterly concerning his Country, reſolved to uſe againſt it the aſſiſtance of Strangers, and of ſuch as he had formerly reduced into ſervitude; and he put more confidence in them for his ſafety and Power, than in thoſe of whom he had well deſerved. Therefore he went under Plutarch.

His departure cenſured.

under ſuch circumſtances that he got inſtead of his former glory in War, a repute of puſillanimity and fear of Cæſar; and for the Honour he had had of increaſing the Renown of his Countrey, now procured the infamy of forſaking her.

21. But by this means became Cæſar in threeſcore days Maſter of all Italy without Blood-ſhed. Now although he well underſtood, that it much imported his Intereſt to put an end to the War by purſuing Pompey, before he could joyn himſelf with the Tranſmarine Forces, yet conſidering the lets and the length of time, and that he had no Shipping, but muſt ſtay for ſuch as could be brought from Ancona, Gall, and the Straits, which at this time of the year would require a long and troubleſome Paſſage; he reſolved to ſteer another Courſe. He thought it not fit that Pompey's old Army, and the two Provinces of Spain, whereof one in gratitude was deeply ingaged to his Adverſary, ſhould be aſſured and ſetled, or that time ſhould be given them there to raiſe new Forces, or opportunity to wreſt from him Italy and Gall in his abſence. He reſolved therefore for Spain, and gave order to the Municipal Towns to provide Shipping, and ſend it to Brunduſium. He ſent Valerius and Curio with convenient Forces to ſeize Sardinia and Sicily, which they eaſily did, Cotta and Cato the two Governours flying out of their Provinces.

Cæſar reſolves for Spain.

22. Cæſar then, to eaſe his Men and refreſh them, carried them back into the Municipal Towns, and went himſelf directly to Rome, where, calling a Senate, he laid open to them the affronts and injuries offered him by his Enemies. He proteſted that he never ſought Honour in the State by extraordinary means; but expected the legitimate time of the Conſulſhip, and was content with that which it was lawful to any Citizen to ſtand for. And the Tribunes of the People had propounded, that conſideration of him, though abſent, ſhould be had; but it was contradicted by his Adverſaries, and by Cato's long reſiſtance, who ſpent the time according to his cuſtom in teadious Speeches; which if Pompey, being Conſul, diſliked, why did he ſuffer it to be done? and if he did allow of it, why did he not ſuffer him to enjoy the kindneſs of the People? He declared how patient he had been, in having moved on his own accord, that both might quit their Forces, though this would have been very prejudicial to his Honour and Dignity. He ſhewed the malice and bitterneſs of his Enemies, in that they refuſed to do themſelves what they required of others, and choſe rather to put all things into confuſion, than relinquiſh their Commands, and their Armies. He told at large what injury they had done him in taking away his Legions, and how cruel and inſolent they had been againſt the Tribunes. He mentioned the Conditions he propounded, and the Conference deſired and refuſed; and upon the whole, beſought them to take the charge of the Common-wealth, together with him; but if, out of fear, they refuſed, he would not be burthenſome to them, but undertake it himſelf. He would have Meſſengers ſent, neither did he regard at all what Pompey had ſaid in the Senate, That they to whom Meſſengers were ſent had Authority attributed to them, and it ſignified fear in thoſe that ſent them; theſe things being Arguments of puſillanimity; for his part, as he had endeavoured to excell in proweſs and ſtrength, ſo would he alſo in Juſtice and Equity.

Cæſar gooth to Rome.

23. The Senators were well pleaſed that Meſſengers ſhould be ſent, but no Man was found that would go, for fear of Pompey, who, upon his departure from Rome, had ſaid in open Senate, that he would hold him that ſtaid there in the ſame condition with him that was in Cæſar's Camp. Three days were ſpent in Debates and Excuſes, L. Metellus the Tribunus Plebis being induced by Cæſars Adverſaries to protract the time, and hinder any matter that he ſhould propound. Perceiving then their reſolution, after he had ſpent there in vain ſome few days, that he might not ſpend any more time, nor leave thoſe things undone which he determined to do, he left the City, and went into the farther Gall. Such is the Account he gives us himſelf of what was done by himſelf and others during his ſtay in Rome, which is not full enough, if we conſult and regard other Writers. Dion Caſſius mentioning his coming to Rome, adds, that the Senate was called without the Pomærium by Antonius and Caſſius, who had formerly been put out of it. That his Speech was long and full of courteſie, he indeavouring thereby to gain their good wills, for the preſent, and put them in good hope for the time to come. For, beholding the multitude of his Soldiers, they were full of fears and ſuſpicions, and therefore he thought it fit to cheriſh them, that they might keep quiet till he had done his buſineſs. Therefore neither did he blame any, nor threaten; nay, he inveighed againſt them who would make War upon their fellow Citizens, not without Imprecations, and moved, that Meſſengers might be ſent to Pompey about a Peace. After the ſame manner he ſpake to the People, which flocked together alſo without the City, and he commanded Corn to be brought out of the Iſlands, promiſing alſo to beſtow upon every Man three hundred Seſterces. For all this, they at Rome conſidered with themſelves, that the words and the actions of Deſigners were very different, as was evident when ſuch obtained what they ſought for. That at firſt they promiſed all fine things to ſuch as might be in capacity to oppoſe them; but having got poſſeſſion of the thing deſigned, remembred their promiſes no more, but made uſe of what they had procured from them againſt them that gave them it, as they remembred that Marius and Sylla had pretended all fair things imaginable. Their fear was increaſed when they ſaw that no Meſſengers were ſent; and that Piſo the Father-in-law of Cæſar was blamed exceedingly for making mention of a Meſſage. And how could they expect any Money, when what was left in the Treaſury, was to be given to thoſe Soldiers, of which they ſtood in fear, for their maintenance? Yet, as if all things went proſperouſly, did they reſume theſe Habits which they wore in time of Peace, and had laid by them.

Leaves it, and goes into Gall.

Cæſars Relation not full enough.

What others ſay.

24. The Propoſal concerning Money was oppoſed by L. Metellus the Tribunus Plebis, who not being able to prevail, got him to the Treaſury to watch the doors. But the Soldiers made no more of his watching than they did of his liberty of Speech, and breaking the Lock, (for the Conſuls had taken away the Keys) took away the Money. Beſides, many other Decrees were made, moſt of which Antony propounded under ſhew of equality, but indeed to eſtabliſh Domination. But each ſide called its Adverſaries, the Enemies of the Common-wealth, and pretended for the ſake of it to wage War, but both wrought only their own ends, and equally weakned the common Intereſt. Plutarch, as to the Meſſengers, adds another Reaſon to that of Cæſar, why none would undertake the Imployment. He ſaith, It was either becauſe they feared Pompey, having forſaken him, or becauſe they thought Cæſar meant not as he ſpake, but that he uſed words of courſe to colour his purpoſe. When Metellus, one of the Tribunes, would not ſuffer him to take any of the common Treaſure out of the Temple of Saturn, but affirmed it was againſt the Law, he told him that times of War and Law were two things, and bade him, if what he was about did offend him, to get him gone; for, War could not bear ſuch freedom and boldneſs of Speech; but when the War was ended, and all was quiet again, then he might ſpeak what he would. He added, that he told him this of favour, departing therein from his Right; for, ſaith he, Both thou art mine, and all they that have riſen againſt me, and whom I have in my Power. Having ſpoken thus to Metellus, he went to the Temple door, where the Treaſure lay, and finding no Keys, he cauſed Smiths to be ſent for, and made them break open the Locks. Metellus thereupon began to hinder him, and ſome that ſtood by commended him for ſo doing; but Cæſar at length ſpeaking bigly to him, threatned he would kill him preſently if he perſiſted to trouble him; and further ſaid, Young Man, thou knoweſt it is harder for me to ſay it than to do it. This word made Metellus quake, and he got him away, and ever after that Cæſar had all at command for his Wars.

25. All this Cæſar omits concerning this publick Treaſure, which they ſay was preſerved from the time that Rome was taken by the Galls, not to be made uſe of but upon ſome extream neceſſity. He pretends that Lentulus, who had orders to ſend it to Pompey, abandoned it by his flight, as we have ſeen, upon the firſt falſe report that Cæſars Troops approached Rome. But, to ſay the truth, his Report is very different in many things that concern himſelf from what we read of him in other Authors, theſe two eſpecially we make uſe of; and therefore we think it neceſſary to take in what others ſay in this matter of the Civil War eſpecially; it being difficult to a Writer in ſuch a caſe to reſiſt the temptation, and treat as indifferently of things which concern himſelf, as thoſe wherein he is no way concerned. But, if you pleaſe, take along with you the excuſe Appian maketh for him, who deriding the ſcrupuloſity of the ancient Romans that would not touch that Treaſure but in extremity of War againſt the Celtæ or Galles, ſaith, That Cæſar might lawfully take it, becauſe he had conquered that Nation, and the Romans had no more cauſe to fear them. Dio tells us further, That he took in Sardinia and Sicily without a ſtroak, the Governours of them receding from their Commands; and that he ſent away Ariſtobulus into Paleſtine his Country, that he might act ſomething againſt Pompey. He gave liberty to the Sons of ſuch as had been proſcribed by Sylla to ſue for Offices of Magiſtracy; and in concluſion, ſetled all matters both in Rome and throughout Italy, as might moſt conduce to his preſent Affair. Having committed the care of them to Antony, he reſolved for Spain, which greatly favoured Pompey, and put him in fear, leſt in his abſence Gall might alſo be perſwaded to revolt. In the mean time Cicero, having not come in the ſight of Cæſar, and with him certain other Senators, went to Pompey, pey, whom they looked on as having the better cauſe, and who would they imagined prove victorious. For, the Conſuls before their departure, and Cicero himſelf, then Proconſul, had commanded that all ſhould follow them to Theſſalonica, the Enemy having ſeized Rome. They were indeed the chief of the Senate, and whitherſoever they went, they carried with them a reſemblance of the Common-wealth. Therefore did moſt of the Senators and Equites follow them either preſently, or after ſome diſtance of time: And the Inhabitants of all the Cities which Cæſar had not ſecured by his Arms. But now let us hear Cæſar himſelf relate what he did after he had left Rome.

26. Upon his Arrival in Gall he found that Pompey had ſent into Spain Viballius Rufus, whom Cæſar had taken at Corfinium, and diſmiſſed; as alſo that Domitius with eight Gallies was gone to ſecure Maſſilia, (or Marſeilles) the Inhabitants of which, upon a Meſſage received from Pompey, ſhut their Gates againſt Cæſar; called into their City the Albicans, a barbarous People, who of ancient time had held amity with them, and dwelt upon the Mountains above Marſeilles, and made all preparations for defence. Cæſar calling out ſome fifteen of the Citizens, expoſtulated with them, and told them they ſhould rather follow the Example of all Italy, than apply themſelves to the Will of any one Man. The Town made this Anſwer, That they underſtood the People of Rome were divided into two Parties, and whether of them was in the right they could not judge. That the Leaders of theſe Factions, Pompey and Cæſar, were both ſpecial Patrons and Benefactors to their City, the one having augmented their publick Revenues, and endowed their State with the Lands of the Volcæ Arecomici, and the Helvii; and the other having conquered and ſubdued Galliæ, (a Place it ſeems ſo called near the Town) gave it to them, and increaſed their Tolls or Impoſts; that therefore, as they were equally obliged to both, they would carry an equal reſpect unto them, and not aid either of them againſt the other, or receive them into their City or Ports. But while theſe things were in hand, Domitius arrived, and was made both Governour of the City, and General for the War. A Fleet now they rigged up, and made Proviſion for a Siege; with which injuries Cæſar, he tells us, provoked, brought three Legions to Marſeilles, reſolved to prepare neceſſaries for an Attacque, and to build twelve Gallies at Arelatum, or Arles. Theſe in thirty days time from the cutting down of the Timber, were built, armed, rigged, and brought down to Marſeilles. And the Command of them he gave to D. Brutus, and left C. Trebonius, his Legatus, to follow the Siege.

Cæſar beſiegeth Marſeilles.

27. Dion Caſſius his Relation ſo far agrees with this of Cæſar, as to affirm that they of Marſeilles were the only Men in Gall, who neither followed his Party, nor received him into their City. He ſaith the Anſwer they gave him was obſervable, that they were the Aſſociates of the People of Rome, and that at preſent they did not curiouſly inquire, nor were able to diſtinguiſh whether the one or the other was in the wrong. But if they pleaſed to come as Friends, they would receive them both without their Arms, but neither of them, if they came in a State of War. He ſpeaks nothing of Domitius his coming, which Cæſar inſiſts upon, and the receiving of him as a juſt ground for the War; but adds, that being beſieged, they both defended themſelves againſt him, and alſo againſt Trebonius and D. Brutus a long time, that Cæſar himſelf ſpent ſome time in attacquing Marſeilles, which he thought eaſie to be taken, thinking it a thing unſufferable, that he who had taken Rome it ſelf without any trouble, ſhould be ſhut out by them of that City. But perceiving the Siege would be drawn out in length, they making ſuch reſiſtance, he left it to others, and haſtened into Spain. He had diſpatched thither C. Fabius; but fearing that he might be worſted if he engaged in Fight, he reſolved to attend his buſineſs there in his own Perſon. He himſelf writes to the ſame effect. As that he ſent from Marſeilles C. Fabius one of his Legati with three Legions that wintered about Narbon, commanding him with all care and diligence to ſeize on the Paſſage of the Pyrenæan Hills, which were at that time kept by the Forces of L. Afranius. The other Legions which wintered further off he ordered to follow after. And Fabius according to his Directions haſted and put the Garriſon from the Paſſage; and by great Journeys marched toward Afranius his Army.

He haſteth into Spain.

How Pompeys Affairs ſtood there.

28. After the Arrival of Viballius Rufus in Spain the three Legati of Pompey, which were Afranius, Petreius, and Varro, did ſo diſpoſe and divide their Charges, that Petreius was ordered to bring his three Legions out of Luſitania, through the Territories of the Vectones, and joyn himſelf with Afranius in the hithermoſt Spain; and Varro was to keep the farther Province. Petreius accordingly haſted to Afranius, and induced by the opportunity of the Place, they agreed to keep the War on foot near about Ilerda. Afranius had three Legions, and Petreius two, beſides Scutati of the nearer Province, and Cetrati of the farther, ſome eighty Cohorts; and of both Provinces about five thouſand Horſe. Cæſar had ſent his Legions into Spain, together with ſix thouſand Auxiliaries of Foot, and three thouſand of Horſe, which had been with him in his former Wars. And at his requeſt he had the ſame number out of Gall, the moſt noble and valiant being called out of every City, beſides thoſe of the Aquitani and Highlanders, bordering upon the Gallick Province. Now was he advertiſed, that Pompey himſelf was coming through Mauritania into Spain with his Legions, and with all ſpeed would be with him. Thereupon he borrowed Money of the Tribunes, and the Centurions of the Soldiers, and diſtributed it to his Army, by which largeſs he gained two Points. For by the Loan as a Pledge he ingaged the Officers to indeavour his good ſucceſs as their own Intereſt. And by the Largeſs he purchaſed the good Affection of the Soldiers.

Action betwixt the Officers and Cæſar near Ilerda.

29. Within two or three days Cæſar arrived with nine hundred Horſe, which he had kept with him for a Guard; and having viewed the Place, the next day in a triple Body he marched toward Ilerda, and offered Battel in an equal and indifferent place. But, Afranius was not diſpoſed to Battel, which Cæſar ſeeing, drew a Trench behind ſome of his Legions, as they ſtood in Arms facing the Enemy, and fortified his Camp, though Afranius and Petreius to divert him brought down their Forces, and provoked his Men to fight. Betwixt the Town and the Hill where Pompey's Officers were incamped, there was a Plain above a quarter of a Mile over, and in it a riſing Ground, which Cæſar endeavoured to poſſeſs himſelf of, thereby to cut them off from the Town and the Bridge, which lay over the River Sicoris; but his Deſign being perceived, Afranius his Men came thither firſt, and thoſe of Cæſar were forced to retire to the Legions. The whole Army was well-nigh affrighted, for as all Soldiers, by living long in a place, get much of the Uſages and Cuſtoms of the Country, Afranius his Men now fought in a faſhion like thoſe of the Luſitanians, who were wont to run furiouſly upon their Enemies, and bold to ſeize on a Place, not regarding their Orders or Ranks, but fighting in a ſcattered and diſperſed manner. The Enemy now inſolent upon their ſucceſs, vigorouſly purſued, till Cæſar, bringing out the ninth Legion, forced him to turn tail, and retire under the Walls of Ilerda; but the Legion purſued them, till it came into a diſadvantageous place under the Hill, whereon the Town ſtood. Here from the upper ground it was ſorely annoyed, and the Fight continued long in ſo unequal a Place, each Party relieving its Men with freſh Supplies. They fought ſome five hours, and Cæſar's Men having ſpent their other Weapons, drew their Swords and made up to the Hill with ſuch ſucceſs, that they forced their Enemy under the Walls, and the Horſe got up in an eaſie aſcent, and riding betwixt the Armies, the better ſecured the Retreat of their Friends. On Cæſars ſide ſeventy Men were ſlain, and ſix hundred at leaſt wounded. And of that of Afranius two hundred Soldiers, and five Centurions. But as well the one as the other thought it had the better.

Cæſar extricates himſelf out of great difficulties.

30. After this followed a great Rain, which cauſed the Rivers, betwixt which Cæſar was incamped, ſo to ſwell, that all Proviſions were cut off from him, and he was very much diſtreſſed. And the Inconvenience grew to that heighth, that, on the contrary, Afranius his Party having plenty of all things, by reaſon of the Bridge of Ilerda, concluded the War in a manner to be at an end, and thereof they wrote Letters to Rome, where the News was ſo acceptable, that Viſits were made to the Family of Afranius by thoſe that congratulated for his ſucceſs. Hereupon alſo many went out of Italy to Pompey, of whom ſome to be the firſt Meſſengers of the News, that they might not ſeem to expect the laſt event of the War, and come when they ſaw the quarrel determined. All the ways were kept by Afranius, and no Bridges could be made to ſerve in ſtead of thoſe that had been broken down with the violence of the Waves. When things were come thus to extremity, Cæſar cauſed ſome Boats to be made of light ſtuff, and ſmall Timber in the Keel, and with Wicker in the upper parts, being covered with Hides, and in the night conveying them in Carts about twenty two Miles from the Camp, therewith made a ſhift to tranſport his Soldiers, and ſettle a courſe for Proviſions. And he was cheared by news from Marſeilles of a Defeat given by D. Brutus his Admiral to the Inhabitants, who ſending out ſeventeen Gallies, beſides many other Veſſels, hoped to over-power him by their Numbers. But Cæſar had taken the ſtouteſt Men of all the Legions, as well of the Antesignani as Centurions, and put them aboard the Fleet; they themſelves deſiring to be imployed in that Service. They grapled with the Maſſilians, who in dexterity of His Men defeat the Maſſilians.

tacking,

Sect. 7.

tacking, and ſkill of their Pilots, were ſuperiour to them, and each Ship undertaking two, they ſunk part, ſome they took, with the Men, and the reſt they beat back into the Haven. The Maſſilians loſt nine Ships, with thoſe that were taken.

Pompeys Officers endeavour to remove the War.

Cæſar purſues their Army.

31. But, upon making the Bridge, fortune turned on Cæſars ſide, for he then had the Command of the Country. Many Cities and States ſent and ſubmitted to him, and the Enemy being diſcouraged, reſolved to transfer the War into Celtiberia, where the Name of Pompey was very precious, and that of Cæſar ſcarcely known: There they expected a good Addition of Horſe, and other Supplies, and thought to draw on the War in length till Winter. Setting forward, they were much diſturbed in their march by Cæſars Horſe, and the Legions in the Camp moved him by their Centurions and Tribunes, that they alſo might purſue them, refuſing no labour nor hazard. Having with great difficulty got over the River, which he drained with Trenches as much as he could, they fetch'd a compaſs of ſome ſix Miles, and yet came up with the Enemy about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, and ſtill dogging him at the heels, forced him to incamp himſelf, and ſtop his Journey. Upon diſcovery, both ſides found the way for five Miles was open and Champion, but afterwards Mountainous and Rocky, and that it was their Intereſt to poſſeſs themſelves of the ſtraits, which whoſoever firſt ſhould take, might hinder the Enemy from proceeding farther. Cæſar took a Circuit, and kept no High-way, the Soldier refuſing no toil in paſſing broken Rocks and Stones, which did ſo hinder them, that they were forced to give their Weapons from Hand to Hand, and lift up one another for moſt part of the way. This courſe he was forced to take, becauſe the Ways leading to Iberus and Octogeſa were poſſeſſed by the Enemies Camp, and he had that good fortune that none of his Men thought much of their labour, becauſe they hoped an end would be put to all their travel, if they could but keep the Enemy from paſſing Iberus, and cut off his Proviſions.

32. It had been reſolved in a Councel of War by Afranius and Petreius, not to ſtir in the night, and when they imagined that by Cæſars courſe he took, he was returning back to Ilerda, they applauded themſelves in their reſolution. But finding at length that he did but fetch a compaſs, and that the Front tended directly to the Streights, they were ſtartled, and hurried in all haſt to get firſt the poſſeſſion of them. Now the contention was which of the two Parties ſhould firſt take them: Cæſar's was hindered by the difficulty of the Way, and that of Afranius by Cæſars Cavalry; and indeed if it ſhould firſt get the Hills, it might happily quit it ſelf of danger; but the Baggage and the Cohorts left in the Camp would be ſo intercepted by Cæſars Army, that there would be no means to relieve them. It ſo fell out, that Cæſar firſt came to the place, and being got from amongſt the Rocks into a Plain, could put his Army in order to give Battel. Afranius thus diſappointed, got to a ſmall Hill, and thence ſent four Cohorts with all ſpeed to poſſeſs themſelves of the higheſt Mountain, intending to follow after with all his Forces, and by the ridges of the Hills to get to Octogeſa. But as, by a Circuit, they endeavoured to do this, Cæſars Horſe ſet upon them, and cut them all in pieces in the ſight of both the Armies. Now was a notable Advantage offered of doing ſomething to purpoſe againſt the Enemy, who was diſcouraged by this Defeat, ſo as in probability not to endure a Charge. And the Legates, Centurions, and Tribunes came to Cæſar, and deſired him to improve it, for all their Soldiers were ready and forward to it. But he tells us he was in hope to end the Controverſie without a Stroak, or any Wound of his Men, having cut off the Enemy from Proviſions. Why then ſhould he loſe any of his Soldiers, though it were to gain a Victory? Why ſhould he ſuffer thoſe who had ſo well deſerved of him to be wounded? Why ſhould he put the matter to hazard? eſpecially it being the part of a General no leſs to overcome by Policy than the Sword. He was alſo moved with pity toward ſuch Roman Citizens as ſhould be ſlain; and rather deſired to accompliſh his buſineſs, and work out his ends with their ſafety. This opinion of his was ſo univerſally diſallowed, that his Men ſtuck not to ſay, That becauſe he over-ſlipt ſuch an opportunity of Victory, when he would have them, they would not fight. Yet he continued reſolute, and fell a little off from the Enemy to abate their fear and amazement. And Petreius and Afranius, upon the opportunity given them, withdrew themſelves into their Camp.

Spares them againſt the Opinion of his own Men.

33. To be ſure Cæſar had ſhut up all Paſſages leading to Iberus, ſo that the adverſe Party had but two Ways left open, either to return to Ilerda, or to Tarracon. Being troubled thereat, and that they were barred of all Proviſions, they conſulted what courſe to take, but were diverted by a neceſſity they were put upon to protect their

Soldiers

Thereby the Soldiers confeſs themſelves obliged, and would yield.

Soldiers that fetched Water. They attempted to do this by raiſing a Rampart from the Camp to the Water-ſide, and upon this occaſion, the two Generals being far off from the Camp, the Soldiers called to one another, and ſought out their acquaintance, and they of Afranius his Party confeſſed they ought their Lives to the favour of Cæſar, who had ſpared them when they were terrified the day before. They deſired aſſurance for the Lives of their two Generals, leſt they ſhould ſeem to look to their own ſafety and betray them; which being granted, they promiſed to come with their Enſigns to Cæſars Camp, and thereupon ſent ſome of their chief Centurions as Deputies to treat. On both ſides they invited their Friends, ſo as they ſeemed to have one and the ſame Camp, and ſeveral Perſons applied themſelves in particular to Cæſar. And Afranius, upon notice hereof, left the Work he had begun, and retired into his Camp, prepared as it ſeemed to take patiently what ſhould befall him; but Petreius was of another opinion, he put his Houſhold into Arms, and with the Prætorian Cohort of the Cetrati, and ſome ſtipendiary Horſe of the Barbarous People, whom he was wont to keep about him as a Guard, haſted to the Rampire, broke off the Diſcourſe of the Soldiers, and drove thoſe of Cæſar from the Camp, killing ſuch of them as he could light on. This done, he went weeping about to the Maniples, calling on the Soldiers, and beſeeching them not to forſake him, nor Pompey their General. A concourſe of Soldiers being made, hereupon an Oath they required of every Man, not to abandon or betray the Army, or the Generals, nor to Cabal in any Conſultation without conſent of the reſt. This both Generals, Officers and Soldiers took; and hereby the minds of the Soldiers being changed, the matter was reduced to the former courſe of War.

But are hindered by Petreius.

Cæſar his moderation.

34. Such effect had the choler of Petreius, as to cauſe it to be proclaimed, that whoſoever had with him any of Cæſars Soldiers, ſhould bring them out; and ſome being brought, they were publickly killed before the Prætorium; yet moſt of them were concealed by their Acquaintance, and in the night-time ſent over the Rampire. But Cæſar took the contrary courſe. He cauſed enquiry to be made after ſuch as came into his Camp in time of Treaty, and ſent them away ſafe; and his moderate and mild Proceeding had ſuch operation, that many Tribunes and Centurions ſtaid with him, whom he advanced together with ſuch Roman Equites as were of the better Rank. In the mean time the Afranians were diſtreſſed, being hindered from foraging. The Legionary Soldiers indeed had ſome of them ſtore of Corn, being commanded to take with them twenty two days Proviſion from Ilerda; but the Cetrati and Auxiliaries not being in condition to furniſh themſelves, nor their Bodies able to carry Burthens, a great number of them fled daily to Cæſar. The Captains ſeeing in what extremity they were, reſolved to return to Ilerda, as the moſt expedient courſe, where they had left behind them a little Corn; and this they attempted to do, but were ſo cloſely purſued by Cæſar, that they could not incamp themſelves in any place fit for watering and forage. And ſeeing them ſurrounded with ſo many Difficulties, he choſe rather to force them to a Compoſition, than to fight.

He forces them to ſubmit.

35. For this purpoſe he endeavoured to incloſe them with a Ditch and Rampart, to hinder their Sallies. They to prevent this, brought out their Legions, and imbatteled themſelves under their Camp; yet ſtill he refuſed to fight, both for the reaſon now mentioned, and becauſe the place betwixt the Camps was ſo narrow, that a Victory obtained would have been little advantageous to him. Notwithſtanding he alſo drew out, and they ſtood im-batteled till Sun-ſetting, and then retired into their Camps again. The next day, when Cæſar went about to finiſh the Fortifications, they tried to paſs the River Sicoris by a Ford, but being hindered alſo from that by Soldiers he had diſpoſed upon the Bank, they then ſent and required a Parley; for they were now ſhut up on all ſides, their Horſes had been without meat four days together, and they were in extream want of Water, Wood and Corn. They would have had the Conference private; but Cæſar denied to treat, except in publick. Then did Afranius, in hearing of both the Armies, deſire of him, that he would not be offended, neither with them the Commanders, nor the Soldiers, for being faithful to Pompey. But now they had done their duty, and having ſufficiently ſmarted in all reſpects, and ſuffered more in Body and Reputation than they were able to bear, they confeſſed themſelves vanquiſhed, and imploring his mercy, deſired they might not undergo the extremity of Fortune. In anſwer to what Afranius delivered, as humbly and ſubmiſſively as poſſible, Cæſar expoſtulated for the Injuries they and their Friends had done him, and ſhewed how all the Forces had been kept up in Spain, purpoſely againſt himſelf, the Provinces ſtanding in no need of them; how the courſe of Elections of Magiſtrates had been broken to do him prejudice;

And diſmiſſeth them.

to him was denied what had been granted to all Generals; that when they had brought matters happily to an end, they might diſmiſs their Armies with Honour, and, at leaſt without diſhonour, return home. Notwithſtanding all this, he would require only that they ſhould diſmiſs their Armies, having quitted the Provinces; which was readily accepted, eſpecially by the Soldiers, who had feared worſe things. Such as had Houſes and Poſſeſſions in Spain were preſently diſcharged, and the reſt at the River Varus ſent out of Spain; whither while they marched, Cæſar promiſed to ſupply them with Corn, and did accordingly perform it.

Other Writers celebrate his Generoſity therein.

36. To this generoſity of Cæſar other Authors bear witneſs, who had ſufficient opportunity to know the Truth. They rather make the dangers he underwent in this Expedition greater than he doth himſelf; and Dio writes, That at Rome they gave him for loſt, and many, as well Senators as others, betook themſelves to Pompey. He adds, That at the ſame time D. Brutus gave a defeat to the Maſſilienſes at Sea, which if it had not happened, Cæſar had been ruined; but the Report of this Victory being increaſed by deſign, and arriving in Spain, had ſuch operation upon them there, that changing their opinions, they ſetled themſelves to his Party. Having promiſed Afranius and his Companions to offer them no violence in any reſpect, and particularly not to conſtrain them to fight for him againſt Pompey, he kept himſelf ſtrictly to his word; for he put none of them to death, although they had killed ſome of his unwary Soldiers in time of Truce; neither compelled he any of them to follow him in the Civil War, but the chief being diſmiſſed, the reſt of their own accord cloſed with him for advantage. This did him eſpecial ſervice both as to his Reputation and management of his Affairs. For all Spain, and the Soldiers in it, except ſuch as in Bætica, M. Terentius Varro, the Legate of Pompey commanded, he hereby got to his Party, which things ſo ſucceeding, he travelled as far as Gades, and did no other injury to any Man than in what concerned Money, a great quantity of which he raiſed every where as he could. Many Honours he beſtowed both publickly and privately, and gave freedom of the City to the People of Gades, which they of Rome afterward confirmed. And ſo in the opinion of Dio, he requited them for the Dream he had there when he was Quæſtor, that he lay with his Mother, and for the hope he thence conceived of having all things in his ſole Power. Over Spain he ſet Caſſius Longinus, who being Quæſtor there under Pompey, had reaſon to underſtand the humour of the Nation. He himſelf went by Ship to Tarraco, and thence proceeded by the Pyrenæans, where he erected no Trophy, knowing his Adverſary to have been blamed for ſo doing, but near that of Pompey cauſed a large Altar to be made of ſmooth Stone.

Cæſar de Bello Civili lib. 2.

The Maſſilians defeated at Sea by Brutus.

37. In the mean time, at Marſeilles, C. Trebonius made Mounts, and did all things he could to annoy the Town, at that place which gave paſſage by Land; for three parts of it were in a manner waſhed by the Sea. But ſuch was the Proviſion of all neceſſaries for War, which in ancient time they had ſtored up in the Town, that no Hurdles made of Rods or Oſiers were able to reſiſt the force of their Engines. For out of their great Baliſtæ they ſhot Beams twelve Foot long, pointed with Iron, with ſuch execution, that they would pierce through four Courſes of Hurdles, and ſtick in the Earth. Beſides this the Albici made frequent Sallies, and ſet fire to the Mounts and Turrets; but they were eaſily preſerved by the Roman Soldiers, who forced ſuch as Sallied out to return with great loſs. While they tugged thus on both ſides by Land, an opportunity was preſented for a Sea-Battle, by means of L. Naſidius, who was ſent by Pompey with a Navy of ſixteen Ships. To theſe the Maſſilians joyned as many with all earneſtneſs imaginable, and with Exhortations to one another, and Prayers to their Gods, as now being to adventure for all, for the Lives of themſelves, and the Liberty of their City. But Brutus had alſo increaſed his Fleet with thoſe which Cæſar had cauſed to be built at Arles, and he had the advantage of exhorting his Men to deſpiſe the Enemy as a vanquiſhed Party, who had been overthrown in their very ſtrength. The Maſſilians yet were wanting in no Point of Valour, fighting for all they had, as their Friends had adjured them; and their Veſſels excelled in nimbleneſs of Swimming and Tacking. But however, they were out-done by Brutus, whoſe Ship alſo was ſo nimble, that it eſcaped two of theirs, which deſigned from contrary quarters to come upon her, ſo as they fell foul on each other, and did ſuch mutual miſchief, that their Enemies ſeeing them thus diſtreſſed, ſet upon, and quickly ſunk them both. The Ships that came with Naſidius proved of no uſe, and quickly left the Fight, which had that iſſue, that of thoſe which came from Marſeilles five were ſunk, and four were taken. One eſcaped with Naſidius his Fleet; and one of them that remained carried Tydings of the Defeat to the City, which received the News with lamentations ſuitable to the endeavours it had formerly uſed for ſucceſs.

Their perfidious humour.

They are forced to yield.

38. Notwithſtanding they left not off purſuing what they had formerly done for their defence at Land. And the Legionary Roman Soldier was as induſtrious to oppoſe them, and protect himſelf in that oppoſition; for which purpoſe he raiſed an extraordinary Tower not far from the Wall, which was built by Stories, and by degrees with admirable Art and Induſtry. The Work-men were defended by the out-jettings of Matreſſes, and other Materials, till they brought to perfection ſix Stories, and a Muſculum or Mouſe, which reached even the Wall it ſelf, with ſuch ſtrength and ſhape, that it could not be forced down, nor over-powered. This Device had ſo great execution, that the Beſieged diſcouraged at it, and looking for nothing but the deſtruction of their City, threw themſelves unarmed out of the Gates, and with Lamentations and Weeping, joyned with Arguments that were moving, (for they were Men Learned and Eloquent) obtained of the Legates, that all Hoſtility ſhould ceaſe till Cæſar himſelf arrived. But ſo perfidious they were, that after a few days when the Romans were grown remiſs and careleſs, they took the advantage of the Noon-time, when all were aſleep, or out of the way, and ruſhing out of the Gates, ſet fire to the Works and Engines. The Cæſarians were at firſt amazed, but recollecting themſelves as well as they could, they drove them back with great ſlaughter, and fell to re-edifie the Works with greater alacrity than before. They began a Mount of a ſtrange and unheard-of faſhion, raiſed with two Side-walls of Brick ſix foot thick apiece, and joyned together with Floors. And the Work was carried on with ſuch ſpeed, that the loſs of their former Labour was redeemed by their incredible Dexterity and Valour. They within perceiving all things to go contrary to their expectations, and conſidering that the Neck of Land leading to the Town, might be ſo poſſeſſed with Fortifications, that their Soldiers could not ſtand upon their Works: That the Enemy had raiſed a Counter-mine againſt the Wall of their Town, and that Miſſile Weapons might be caſt upon them; knowing alſo that there would not be any more place for deceit and treachery, they deſcended to the ſame Articles of Surrendry as had been formerly accorded.

Varro his acting againſt Cæſar.

Is forced to ſubmit.

39. Marcus Varro in the further Province of Spain had all this while variouſly demeaned himſelf toward Cæſar. At firſt diſtruſting how matters would go with the contrary Party, he ſpake as kindly of him as of Pompey; but afterward upon report, and his own belief of Afranius his good ſucceſs, he ſet himſelf againſt him every way he could both by Word and Action. He levied Soldiers, he cauſed them of Gades to provide ten Gallies, and ordered many others to be made at Hippalis. He took all the Money and Ornaments out of the Temple of Hercules; made many reflecting Speeches againſt Cæſar and his Intereſt, affirming in publick, that he had been ſeveral times worſted, and that a great number of his Men had revolted to Afranius. He exacted much Money and Wheat from the Provincials, confiſcated the Eſtates of ſuch as he thought diſaffected, and conſtrained all the Province to ſwear fidelity to him, and to Pompey; and being at length advertiſed what had happened, in the hither Province, he kept himſelf with two Legions, and all the Shipping and Proviſion, at Gades, as moſt ſafe, knowing that the whole Province affected the Cauſe of Cæſar. And that ſo it did he found ſhortly by further experience. For though Cæſar by good Motives was called into Italy, yet reſolving to leave no appearance of War behind him, he ſent two Legions before him, and haſted himſelf with ſix hundred Horſe into the farther Spain. He ſent alſo an Edict for calling an Aſſembly at Corduba, and thither the Towns ſent their Deputies unanimouſly, and all Roman Citizens appeared. They ſhut their Gates of their own accord againſt Varro, and the Gaditans agreed with the Tribunes to drive Gallonius, whom he had left Governour there, out of their City; ſo that of Varro's two Legions, one forſook him and went its way, he looking on. and then perceiving how he was diſtreſſed, he ſent and yielded up the other; and afterward coming to Cæſar at Corduba, delivered up the Money lying in his Hands, and gave an Account of the Corn and Shipping that was any where provided. After this Cæſar gave thanks, and cauſed reſtitution to be made to his Friends; ordered the the things taken out of the Temple to be carried back, and making Q. Caſſius Governour of the Province, he left with him four Legions. From Gades he paſſed by Ship to Tarraco, then by Land to Narbon, and thence to Marſeilles, where he firſt received News of the Law made at Rome for creating of a Dictator, and that M. Lepidus the Prætor named him to be the Man. The Maſſilians being reduced to great ſtraits by Famine and Peſtilence, and having no hope of relief, now yielded

Sect. 7. yielded to him, and he, as he ſaith, was willing to ſave them, rather for the Name and Antiquity of the Town, than any merit of theirs. He left two Legions there, and ſent the reſt into Italy, he himſelf taking his way toward Rome.

40. In the mean time Matters had a contrary iſſue in Africk under the Conduct of Curio, who tranſported two Legions into that Country. The Fleet of Pompey he beat and diſperſed, and ſuch Ships as were in the Bay of Utica he drew off to his Party, by proclaiming, that ſuch (being in number two hundred) as would not preſently come, ſhould be taken for Enemies. At Utica lay Actius Varus, to whom King Juba had ſent to aſſiſt that Party ſix hundred Numidian Horſe, and four hundred Foot, having had acquaintance with Pompey by reaſon that his Father was his Gueſt, and he bare a ſpleen to Curio, for the Law he preferred when he was Tribune of the People, for Confiſcation of his Kingdom. The Cavalry on each ſide ingaged; the Numidians were not able to abide the Charge of Curio's Horſe; but about an hundred and twenty being ſlain, the reſt retired to the Camp. The next day he Incamped himſelf near the Town, but before the Fortifications were finiſhed, a noiſe there was of great Forces that were coming from King Juba. Yet did his Horſe, before the Legions could be well put in order, drive away all the Kings Forces that came marching without fear or care, and ſlew a great number of the Foot, the Horſe getting almoſt all ſafe into the Town by the Sea-Shore. But ſo it happened that the next night after, two Centurions of the Nation of the Narſi fled from Curio with twenty two of their Soldiers to Varus, to whom they declared, that the minds of the whole Army were alienated from him, and that it was very expedient that the Armies ſhould come in ſight, and find means to ſpeak together: Hereupon Varus drew out his Soldiers the next morning, and Curio put his Men alſo into order. But it had further happened that Curio had carried over theſe Legions which Cæſar had formerly taken at Corfinium; ſo that a few Centurions being ſlain, the Companies and Maniples remained the ſame. Now in Varus his Army there was one S. Quintilius Varus, who had been alſo at Corfinium, and being let go by Cæſar, went into Africk. This Quintilius taking the occaſion ſo fitly offered, went about the Army of Curio, and beſought the Soldiers as he could, that they would not forget the firſt Oath they had taken to Domitius, and to him their Quæſtor, nor bear Arms againſt them that had run the ſame Fortune, and endured the ſame Siege; nor fight for thoſe who by way of reproach had called them Fugitives or Turn-coats. And he added ſome Promiſes of Recompence, if they would follow him and Actius.

How Matters went in Africk.

41. Hereupon Curio his Army ſtood mute, and was much diſturbed in mind, but they declared not themſelves by any ſign either one way or other, and each Party drew back to their Camps. In concluſion, the Legions which before were in the Service of Pompey, willingly imbraced what was offered them; old acquaintance having made them forget what kindneſs they had lately received from Cæſar, being alſo of divers Countries and Nations. Curio ſeeing himſelf and his Affairs in ſuch danger, after the matter had been in vain debated in a Council of War, called together the Soldierrs, and in an exquiſite Speech harangued unto them. He called to remembrance what they had done for Cæſar at Corfinium; how by their furtherance he had gained the greateſt part of Italy, all the reſt of the Municipal Towns being drawn to follow him by their endeavours. He ſhewed how great folly it would be now to betray thoſe who profeſſed themſelves wholly theirs, and that afterwards they might come into their Power who took themſelves to be undone formerly by their means. He related what Cæſar had done in Spain; that there two Armies were beaten, two Generals defeated, two Provinces taken, and all within forty days after he came in view of them. He put them in mind that they did not forſake Domitius, but that he forſook them. For he thruſt them out, and expoſed them to all extremity. Without their knowledge or privity he ſought to ſave himſelf by flight; and then they were kept alive by Cæſars Clemency. He demanded how he could bind them by the Oath of Fidelity, when having caſt away his Faſces, and laid down his Authority, he himſelf was made a private Perſon, and became captivated to another Mans Power. He told them, in concluſion, what he himſelf had done in this Expedition, for which, though he was content to be called Cæſars Soldier, yet they had ſtiled him by the Title of Imperator. And if it repented them, he would willingly again reſign it, leſt they ſhould ſeem to give him Honour, which might turn to his Reproach.

42. His Oration ſo wrought upon the Soldiers, that they oftentimes interrupted him, as grieving to lie under a ſuſpicion of Revolt, and at their deſire he reſolved to give Battel upon the firſt occaſion offered, ſeeing that the minds of all Men were ſo changed. And the day following an occaſion was offered, which he ſo far improved, as to put Varus his Army to the rout, and to force them to retire to their Camp, which he might have taken, but that his Men, not thinking of ſuch work, but only of a Battle, were not provided of fit Inſtruments. Of the Adverſaries were ſlain ſix hundred, with the loſs of one Man on Curio's ſide, one Fabius Pelignus, an ordinary Soldier, who in the Purſuit ſought for Varus, calling him with a loud Voice, as though he had been one of his own Soldiers, and had ſomething to ſay to him. Being often called, as he looked back, aſking him what he would have, and ſtood ſtill, he made at Varus his Shoulder with his Sword, which was unarmed, and was very near killing him: Yet he avoided the danger by receiving the Blow upon his Target, and Fabius was preſently incloſed and ſlain. Many more on Varus his ſide were wounded than were ſlain, who all, beſides many others that feigned themſelves hurt, left the Camp for fear, and went into the Town; which Varus perceiving, and knowing the aſtoniſhment of the Army, left a Trumpeter in the Camp, and a few Tents for ſhow, and about the third Watch drew his Army in ſilence thither.

Curio puts Varus his Army to the rout.

43. Curio now as Conqueror, the next day prepared to beſiege Utica, the Inhabitants of which favoured Cæſar, and the reſt in the Town being diſcouraged, all talked of a Surrender, and began to preſs Varus to it. But news arrived, that King Juba was coming to the Relief of the Place with all his Forces. This Curio was ſo confident, as not to believe at firſt, but when it was found aſſuredly that the Kings Forces were come within twenty five Miles, then he withdrew himſelf into a Place called Cornelius his Camp, from P. Scipio his Incamping himſelf there formerly, which was every way convenient for defence and ſupply of Proviſions. Hither he ſent to have the two Legions and the Horſe brought out of Sicily; and here he thought to draw out the War in length; when another report was brought, that the King himſelf was not come, being deteined by ſome Controverſies of the Leptitani; but only Sabura his Lieutenant was ſent with ſome competent Forces, and was not far from Utica: To theſe Reports giving too light and eaſie credit, he altered his purpoſe, and reſolved to give him Battle, being violently led to this reſolution (Cæſar his Friend tells us) by his youthful heat, the greatneſs of his courage, the ſucceſs of former times, and his confidence in managing of the War. He ſent all the Cavalry the firſt night to the River Bagrada, where the Enemy lay indeed under the Command of Sabura. But the King followed after with all his Forces, and lay continually within ſix Miles, or thereabouts.

44. The Horſe fell upon the Numidians, as they lay ſcattered, in a barbarous manner, altogether ſecure, and killing many of them, put the reſt to flight. Curio himſelf having left a Guard to his Camp, followed, and met with his Cavalry in their return, of whom demanding who was General at Bagrada, and they ſaying Sabura, he omitted for haſt to inform himſelf of the reſt, but told his Men, that now they ſaw was true what was formerly reported by Fugitives, that the King was not come, but had ſent ſome ſmall Forces which could not make their Party good with a few Horſe; and he bade them therefore make haſt to take the Spoil, and to receive the reward of their merits. The Soldiers incouraged with the ſight of the Booty, which their Friends had taken, and their bragging Speeches, conceived alſo hope that it would be as he ſaid, and haſted to find the Enemy, affrighted and aſtoniſhed, as Curio believed, who commanded the Cavalry to follow him; but the Horſe-men having travelled all night, could by no means do it; but ſome ſtayed in one place, and ſome in another, and yet this did not hinder or diſcourage Curio. Now ſee the Iſſue. Juba having notice of the Conflict, in the night ſent immediately two thouſand Spaniſh and Gallick Horſe, which he kept for the ſafety of his Perſon, and ſuch of the Foot as he moſt truſted, to relieve Sabura; he himſelf, with the reſt of his Forces, and forty Elephants, followed ſlowly after.

45. Sabura ſuſpecting that Curio was coming, Imbattelled all his Forces, and gave order, that under pretence of fear they ſhould retreat by little and little, till he gave the Signal of Battel, or other directions. Curio ſuppoſed they fled indeed, and drew his Forces down from an Hill into the Plain, having marched now ſixteen Miles. Sabura gave the Signal for Battel, and with his Horſe charged the Romans, who were harried and wearied, and the Horſe-men being but two hundred in number, (the reſt ſtaying by the way) were ſpent with travel; yet wanted they no courage nor deſire to fight, and on what part ſoever they charged, they forced the Enemy to give way; but they could not purſue them far, nor put their Horſes to any round or long Carier. At length the Numidian Cavalry from both the Wings circumvented the Army, and malled them down behind, being often re-inforced by Succours ſent from the King. Curio ſeeing his Men ſo diſmayed, as not to receive his Orders, commanded them, as the laſt hope, to fly to the adjoyning Hills; but Sabura had alſo poſſeſſed theſe places, and ſo they fell into utter deſpair, ſome being ſlain as they fled, and others falling down without wounding. Cn. Domitius, General of the Horſe, deſired Curio to ſave himſelf by flight to the Camp, promiſing not to leave or forſake him; but he confidently replied, That he would never come in Cæſars ſight, having loſt the Army committed to him; and thereupon fighting valiantly, was ſlain. A few Horſe-men ſaved themſelves. The Foot were all killed to a Man; but ſuch Horſe-men as ſtaid behind to refreſh their Horſes eſcaped to the Camp. Such as deſired to be tranſported into Sicily, when Boats were brought, ſunk them by crouding in, and the reſt of the Veſſels would not come to Shoar, by that ſight diſcouraged; ſo that but a few Soldiers and Maſters of Families that could ſwim to the Ships got over ſafe. The reſt yielded to Varus, whom Juba challenging as his Booty, cauſed many of them to be ſlain, and ſelecting a few of the reſt, ſent them into his Kingdom; Varus in vain complaining that his Faith and Promiſe were violated. The King rode into the Town, accompanied by many Senators, and there remaining a few days, gave ſuch orders for things as he thought fit, and then returned into his own Kingdom with all his Forces.

Curio there defeated and ſlain.

Cæſar Dictator.

46. But now was Cæſar Dictator, and held the Aſſembly for creation of Magiſtrates. He himſelf and P. Servilius Iſauricus were created Conſuls; for at this time was he capable to be choſen, it being now ten years from his firſt Conſulſhip, and conſequently he was not obnoxious to the Law publiſhed by Sylla, wherein was provided, that no Man ſhould be choſen to an Office within ten years after he had ſupplied the ſame. He took notice that credit was very ſcant throughout Italy, and money lent was not repayed. He gave order that Arbitrators ſhould be choſen to make an eſtimation of Eſtates and Goods according as they had been valued before the War, and that at that rate Creditors ſhould take them for their Monies. He reſtored the ancient courſe of Rogations, made by the Prætors and Tribunes, to the People; as alſo certain that were condemned for indirect ſuing for Magiſtracy by a Law in Pompey's time, when he kept the Legions about him in the City, he reſtored, and thoſe who had offered him aſſiſtance at the beginning of the War, though they did not do it, he procured to be abſolved by the People, that he might not ſeem ingrateful, nor yet aſſume to himſelf what belonged to the Comitia. In accompliſhing theſe things, celebrating the Latine Holy-days, and holding the Aſſemblies of the People, he ſpent eleven days; then gave over his Dictatorſhip, left the City, and went to Brunduſium, having commanded ſeven Legions, and all his Horſe, to come thither. Such is the Account he himſelf gives us of what he did in his Dictatorſhip.

His Acts.

What other Writers ſay he did.

47. And other Writers in their Relations do little differ from that of his. Plutarch ſaith in his Life, That when he returned to Rome, Piſo, his Father-in-law, adviſed him to ſend Meſſengers to Pompey to treat of Peace; but Iſauricus, to flatter him, was againſt it. That Cæſar, then created Dictator by the Senate, called home all the Baniſhed, and reſtored to Honour the Children of them who had been ſlain in Sylla's time, and did ſomewhat reſtrain the Uſuries that did oppreſs them; and beſides made ſome other Ordinances, but very few; for he was Dictator only eleven days, and then made himſelf Conſul with Servilius Iſauricus; and after that determined to follow the War. All the reſt of his Army he left coming on the way, and went himſelf before with ſix hundred Horſe, and five Legions, in the Winter Quarter, about the Month of January, which by the Athenians was called Poſideon.

48. Dion Caſſius having told us how this great Man took away all the Arms, Ships and Money of the Maſſilians, and at length all the reſt ſaving the Name of Liberty, becauſe Pompey left free Phocæa, from which the Maſſilians deſcended, then acquaints us with a Mutiny of certain of his Soldiers at Placentia. They pretended they were ſpent with labours, but the matter was, they took it ill that he would not give them leave to plunder and ſpoil the Country; and now they thought they could ask nothing but he would grant it, becauſe of the need at preſent he had of them. But their hopes were very ill founded; for ſo far was he from granting any thing they mutinouſly deſired, that calling them together, he ſhewed them in a long Speech what it was they deſerved, and not only by word but deed; for he cauſed them to be incompaſſed with their fellow Soldiers for his own ſecurity, and then made them an example of his Juſtice by taking out by lot, and putting to death the boldeſt of them; the reſt, as being of no uſe to him, he caſhiered; but afterward received them again when they had ſeen and repented of their Error.

Quam quidem Orationem vel Cæſaris vel Dionis, vide apud hunc p. p. 165, &c.

49. But while he was ſtill in his Journey from Marſeilles, Dion adds, that M. Æmilius Lepidus, he who afterward was Triumvir, and at preſent Prætor, adviſed the People to make him Dictator, which was ſpeedily done according to the Cuſtom. Coming to Rome, he entered upon his Office, but nothing ſharp or ſevere did he the time he bore it: On the contrary, he gave liberty to Exiles, Milo excepted, to return home, and ordained Magiſtrates for the following year, for hitherto none had been put into the places of them that were gone away; inſomuch that there being no Ædilis, the Tribuni Plebis were obliged to diſcharge their Duties. He made new Pontifices in the room of the Deceaſed, yet therein not obſerving all things required by their Laws. He gave freedom of the City to the Galles inhabiting within the Alpes, becauſe they had been under his command, and then laid down his Dictatorſhip, though indeed he ſtill retained all its Power, the Senate permitting, that he ſhould do what he would. And he improved this Power in a matter of great and neceſſary conſequence. For now did Creditors with all bitterneſs imaginable exact what Monies were owing to them from thoſe who borrowed of them for Supply in the Civil War, and moſt of them were utterly unable to pay, at this time it being very difficult either to pay or borrow. By occaſion hereof many ſevere Acts were committed, and great miſchiefs could not but follow; for although formerly the Tribuni Plebis had done ſomething to reſtrain Uſury, yet was not thereby any proviſion made for paying Debts; the Debtors parting with their Pledges, and yet the Creditors exacting the Sums after the ancient manner.

50. To obviate this miſchief, Cæſar commanded the Pledges to be valued, and that Judges ſhould be choſen by lot to take up theſe Controverſies. And becauſe many Perſons were ſaid to have much Money, and to ſuppreſs it, he commanded by an Edict, that none ſhould have in Gold or Silver more than ſixty Seſtertia; which Law he did not make, but only renewed it, either that Debtors might pay ſomething to their Creditors, or to diſcover who were rich; or elſe that no Man might have any vaſt Sums to raiſe any diſturbance in his abſence. However, with this Law the People were elevated, and began to require, that a Reward ſhould be propounded to ſuch Slaves as would accuſe their Lords; but he not only refuſed to add this unto the Law, but laid Imprecations upon himſelf if ever he gave credit to a Slave that accuſed his Maſter. All theſe things done, and all Ornaments taken away both from the Capitol and other places at the end of the year, and before he entred his Conſulſhip, he went to Brunduſium. Dio here mentions, according to his Cuſtom, Particulars preſaging what afterward happened, which cauſed his Diviners to deſire him to haſten his Journey, affirming that deſtruction would betide him if he ſtaid in the City; but ſafety and Victory if he paſſed the Sea. After he was gone the Boys of Rome divided themſelves into two Parties, of which one took the Name of Pompeyans, and the other of Cæſarians; and making a ſhow of Fight, without Weapons, thoſe that called themſelves Cæſarians departed with advantage over the other. While theſe things were done at Rome, and in Spain M. Octavius and L. Scribonius Libo, with Pompey's Fleet, drove P. Cornelius Dolabella out of Dalmatia, and ſhut up C. Antonius, who prepared to relieve him in a ſmall Iſland, where being deſerted by the Inhabitants, and pinched with famine, they took him and all his Men, except ſuch as killed themſelves, or eſcaped into the Continent. Dio's Story of Curio his defeat in Africk, otherwiſe agrees with that of Cæſar; but he adds, that Juba was greatly honoured for that Action by Pompey, and the Senators with him in Macedonia, and had the Title of King. But by Cæſar and thoſe of his Party he was adjudged an Enemy; and Bocchus and Bogud were ſaluted Kings, becauſe they were Enemies to Pompey. Now let us ſee what Cæſar himſelf writes of the coming to Blows betwixt him and Pompey.

Cæſar goes to Brunduſium.

Pompey's Party hath the advantage by Sea.

51. He came, as we ſaid, to Brunduſium, but with an Army much leſſened with travel and ſickneſs, by reaſon of change from the good and wholeſom Air of Gall and Spain, into that of Apulia, and the Maritime Parts. And he found no more Shipping ready than would hardly tranſport twenty thouſand Legionary Soldiers, and five hundred Horſe; and this want of Ships he ſaith hindered him from diſpatching the War. On the other hand, Pompey having had a years ſpace to provide himſelf, without any trouble or moleſtation, had got together a great Navy out of Aſia, and all places where he could build Ships. He had raiſed great Sums of Money out of Aſia and Syria, and exacted Supplies thereof from all Princes and States. From ſeveral Quarters he had raiſed nine Legions of Roman Citizens, to which he added, as Cæſar de bello civili lib. 3.

The great Preparations of Pompey againſt Cæſars weak Army.

a Supply, a great number out of ſome parts of Greece and Epirus. He mingled Antonies Soldiers amongſt them, and expected two other Legions to be brought by Scipio out of Syria. He had from Crete, Lacedæmon, Pontus and Syria, and the reſt of the Cities, three thouſand Archers, of Slingers ſix Cohorts, two others Mercenary, and of Horſe-men ſeven thouſand. Hereof Deiotarus brought ſix hundred Galles; Ariobarzanes five hundred out of Cappadocia; and Cotus out of Thrace had ſent the like number with his Son Sadalis. From Macedonia came two hundred commanded by Raſcipolis, a Perſon of much worth. From Alexandria five hundred Galles and Germans, which A. Gabinius had left as a Garriſon with King Ptolomy. Pompey the Son with the Navy had brought eight hundred of his own Slaves, and of thoſe belonging to his Cattel. Tarcondarius, Caſtor, and Donilaus, had ſent three hundred out of Gallogræcia; of whom one came in Perſon, and the other ſent his Son. Two hundred did Antiochus Comagenus, to whom Pompey had given great Gifts, ſend out of Syria, amongſt whom moſt were thoſe Cæſar called Hippotoxotæ, or Shooters on Horſe-back. To theſe he added Dardani and Beſſi, partly mercenary, and partly procured by his Power and Favour; beſides Macedonians, Theſſalians, and thoſe of other Nations and Cities, whereby he filled up the ſaid number. For Corn he provided great quantity out of Theſſaly, Aſia, Crete, Cyrene, and other Regions. He appointed the Winter Quarters at Dyrrachium, Apollonia, and all the Maritime Towns, to keep Cæſar from paſſing the Sea; and for that purpoſe diſpoſed of his Soldiers all along the Sea-Coaſt. Now of the Ægyptian Ships Pompey the Son was Admiral. Thoſe that came out of Aſia were commanded by D. Lælius and C. Triarius. C. Caſſius had the command of thoſe of Syria; and C. Marcellus, with C. Pomponius, of thoſe of Rhodes. Of the Liburnian and Achaian Navy, Scribonius Libo, and M. Octavius, had the Charge. But M. Bibulus was General for Maritime Affairs, with chief Command.

Who paſſeth over ſeven weak Legions to Pharſalus.

52. Cæſar at Brunduſium having perſwaded the Soldiers to leave all their Slaves and Baggage behind them in hope of Victory, and his liberality, ſhipped ſeven Legions, and in ſafety landed his Men at a place called Pharſalus, not daring to venture into any known Port, which he believed to be poſſeſſed by the Enemy. Being landed, he ſent back his Ships to Brunduſium to bring over the other Legions, but in their return thirty of them fell into the hands of Bibulus, who ſenſible of his neglect of guarding the Paſſage, and in wrath, ſet them all on fire, and therewith conſumed both owners and Mariners, hoping by this Example to terrifie the reſt. This done, with greater diligence than had been uſual, he poſſeſs'd all the Sea-Coaſt from Salonæ to Oricum with Men and Ships of War, he himſelf in the depth of Winter refuſing no labour, but watching on Ship-board, nor expecting any Supplies, if he could meet Cæſar. M. Octavius, with ſomething better ſucceſs by Sea, came and drew Hiſſa from Cæſars Party, and not being able to prevail with the Inhabitants of Salonæ, he beſieged the Town. The Place was indifferently well fortified by Nature, and their Induſtry, but the Inhabitants being wearied and ſpent with Wounds, fell at length to the laſt Refuge of infranchiſing all their Slaves above the Age of fourteen, and cutting the Hair of their Women to make Engines. Their Reſolution being known, Octavius begirt them with five Camps and Intrenchments, and they indured the want of Corn and other inconveniences. But the Siege continuing a long time, and this making the Beſiegers remiſs and negligent, they took the opportunity of the Noon-time, and placing their Women and Children on the Walls to make a ſhow, they themſelves, and ſuch as they had infranchiſed, made a Sally, and with violence broke through all the five Camps, and with great ſlaughter forced Octavius, and his Men remaining, to betake themſelves to their Ships, and leave the Place. He deſpairing of taking the Town, and Winter approaching, retir'd to Pompey at Dyrrachium.

The notable Valour and Induſtry of the Inhabitants of Salonæ.

53. Now did Cæſar, as he tells us, think fit to ſend to Pompey about a Peace, and the Party on which he pitched to carry the Meſſage was Vibullius Rufus, whom, being one of Pompey's Lieutenants, Cæſar had twice taken, once at Corfinium, and a ſecond time in Spain. His Inſtructions were to let him know, that in his opinion it was time to give way to Fortune, and lay down Arms, either Party having had ſuch loſſes as might inſtruct it to prevent greater Inconveniences. That this was the only time to treat of Peace when both was confident of his own ſtrength, and ſeemed to be of equal Power. That for Conditions, ſeeing they could not agree of them themſelves, they ought to ſeek them from the Senate and People of Rome; and in the mean time it was convenient that both ſhould take an Oath before their Armies within three days next following, to lay down their Arms, ſend away their Auxiliaries, in which they confided, and conſequently ſubmit to the Decree of the People: And for aſſurance, rance, on his ſide, he would preſently diſcharge his Forces, as well them in the Field, as in Garriſon. Vibullius haſted to Pompey; chiefly to let him know of Cæſars coming, and he, upon the News, with all ſpeed made towards Apollonia, leſt he ſhould poſſeſs himſelf of the Maritime Cities. In the mean time Cæſar took in Oricum, Apollonia, the Town of the Bellidenſes; and alſo Epirus ſubmitted to him; Pompey upon notice of theſe things haſted toward Dyrrhachium; but his Army was ſo affrighted with the News, that it ſeemed rather to fly than march, many of the Soldiers caſting away their Arms. When he came near the Town, he opened the Trenches, and incamped himſelf; but ſtill his Men were in ſuch fear, that Labienus ſtepped out firſt, and ſwore never to forſake him whatſoever ſhould happen. Then was the ſame Oath taken by the Legates, the Tribunes, Centurions, and all the Army.

Cæſar takes in ſeveral Towns.

54. Cæſar underſtanding his Paſſage to be ſtopped to Dyrrhachium, Incamped himſelf upon the River Apſus, in the Confines of Apollonia, and there determined to winter under Skinns, to expect the coming of his other Legions out of Italy, and protect ſuch Places as had well deſerved of him. And Pompey did the like, pitching his Camp on the other ſide of the River, whither he aſſembled all his Troops and Forreign Aids. Now did each Party mutually obſtruct the Deſigns of the other. For Bibulus lay with his Fleet at Oricum, and kept the Sea and the Ports, ſo as Cæſars Army could not land from Brunduſium; and then again, the Sea-Coaſt was all along ſo watched and guarded by Cæſars Men, that he could neither get Water nor Wood, nor his Ships to Land upon occaſion; inſomuch as he was brought into ſuch diſtreſs, that he fetch'd his Water and Wood from Corcyra; nay at one time, the Weather being very tempeſtuous, they were forced to content themſelves with the Dew which by night fell upon the Skins that covered the Decks of their Ships. All theſe extremities they patiently bore, and would not leave the Coaſts; and yet they ſought by a pretence of a Treaty to draw Cæſar to a Truce, who requiring that his Meſſengers might have ſafe conduct to Pompey, when that was denied, he ſaw that their drift only was to avoid preſent danger, and began to think of proſecuting the War. In the mean time Bibulus, having contracted a Sickneſs by extremity of Cold and Labour, reſolving never to be friends with Cæſar for the loſs of the Ædility and Prætorſhip, ended his days on Ship-board. Now, Cæſar tells us, he made again ſeveral offers for a Treaty, but the Conference was ſtill broke off; once Pompey ſaying, that in caſe it proceeded to an Iſſue, he ſhould be thought to enjoy his Life and the City by Cæſars favour; and at another time Labienus affirming, that no Compoſition could be made without Cæſars Head.

Bibulus vigorous at Sea.

Dies.

55. This made him the more to long for the Arrival of his other Forces from Brunduſium, and they ſeeming to him to have omitted ſeveral convenient Gales, he wrote to them, and required them to take the firſt opportunity, which the Soldiers willingly did by the conduct of M. Antonius, and Fuſius Calenus, for the love they bore to him. Three Legions of old Soldiers, one of new, and eight hundred Horſe, by favour of the Wind, ſafely arrived, though they were purſued by Caponius, Admiral of the Rhodian Navy, of which ſixteen Veſſels periſhed by the turning of the Wind, and the roughneſs of the Weather. Only two of Cæſars Ships lagged behind, whereof one yielded to Otacilius Craſſus, upon a Promiſe of Life, but the Men being unexperienced young Soldiers, were put to death before his face; thoſe of the other being old Soldiers, ſtoutly defended themſelves, and eſcaped. About this time Scipio, though he had received ſeveral loſſes about the Mount Amanus, which ſeperates Syria from Cilicia, yet had taken upon him the Title of Imperator. This done, he impoſed heavy Taxes upon the Cities and Potentates of theſe Tracts, and from the Publicans of his Province took all the Money in their hands for the two years paſt, and by way of Loan that of the following year; and from the whole Province he exacted a number of Horſe-men. He left then the Parthians behind his back, who had lately ſlain M. Craſſus, and beſieged M. Bibulus, and drew the Legions out of Syria. At his departure the Soldiers gave out Speeches, as if they would not march againſt a Citizen and Conſul; but however, he brought the Army to Pergamus, and quartered it about in Winter in divers rich Cities; and for the better aſſuring of his Men to him, gave them great Largeſſes and Gifts; nay, and beſides, ſome Cities to plunder. In the mean time he moſt heavily oppreſſed the Province with Impoſitions. Upon Slaves as well as Free-men he impoſed a Tax by Poll, and any Name or Pretence that could be invented for raiſing Money was moſt acceptable, they being eſteemed the worthieſt Men that would domineer, and cruelly exact moſt from ſuch Cities and Villages as they were ſet over. The poor Province beſides this was op-

Cæſars other Forces arrive from Brunduſium.

Scipio moves againſt him out of Syria.

preſſed

Sect. 7.

preſſed with Exactors, who made their own Markets; moreover with hard and heavy Uſury, which oftentimes accompanied War; and yet they ſtuck not there to make Leavies, and to require Loans. Nay Scipio gave order, that the Treaſure of Diana's Temple at Epheſus ſhould be taken out, with other Images of that their Goddeſs. Which had been done, but that he received Pompey's Letters, who thereby let him know, that Cæſar had paſſed the Sea with his Legions, and deſired, that, ſetting all things apart, he ſhould haſten to him with his Army. Hereupon he determined concerning his Journey into Macedonia, and ſet forward a few days after.

Cæſar ſends Forces into the Provinces.

56. Cæſar now being joyned with Antony, notwithſtanding the endeavours of Pompey to the contrary, reſolved to march further up into the Province. At the deſire of ſome of the Inhabitants of Theſſaly, he ſent thither that Legion called the Seven and twentieth, conſiſting of young Soldiers, with two hundred Horſe, and five Cohorts, and a few Horſe into Ætolia upon the ſame Invitation. Moreover two Legions called the Eleventh and Twelfth, he ordered into Macedonia, of which Province, that which was called the Free had profeſſed a great deal of forwardneſs to his Service. Ætolia was eaſily gained; but the Theſſalians ſtood divided in their opinions; and when Cn. Domitius Calvinus, who commanded the Legions, came into Macedonia, word was brought him that Scipio would ſpeedily be with him. And accordingly he marched with great fury toward him, but when he was come within twenty Miles, he ſuddenly turned his courſe toward Caſſius Longinus in Theſſaly, and with ſuch ſpeed, that fame did not prevent his Arrival. Caſſius thus ſurprized, made away towards the Hills which incloſe Theſſaly and Ambracia. Scipio as earneſtly purſued him; but in his heat he received News from Favonius, whom he had left at the River Haliacmon, (which divideth Macedonia from Theſſaly) with eight Cohorts to keep the Baggage, that Domitius would ſpeedily be upon him, and that he was not able of himſelf to hold the Place. Upon receit of the Letters he altered his purpoſe, and haſted back day and night to help Favonius, whereby it happened, (both Scipio and Domitius arriving together) that as the Induſtry of Domitius did help Caſſius, ſo did Scipio his ſpeed deliver Favonius.

57. Scipio after this paſſed the River Haliacmon, as to fight with Domitius, who embracing the occaſion with alacrity, he was diſcouraged, and pittifully retreated to his former Poſt, fearing that the following day he ſhould either be conſtrained to fight, or with ſhame keep himſelf within his Camp. After this Domitius drew him to a loſs by an Ambuſhment, wherein M. Opimius, who commanded his Horſe, was taken. Cneius the Son of Pompey in the mean time, who commanded the Ægyptian Fleet, by Cæſars confeſſion had good ſucceſs at Sea, where he broke into the Haven of Noricum, notwithſtanding all endeavours uſed to hinder him, and burnt his Enemies Ships both there and at Liſſus, and the Towns themſelves he endeavoured to maſter, but with no ſucceſs. At this time his Father lay at Aſparagus, a Place belonging to Apollonia, and thither Cæſar marched with his Forces, ſate down near him, and offered him Battel. This he thought not fit to accept of, which put Cæſar upon new Councils. He retreated toward Dyrrhachium, with deſign thereby either to conſtrain him to fight, to force the Town, or elſe cut from him all Proviſions which there were laid up for the whole War. This laſt he effected, though Pompey at firſt thinking he had retired for want of Proviſion; upon finding his error, laboured to get thither before him. Being thus cut off from this Town, Pompey incamped himſelf in a convenient place to receive Proviſions by Sea. Cæſar now doubted that the War would prove tedious, and therefore the Sea-Coaſts being blocked up by Pompey's Fleet, he took order for Grain to be imported out of the Mediterranean Tracts of Epirus. And theſe Regions being far off, he appointed Store-houſes in certain Countries, and impoſed carriage of Corn upon the Places adjoyning to them.

Pompey the Son his ſucceſs at Sea.

Cæſar beſieges the Father in a ſtrange manner.

58. This done, he entred into ſuch a courſe as the nature of the Place where Pompey was incamped did prompt him to. His Camp was incloſed with many high and ſteep Hills. Theſe Hills he took and built Forts upon them; then, as the condition of the Ground would bear, he drew Lines from one Hill to another, and ſo determined to incloſe Pompey with a Ditch and Rampire. This he did being ſtraitned for want of Corn, that he might now freely forage about without fear of Pompey's Horſe, in which he was ſtrong; but chiefly he hoped to abate the exceeding great reputation he had amongſt Forreign Nations, when it ſhould be noiſed about that he was beſieged by Cæſar, aud durſt not fight. Yet, for all this, Pompey reſolved to venture that, rather than quit the Commodity of the Sea, and Dyrrhachium, where all his Proviſion ſion of War whatſoever was to land. He reſolved to poſſeſs himſelf of as many Hills as poſſible, and to keep as much of the Country with good and ſufficient Guards, thereby to diſtract Cæſars Forces, as it fell out, taking in no leſs than twenty five miles in Circuit, in which he foraged, and there cauſed many things to be ſet and planted by hand which ſerved for Food for his Horſes: Moreover, his Works excelled, for he abounded with Men, and had on the in-ſide a leſs compaſs to fortifie. He refuſed to fight, but he ſorely galled Cæſars Men with his Archers and Slingers, ſo that almoſt all of them made them Coats of Quilt, ſtiffening, or Leather, to keep them from danger. Mutual Contention gave occaſion to many Skirmiſhes and Encounters; to be ſure, in the opinion of Cæſar himſelf, the War was carried on in a ſtrange and unuſual manner. And this was not only in reſpect of the great number of Forts and Caſtles, but of the whole Siege and Conſequents thereof. For the weakeſt are wont to be beſieged, and Sieges are made to cut off the Enemy from Proviſions; but Pompey was the ſtronger of the two, and received Proviſions by Sea. Cæſar on the other hand was in great ſcarcity, and yet his Soldiers, he tells us, bore it with ſingular patience, remembring how, notwithſtanding ſuch great want endured both in Gall and Spain, they had gone away Conquerors of many great Nations. They were content with Barly and Peaſe inſtead of Wheat, and of a certain Root called Chara, which they made uſe of in the room of Bread. This, when Pompey's Soldiers jeered them, and objected their ſcarcity and miſery, they would commonly throw at them, and ſcatter in divers places, to diſcourage them in their hopes.

59. But afterward the Caſe quite altered, Summer coming on. For Pompey's Army could ſcarcely be kept alive, eſpecially for want of Water, Cæſar having either turned another way, or dammed up all the Rivers and Brooks of the Country. On the contrary, Cæſars Army was in extraordinary good health, having plenty of Water, and all Proviſions, except Wheat; of which there was good expectation, Harveſt being ſo near at hand. After this followed ſeveral Skirmiſhes, wherein Pompey had far the worſt, and was forced to quit a Mount he had ſeized, to ſuccour his Men, and return to his old Fortifications. Cæſar now by his Officers drew to his Party ſeveral Countries of Greece, and underſtanding that Scipio was come into Macedonia, ſent to him to procure a Peace, which he would have perſwaded him he might eaſily conſtrain Pompey to accept, having the Command of an Army. But this not ſucceeding, Cæſar applied himſelf more ſtraitly to block up Pompey, which brought him into ſuch diſtreſs, that his Horſes having conſumed all the Leaves of Trees, and all the Barley, there remained no more ſuſtenance for them, and now they were not able to go on their Legs. Hereupon he reſolved to break out, eſpecially after he had been informed of the condition of Cæſars Fortifications by two Allobroges, Brothers, who having cheated the Soldiers of their Pay, revolted to him. He gave order to his light Armed Soldiers and Archers to defend themſelves with Bavins and Faggots of Oſiers, and drawing out threeſcore Cohorts, Shipped them, and fell upon a Fortification of Cæſars by the Sea, which was not compleated. This was done with ſuch execution, that all the Centurions of the firſt Cohort were ſlain, except the firſt of the Maniple of the Principes; and though both Cæſar and his Officers endeavoured to put a ſtop to the Proceedings of the Enemy, yet the Iſſue of the Attempt was, that Pompey got out of the Fortifications, and Incamped upon the Sea, in ſuch ſort as he might freely go out to forage, and have no leſs acceſs to his Shipping, than he had formerly. Cæſar perceiving the loſs he had ſuſtained, and that this courſe of War had not ſucceeded according to his expectation, reſolved to change it, and ſate down cloſe by Pompey. He deſigned to cut off a Legion which had taken up a Poſt by a Wood; but in the Attempt his Men were intangled within the Fortifications of the old Camps lately deſerted, and therein ſo over-powered by the Supplies ſent in by Pompey, that he loſt, by his own confeſſion, nine hundred and threeſcore Soldiers, beſides Horſe-men of note, ten Tribunes, and thirty Centurions, beſides thirty two Military Enſigns. But the greateſt part periſhed in the Trenches, and on the River Banks, preſt to death, as driven by the fear and flight of their Fellows, without any Blow or Wound given them.

Pompey breaketh out.

And Cæſar loſeth.

60. Pompey hereupon was ſaluted Imperator, and ſo ſuffered himſelf to be ſtiled; though he uſed not the Title in any of his Miſſives, nor had any Lawrel in the Bundle of Rods carried before him. Labienus having begged the Priſoners, cauſed them all to be ſlain; and Pompey's Party took ſuch aſſurance, that not thinking any more of the the Courſe of the War, they carried themſelves as already Victors, not at all conſidering the fewneſs of Cæſars Men to be the cauſe of their Succeſs, nor the diſadvantage

Sect. 7.

Who altereth the courſe of the War.

Retreats to Apollonia.

trage of the Place, nor that the Army was divided into two parts, in ſuch ſort, that neither of them was in a capacity to relieve the other. They did not remember the common chances and caſualties of War, wherein oftentimes very ſmall cauſes, either of falſe ſuſpition, or of ſudden fear, or ſcruple of Religion procure great and heavy loſſes, as often as, either by the negligence of the General, or the fault of a Tribune, an Army is diſordered. As if they had overcome by down-right Force and Valour, and no alteration could after happen, they magnified this days Victory by Letters and Report throughout the World. But Cæſar being driven from his former Purpoſes, reſolved to change the whole courſe of the War, to omit the Siege, and withdraw the Garriſons. He cheared up his Army as well as he could, by putting them in mind of their manifold Victories in Italy and Spain, and other Succeſſes, which, put together, over-ballanced by much the late diſaſter. Having diſgraced and diſplaced certain Enſign-bearers, the Soldiers were earneſtly deſirous, by a freſh Ingagement, to redeem their credit; but he thought it not fit to put it to the tryal, till their minds were ſetled, and he reſolved to make a fair Retreat to Apollonia. This he did with ſuch ſpeed, that Pompey could not overtake him, only ſome of his Horſe came up with the Reer, but with loſs were repulſed. Pompey followed a full Journey, but ſome of his Men riſing haſtily, had left a great part of their Baggage behind them, and induced by the nearneſs of their laſt nights lodging, left their Arms, and went back to fetch thoſe things that were behind. Cæſar took this Advantage which he had expected, and continued his diligence; ſo that Pompey being ſtaid the firſt day, and afterward ſtriving in vain, and making great Journeys, and yet not overtaking him, the fourth day gave over the Purſuit, and betook himſelf to another Reſolution.

Takes Gomphi in Theſſalie.

61. Cæſar, for accommodating his Wounded Men, for paying his Army, ſetling his Allies and Confederates, and leaving Garriſons in the Towns, was neceſſitated to go to Apollonia; but in performing theſe things, made all haſt imaginable. For he deſired to be with Domitius with all poſſible celerity, leſt he ſhould be ingaged by Pompey's Arrival. If Pompey followed after him, he ſhould by this means draw him from the Sea-ſide, and from ſuch Proviſions of War as he had ſtored up at Dyrrhachium, and ſo ſhould compel him to equal Conditions. If he ſhould go over into Italy, then having joyned his Army with Domitius, he would go and ſuccour that Country by the way of Illyricum. And if he ſhould beſiege Apollonia or Oricum, and ſo exclude him from all the Sea-Coaſts, he would then beſiege Scipio, and force Pompey to relieve him. Pompey conjectured as Cæſar purpoſed, that he might attacque Scipio, and therefore thought it requiſite to haſt to his relief; but if he would not depart from the Sea-ſhore and Corcyra, as expecting more Forces out of Italy, he then reſolved to fall upon Domitius. Each haſted to relieve his Friends, and ſurprize his Enemies; but Cæſar had turned out of the way to go to Apollonia, whereas Pompey had a ready way into Macedonia by Candavia. The News of Cæſar being defeated at Dyrrhachium, did much incommode his Affairs; for thereupon ſeveral States drew off from his Party, and the Ways were ſo ſtopped, that no intercourſe could be had betwixt him and Domitius, till he met with him at Æginium, a Town ſituate upon the Frontiers of Theſſalie. The firſt Town of this Country by the Way leading out of Epirus, was Gomphi, the Inhabitants of which formerly had offered themſelves and all they had to be diſpoſed of at his pleaſure; but upon the Rumor of his overthrow, Androſthenes, Prætor of Theſſalie, had drawn the multitude of Servants and Children out of the Country into the Town, and ſent to Scipio and Pompey for Aid. Cæſar knowing of what conſequence this Town would be, and to ſtrike terror into the reſt, reſolved to ſtorm it, and making the Attacque after three of the Clock in the Afternoon, notwithſtanding the extraordinary height of the Walls, took it before Sun-ſet, and gave it to the Soldiers to be rifled. Then preſently removing, he went to Metropolis, by his haſt preventing all Meſſages and News. The Inhabitants at firſt Manned their Walls; but underſtanding by the Captives in Cæſars Camp what had happened to Gomphi, yielded, and ſaved themſelves. And this their happineſs being compared with the deſolation of Gomphi, had that effect, that there was not one State of Theſſalie, Lariſſa excepted, which was kept in by Scipio, but yielded obedience to Cæſar; who now being got into a Place plentiful in Corn, which was almoſt ripe, reſolved to attend Pompey's coming, and there to proſecute the remainder of the War.

62. A few days after, Pompey came into Theſſalie, and taking the Legions all into one Camp, he made Scipio, with whom he had joyned, Partaker both of his Honour and Authority, commanding the Trumpets to attend his Pleaſure for matters

of

All Men give him for loſt.

of direction, and that he ſhould uſe a Prætorian Pavilion. Pompey being ſtrengthned thus with the addition of another Army, all Men gave Cæſar for loſt. His Enemies were in pain till their aſſured Victory was obtained, that they might return into Italy, and into heavy conteſts they fell, who ſhould be ſucceſſively Conſuls, concerning Rewards and Preferments, and eſpecially who ſhould have Cæſars Prieſthood; ſome begged the Houſes and Goods of ſuch as were with Cæſar; beſides, a great controverſie grew in open Council, whether L. Hertius ſhould not be regarded at the next Election of Prætors, being abſent, and imployed by Pompey againſt the Parthians. Other things they diſputed, as not thinking ſo much of the means how to overcome, as how to uſe the Victory. As for Cæſar, Proviſion of Corn being now made, and his Soldiers well reſolved after a ſufficient time paſſed from the Battel at Dyrrhachium, he thought fit to try what Will Pompey had to fight. Every day he drew out his Men farther and farther from their Trenches, to imbolden them; and becauſe he was much inferior to his Enemies in the number of Horſe, he commanded certain luſty young Men of them that ſtood before the Enſigns, being nimble and ſwift in running, to fight amongſt the Horſe-men. They by their daily practice had learnt the uſe of that ſort of fight; ſo that Cæſar tells us, one thouſand of his Cavalry, in open and Champion places, upon occaſion, would undergo the Charge of ſeven thouſand of theirs, and they were not much terrified with their Multitudes. Now they made a fortunate Incounter; but Cæſar thinking Pompey would not be drawn to Battel, reſolved to ſhift his Camp, and be always in moving, hoping by often removes to be better accommodated with Proviſions, and upon a March to find ſome good occaſion to fight; beſides, he thought he ſhould weary Pompey's Army with continual Journeys, it being not accuſtomed to travel.

63. But when the Tents were taking down, it was diſcovered, that the Enemy was advanced from the Hill, where he was formerly Incamped, ſomewhat farther from his Trenches; ſo that it ſeemed they might fight in an equal and indifferent place. Thereupon Cæſar ſtopped his March, and drew out his Forces to fight, and Pompey, as afterwards it was known, was reſolved to give Battel, for all that were about him moved him to it; and ſome few days before he had given out in Council, that he would overthrow Cæſars Forces before the Armies came to joyn. He told them (who wondered at it) that the Cavalry had, upon his deſire, promiſed him, when they drew near, to attacque Cæſars right Cornet on the open ſide; ſo that the Army being circumvented behind, ſhould be amuſed and routed, before Cæſars Men ſhould caſt a Weapon, and thereby the War ſhould be ended without danger of the Legions, or almoſt without any Wound received. Labienus ſeconded his Speech, and further incouraged them by affirming, that this was not the Army wherewith Cæſar performed ſuch things in Gall and Germany, which was either dead, gone home, or a very ſmall piece of it was remaining; but was gathered from the Leavies made in the hither Gall, and moſt of them out of the Colonies beyond Padus, and yet all the flower and ſtrength of them was taken away in the laſt two overthrows at Dyrrachium. Affirming this, as not ſpeaking raſhly, but having been himſelf preſent at the Battels in Gall and Germany, he took a ſolemn Oath, not to return into his Camp, but with Victory, exhorting the reſt to do the like. Pompey commending him, took the ſame Oath, neither was there any that refuſed it, all being now cockſure, and conceiving Victory already in their minds, as not imagining that any thing ſhould be ſpoken vainly by ſo skilful a Commander, eſpecially in ſo important a matter.

The ordering of Pompey's Army before the Battle of Prhaſalum.

64. In the left Cornet of Pompey's Army ſtood the two Legions which had been in the beginning of the War, taken from Cæſar by decree of the Senate, the one being called the Firſt, and the other the Third, and with them ſtood Pompey. Scipio had the middle Squadron, with the Legions he brought out of Syria. The Legion of Cilicia joyned with the Spaniſh Cohorts, which Afranius brought, made up the right Wing. The reſt of the Troops were interlaced betwixt the Squadron and the Wings. In all they amounted to one hundred and ten Cohorts, and fifty five thouſand Men, beſides two thouſand old Soldiers, and Men of note, which Pompey had diſperſed over all the Army. The remaining ſeven Cohorts he left in the Camp, or diſpoſed about the Forts near adjoyning. The Right Wing was flanked with a River, having high and cumberſome Banks, and therefore he put all his Horſe together with his Archers and Slingers in the Left. Cæſar obſerving his former Cuſtom, placed the Tenth Legion in the Right Wing, and the Ninth in the Left, though they were much weakened in the Fights at Dyrrachium, but to the Ninth he joyned the Eighth, ſo as he ſeemed to make one of two, and commanded them to ſuccour each other. In all he had about Eighty Cohorts, which made up twenty and two thouſand Men; and two Cohorts he left to keep the Camp. The Left Wing he aſſigned to Antonius, the middle Battle to Cn. Domitius, and the Right Wing to Pub. Sylla, and ſtood himſelf againſt Pompey. Having well obſerved all things, and fearing leſt his Right Wing ſhould be incloſed by the Multitudes of the Enemies Horſe, he ſpeedily drew five Cohorts out of the Third Battle, and of them he made a Fourth to incounter their Cavalry; ſhewed them what he would have done, and admoniſhed them that the ſucceſs of that day reſted in the Valour of thoſe Cohorts. He put them all in mind of his favours and his carriage towards them from time to time, and eſpecially how they themſelves were Witneſſes, that he had ſeveral times ſought for Peace: Neither was he willing at any time to ſpend the Soldiers Blood, or deprive the Common-wealth of either of thoſe Armies.

Sect. 7.

Of Cæſars.

The manner of the Fight.

65. There was ſo much ſpace left between both the Armies, as might ſerve either of them to meet upon the Charge. Pompey commanded his Men to receive the ſhock of Cæſar's Soldiers without moving from the Place. This he did by the advice of C. Triarius, to the end that the firſt violence of the Soldiers being broken, and the Battel diſtended, they that ſtood in perfect order might have the advantage of them that were diſperſed. Beſides, it was hoped the Piles would not fall ſo forcibly upon the Army ſtanding ſtill, and that Cæſars Soldiers, having ſo far to run, would by that means be out of breath. This in Cæſars opinion was without reaſon, there being, he ſaith, a certain incitation and alacrity of Spirit planted in every Man naturally, which is inflamed with a deſire to fight; which no Commander ought to repreſs or reſtrain, but rather increaſe and ſet it forward. However his Soldiers, upon ſign of Battel, running out with their Piles ready to be caſt, and perceiving that Pompey's Men did not make out to meet them, whom they looked upon as Men of experience, and exerciſed in former Fights, they ſtopt their courſe, and almoſt in the mid-way ſtood ſtill, that they might not come to Blows upon ſpending of their ſtrength: Then, after a little reſpit they ran on again, threw their Piles, and preſently drew their Swords, as Cæſar had commanded them. Pompey's Soldiers were not now wanting on their part, but having received the ſhock, caſt alſo their Piles, and betook themſelves to their Swords, keeping their Ranks. His Horſe-men did not forget the Orders they received, but from his Left Wing, with the Multitude of Archers, made ſuch a Charge, that Cæſar's Horſe was not able to ſuſtain it, and they put themſelves into Squadrons to incloſe the Army. Now did Cæſar give the Sign to the ſix Cohorts to advance, who came with ſuch fury upon Pompey's Men, that none of them were able to ſtand before them, but fled as faſt as they could to the higheſt Hills, whereby the Archers and Slingers, being left naked, were put to the Sword; and now the Cohorts, notwithſtanding any reſiſtance, charged the Left Wing upon their Backs. At the ſame time Cæſar commanded his third Battel, which as yet ſtood ſtill, and was not removed, to advance forward; and theſe Men being freſh and ſound, and relieving ſuch as were faint and weary, and others charging them upon the Backs, Pompey's Party was no longer able to endure it, but all turned their backs, and fled. Thus it fell out according to Cæſars opinion, and as he had ſpoken in his Incouragement to the Soldiers, that the Victory would grow from the ſix Cohorts placed in the fourth Battel againſt Pompey's Horſe-men.

Pompey flyeth.

Cæſar taketh his Camp.

66. As ſoon as Pompey ſaw his Horſe were beaten, and perceived the Party he moſt confided in to be amuſed and affrighted, he diſtruſted the reſt, and forthwith left the Battel, conveying himſelf on Horſe-back into the Camp: With a loud voice he commanded the Centurions, which had the Watch at the Prætorian Gate, to defend it diligently, to prevent any hard caſualty that might happen, ſaying, That he would go about to the other Ports to ſettle the Guards; but into the Prætorium he went diſtruſting the main Point, and yet expecting the Event. And he was followed into the Camp by his Soldiers, to whom Cæſar would give no reſpit; but notwithſtanding the great heat, it being now mid-day, perſwaded his Men to force it, which they did without very much trouble, it being chiefly defended by Thracians and Barbarians, for the Soldiers were weary and wounded, and ſought how to ſhift for themſelves. Neither could they that ſtood upon the Rampire indure the multitude of Weapons, but, fainting with Wounds, forſook the Place, and fled to the high Mountains adjoyning, being led thither by the Centurions and Tribunes. In the Camp were found rich Furniture, and the Tents were ſtrowed with freſh Herbs and Ruſhes, and many other ſuperfluities there were, which diſcovered their extream luxury and aſſurance of Victory; and yet they upbraided Cæſars patient and miſerable Army with riot and exceſs, to which there was always wanting ſuch Requiſites as were expedient for neceſſary uſes. When Cæſars Men entred the Camp, Pompey having caſt off all Imperial Enſigns, got on Horſe-back, and from the Decumane Gate fled to Lariſſa with all the haſt he could make, whence with the ſame ſpeed he poſted night and day, till he got to the Sea-ſide, with a Troop of thirty Horſe. Then went he aboard a Ship of Burthen, complaining, that his opinion only deceived him, being as it were betrayed by thoſe that firſt fled, from whom he had chiefly hoped for Victory.

67. Cæſar having got the Camp, perſwaded his Soldiers not to look after Booty; but to finiſh the Work they had been about. Then began he to incloſe the Hills with a Fortification, which cauſed Pompey's Party to deſert the Place, being without Water, and take the way toward Lariſſa. With four Legions he followed them, and coming a nearer way, after ſix Miles, Imbatteled his Forces, whereupon they betook themſelves to an high Hill, under which ran a River. Now Cæſars Soldiers were ſpent with continual toil all this day, and night was at hand; yet for all this he prevailed with them to cut off the River from the Hill, by a Fortification, to keep them from watering that night. This being perfected, they began to ſend about, treating upon Conditions to yield themſelves, and ſome few of the Senators eſcaped away in the night. As ſoon as it was light Cæſar cauſed them all to come down into the Plain, and to caſt away their Arms, which done without refuſal, they caſt alſo themſelves upon the Earth, ſpread their hands abroad, and ſhedding many Tears, deſired mercy. He comforted, and commanded them to ſtand up, and having ſpoken ſomething of his clemency a little to eaſe them of their fear, gave them all their Lives with ſafety, commanding the Soldiers to hurt none of them, and that they ſhould want nothing which was their own. After ſuch wonderful diligence uſed, he ſent for other Legions which had reſted in the Camp, and that day went to Lariſſa. He tells us he loſt in the Battel not above two hundred Soldiers, but of Centurions, valiant Men, he loſt thirty. Of Pompey's Army were ſlain about fifteen thouſand, and twenty four thouſand yielded themſelves. Such Cohorts as were in the Forts yielded to Sylla, and many fled into the next Towns and Cities. Of Military Enſigns were brought out of the Battle to Cæſar one hundred and fourſcore, with nine Eagles. The News of this Victory arrived in good time in the Weſtern Parts, where, at Sea, Cæſars Affairs went down the wind. Caſſius in Sicily burnt his Ships in divers places, and if the Report had not come ſeaſonably, Meſſana had been taken.

Pompey's Soldiers ſubmit to him.

68. But Cæſar reſolved, that all other things he was to ſet aſide, and to purſue Pompey, leſt he ſhould leavy Forces and renew the War. He made forward every day as far as his Men were able to go, and the fame of his Victory flew before him, which cauſed the Cities to exclude Pompey and his Party as they went by Sea; and Pompey leaving off his purpoſe of going into Syria, directed his courſe toward Peluſium. There by chance was King Ptolomy, a Child within years, making War againſt his Siſter Cleopatra with great Forces, whom a few Months before, by means of his Allies and Friends, he had thruſt out of his Kingdom. Pompey ſent to him, that in regard of the ancient Hoſpitality, and the Amity he had with his Father, he would receive him into Alexandria, and by his Wealth and Power ſupport him, now fall'n into miſery and calamity. And they that were ſent, when they had done their Meſſage, began to ſpeak liberally to the Kings Soldiers, and to deſire them to ſtand by Pompey, not deſpiſing the lowe ebbe of Fortune to which he was brought. Their Speech was ſo properly applied, that amongſt theſe Men there were many that had been Pompey's Soldiers, whom Gabinius had received out of his Army in Syria, and brought to Alexandria; and upon ending of the War had left them with Ptolomy, the Father of this Boy. But theſe things being known, ſuch as were Protectors of the King, and Guardians of the Kingdom in his minority, either induced by fear that the Army ſhould be gained, (which afterward they affirmed) and thereby Pompey might ſeize upon the City and Ægypt, or deſpiſing his Fortune, (for the moſt part it happening, that a Mans Friends become his Enemies, when low) gave a good Anſwer openly to ſuch as were ſent, and willed him to come to the King; but ſecretly plotting among themſelves, ſent Achillas, a principal Commander, and a Man of great boldneſs, together with L. Septimius, a Tribune, to kill him. They gave him good words, and he himſelf knowing Septimius to have led a Company under him in the War againſt the Pirates, went aboard a little Bark with a few of his Soldiers, and there was ſlain by Achillas and Septimius. In like manner L. Lentulus was apprehended by commandment of the King, and killed in Priſon.

Pompey flies into Ægypt,

And there is killed.

69. Cæſar having ſtaid a few days in Aſia, and heard that Pompey was ſeen at Cyprus, conjectured, as it was, that for his friendſhip and correſpondency with the Cæſar comes to Alexandria.

The Alexandrian War.

Kingdom of Ægypt, he was gone thither, where he might be furniſhed with other advantages. He proceeded therefore to Alexandria with two Legions, eight hundred Horſe, ten Gallies of Rhodes, and a few Ships of Aſia. In the Legions were not above three thouſand and two hundred Men, the reſt being either wounded in Fights, or ſpent with travel; yet truſting to the fame of his great Performances, he doubted not to go with theſe weak Forces, thinking every place would entertain him ſafely. But coming to Alexandria, where he heard of Pompey's Death, his having Bundles of Rods carried before him gave great offence to the Multitude, which at his landing, and afterward, was very tumultuous, crying out, that the Kings Authority was diminiſhed. Hereupon he gave order for other Legions, inrolled out of Pompey's Soldiers, to be brought him out of Aſia, he being ſtopped in Ægypt, as he ſaith, by the Eteſian Winds, which are againſt them that Sail from Alexandria. He now conceived, that the Controverſie between the King and his Siſter belonged to the Cogniſance of the People of Rome, and conſequently of himſelf as Conſul, and the rather, for that in his former Conſulſhip there was a League made by Decree of the Senate with Ptolomy the Father: In regard hereof he let them know his pleaſure, that they ſhould rather plead their Cauſe before him, than decide the Controverſie by Arms. At this time one Photinus, an Eunuch, had the Adminiſtration of the Kingdom, who diſdaining that the King ſhould be called to plead his Cauſe, drew the Army ſecretly from Peluſium to Alexandria, and made Achillas General, giving him Inſtructions what he would have done. Now old Ptolomy by his Will had left his eldeſt Son and his eldeſt Daughter his Heirs and Succeſſors in his Kingdom, and had charged the People of Rome by all things Sacred to ſee it duly obſerved. Cæſar was endeavouring to take up the Quarrel by a friendly and peaceable Arbitrement, when he was diſturbed by the coming down of the Kings Forces. His own were not ſuch as to hazard a Battle without the Town, but he ſtood upon his Guard, and commanded the Soldiers to Arm. He procured alſo, that Dioſcorides and Serapion, two Perſons eminent for their Embaſſies at Rome, as well as for other Imployments, to be ſent from the King to Achillas to know his Purpoſe, whom, as ſoon as he ſaw, he commanded to be put to death. Hereupon Cæſar endeavoured to get the King into his own Hands, to make uſe of the Authority of his Name and Title amongſt his People, and to make it appear, that this War was moved rather by the private Practices of ſome ſeditious and deſigning People, than by his Order and Commandment.

The Alexandrian Army.

70. Achillas his Forces were not to be deſpiſed, either for their number, or faſhion of Men, or experience in War. For of them he had twenty two thouſand in Arms. They conſiſted of the Soldiers of Gabinius, who by this time were grown into an habitual Cuſtom of the Life and Liberty of the Ægyptians; and having forgot the Name and Diſcipline of the People of Rome, had married Wives, and moſt of them had Children. To theſe were added ſuch as were gathered from the Theives and Robbers of Syria, and other neighbouring Countries, beſides many baniſhed Men, and others condemned to die. For Alexandria always afforded a receptacle for all the Roman Fugitives, and there they had a certain Condition of Life; for upon giving up his Name a Man was preſently inrolled a Soldier. And if a Slave chanced to be apprehended by his Lord, he was preſently reſcued by the concourſe of Soldiers, who being all in the ſame condition, did ſtrive and ſtruggle for him as for themſelves. Theſe Troops thus conſtituted, would when they pleaſed cauſe the Kings Friends to be ſlain, they would rob Rich Men of their Goods to enlarge their pay, beſiege the Kings Houſe to expel his Miniſters out of the Kingdom, and ſend for others home, and that according to an old Cuſtom and Priviledge of the Alexandrian Army. But beſide, there were two thouſand Horſe that had been of ancient continuance in many Wars, and had brought back Ptolomy the Father, and reſtored him to his Kingdom; had ſlain Bibulus his two Sons, and made War with the Ægyptians; ſuch experience they had in War.

The Iſland Pharus.

71. Achillas truſting to theſe Forces, and contemning them that belonged to Cæſar, attacqued that part of the Town where he lay, and endeavoured by all means to break into his Houſe. This cauſed a moſt fierce Encounter, and another as fierce happened at the Port where Achillas endeavoured to ſeize on all the Shipping, whereby he would have cut off all Supplies that might have been ſent to Cæſar. This cauſed Cæſar to beſtir himſelf, which he did to ſuch purpoſe, that the Veſſels he got into his Power, and burnt them all, not being able to keep ſo many things with ſo few Forces, and preſently landed ſome Soldiers at Pharus. This Pharus, he tells us, was a Tower which took its name from an Iſland wherein it ſtood; the Iſland was of a great height, and the Town built with ſtrange Workmanſhip. The Iſland lay over againſt Alexandria, and ſo made it an Haven. But former Kings had inlarged it nine hundred Paces in length, by raiſing great Moles in the Sea, and by that means brought it ſo near the Town, that they had joyned them both together with a Bridge. In the Iſland dwelt Ægyptians, who made up a Village reſembling a Town, and robbed all ſuch Ships as by Error or Tempeſt were caſt upon the Place, none being able to get into the Haven by reaſon of the narrowneſs of the Entry, without the leave of ſuch as held Pharus. Cæſar afraid of this, while the Enemy was ingaged in fight, landed his Men, and ſeized the Place by a Garriſon, ſo that Corn and all other Succours might come to him; for he had ſent to all the confining Regions for Aid. He cauſed alſo ſeveral Places near him to be fortified in the City, while in the mean time the younger Daughter of Ptolomy, out of hope to obtain the Crown, now in queſtion, conveyed her ſelf out of the Kings Houſe to Achillas, and both joyntly undertook the management of the War. But they preſently fell out about the chief Command, to the great advantage of the Soldiers, whom they both careſſed with Largeſſes. While they were thus buſied, Photinus, Governour of the young King, and Superintendent of the Kingdom, ſent Meſſengers to Achillas, deſiring him not to deſiſt, or be diſcouraged. Upon diſcovery and apprehenſion of ſuch Meſſengers, Cæſar cauſed him to be ſlain. And theſe were the beginnings of the Alexandrian War.

Sect. 7.

72. Thus long we have heard Cæſar himſelf relate his own Acts; for indeed we generally believe we hear or read him, when we peruſe thoſe Writings which bear his Name. Yet Juſtus Lipſius it ſeems thought theſe Commentaries not to have been written by him, ſaying, That the raſon why moſt Eloquent Men eſteemed that Book as a Pattern of Eloquence, was, becauſe they preſumed it was Cæſars, and if it had not Cæſars Name, peradventure the Book would not be in ſuch requeſt. Now there's nothing of this nature more certain, than that Cæſar left Commentaries of his Atchievements, both in the Gallick, and Civil War with Pompey; not only Suetonius affirming this, but Plutarch, Pliny, Strabo; and Cicero commends them for extraordinarily good. It's known ſufficiently, that Cæſar excelled or equalled in Language the moſt famous Orators of his time. But indeed the broken and looſe manner of the Compoſition of theſe Commentaries, as now we find them, hath given occaſion to Learned Men to queſtion, whether they be his true and genuine Worke the Author oftentimes rather endeavouring to ſpeak, than ſpeaking. They object, that they are obſure and intricate, here bare, and there ſuperfluous, and far different from that Terſe and Attick Style of Cæſar, which Cicero ſo exceedingly commends. Therefore Lipſius doubted, whether he ſhould not aſcribe theſe Books to Julius Celſus, having found in a certain Piece called Margareta Poetica, many fragments cited out of them, but always in the Name of Julius Celſus. Moreover, Johannes Saliſberienſis, in his Policraticus, or his Works De Nugis Curialium, produceth many Teſtimonies found in theſe Writings, but from Julius Celſus too. Vincentius, in his Speculum, deſcribing the Bridge of the Rhine, celebrated by Cæſar in his fourth Book, commends Julius Celſus, not Cæſar, for Author. And Rodericus Sanctius, in the third part of his Hiſtory of Spain, and the thirty third Chapter, commends the Authority of Julius Celſus for the Hiſtory of the Alexandrian War, in Paſſages now found in the Book commonly aſcribed to Hirtius.

In Poliorceticis lib. 1. Dial. 9.

Vide Giſſelini Hiſtor. Gallorum veterum Cap. 1.

Whether the Commentaries going under the Name of Cæſar were his.

73. It's therefore thought, that this Celſus tampered with the Commentaries of Cæſar; and if he did not wholly alter, yet he ſo interpolated them, that, as Claudius Cæſar ſaid, The Author indeed appears, but the Raſure is evident. In an ancient Copy of Lævinus Torrentius, at the end of the ſeventh Book, was found written The Ephemeris or Journal of C. Julius Cæſar, concerning the Gallick War, here ends. Julius Celſus of Conſtantinople, a Man of the Rank of Clariſſimus, read it. He cut off, and caſt away many things, and particularly the Hiſtory which Servius, in his ſecond Book upon Virgil, recites from Cæſars Journal, for now it no where appears. Virgil ſaying, That having plucked the Enemy from his Horſe, he graſped him with his Right Hand, Servius notes, That he had this out of the Hiſtory. For. C. Cæſar being taken by the Enemy, and carried away armed as he was, one of the Enemies that knew him met him, and ſaid inſulting, Cecos Cæſar, which in the Language of the Galles ſignifieth Diſmiſs; and ſo it came to paſs that he was diſmiſſed. This Cæſar ſpeaks of in his Journal, where he commemorates his own felicity. For theſe Reaſons, both Lipſius and others thought, that in thoſe Commentaries we now make uſe of, the Matter and Narration was Cæſars, but not the Words. If we conſider what formerly we have ſeen objected by Monetus, concerning the Errors either of Cæſar, or ſuch as medled with

Sect. 7.

with his Writings, it will induce to think they might have the more reaſon for their opinion, and it tends not to the diſrepute of Cæſar. Preſuming however at the leaſt, that the Matter and Story is his, it's convenient to examine what other Writers furniſh us with that may atteſt or qualifie his Narrations.

What other Writers ſay of this War.

74. What ever he ſpeaks concerning his deſire of Peace, and making means to obtain it, Writers cenſure as well him as Pompey, for deſigning high things, and out of ambition more than any other Principle, driving on the War to ſuch extremity. Pompey was not forward to purſue Cæſar, ſo as he might have done after the advantage he had got at Dyrrhachium, Cæſar ſaying to his Friends, that his Enemies had won the Victory, had they known how to overcome. And indeed Pompey's Followers generally behaved themſelves as if the War was then at an end, in ſo much that ſome of them went to his Wife Cornelia to congratulate with her upon that account, and ſome took care about Poſſeſſions, and ſuing for Offices in Italy, crying out, that he ſhould return thither. But now when he had Cæſar in chaſe, he thought it not honourable to fly from him, eſpecially to deſert Scipio his Father-in-law, and other Senators diſperſed through Greece, who upon his retreat muſt fall into Cæſars Hands. Yet he did not purpoſe to fight him; only to beſiege, and cut him off from Victuals. Plutarch tells us plainly of a Report raiſed amongſt the Equites, that if Cæſar was overcome, they muſt alſo reduce Pompey to a private Man again; that this confirmed him in his reſolution, and was the cauſe why he would no more imploy Cato as one who intended to make him reſign his Authority. This was ſmelt out by his Companions, who ſeeing him loiter, ſaid, he made not War againſt Cæſar, but the Senate and his Country, that he might ever retain his Authority, and have them for a Guard, and his Servants about him, to rule and command the World. The Taunts of Domitius Ænobarbus, who called him Agamemnon, and King of Kings, raiſed him much envy, as alſo the Speeches of ſeveral others, amongſt whom Afranius ranted againſt him, impatient to have Cæſars Offices diſpoſed amongſt themſelves, with other Places of Dignity in the State. So, as Plutarch writes, they hurried him to a Battel, contrary to his Judgment of fighting Cæſars Army, which had taken a thouſand Towns by Aſſault, had ſubdued above three hundred ſeveral People, had won infinite Battels againſt the Germans and Galles, was never overcome, had taken a Million of Men Priſoners, and had ſlain as many in ſeveral Battels. This fatal one was fought on the Plains of Pharſalum, (not of Philippi, as Florus falſly relateth, and with him Manilius and Virgil) betwixt that Town and the River Enipeus. The word of Pompey was, Unconquered Hercules, and that of Cæſar, Victorious Venus. It's ſaid, that Cæſar gave order to his Horſe-men to caſt their Darts upwards into the Faces of their Enemies, which made the young Gallants not only ſmart, but being aſtoniſhed at the manner of Fight, to cover them with their Hands, and run away.

Cæſar raiſed to the higheſt pitch from a very low ebbe.

75. But thus, by the Valour of his Soldiers, as well as his own Conduct, was Cæſar raiſed from the extremity of his wants, and the diſgrace of his former loſſes, to the chiefeſt Height of Earthly Glory and Power; ſo that what was wont to be ſaid of his Country, that the Fortune of the People of Rome was great, but ſtill grew greater from troubles and difficulties, might be applied unto him. Now had Pompey, by his over great Power and Intereſt, brought the Common-wealth to that paſs, that it could not ſubſiſt but by the benefit of Servitude, as Seneca words it, or without being in the Hands of a ſingle Perſon, who cauſed Servitude or Liberty as he was inclined. It's ſaid, that at Mytylene, in his flight, he had much diſcourſe with Cratippus the Philoſopher, (the ſame to whom Cicero ſent his Son to ſtudy) who in their talk made it evident, that his courſe of Government had brought a neceſſity of changing the State from the condition of a Common-wealth, to that of a Juſt Monarchy. When he was come into Ægypt, and had ſent to the King to be received, a Council was called by the Governours to conſult what was to be done, during which he rode at Anchor, expecting their reſolution. Some would have him received, and ſome not; but Theodotus of Chios, who taught the King Rhetorick, to ſhew his Eloquence, affirmed, that neither the one nor the other was to be done; for by receiving him they ſhould make Cæſar their Enemy, and Pompey their Lord, and by denying him they ſhould diſoblige him, and diſpleaſe Cæſar for letting him eſcape. In concluſion, he perſwaded them to ſend to kill him, for thereby they ſhould win the favour of the one, and not fear the diſpleaſure of the other; and ſome ſay, that he added this Saying, That a Dead Man bites not. This being determined, they gave Achillus order to do it, who took with him Septimius and Salvius, another Centurion, with three or four Soldiers, and perſwaded him to come out of his Ship into a Fiſhers Boat, the Shore being filled with Armed Men. None in the Boat ſpeaking friendly to him, he told Septimius he thought he ſhould know him, having ſerved formerly with him, at which the other nodded with his head, that it was true, but gave him no other anſwer, nor ſhewed him any courteſie. Seeing this, he took a little Book he had in his Hand, in which he had written a Speech he intended to make to Ptolomy, and began to read it. When they drew nigh the Shore, he took hold of the Hand of Philip, his infranchiſed Slave, to riſe more eaſily, and then Septimius coming behind him, thruſt him through with his Sword. Now Salvius and Achillas drew theirs. Pompey did no more, but took up his Gown with his Hands, and covered his Face, then patiently and manly he received the Wounds they gave him, only ſighing a little. Thus died he, fifty nine years old, the next day after that of his Birth. A great Man, as not only the Sir-name given him, but his Actions, in the Eaſtern Countries, and others, declared; but he was over-matched by his Rival, and was, however, too formal and ſlight to overcome Cæſar and his Fortune.

Pompey's Head brought to Cæſar.

76. Having ſtricken off his Head, they caſt his Body over-board, as a miſerable Spectacle for all that had a deſire to ſee him. Philip his Freedman remained by it till they had all gazed their full, and then with an old Fiſhers Boat he found on the Shoar ſcarcely burnt it, being aſſiſted by an old Roman, who had dwelt long in the Country, and prided himſelf in this Honour of doing to him this laſt Office. Not long after came Cæſar into Ægypt, and Pompey's Head was preſented to him, but he turned aſide, and would not ſee it, abhorring him that brought it as a deteſtable Murderer. He took his Ring with which he ſealed his Letters, and, whereon was ingraven a Lyon holding a Sword, and burſt out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus (Plutarch adds) he put to death. King Ptolomy was overcome in Battel, vaniſhed away, and was never heard of. Theodotus the Rhetoritian eſcaped Cæſars Hands, and wandered up and down Ægypt in great miſery, deſpiſed by every Man, till Marcus Brutus, who ſlew Cæſar, ſubduing Aſia, met with, and put him to death after cruel Torments. The Aſhes of Pompey's Body were afterward carried to Cornelia his Wife, who buried them in a Town of hers by the City of Alba. This is Plutarch's Account, who blames this great Captain eſpecially for being hectored by his Officers into a Battel, and deceived by his Father-in-law Scipio, who, it is ſaid, intending to keep the greateſt part of the Money he had brought out of Aſia to himſelf, haſted and perſwaded him to fight, by telling him there was no Treaſure left.

77. Dion Caſſius relates the ſame Story as Plutarch, concerning Cæſar his weeping at the ſight of Pompey's Head. He adds, that he lamented, called him his Son-in-law, and related what they two had done together. That he was ſo far from owning his Murderers to have done him any Service, that he blamed them for the Fact, and gave the Head to others to be honourably interred. As hereby he deſerved Praiſe, ſo in the opinion of the Writer he deſerved to be laugh'd at for his counterfeiting. For having above meaſure coveted Domination, hated Pompey always as his Adverſary upon that account, deviſed all manner of things againſt him, and undertaken this War for no other reaſon, than that having removed him out of the way, he might obtain the Sovereignty, and being for no other thing come into Ægypt, than to deſtroy him, if he was yet alive; he pretended a miſs of him, and to be troubled at his Death. He being ſo made away, Cæſar thinking there was nothing of Hoſtility now behind, ſpent his time in Ægypt in gathering up money, and deciding the Controverſie betwixt Ptolomy and his Siſter Cleopatra, and became intangled in the Alexandrian War, as we have ſhown in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom. In the mean time Pharnaces was at work in Pontus, where being incouraged by the late Civil War, he had attempted to ſeize on his Fathers Kingdom. And another, both Civil, and, as Dio terms it, Forreign War was begun by Cato and others in Africk. For he being left by Pompey at Dyrrachium to guard the Paſſage from Italy, upon his overthrow, betook himſelf from Epirus to Corcyra, with whom joyned ſuch as had fled from the Battel, or were of that Party; for though Cicero, and ſome other Senators, went ſtrait to Rome, yet moſt of them with Labienus and Afranius (who both deſpaired of pardon from Cæſar, the one becauſe he had revolted from him, and the other becauſe having once been pardoned he had again taken Arms againſt the Conqueror) went to Cato, and under him, as General, renewed the War. To them joyned Octavius, who had plyed about the Ionian Sea, had taken C. Antonius, and many Towns, but his Men, after the Battel of Pharſalum, fell off from him. So did Cn. Pom- pey, who with the Ægyptian Fleet had made incurſions into Epirus, and attempted Oricum, as alſo Brunduſium, though without ſucceſs, after the defeat of his Father, and the departure of the Ægyptians; whereupon he betook himſelf to Cato, to whom alſo repaired C. Caſſius, who had vexed many Parts of Italy and Sicily, and fought often proſperouſly both by Sea and Land. Cato uſing theſe Perſons as his Councellors and Aſſiſtants, paſſed into Peloponneſus, with hopes of ſeizing on that Country, knowing yet nothing of the Death of Pompey. But Q. Fuſius Calenus marching againſt them, they ſet Sail, and went to Cyrene, where, hearing of Pompey's Death, they then differed in opinion. Cato, who by no means would bear the Domination of Cæſar, reſolved for Africk, and was followed by ſuch as deſpaired of ſafety, where they omitted nothing they could deviſe againſt Cæſar. Moſt of the reſt were diſperſed, as it happened; and ſome went ſtrait to Cæſar, and obtained pardon, amongſt whom was C. Caſſius.

Cato General againſt Cæſar.

Honours decreed by the Senate to Cæſar.

78. Calenus, before the Battel of Pharſalum, being ſent into Greece by Cæſar, attacqued the City of Athens, but could not force them to yield, till News arrived of his Succeſs. Then they ſubmitted, and Cæſar forgave them without any injury offered to them, or any fine impoſed, ſaying, That they having grievouſly offended, were preſerved by the Dead; by which ſaying he hinted, that he ſpared them for the Glory and Vertue of their Anceſtors. After this moſt other Towns of Greece reconciled themſelves to him, and Megara paid dear to Fuſius for its contumacy. At Rome, before the Controverſie was determined, all openly ſpake well of Cæſar, for fear of his Soldiers there left, and of Servilius his Colleague. When they believed the defeat of Pompey, they cauſed the Statues of him and Sylla to be demoliſhed at the Roſtra; but fearing he might yet recruit himſelf, they thought they had done too much. But when they underſtood for certain of his death, then what was it they would not do for Cæſar, the principal Citizens ſtriving who ſhould exceed in flattery, and hoping to obtain Preferments for ſo doing, whereas it was known they were driven to it by the exigency of Affairs? They gave him Power to determine of thoſe of Pompeys Party as he pleaſed, and they made him Lord of Peace and War againſt all Men whatſoever, though he neither conſulted the People nor Senate. This Power he had taken to himſelf before in the management of the late Wars; but this is to be obſerved concerning theſe Times, and in reference to Cæſar and his adopted Son, that the Romans deſiring to ſeem ſtill Free Citizens, and their own Men decreed thoſe things in their behalf, which they were already poſſeſſed of, and gave ſuch things as they could not keep. Now was he voted Conſul for five years together, Dictator not for half, but an whole year, and to have Tribunitial Power for his Life; ſo as to ſit amongſt the Tribunes, and do their Work, which had not been granted to any before him. Having delivered the Provinces to the Conſuls by lot, yet they decreed, that Cæſar might grant them to Prætors without ſortitition, and ſo they returned both to Conſuls and Prætors again, contrary to their former reſolution. They ordered him a Triumph over Juba, and the Romans that ſerved him, as if the Victory was already obtained, when Cæſar knew not as yet whether there would be ſuch a War. Now though he was out of Italy, yet he preſently took the Dictatorſhip, and made Antony his Magiſter Equitum, who as yet had not been Prætor. And after this Magiſtracy, he was made Conſul, the Augurs making a clamour, that it was not lawful for a Magiſter Equitum to hold above ſix Months. For this they were laughed at to purpoſe, in that having, againſt all Precedent, made the Term of the Dictatorſhip to be Annual, they would be ſo accurate as to that of his Magiſter Equitum.

Diſorders at Rome, and in Italy.

79. While Cæſar was buſied in the Alexandrian War, great Tumults happened in Italy, and at Rome. In Italy Milo raiſed Commotions, being the only exil'd Perſon whom Cæſar did not reſtore; but he was ſuppreſſed and ſlain at Apulia, by the Arms of Servilius the Conſul. At Rome M. Cæcilius preſumed to contradict what Cæſar had ordained concerning Creditors, being diſpleaſed that he had not been made Prætor of the City formerly by him, which Office he now obtained. He raiſed alſo grievous Commotions, and at length was ſlain by thoſe of Cæſars Party. Yet with theſe Men did not the Diſturbances of the City receive an end; for Antony the Magiſter Equitum was burthenſome to them, wearing the Prætexta, and having ſix Lictors, when there was neither Conſul nor Prætor to be ſeen. Indeed he aſſembled the Senate, and thereby was repreſented a ſort of a Commonwealth; but when they ſaw him girt with a Sword, and Guarded by a great number of Attendants, they began to think what ſort of Perſon the Dictator himſelf would prove, who though he had hitherto made no other ſhow, than that of clemency, yet they thought a Man in full poſſeſſion differed in humour from one who indeavoured to clear his way to his deſigns, by an obliging demeanour. But above all, they were plagued by the outragious carriage of L. Trebellius, and P. Cornelius Dolabella, the Tribuni Plebis, the latter of which being once a Patritian, had made himſelf a Plebeian, to obtain the Place. By publiſhing Laws, and making Slaughters to enact and confirm them, they harraſed the Citizens, Dolabella not expecting pardon from Cæſar, ſo great were his demerits, and therefore not caring what he did to be remembred after his death. Till Cæſars arrival in Italy they would not give over, but then when they expected puniſhment, he betook himſelf to his wonted clemency. Finding all things quiet, he not only forgave his Enemies, but preferred ſome of them, amongſt whom Dolabella himſelf, to the Dignity of Conſul, although he had never born the Pretorſhip.

Pharnaces invades ſome Countries of the Eaſt.

80. Cæſar might ſooner have come to Rome, if Cleopatra had not held him faſt in Ægypt, which hold ſhe was forced at length to let go after ſome nine Months, and give way to a greater violence, which hurried him out of her Imbracements. This proceeded from Pharnaces the Son of Mithridates, who was King of the Boſporus Cimmerius, but inflamed with an earneſt deſire of recovering his Fathers Dominions, having the opportunity of the Civil and Ægyptian Wars. He ſeized Colchis without any trouble, and all Armenia in the abſence of Deiotarus, beſides ſome Cities of Cuppadocia and Pontus, which were ſubject to the Juriſdiction of Bithynia. Cæſar having not yet ſetled matters in Ægypt, as he deſired, and hoping to reduce him into order by others, had ſent away Cn. Domitius Calvinus againſt him, with command to recover Aſia, and receive the Forces that were there. Calvinus joyned to himſelf Deiotarus and Ariobarzanes, and went ſtrait againſt Pharnaces, who had his abode at Nicopolis, on which he had ſeized. Pharnaces affrighted at his coming, deſired a Truce, that the matter might be compoſed by a Meſſage, but Calvinus contemned, and would not hear him, but reſolute to fight, was worſted in the Ingagement, and Winter now drawing on, returned into Aſia. Pharnaces elevated by this Succeſs, took in the reſt of the Cities of Pontus, ſtormed Amiſus, and marched for Bithynia and Aſia, with hope of having his Fathers Succeſs. But he was ſtopped in his career by the revolt of Aſander, to whom having committed the charge of Boſporus, the Man being in hope to have it granted to himſelf by the Romans, endeavoured to curry favour with them. He purpoſed to go againſt him, but was diverted by News that Cæſar himſelf was coming into Armenia, who, Ptolomy being now dead, and Domitius overthrown, thought it not honourable for him to make any longer ſtay in Ægypt. Pharnaces was more affrighted with his vigorous Spirit, than his Army, and before he drew near, ſent often to him about a Peace, labouring by all means to evade the preſent danger. He pleaded that he had given no aſſiſtance to Pompey, and hoped to pacifie Cæſar, who would haſt into Italy and Africk, not doubting but after his departure eaſily to renew the War. Cæſar ſufficiently apprehenſive of his Deſign, gave good words to the Meſſengers that came the firſt and the ſecond time, on purpoſe to deceive him; but to thoſe that were ſent the third on the ſame errand, he objected, amongſt other crimes, his ingratitude to Pompey his Benefactor. Uſing all expedition, on one and the ſame day he came and fought the Enemy, who diſtreſſed him at firſt with his Horſe and Chariots that bore Scythes. But the Legions obtained for him the Victory, and Pharnaces flying to the Sea, and indeavouring to break into Boſporus, was repulſed and ſlain by Aſander.

Cæſar overcometh him.

Prideth himſelf in his Victory.

81. In this Victory, though none of the moſt eminent, Cæſar ſo much prided himſelf, as in none more, and that for the celerity of his Expedition; ſo that writing to Anitius at Rome he expreſſed his Atchievment in three words, Veni, Vidi, Vici, I came, I ſaw, I overcame. He gave the Spoil, which was great, to his Soldiers; and whereas Mithridates had at this Hill Scotius overthrown Triarius, and erected a Trophy in the Place; becauſe it was eſteemed wickedneſs to demoliſh it, as conſecrated to the Gods of War, he oppoſed againſt it another over Pharnaces after a certain manner to deface it. He recovered all that Pharnaces had taken from the Romans, or their Friends, and reſtored them to the former owners, part of Armenia excepted, which he beſtowed on Ariobarzanes. He made ſome amends to thoſe of Amiſus, by making them free; to Mithridates of Pergamus he granted a Tetrarchy, with the Name of King, aud committed to him the War againſt Aſander, to revenge the treachery committed againſt his Friend; and that Mithridates might become Lord of Boſporus. He left Domitius to take order for other matters, and went into Bithynia, thence into Greece, and ſo ſailed into Italy; for, ſuch was his Expedition againſt Pharnaces, and Returneth into Italy.

and his Return, as Dion Caſſius hath deſcribed it. But Joſephus further acquaints us, (which we muſt not paſs over) that taking Syria in his way from Ægypt he reſtored Hyrcanus to the Prieſthood in Judæa, though Antigonus the Son of Ariſtobulus (who being let out of Priſon by him, and ſent home, had been poiſoned by Pompey's Party) ſued to him for the Government. He made alſo Antipater (whom Hyrcanus had ſent to joyn with Mithridates of Pergamus with three thouſand Horſe, and who did good Service in the Alexandrian War) Governour of Judæa. And he promoted his own Kinſman Sextus Cæſar from a Quæſtorſhip to the Government of Syria, which Scipio the Father-in-law of Pompey had enjoyed the year before.

Raiſeth Money all ways poſſible.

82. Cæſar, upon his return into Italy, by all means he could, raiſed Money, as formerly he had practiſed. What had been promiſed to Pompey he exacted, and impoſed new Leavies upon other pretended occaſions. At Tyre he took away all that was conſecrated to Hercules, becauſe they had received the Wife and Son of Pompey in their flight; and from many Princes and Kings he received Crowns of Gold, becauſe of the Victories he had obtained. And this he did, our Writer tells us, not out of any diſhoneſt humour, but becauſe he was at vaſt charge, and now muſt be at greater, for the paying of his Armies, ſetting forth his Triumph, and in other matters, wherein his Magnificence was to be ſhown. He was intent upon raiſing Treaſure, becauſe, as he was wont to ſay, there were two things whereby Power was obtained, preſerved, and increaſed, and theſe were Soldiers and Money, of which the one procured the other; for by Money Soldiers were maintained, and by Soldiers Money was raiſed. Sometimes he was wont to think and ſpeak after this manner. And when he came to Rome this was the only courſe he followed. He otherwiſe offended no Man, but ſuch Gifts as weſe given him in Gold, Images, or other things, he gladly received, and raiſed much Money by Loans, not only from private Perſons, but alſo from Cities, and exacted them no otherwiſe than as due to him, by conſtraint and force, though he never intended to make reſtitution, alledging, that he had ſpent his own Eſtate upon the Common-wealth, and now was upon neceſſity to be in debt. He not only herein offended Strangers, but his own Friends, who buying ſuch Goods and Eſtates as he had publiſhed, and hoping he would not exact the price, now found they were miſtaken; and he valued not their Indignation. For he pleaſed them again by Offices and Imployments, and the Multitude he obliged, by remitting all the Uſury which had been due from the time he undertook the Expedition againſt Pompey, as alſo Rent for the hire of Houſes, and other ways. That he might gratifie many Perſons, he deſigned ten Prætors for the following year, and increaſed the number of ſuch as ſerved about their Sacred things, above what was preſcribed by the Laws. The Colleges of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Quindecemviri, he increaſed by one added to each, though, as was decreed, he had reſolved to have all Offices of Prieſts in his own Hands. The Horſe-men and Centurions of his Army, and ſuch as held leſſer Commands, he honoured ſeveral ways, and ſome of them by bringing them into the Senate in the Places of ſuch as were dead.

His Soldiers mutiny.

83. But while theſe things he did, he was much diſturbed by his Soldiers, who though they had been rewarded as they had deſerved of him, yet were not contented, and their expectations not being anſwered, grew mutinous. The greater part of them lay in Campania, whence he purpoſed to tranſport them into Africk. They almoſt killed Salluſt, who was made Prætor, that he might obtain the Senatorian Dignity, and when he fled towards Cæſar to acquaint him with their diſorder, they purſued, and ſlew two Senators out-right, or two Prætors, as Plutarch names them, Coſconius and Galba. When Cæſar knew it, he thought firſt to have ſent his Prætorian Troops; but fearing that they alſo ſhould be drawn into the Mutiny, he ſtaid till the Soldiers came into the Suburbs. Then he ſent to know what they would have, and what the reaſon was of their coming. They anſwered, they would declare it to Cæſar himſelf; and it being the Cuſtom to wear their Swords in the City, he permitted them to come with them, without their other Arms. With many words they related what Labours they had undergone, what Dangers they had incurred, what Rewards they had both expected and deſerved, and now they required to be diſmiſſed, and vehemently urged it; not that they deſired to return to a Private Life, being uſed to War and Spoil, but to terrifie him, now involved in the African War. He only replyed, Indeed Quirites you ſpeak the truth, for you are exhauſted with Labours and Wounds. Without any other Anſwer he remitted to them all the Military Oath, as aſtanding in no further need of their aſſiſtance, and promiſed Pay and Rewards to thoſe that had ſerved their full time. Herewith they were ſtruck with great amazement, eſpecially that he ſhould call them Quirites, and not Soldiers, and fearing ſome ill thing was determined againſt them, they deſponded, and earneſtly beſought him to receive them again, promiſing all obedience, and alone by themſelves to diſpatch the War. They making theſe Intreaties, and a certain Tribune, whether at their requeſt, or to gratifie Cæſar, is unknown, interceding in their behalf, he ſaid he diſmiſſed them all that were there, and moreover all others that had ſerved their time; for he had nothing for them to do. Yet he would reward them, that they ſhould not ſay he made uſe of them in his need, and afterwards was ingrateful, although they had refuſed his Service, and to diſpatch the remainder of the War, when they were neither deſtitute of ſtrength, nor of any other thing.

Whom he reduceth by calling them Quirites.

84. This he craftily ſpake, for he had great need of them, and to all he aſſigned Grounds, partly ſuch as were publick, and partly his own, but in a diſperſed manner, leſt being in one place they might diſturb their Neighbours, or attempt ſome ſeditious things. Such Money as he had promiſed for performance of ſome notable Facts, he undertook to pay down, or afterward with Intereſt; and by ſuch diſcourſe made them ſo obnoxious, that they not only not murmured, but gave him thanks. Now, ſaith he, you have all I owed you, neither will I for the time to come force any of you to the War; but if any of you will aſſiſt me in what is behind, I will willingly receive him. Having heard this, they were wonderous joyful, neither was there one who did not give his Name. He ſelected ſome he knew moſt turbulent that were able to live by Husbandry, and received the reſt, taking this courſe alſo with ſome other Troops. Such as were moſt fierce, amutinous, and fitteſt for miſchief, he took along with him out of Italy, and expoſed them to dangers in Africk, both thereby to promote his Service againſt the Enemy, and to rid himſelf of ill Men. For though he was of a moſt gentle humour, and deſirous to gratifie his Soldiers, above all other Mortals, yet he moſt grievouſly hated all Mutineers, and moſt ſeverely puniſhed them. Theſe things happened that year wherein he in effect again was Dictator, though Calenus and Vatinius at the latter end of the year bore the Name of Conſuls.

He goes into Africk.

85. In the middle of Winter he paſſed over into Africk, and thereby coming unexpected upon his Enemies, had the better ſucceſs. For in all his Affairs he uſed celerity, and gained much by his ſudden expeditions, which indeed was the cauſe why he excelled all Captains of his time in the Glory of Martial Actions. Africk had formerly been no great friend to him, and after the deſtruction of Curio he eſteemed it an Enemy. For Varus and Juba did there what they pleaſed, and now Cato and Scipio having joyned with them, they drew in Sicily and Sardinia to their aſſiſtance, and hearing there were ſtirs in Spain, ſent Cn. Pompey thither, that by the power of the love that People bore to his Father, he might make it their own, and then they might return with him into Italy. Varus at firſt, as moſt experienced in Africk, contended with Scipio for the chief Command, but Cato declined it, and it was devolved upon Scipio as the greateſt Perſon in Dignity, and one who for his very Name was acceptable in that Country, where it was thought a Scipio could not miſcarry. Cæſar perceiving his Soldiers alſo to be of this humour, carried over with him one Scipio, Sirnamed Salatto, and, they not expecting him in Winter, arrived at Adrumetum, not being able to reach Utica with his Ships. At his going aſhoar his feet ſlipped, and he fell flat upon his face, at which his Men were affrighted, as an ill Omen; but he, without any heſitation, ſtretch'd out his Hand upon the Ground, and graſped it, as having fall'n on purpoſe, and, kiſſing it, ſaid, I hold thee, O Africk. Attempting to take Adrumetum, he was repulſed, and driven to another Place called Raſpina, where he took up his Winter Quarters, and thence made War. For the following year he entred upon the Conſulſhip and Dictatorſhip, both the third time, having Lepidus for his Colleague. This Man, as ſoon as he was declared Dictator by him, he ſent from being Prætor into the hither Spain, and granted him a Triumph at his return, though he had overcome no Man, nor ſo much as fought, only it was pretended he was preſent at the Actions of Longinus and Marcellus. Lepidus in his Triumph brought in nothing but the Money, of which he had ſpoiled the Provinces. But Cæſar having thus requited him, now, as was ſaid, took him for his Colleague.

86. In Africk Fortune now ſeemed to change her aſpect upon his Affairs. His Men going out on forraging, before they had worn off the diſorder into which the Sea had brought them, were many of them cut off by Petreius and Labienus, who laying hold on the advantage, drove them to an Hill, where they might have been all taken or deſtroyed, but that their Enemies were diſcouraged by the many Wounds they had received. However, they reſolved to beſiege them, and periſh they muſt, if Cæſar did not relieve them, who now, as he had reaſon, was very melancholick, conſidering that Scipio and Juba were coming with all their Forces, that he had not ſtrength to grapple with them all, had not neceſſaries wherewith to ſubſiſt, neither could he get away, his Enemies ſtopping him both at Sea and Land. When he was in this perplexity, he was reſcued out of danger by one P. Sittius, who being driven out of Italy, joyned many baniſhed Perſons with him, and paſſing into Mauritania, having obtained of King Bocchus a Band of Men, reſolved to aſſiſt Cæſar in this War, though he never had been gratified by him, nor ſo much as known to him. Yet did he not think he could do him much Service, being at a great diſtance from him, and having but a ſmall Force; but obſerving the time when Juba led his Army out of his Kingdom, he brake into Numidia, and waſted it, together with Gætulia, (part of his Kingdom) which conſtrained Juba to return back when he had gone half his Journey. So far was Cæſar from being in condition to defend himſelf from both, that he was not able to grapple with Scipio, eſpecially becauſe his Horſes would not endure the ſight, and ſmell of his Elephants, which cauſed him to ſend not only for Soldiers out of Italy, but for Elephants too, to make them familiar to his Horſes. In the mean time the Gætuli imbraced his friendſhip, the Example of whom ſome Neighbouring People followed, induced by the requital he made them, and by remembrance of Marius, to whom Cæſar was akin. And now Succours came to him out of Italy, though with great difficulty and hazard, both by reaſon of Enemies, and tempeſtuous Weather.

Where he is diſtreſſed.

Relieved by Sittius.

87. He reſolved now to fall upon Scipio, before Juba could come and joyn with him. He beat him from a Mount he had ſeized near the City Uzitta, and driving alſo Labienus from another Poſt, blocked up the Place. Scipio was fearful to ingage till the coming of Juba, whom, to draw on, he promiſed all Africk that was held by the Romans. This Promiſe ſo wrought upon him, that leaving a Party to oppoſe Sittius, he began his March againſt Cæſar, who in the mean time, by fair Promiſes, drew many, both Romans and Africans, to revolt from Scipio, but by all means he might uſe, he could not oblige him to fight. Scipio alſo attempted to draw off Cæſars Men, but without ſucceſs, not promiſing them any Rewards, but only moving them to preſerve the liberty of the Roman People. But the Arrival of Juba altered the Caſe. Now they reſolved to fight Cæſar, who declined all Ingagements till more Forces could arrive out of Italy, which was but by degrees, for they were raiſed without haſt, and Shipping was wanting for their tranſportation. At length, incouraged by their arrival, he drew out his Army to give Battel, and they alſo drew out and faced him; but yet they ingaged not, though they looked on one another ſeveral days, but then retired to their Camps. Cæſar ſeeing they were not to be drawn from their Fortifications, removed to Thapſus, thereby either to fight the Enemy, if he came to relieve it, or elſe to take it deſtitute of Succours. Thapſus was ſituate in a kind of a Peninſula made by the Sea, and a Fen, and a narrow neck of Land gave acceſs to it, wherein was a Lake, the Way lying narrow on each ſide. Cæſar made Fortifications in theſe Straits, and Scipio and Juba indeavoured to cut them off by other Works from the Continent, and where they could not at preſent do this, they placed Elephants to keep off Cæſars Soldiers, being wholly intent upon the Works. But Cæſar fell upon Scipio's quarter, and drove the Elephants by Darts and Stones upon the Labourers, whom putting to flight, he purſued, and took the Camp. Herewith was Juba ſo ſtruck, that he would neither fight, nor take care to preſerve his own Camp, but fled amain into his Kingdom. There none would receive him, and the rather, becauſe they had been defeated by Sittius. Deſpairing then of ſafety, he fought a ſingle Combate with Petreius, who hoped alſo for no pardon, and they both died together. Cæſar, he being fled, became Maſter of their Fortifications, and made great ſlaughter of their Men, not ſparing thoſe who yielded themſelves. * Then took he the reſt of the Cities, with the Numidians, over whom he ſet Salluſt, not to govern, but pill them as it proved. That part of Libya lying about Carthage, and by the Romans called Africa, was now ſtiled The Old Province, having been formerly ſubdued; and Numidia, but now brought under, had the Name of The New Province. Scipio eſcaped to Sea, and purpoſed to go into Spain to Pompey, but being caſt upon Mauritania, for fear of Sittius, he killed himſelf.

His great ſucceſs againſt Juba and Scipio.

88. Of the Generals of the Party againſt Cæſar, now Cato only remained, who lay at Utica. This City they perſwaded him to be Governour of, and he could not but be acceptable to the Inhabitants, whom he ſaved from ruine, when Scipio would have had the Place deſtroyed, as having taken Cæſars part. He had given place to Scipio, as the greater Man in Dignity, but adviſed him to delay, and not to fight ſo Cato Governour of Utica.

* Plutarch writes, That in a piece of one day he took three Camps, (reckoning that of Afranius with the other two) ſlew fifty thouſand of his Enemies, and loſt but fifty of his own Men.

ſo great a Commander as Cæſar was,for which he received ſeveral taunts from him by Letters,as well as when he offered to paſs into Italy with his Forces to draw Cæſar out of Africk. Cato repented then that he had made him General, becauſe he ſaw he would indiſcreetly proſecute the War, and if he overcame, would not moderately uſe the Victory againſt his Fellow-Citizens, and he declated, that if ſo it happened, he would not ſtay at Rome, but fly from his cruelty, who even now did proudly threaten many Perſons. But the news of Scipio's defeat arriving, put Cato upon other thoughts. He attempted to fortifie the City, and perſwaded three hundred Roman Merchants, who lived there, to ſtand upon their guard; but they again, out of fear of Cæſar, forſook him; ſo that reſolving to die, and not accept the mercy of the Conqueror, if it ſhould be offered, he laboured all he could to ſave ſuch Senators as were with him in the City. And by his Induſtry he got Ships for them all, and ſent them to Sea. When the three hundred Merchants told him they would ſend to Cæſar to crave pardon for him in an eſpecial manner, and if they could not obtain it, they would fight for him to the laſt breath in their bodies; he thanked them for their good will, but anſwered, that they ſhould ſend quickly to beg pardon for themſelves, but none for him. His reaſon he ſaid was, becauſe Men that be overcome, and have offended ought to make ſute and crave pardon; but for himſelf, he was never overcome in his life; had overcome others as much as he deſired, and in Juſtice had always excelled Cæſar, who was indeed the only Perſon that was now overcome and captivated; that thing now being evident to all the World, which he had always denied to have practiſed againſt his Country.

Plutarch in Catone minore.

89. The Perſon that was choſen by the three hundred to go and intercede with Cæſar, was Lucius Cæſar his Kinſman, who intreated Cato to help him to make the Speech he ſhould ſpeak in behalf of them all; but in Cato's behalf he ſaid he would kiſs his Hand, fall down on his Knees, and intercede for him. He told him he ſhould not; for if he would ſave his life by Cæſars favour, he could do it, if he would go to him, but he would not be obliged to a Tyrant for injuſtice. For he ſaid it was injuſtice in him to take upon him as a Lord and Sovereign to ſave a Mans life, when he had no real Authority to command: But he conſidered with him what to ſay in behalf of the three hundred. When Lucius Cæſar was gone, to whom he recommended his Son and his Friends, he charged his Son by no means to meddle with State-Affairs, becauſe to deal uprightly like Cato's Son, the corruption of the Time and State would not abide it, and if he obſerved the time, he could not do like an honeſt Man. At night he imbraced him and his Friends more lovingly than he was wont to do, whereby he made them ſuſpect as formerly what he deſigned. His Son at Supper took from him his Sword, which he miſſed not when he aroſe,but lying down in his Bed read Plato's Dialogue, called Phædo,concerning the Immortality of the Soul. Then, miſſing his Sword, he was very angry it was taken away, and would not be quiet till it was again reſtored to him. When he had it, and felt it to be ſharp, he ſaid he was now where he would be, and laying it down naked by him, took his Book again, and read it over, as was ſaid, twice together. Then ſlept he ſo ſoundly, that his Men in the Antichamber heard him ſnoar. When it grew day, and the Birds began to chirp, he took his Sword, and thruſt it into his Breaſt; but the Wound not diſpatching him quickly, by reaſon his Hand was ſwoll'n with a ſtroak he gave one of his Servants on the Face in his paſſion about his Sword, he fell down upon his Bed, and caſt to the ground a little Geometrical Table; with the noiſe of which, his Servants affrighted, cried out, and his Son and Friends coming in, found him all in Blood, and moſt of his Bowels coming out of his Body. Then did his Phyſitian endeavour to put in his Bowels again, and to ſow up his Wound; but he coming to himſelf, thruſt him from him, tore them with his own hand, and inlarging the Wound, immediately died.

Kills himſelf.

90. His death being known, the three hundred Merchants, and all the People of Utica, to whom he had reſtored all their Money in his Hands, were preſently at his Door, called him their Benefactor and Reliever, and ſaid, That he only was a Freeman, and had an invincible mind. This they did even when they heard that Cæſar was not far from Utica, and neither fear of the preſent danger, nor deſire to flatter the Conqueror, nor any private quarrel amongſt themſelves, could keep them from honouring his Funerals; for ſumptuouſly ſetting out his Body, they paid their laſt reſpects to him by the Sea-ſide, where in Plutarch's time was to be ſeen his Image, holding a Sword in his Hand. This done, they took the beſt courſe they could to ſave themſelves and the City. Cæſar having heard that Cato ſtaid at Utica, and ſent all others away, knew not what to think of his meaning; but in a little time, hearing he had killed himſelf, it was reported he ſaid, O Cato! I envy thee thy Death, becauſe thou haſt envied me the Honour of ſaving thy Life. But Men doubted for all this what he would have done, and eſpecially by reaſon of a Book he afterwards wrote againſt Cato, wherein he heaped up a number of Accuſations againſt him. But ſome believed he wrote it not out of any malice to him, at leaſt that was deadly, but rather out of civil ambition upon this occaſion. Cicero had compoſed a Treatiſe in praiſe of this Perſon, and called it Cato, which Book was much eſteemed, both becauſe of the Eloquence of the Writer, and the excellent Subject which it handled. Cæſar was much offended at it, thinking, that to praiſe him of whoſe death he was the cauſe, was to accuſe himſelf; and therefore he took Pen in Hand, and compoſed another Treatiſe in anſwer to it, which he called Anti-Cato. Both theſe Books had favourers a long time after, ſome defending the one for the love they bare to Cæſar, and others the other for Cato's ſake. But ſo died Cato, than whom none was more ſtudious of Popular Government, a Man of a moſt firm and conſtant mind, who by his death obtained great Renown with his Countrey-men, eſpecially thoſe of his own Party, and from the Place where he died, obtained the Sirname of Uticenſis, the rather to diſtinguiſh him from his Great-Grand-father, who was called Cenſorius from that Office which he bore.

Cæſar puniſhes ſome, and ſpares more.

Honours decreed him by the Senate.

91. Cæſar diſmiſſed his Son unhurt, as he did many more who betook themſelves unto him. Afranius and Fauſtus Sylla fled into Mauritania, deſpairing of pardon, and falling into Sittius his Hands, Cæſar put them to death as Captives. Though L. Cæſar was both his Kinſman, and came voluntarily in to him to beg his pardon, yet becauſe he had been againſt him all the War, he made him be called to his Tryal, and when he feared to give Judgment of death againſt him himſelf, cauſed the Proceſs to fall, but procured him to be ſlain privately. And it was his Cuſtom in Fight, or ſome other way, to bring about the deſtruction of ſuch as he liked not, or had ill deſerved of him, being not willing to puniſh them all openly. However, when he had taken Scipio's Cabinet, he burnt all the Letters therein contained, without reading them, and pardoned many that had borne Arms againſt him, either for their own ſakes, or at the requeſt of ſuch as interceded for them, giving liberty to every of his Friends and Fellow-Soldiers to exempt one, whom they would name, from puniſhment. And though Plutarch writes concerning Cato, as we have ſeen, yet Dio thinks he ought not to doubt but he would have ſpared him. For he ſaith he had him in ſo great admiration, that when as afterward Cicero compoſed a Book in his praiſe, he took it not ill he had ſo done, though the Author had alſo been in the War againſt him, but ſatisfied himſelf in anſwering the Book in another Treatiſe, which was called Anti-Cato. Whatever they thought at Rome of theſe things, they of the Senate were fearful to be ſlow in expreſſing the ſence they had either of his Merit, or his Power. They decreed, That for his Victory Sacrifice ſhould be offered forty days; that in his Triumph already granted, he might uſe White Horſes, and the Apparitors he both now had with him, and which he uſed in his firſt and ſecond Dictatorſhip. They created him Maſter of Manners, as if the Name of Cenſor was too mean, for three years, and Dictator for ten. They ordered he ſhould ſit in the ſame Seat with the Conſuls in Senate, and always ſpeak his opinion firſt; that in all Horſe-races he ſhould diſtribute the Rewards, confer Places of Magiſtracy, and other Honours wont to be beſtowed by the People; that a Chariot ſhould be ſet up to him in the Capitol over againſt Jupiter; that he ſhould be placed upon a Globe of the World with this Inſcription, He is a Demi-God, and that the Name of Catulus being obliterated, his ſhould be ſet upon the Capitol, as if he had finiſhed that Temple for which he intended to call Catulus to account. Many other things they decreed, but theſe Dio mentions, becauſe he approved and received them, rejecting the reſt.

He labours to take off their Jealouſie.

92. He knew ſufficiently, that they were decreed more out of flattery than good will, and was ſenſible that they were fearful of him that he would abuſe his Power, and act with ſuch heat and inſolence as Sylla, Marius, and Cinna had done before him. Being returned to Rome, he indeavoured to take off their jealouſie by two Speeches he made, the one to the Senate, and the other to the People, promiſing to treat them no otherwiſe than as an Indulgent Father is wont to do his Children, and to uſe his Power for their protection, and not the deſtruction of ſuch as had fought againſt him. And as for his late Victory, he magnified it, declaring, that he had thereby laid ſo many Countries to the Empire of Rome, that he could furniſh them yearly with two hundred thouſand buſhels of Wheat, and twenty hundred thouſand Pound weight of Oyl. By his words they were a little eaſed of their fear, but they could not fully truſt him, till they ſaw them made good by his Actions. Now Dio tells us,

He Triumphs.

he triumphed four days together, and that with all poſſible ſhow of Magnificence, over the Galles, Ægypt, Pharnaces, and Juba, though others mention only three Triumphs, omitting that over the Galles. The Spectators were well pleaſed at the ſight, but it grieved them to ſee Arſinoe, once called Queen of Ægypt, led amongſt the Captives, and to behold the Spoils of the Citizens that had fall'n in Africk. Yet conſidering the greatneſs of the things performed, they had him in admiration, and he was not diſpleaſed, but bore well the inſolent liberty of the Soldiers, who jeered him for his familiarity with Cleopatra, and his having been abuſed by Nicomedes, and ſaid, That if he laid down his Power, he muſt periſh by the ſtrictneſs of the Laws; if he continued it, he muſt turn Tyrant. But he regarded nothing they ſaid, but touching the matter of Nicomedes. About it he was much concerned, and offered to purge it by Oath, for which he was derided. On the firſt day of his Triumph his Chariot broke as he paſſed by the Temple of Fortune, built by Lucullus, and he was forced to make uſe of another. But he mounted the ſteps of the Capitol upon his Knees, and he would neither have Chariot placed there, nor the Inſcription lately mentioned, of Demi-God. Arſinoe was diſmiſſed, but Vercingetorix, Dio tells us, with others, was put to death.

He feaſts the People.

Which is diſſatisfied.

93. He feaſted the People with great Magnificence, (Plutarch ſaith, at two and twenty thouſand Tables) adding Wheat and Oyl above the ordinary Cuſtom; to the three hundred Nummi he had promiſed them a Man, he added another hundred, and to the Soldiers he gave two Seſtercia apiece. He reformed the abuſe committed in giving Corn at the publick charge; for finding it to be procured in confuſion, and ſeditiouſly he cut off about one half of the Expence. The laſt night of the Triumph, after Supper, he went with his Shooes on, and his Head bedecked with all ſorts of Flowers, into his Forum, whither all the People in a manner accompanied him, many Elephants bearing Torches before them. For he had built a Forum which bore his Name, more beautiful than the Roman, though the Roman had this advantage by that new one that it was called the Great. This, with a Temple to Venus, his Progenitrix, as he reported, he dedicated, he ſet forth Shows, built an Amphitheatre; and in Honour of his Daughter, exhibited Huntings, and Games of Gladiators. Other ſorts of Sports there were, and the Sons of Patritians, according to the Cuſtom, played the Tragedy of Troy, and other real Tragedies were acted, many Perſons being killed, for which the People were angry with him, as alſo for the vaſt expence, wherewith the Soldiers were alſo ſo far moved, that angry that the Money was not beſtowed on themſelves, they had fall'n into a Mutiny, had not he himſelf laid hold on one of them, and delivered him to puniſhment. And Dio writes, That two other Men had their Throats cut in a way of Sacrifice by the Pontifices and the Salius in the Campus Martius, though neither Sibylla had commanded, nor any Oracle was extant concerning ſuch a thing.

He maketh Laws.

Reforms the Calendar.

94. Now did he make many Laws. He committed Judicature to the Senators and Equites alone, to have Juſtice daily adminiſtred; ſome Plebeians having been formerly imployed herein. Both by Laws and his own obſervation he repreſſed the profuſe way of living of Rich Perſons. And becauſe the City was manifeſtly exhauſted, by reaſon of multitudes quitting it, he propoſed Rewards to thoſe that had many Children. Finding that by his long Command in Gall he had had opportunity to aſpire after Domination, and to eſtabliſh his Power, by a Law he ordained, that no Prætor ſhould have command above a year, nor a Conſul above two years, from the execution of his Office. And whereas the form of the year was much now out of order, the Months being obſerved according to the Revolution of the Moon, he reduced it, Dio tells us, to that ſtate in which it ſtood in his time, intercalating ſixty and ſeven days, though others falſly ſpeak of more. This account he himſelf had learnt at Alexandria, although it varied ſo much from the form of a Year, that every Alexandrian Month conſiſted of thirty days, and they added five days to every year. Others have written, That in framing this Account, which after him hath been called Julian, he uſed the skill of Soſigenes, an excellent Mathematitian of Alexandria, for Aſtronomical Calculations, and of Flavius the Scribe, in rectifying the Calendar. Now thoſe five days, and two others beſides, which he took from one, he fitly added to the other Months; and that Day which ariſeth out of the parts of a Day, he added to every fourth Year, three Years being omitted; ſo that now, ſaith Dio, there can be no error as to the Hours of a Year, except very ſmall, ſo ſmall, that every one thouſand four hundred and ſixty one Year ſhall need the Intercalation. but of one Day. How true this is, let them that uſe the Gregorian Account, if they ſhould think it worth their while, conſider.

He goes into Spain.

95. Cæſar, though he did all theſe things, yet was ſo wiſe as to do nothing on his own Head, without communicating his Deſigns with the Principal of the Senate, and ſometimes with the whole Order. As hereby he declined ill will, ſo he procured it by relieving condemned Perſons, particularly ſuch as were found guilty of ambitious ſeeking for Offices, for making unworthy Men Senators, and eſpecially for harbouring Cleopatra in his own Houſe, who was come to Rome with her Husband; and he valued not the infamy, but entred them amongſt the Kings, that were the Friends and Allies of the Romans. But the pleaſure he took in ſuch Society was diſturbed by News out of Spain, where Cn. Pompeius, Son of Pompey the Great, ſwayed all as he pleaſed, having ingratiated himſelf with the Soldiers by his obliging demeanour. Cæſar hoping to diſpatch this War by his Officers, had ſent a Fleet thither from Sardinia, and after that an Army, but his Captains were diſcouraged, and ſtood at gaze, expecting and requiring his coming. And when he ſaw it was neceſſary, he was there before either they or the Enemy in the leaſt imagined it, hoping by ſuch expedition to terrify Pompey, who now had laid Siege to a Town called Ulla. Cæſar indeavoured to divert him by beſieging Corduba, but there fell ſick, and when he came to raiſe the Siege, durſt not abide his coming. Having recovered his Health, and received more Forces which followed him, he abode as well as he could the Incommodities of Winter, and want of Proviſions, being now, though Dictator, made Conſul again for the following year; for Lepidus aſſembled the People, being then Magiſter Equitum, which Title, being Conſul, he aſſumed contrary to the practice of their Fore-fathers.

Fights with Pompey's Sons.

Very hardly gets the Victory.

96. Cæſar having no hope of taking Corduba, it was ſo well Manned, removed, and laid ſiege to Attegna, which he heard was full of Corn; and Pompey thinking it ſtrong enough to hold out, and not willing to expoſe his Soldiers to the cold, came not to relieve it; ſo that the Townſ-men yielded. Being Maſter of this, other Cities ſubmitted themſelves to him; and Pompey wandering up and down, and fearing all the reſt would revolt, reſolved to come to a Battel. Both Armies had Auxiliaries of Spaniards and Moors, but the Romans alone ſuſtained the Charge; for thoſe on Cæſars ſide were excited to do their utmoſt by hope to put an end that day to all their labours; and they with Pompey fought out of deſperation, moſt of them expecting no pardon, as having had their Lives formerly given them when they were overthrown with Afranius and Varro. And with ſo great animoſity they fought, that had not Bogud, who ſtood with his Men without the Battel, turned himſelf to fall on the Camp of Pompey, they had either all died upon the Spot, or Night muſt have taken up the Controverſie. But Labienus, when he perceived the Deſign of Bogud, leaving his Place to go to oppoſe him, Pompey's Men thought he fled, and let fall their courage ſo much, that though afterward they ſaw their error, yet could they not recover their former condition, but fled into the City Munda, or into their Camp. Such as got into the Camp valiantly reſiſted the Enemy, and were not ſlain till they had killed as many of the Aſſailants. They that got into the Town held it long out, and it was not taken till they were all deſtroyed by frequent Sallies. So great ſlaughter was made of Romans in the Battel, that at night when Cæſars Soldiers were to raiſe a Wall to keep them in that none might eſcape, they made one of dead Bodies. How true ſoever this Story is, related by Dio, others affirm this the greateſt Battel that was fought in this Civil War. That Cæſars Men were ſo diſtreſſed, that he was glad to run himſelf into the Croud, and ask them if they were not aſhamed to be beaten and taken Priſoners, and to yield themſelves to the young Boys, meaning Pompey's two Sons. That with much ado, and not without all the Force he could make, he got the day, killing thirty thouſand of his Enemies, and loſing a thouſand of his own beſt Soldiers. When the Fight was over, being in his Tent, he told his Friends, that he had often before fought for Victory, but now for the ſaving of his own Life. Some ſay his Army had run, but that he ſnatching a Target out of a Soldiers Hand, went and ingaged the Enemy himſelf, and had two hundred Darts thrown at him; whereat his Officers being aſhamed, went on, and got the Victory.

All Spain ſubmits to him.

97. After this he had all the Cities of Spain given up to him, whence he raiſed as much Money as he could poſſible, not abſtaining from things conſecrated at Gades unto Hercules. Cn. Pompey, after a conflict with Ceſennius Lento, wherein he was worſted, got into the Woods, and there periſhed. And ſo ended this Civil War, by a Battel fought on the day of the Bacchanalia, as Plutarch writes, who adds, that ſome reported that it was on the ſame day four years that Pompey went out of Rome to begin it. A War ſo deſtructive to the Roman People, that Cæſar before his going into Spain, making a Cenſus, found at the Luſtrum but one hundred and fifty thouſand Polls of Citizens; whereas at that before had been found three hundred and twenty thouſand. Whether the great danger he eſcaped made him over-joyed, and this exceſſive Joy tranſported him above his uſual and common temper; but whereas after his other Victories in the Civil War he neither ſent Meſſengers nor Letters, as rather concealing and grieving at the ruine of his Fellow-Citizens, now he did it as if he had overcome ſome barbarous King or Nation. More than this, he triumphed, and yet not content with this, and giving a Dinner again to the People, as in a common Feſtivity, he gave the Honour of Triumphing to Fabius and Pedius his Lieutenants, who had done nothing by their own Conduct. But the laughter they moved made ſome amends, for they made uſe not of Ivory, but Wooden Images and Veſſels in their Pomp. This gave extraordinary great offence, and more than any thing he had done before, when the Spectators conſidered that he made all this noiſe for having deſtroyed the Sons of the greateſt Man in Rome, who had been overcome by Fortune, and had plucked up his Race by the Roots. It was odious that he ſhould triumph for the Calamities of his Country, and rejoyce at a thing for which he had but one excuſe to God and Man, viz. That he was compelled to do it.

At his return he gives great offence.

98. But now again the Senate goes to work, and conſiders not what it was he deſerved, but what the ſtate of Affairs required they ſhould do for his further Honour. And many extraordinary things they voted. Amongſt others, that he ſhould have the Name of Deliverer, and ſo he was entered in the Faſti, That a Temple ſhould be erected to Liberty; And that he ſhould have and enjoy the Title of Imperator, not only in the ancient ſenſe, as it was common to him, with others who obtained it after Victories, nor as it gave merum Imperium, or an abſolute Command; but they conferred it on him now firſt of all, in that meaning as a Steward it belonged to ſuch as had Sovereign Authority, and as proper to himſelf. To that flattery they proceeded, that they commanded his Sons and Nephews to be named Imperatores, though he had no Son, and was old; although indeed from this Julius proceeded the Name of Imperator, as alſo that of Cæſar, and as a peculiar Name of Sovereign Authority was derived down to all Imperatores, (Emperors, as we call them) who enjoyed them both joyned together. Other things they decreed, which made him a Sovereign Prince or King in effect. They ſubjected all Magiſtrates, even Plebeian, to his Power; made him Conſul for ten years, and ordained that he alone ſhould command the Armies, and raiſe Money.

Honours,

And Sovereign Power given to him.

SECT. VIII.

From the Abſoluteneſs of Julius Cæſar, to the end of the ſecond Triumvirate, and the Abſoluteneſs of Octavius Cæſar, or Cæſar Octavianus.

The ſpace of fifteen Years.

Cæſar makes a great change in the Conſulſhip.

1. CÆSAR, before he came to the City, entred his fourth Conſulſhip alone, but did not bear it all the year, but after his return diveſted himſelf of it, and created Conſuls Q. Fabius and C. Trebonius, of whom it happened, that Fabius died the laſt day of his Magiſtracy, and Cæſar ſubſtituted C. Canivius for the remaining hours; whereupon Cicero jeſted, writing in one of his Epiſtles, That during this Conſulſhip of Canivius no Man dined; yet no harm was committed in it, for he was wonderfully vigilant, who in his whole Conſulſhip never ſlept. Thus bold did Cæſar make with the Laws and Cuſtoms of his Country, in abdicating the Conſulſhip of his own accord, without being commanded by an Edict ſo to do, and in the matter of Canivius he ſeemed to play with ſo ſerious and noble a Dignity. But from this time forward it grew cheaper, and yet few held it an whole year, and ſome more, ſome fewer Months and Days as it happened. This Dio obſerves, who adds, That in his time ſcarcely any was Conſul for an whole year, nor above two months, with a Colleague. But in other things they differed nothing from the ancient Cuſtom, and the number of years was reckoned by their Names who were Conſuls at the beginning.

Fourteen Prætors and forty Quæſtors.

Nine hundred Senators.

Ædiles made Treaſurers.

2. So he ordered the Conſulſhip. Other Magiſtrates he pretended he would not meddle with, but leave them to the People to be named according to the ancient Cuſtom, but it was but a pretence; for he made them, and without any ſortition they were ſent into the Provinces. In other Offices the ſame number was obſerved, but fourteen Prætors and forty Quæſtors were made. For he had no other way to gratifie thoſe to whom he had promiſed great matters, and this cauſed him to admit many into the Senate without any diſtinction, whether the Man was a Soldier or a Libertine by original; ſo that the number of Senators by this means aroſe to nine hundred. Many alſo he brought into the Ranks of Patritians, Conſulares, and of thoſe who had born other Offices; which became a Cuſtom with thoſe who were afterwards Emperors. Nay ſome that were called to Judgment for corruption, he abſolved not without ſuſpition of taking Money, which was increaſed in that he publickly ſold publick Places, as well Sacred as Prophane. To his Friends he gave away much both in Money and Lands, which was pleaſing to them that made their ends: Others took it very ill, and teſtified their reſentment, as they might, by word of Mouth, or by Libels. The management of publick Money was now tranſlated from the Quæſtors to the Ædiles, and afterwards returned no more unto them, but at length was committed to Perſons of Prætorian Dignity. Of theſe Ædiles of the Treaſury two were this year created.

Sixteen Prætors.

For what Cæſar was commended.

3. For the following year Cæſar was Conſul again with Antonius, and ſixteen Prætors were made, and ſo continued for many years. The Tribunal being taken out of the middle of the Forum, and put into another place, where it afterward continued, the Statues of Sylla and Pompey were reſtored and placed by it, which cauſed Cæſar to be very well ſpoken of, as alſo that he granted the Glory and Inſcription of the Work to Antony. He made ſome Laws, and extended the Pomærium, and yet in ſuch Actions ſeemed only to imitate Sylla; but in that he fully forgave them that had born Arms againſt him in the War, and granted part of their Eſtates to their Sons, he thereby greatly taxed the cruelty of Sylla, and obtained a Name not only for Valour, but for Clemency; it being a difficult thing indeed for one and the ſame Man to pleaſe the People, and be commended for his carriage both in Peace and War. He was praiſed alſo by ſome for reſtoring the two ancient Cities of Corinth and Carthage, which had miſcarried at the ſame time, by ſending Roman Colonies thither, and continuing to them their old Names. While Cæſar was doing theſe things, the People of Rome was earneſtly deſirous, that the death of Craſſus, and the loſs of that Army ſhould be revenged, and they had great hope to ſubdue the Parthians.

But that in Cæſars abſence the City might not be without Magiſtrates, nor if it choſe them it ſelf, fall by that means into ſeditions, they reſolved to name all ſorts of Officers for three years; for ſo long they reckoned the Expedition would hold. Of them Cæſar, by vertue of a Law, was to name half, but indeed the whole. This year ſix Ædiles were made; of whom two Patritians called Cereales, and four Plebeians; which number continued till the time of Dio. Sixteen Prætors were created, and all the Magiſtrates deſigned that were to ſerve the following year, and for the next the Conſuls and Tribuni Plebis, but none for the third as had been intended. For theſe two years, Cæſar being ſtill to be Dictator, named two that ſhould be his Magiſtri Equitum, whereof Octavius a Youth was one, and for himſelf he appointed Dolabella to be Conſul. Antony being Conſul to the end of the preſent year, and Lepidus having given him the Government of Gallia Narbonenſis, with the neighbouring part of Spain, he made other two Magiſtri Equitum in their room. For by this means he ſatisfied thoſe to whom he was obliged. Therefore to the Colledge of fifteen Prieſts he added one, and three to that which conſiſted of ſeven Perſons.

Six Ædiles.

Sixteen Prætors.

4. Cæſar being now Conſul the fifth time, with M. Antonius (whom he much favoured, and promoted, for that in his Tribuneſhip he ſo much ſtood for him) to ſhun (a) envy in the City, thought upon making War upon the Getæ and Dacæ, which had made inrodes into Pontus and Thrace. About this time young Caſtor, the Son of Caſtor (by (b) Strabo called Saocondarius) by the Daughter of Deiotarus the King or Tetrarch of Galatia (to whom Pompey gave Armenia the Leſs, which Gift the Senate having confirmed was taken away by Cæſar, becauſe he took part with Pompey) came to Rome to accuſe his Grand-father. He was ſent by his Father and Mother, together with Phidippus a Phyſitian, and Deiotarus his Slave, who was corrupted by their promiſes to feign an accuſation againſt his Lord, that he would have killed Cæſar when he entertained him in his Tetrarchy. Deiotarus, Father, and Son, who reigned together, had at that time four Ambaſſadors in the City, who offered their own Bodies to Cæſar for the ſafety of their Maſters. But Cicero being mindful of the friendſhip and familiarity he had had with the old Man, made an Oration for him in Cæſars Houſe, wherein he premiſeth, that it was ſo unuſual a thing for a King (a real King; for as for the Kings of Lacedæmon, who were called to account by the impudent Ephori, they were indeed no Kings, having nothing but the Title, and therefore this can make nothing againſt this truth) to be queſtioned for his Life, that before that time it was never heard of. Deiotarus being acquitted by Cæſar, put to death his Daughter as ſhe had deſerved, together with her Husband Caſtor Saocondarius, that noble Chronographer, concerning whom Gerard John Voſſius is to be conſulted, in his Treatiſe of Greek Hiſtorians. Cæſar in his laſt Conſulſhip, to (c) gratifie Hyrcanus the High-Prieſt, and Ethnarcha of the Jews, as alſo the Nation, granted to him to enjoy, and govern the City of Jeruſalem as he pleaſed, which he might alſo fortifie with Walls. To the Jews he granted alſo a freedom from the charge of Portage and Toll, with an abatement of the publick Revenue in the ſecond year of letting it out to Farm. In this ſecond Julian year his Colleague (d) M. Antonius procured by a Law, that the Month Quintilis ſhould in honour of his Name be after it called July.

(a) Sueton in Julio.
Appian belli civil. lib. 2.
(b) Lib. 12. pag. 568.
Suidas in voce Κάςωρ.
Vide Gerard. Voſſium de Hiſtoricis Græcis lib. 1. ult.

King Deiotarus defended by Cicero.

(c) Joseph. Antiquit. lib. 14. cap. 17.

(d) Appian bell. civil. lib. 2.
Dio lib. 44.
Cenſorin. de die Natali cap. 9.

The Month Quintilis called July.

Dio lib. 44.

Cæſar imprudently receives too many Honours.

5. Cæſar prepared himſelf to go againſt the Parthians, but was ſent to another World by the Fury of certain Perſons who envied him his Honours, and bore it ill that he was greater than themſelves; and thereby out of concord raiſed new Seditions, and procured more Civil Wars to the Roman State. Their pretence was by cutting him off to reſtore the People to liberty; whereas, in the opinion of our Hiſtorian, they both wickedly deſtroyed him, and caſt the Common-wealth again into Seditions, when it began to make uſe of the moſt proper ſort of Government; the Sovereignty of the People having a ſpecious Name and Repute, upon the account of equality, but having nothing elſe agreeable with the Name and Repute. On the other ſide he affirms, that the Name of Monarchy might be unpleaſant to the Ear, but that it is for the benefit of all to have the Government in the Hands of a ſingle Perſon; it being an eaſier matter to have one good than many, and leſs harmful to have but one, than many bad ones to command. But ſo matters went at this time; the great ones envied Cæſar, and he through their cunning drew more envy upon himſelf. They heaped Honours upon him to make him odious, and to appear over-big, and he was ſo imprudent as to receive them, when he had as much before as amounted to Sovereign and Abſolute Authority, imagining that he was eſteemd worthy of them, as is incident to all Perſons that receive flattery. They improved this againſt him to the utmoſt, and ſtill added more and more by the weight of them to deſtroy him. They voted that he ſhould always wear even in the City a Triumphal Robe; that he ſhould always ſit in a Curule Chair, except at the celebration of Games; for then he ſhould ſit on the Bench with the Tribuni Plebis; that he ſhould hang up Opima Spolia in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, as if he had killed ſome General of the Enemies with his own Hand; that his Lictors ſhould uſe Laurel; that having finiſhed the Latin Feriæ, he ſhould from the Albanian Mount enter the City in a Chariot. Beſides, they gave him the Name of Pater Patriæ, ſtamped Money with his Image, ordered publick Sacrifices on his Birth-day, and his Statue to be ſet up in all Cities, and in all Temples at Rome. At the Roſtra they erected to him two Statues, whereof one was adorned with a Civick, and the other with an Obſidional Crown, as if he had reſcued his Fellow-Citizens from deſtruction, and delivered the City from a Siege. Moreover they raiſed a Temple to new Concord, and therein commanded an Annual Feaſt to be kept, upon this account, that he had reſtored Peace unto them.

6. Cæſar having accepted of theſe Honours, they put him upon filling up the Pontine Fenns, and digging through the Iſthmus of Peloponneſus, and building a new Curia, which ſhould be called Julia, as was one Tribe, as well as the Month on which he was born named Julius, They made him Cenſor alone for his Life; and gave him the ſame priviledge as the Tribuni Plebis enjoyed, that who ever injured him either by word or deed, ſhould be eſteemed guilty of Sacriledge, and of a piacular crime; and if he ſhould have a Son he ſhould be made Pontifex Maximus. When he had received theſe things very willingly, they added to them, that he ſhould make uſe of a gilt Chair, and they erected to him ſuch a Statue, as had been formerly raiſed to the Kings. A Guard was appointed him of Equites and Senators; every year they ordained that Vows ſhould be made publickly for his Health, that an Oath of ſwearing by his Fortune ſhould be framed; that what ever he ſhould do ſhould be confirmed; that every five years ſhould Feaſts be celebrated in his Honour as to an Heroe. Moreover they decreed a third ſort of Colledge of Prieſts, who ſhould celebrate the Lupercalia to be inſtituted and called Julii; that one of the Days of the Shows of the Gladiators ſhould be conſecrated to him, whether held at Rome, or elſewhere in Italy. Theſe things alſo pleaſing him, they commanded his Golden Chair and Golden Crown ſet with Gems (which Honour was wont to be given to their Gods) to be brought upon the Theatres by the Multitude; nay, they openly gave to him the Sirname of Jupiter, and ordained a Temple to be built to his clemency, and made Antonius the Chief Prieſt in it to preſide as ſome Flamen Dialis. While they decreed theſe things, they permitted a Sepulchre to be built for him within the Pomærium, and theſe Decrees to be written in Pillars of Silver with Golden Letters, which they placed under the feet of Jupiter Capitolinus, by which they ſufficiently admoniſhed him, and that openly, to think himſelf but a Man. At firſt they decreed him Honours, which they thought he would bear with modeſty; but after that they found he rejoyced in them, though he refuſed ſome, they heaped them one upon another, ſome out of deſire to flatter him, and others out of deſign that they might expoſe him to cenſures. For there were found ſuch as would have it permitted to him to lie with what Women he would, for he made uſe of many, though now he was above fifty years of Age. But the greater part did it upon deſign that being brought into greater envy and reprehenſion, they might the more eaſily work his deſtruction, which the event did manifeſt. And yet was he altogether ſecure, not imagining they meant him any harm, and therefore he accepted not of the Guard of Equites and Senators, but removed the Armed Attendants upon his Perſon.

Cæſar ſtill more and more incurs Odium.

7. But having incurred odium by accepting of theſe Honours, another thing happened, either through his unadviſedneſs, or by accident, which made the Load inſupportable. On a certain day when in the Senate many other, and the greateſt Honours were decreed to him, and that by conſent of all, except Caſſius and his Party (the ill will of whom towards him was ſufficiently known, and yet his clemency was ſuch, that he bore with them) the Senators came in their Body to him, to tell him what they had decreed, as he ſate in the Porch of the Temple of Venus, (for they voted in his abſence, that it might appear that they were not compelled) and he roſe not up, but ſate ſtill when the Senate preſented it ſelf. Dio tells us, That this he did, either through ſome fatal error, or not minding what he did for joy, or how it's uncertain; but it raiſed exceeding great prejudice and indignation againſt him, not only in the Senators, but the reſt of the People alſo, and gave the moſt ground for excuſe to thoſe that murdered him. For as for that Excuſe, which afterward was brought in his behalf, that he was then troubled with a Looſeneſs, and durſt not riſe for fear it ſhould come upon him, it was not believed, becauſe afterward he went to his Houſe on foot; but they concluded he ſo demeaned himſelf out of pride, and they hated him upon that account, when they themſelves had made him proud by heaping ſo many extravagant Honours upon him. There was another thing ſtill which increaſed that ſuſpition they had of him, which was, that he ſuffered himſelf to be created Perpetual Dictator; and this added ſo much to the fury of his Enemies, that now they conſpired againſt him. To puſh him further on, and to turn his very Friends againſt him, amongſt other devices, they gave him the Title of King, and ſo publiſhed him. This he indeed refuſed, and rebuked ſuch as ſaluted him by it; but for all that, doing nothing whereby he ſhewed that he took it ill, they privily put a Diadem upon his Image that ſtood by the Roſtra. This was removed from it by C. Epidius and L. Ceſitius Flaccus the Tribuni Plebis; and for that he was ſo far moved in choler againſt them, that though they ſaid nothing to his diſparagement, but praiſed him to the People as not deſiring ſuch Honours, he hardly contained himſelf from doing them miſchief. But when afterward, as he returned on Horſe-back, (in Ovation on the Latin Feriæ) ſome ſaluted him and called him King, and to which he ſaid, That he was not King, but Cæſar, and theſe ſame Tribuni Plebis ſetting the Man that firſt gave him the Title, a Day to anſwer it; he was greatly inraged againſt them, as deſigning ſomething againſt his Perſon, but yet he deferred the revenge. At length theſe ſame Perſons, by a publick Writing, complained that they were not ſuffered, neither was it ſafe for them to act freely in behalf of the Common-wealth. For this, in the greateſt diſpleaſure imaginable, he brought them into the Senate, accuſed them, and demanded Sentence againſt them, and there were not wanting who moved it ſhould be Capital; yet he ſpared their Lives, but by the aſſiſtance of Helvius Cinna their Collegue, deprived them of their Tribuneſhip, and turned them out of the Senate. Of which they pretended to be glad; for now being eaſed of the danger and burthen of their Office, they could in ſafety be lookers on.

8. This opened the Mouths of his Enemies wider than ever; that whereas he ought to have puniſhed them who called him King, he fell upon the Tribuni Plebis. And the ſuſpition of his affecting the Title was confirmed by another thing which ſhortly after happened. In the Solemnity of the Lupercalia, as he ſate at the Roſtra in his Golden Chair, adorned with a Royal Robe, and a Royal Crown, Antony with his Collegues the Prieſts, came and ſaluting him King, ſet a Diadem on his Head, and told him that the People by him preſented him with it. Cæſar only anſwered, That Jupiter alone was King of the Romans, and ſending the Diadem into the Capitol, did not blame them for ſo doing, but cauſed it to be regeſtred in the publick Acts, that he had refuſed the Kingdom offered him from the People by their Conſul. This cauſed a Belief, that the thing was done by agreement, and that Cæſar deſired the Title, but would be compelled to receive it. Such is the Account given us by Dion Caſſius concerning the hatred which he incurred, and thoſe things which procured his ſudden death, with whom other Writers agree. Plutarch attributes the main cauſe of his being mortally hated to his earneſt deſire after the Title of King, and thence, he ſaith, his Enemies took the Advantage, though it was pretended by ſome of his Friends, that it was written in the Sibylline Books how the Romans might overcome the Parthians, if they made War againſt them under a Kings Conduct, otherwiſe they were unconquerable. He adds, That when his Flatterers ſaluted him with that Title, as he returned from Alba, the People was offended, and he was angry, ſaying he was not King, but Cæſar, and every one keeping ſilence, he went home very ſorrowful. That many Honours being decreed to him in Senate, the Conſuls and Prætors, accompanied with the whole Body, went to him into the Forum, where he ſate at the Roſtra, to tell him what they had done, but he diſdained to riſe up to them, as if they had been private Men, ſaying, that his Honours had more need to be cut off than inlarged. That this did not only offend the Senate, but the People alſo, to ſee him ſlight the Magiſtracy of the Common-wealth; ſo that all that might depart went away very ſorrowfully. Thereupon he aroſe and went home to his Houſe, and tearing open his Boſome, made his Neck bare, and cried to his Friends, that he was ready to offer his Throat to any that would come and cut it. It was reported, that afterwards to excuſe his folly, he imputed it to his Diſeaſe, ſaying, That ſuch

The main cauſe of his being mortally hated.

Sect. 8.

ſuch as had the Falling-ſickneſs were not themſelves, when ſtanding on their Feet they ſpake to the People, but were ſeized with a trembling of the Body, giddineſs, and a ſudden dimneſs of ſight. But this was not true; for he would have riſen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus, one of his Flattering Friends, would not let him, bidding him remember he was Cæſar, and let them reverence him, and do their Duties.

9. Concerning the Lupercalia, Plutarch premiſeth, that in old time this Feaſt was ſaid to be the Feaſt of Shepherds or Herdſ-men, and that it was much like to that of the Lyciæans in Arcadia; That at this time in Rome it was celebrated by ſeveral young Noble-men, and ſome Magiſtrates that governed them, who ran naked through the City, ſtriking in ſport them they found in their paſſage, with Leathern Thongs, Hair and all on, to make them give way; That many Noble-women, as well as others, went on purpoſe to ſtand in their way, and put forth their Hands to be ſtrucken, perſwading themſelves, that being with Child, they ſhould have good Labour, or being barren, that it would cauſe them ſpeedily to conceive. Cæſar ſitting at the Roſtra to behold the ſport in a Golden Chair, and Triumphal Robes, Antony now Conſul being one of them that ran the Courſe, the People making him a Lane, came to Cæſar, and preſented him with a Diadem wreathed about with Laurel. Hereupon there aroſe a Cry of rejoycing, not very great, made only by a few appointed for the purpoſe. But Cæſar refuſing the Diadem, all the People ſhouted for Joy. Then did Antony offer it him again the ſecond time, and there was a ſecond ſhout of Joy; but ſtill by a few; but when he refuſed it again the ſecond time then all the whole People ſhouted. Cæſar having made this Experiment, found that the People did not like of it, and thereupon riſing, commanded the Diadem to be carried into the Capitol. Plutarch adds further, That when the Tribunes had pulled the Diadems from his Statues, and ſent to Priſon thoſe who firſt called him King, the People followed them, rejoycing at it, and called them Bruti, in memory of Brutus, who expelled Tarquinius. That Cæſar was herewith ſo offended, that he deprived them of their Tribuneſhips, and accuſing them, ſpake alſo againſt the People, calling them Bruti and Cumani; whereupon they betook themſelves to M. Brutus, who was deſcended from the former Brutus, was of as Noble a Family as any in Rome, and Son-in-law of M. Cato. Dion Caſſius writes, That he was not deſcended from that ancient Brutus the Enemy of Tarquin, who had no Children but the two Sons, Youths, whom he ſlew. Plutarch confeſſeth there was ſuch a Report; and it was ſaid that this M. Brutus was deſcended of a mean Family. But he cites the Authority of Poſidonius the Philoſopher, who wrote, that Junius Brutus ſlew indeed two of his Sons, who were Men grown, but that there was a third Son, but a little Child at that time, from whom the Family was derived; as alſo, that of this Family there were certain Famous Men in his time, who in Stature and Countenance much reſembled the Image of Junius Brutus.

The Conſpirators draw in to them M. Brutus.

10. However, the Enemies of Cæſar made uſe of the deſcent, as ſerving their purpoſe to excite him to an Act which might be ſuitable to that Original. To this purpoſe they wrote frequent Letters, ſometimes called him by Name, and ſaid they wanted another Brutus. Under the Statue of the ancient Brutus they wrote, That they wiſhed he lived; and upon the Tribunal of Marcus, where he exerciſed the Office of Prætor, Brutus thou ſleepeſt, and art not Brutus. Cæſar had been kind unto him as well as merciful, having not only pardoned him after the Battel of Pharſalum, but preferred him to the Prætorſhip, and deſigned him Conſul the fourth year after, being confident that he would not be tranſported by ambition, or any other paſſion, to do any thing ingrateful or diſhonourable. But theſe Papers and Speeches having moved him, Caſſius, who had married his Siſter, took the advantage to perſwade him againſt the Tyrant, as he termed him; not only being an Enemy to the Power of Cæſar, but alſo his Perſon. For he contended before him with Brutus for the Prætorſhip, and having heard them both, Cæſar confeſſed that Caſſius had the juſter Cauſe, but ſaid that Brutus ſhould have the Place. He hated him for denying him the firſt Place, and would not thank him for the ſecond, though he made him the ſecond Prætor. And it begat alſo a quarrel betwixt him and Brutus, though upon this occaſion, knowing how fit a Perſon one of his Reputation would be to patronize the Fact, he reconciled himſelf unto him; his Friends agreeing to the Conſpiracy, ſo as Brutus would become the chief. Brutus his thoughtfulneſs about this Affair did ſo diſturb him in the night, though he carried it wonderful cunningly in the day, and did ſo diſtract him, that Porcia his Wife perceiving it was ſome extraordinary matter, and that he would not reveal it, becauſe he thought her not able to bear Tortures, if it ſhould come to it, gave her ſelf a Wound in the Thigh, and convincing him that ſhe could endure pain, got it out of him, and confirmed him in his reſolution, as the Daughter of Cato. Many of the Conſpirators, if not moſt, had been ſome way or other obliged by Cæſar. They were above ſixty in number, and generally of Pompey's Party; but Decimus Brutus, one of his own Party, was drawn in, who had received from him extraordinary Kindneſſes, and ſhould have been Conſul the ſecond year following.

And Decimus Brutus one of his own Party.

11. The matter was in great danger of coming out, though the conſtancy of the Conſpirators was very wonderful, and Cæſar himſelf was ſo ſecure, that he would believe nothing, but puniſhed ſuch as went about to tell him any ſuch thing. They diſtruſted the Succeſs, and the greatneſs of the Enterprize cauſed them to defer it till they perceived that the Qindecimviri, who ſaid it was predicted in the Books of Sibylla, that a King was to ſubdue the Parthians, would make the report to the Senate, and require a Sentence which might be agreeable to the Prediction. This ſtartled them, eſpecially Brutus and Caſſius, and others who being Magiſtrates were to be for it, without either contradiction or ſilence, and cauſed them to put their Deſign in execution. It was reſolved it ſhould be done at an Aſſembly of the Senate, for thither Cæſar would not fail to come, and there they might alſo meet him without ſuſpition, all the Nobleſt and chiefeſt Perſons of the City being preſent. The Place was to be a Porticus joyning to the Theatre of Pompey, in which were Seats to ſit on, and wherein the City had dedicated the Statue of Pompey for his care and charge. The Time ſhould be on the Ides, or fifteenth of March, for luckily had the meeting of the Senate been on that day appointed; ſo that it ſeemed to be reſolved above, that Cæſar then ſhould die in revenge of Pompey's death. When the Day was come the Conſpirators met at the Houſe of Caſſius, to bring his Son into the Forum, who that Day was to put on his Toga Virilis, and thence they came in a Troop to the Place, and expected the coming of Cæſar. But ſuch had been the Dreams of himſelf and his Wife Calpurnia, and ſuch Omens had happened with ill Preſages in Sacrifices, and the Geſtures of the Birds, that he thought not to go out of his Houſe, being alſo indiſpoſed, but to ſend Antony to adjourn the Senate. The Conſpirators fearing the Conſequence of this delay, ſent away to him Decimus Brutus his great Friend, as he was accounted, (and ſo great a Friend by Cæſar himſelf, that in his laſt Will and Teſtament he had appointed him to be his next Heir) to draw him into the Snare. He laughed the Sooth-ſayers to ſcorn, and told Cæſar he would affront the Senate, or make them believe he did ſo, conſidering that by his commandment they were aſſembled, ready to grant him all things, and to declare him King of all the Provinces out of Italy, in which he ſhould wear his Diadem in all Places both by Sea and Land. He asked him what the World would ſay, if the Senators ſhould be told, that they muſt depart, and come again when Calpurnia ſhould have better Dreams? He urged, that they would think and ſpeak of him as a Tyrant; and if he could not be reconciled to the Day, that he would go himſelf in Perſon, and diſmiſs the Senate. With this he took him by the Hand, and treacherouſly brought him out of his Houſe.

Who draws him into the Snare.

12. In his way ſome that met him indeavoured to reveal the Conſpiracy, and amongſt the reſt one put a Bill into his Hand, containing the whole Matter, which he had learnt being familiar with Brutus his Confederates. Perceiving him to give all the Petitions that were preſented him to his Men about him, he prayed him to read it himſelf, and that ſpeedily, for it contained things of weight, which concerned him nearly. He took it of him with much ado, (for he got near to him, notwithſtanding the Croud, which others could not) but could never read it for the Multitude of Perſons that ſaluted him, but held it ſtill in his Hand, till he came to the Place of the Aſſembly. However this happened, whether by reaſon of the diverſion he had by the Croud, or his own neglect; ſo ſecure and careleſs he was, that ſeeing one who had bid him beware of this Day, he jeſted at him, and asking him what was become of his Predictions, ſaid the Day was come, and he was ſafe; to which the Man replied, That indeed it was come, but not ended. Some of the Conſpirators would have had Antony and Lepidus alſo ſlain; but for Antony, Brutus, who indeed moſt generous of any of them, interceded, hoping, he ſaid, he would become a better Man, and joyn with them for Liberty, when he ſhould ſee Cæſar taken

UMI

And diverts Antony.

taken away. And it was agreed, that leſt by killing many they ſhould give occaſion to ſay, that what they did was not out of love to the publick Liberty, but for Rule and Domination, that they ſhould not be killed, and they pretended they would be ſatisfied with Cæſars Death. Now Lepidus was with the Army in the adjoyning Country, but Antony was in Town, and they reſolved that he was by no means to be ſuffered to be preſent. Therefore when Cæſar went into the Houſe, Decimus Brutus (Dio ſaith Trebonius) took him aſide, and diverted him from going in with a long Story.

While Cæſar is murdered.

13. Cæſar coming in, all the Senators ſtood up to do him reverence. Being ſate, they came about his Chair, and Cimber Tullius firſt applied himſelf to him, pretending to petition him to call home his Brother from baniſhment. He denying his Suit, and putting him off till another time, they all came about him, and began to move him, but he rejecting them, and in diſpleaſure putting them away from him, Cimber took his Gown and pulled it from his Shoulders, which was the Sign given to his Companions. Cæſar cried out, that this was violence, and then Caſca ſtanding behind him, ſtruck him on the Neck with his Sword, but the Wound was not great nor mortal. Cæſar turning ſtraight, catcht hold of his Sword, and, ſome ſay, ſtruck him in the Arm with his Writing Inſtrument, and both cried out, Cæſar in Latin, O vile Caſca, what doſt thou, and Caſca in Greek to his Brother, Brother help me. Then did Cæſar indeavour to break from them, but was hindered by one ſtroak after another, for they compaſſed him in on every ſide, and he could turn him no where but he was ſtrucken at by ſome, and ſtill had naked Swords in his Face, and was hacked and mangled among them, as a Wild Beaſt taken by Hunters. Seeing this, and that Brutus amongſt the reſt made at him, who gave him a Wound under his Belly, he ſtrugled no more, but covered his Head with his Gown, and with his Left Hand drew his Skirts down to his Knees, that he might fall decently; and down he fell at the Baſe whereon Pompey's Image ſtood, which all ran of gore Blood, till he was ſlain. The Report was, that he had three and twenty Wounds upon his Body, though none mortal but the ſecond on his Breaſt; for it was agreed amongſt them, that every one ſhould give him a Wound, becauſe all their Hands ſhould be in the Murder, and divers of the Conſpirators were hurt, ſo many ſtriking at one Body. But to ſo violent and bloody a Death came this great Man, one of the greateſt Spirit and Preſence of Mind that we can read of, and yet of a courteous and merciful Diſpoſition, in the fifty ſixth Year of his Age. He who had fought fifty Battels, and procured the Death of a Million and one hundred ninety two thouſand Perſons, as Pliny reckoneth, in that Senate which he himſelf for the moſt part had choſen, in the Court of Pompey, and at the Feet of Pompey's Statue, ſo many of his Officers looking on, but not ſtirring, with ſuch confuſion were they ſtruck at the ſight, by the hands of moſt Noble Citizens, many of whom he had to his utmoſt gratified; and ſo lay he, the Tumult and Confuſion being ſo great, that for ſome time not a Friend nor Slave came near his Body, till at length it was by three of his meaneſt Slaves put into a Litter, and carried home, his Arm hanging out.

Lib. 7. c. 15.

14. So great a Man he was, that Plutarch * being judge, there was none of the greateſt, and moſt admired Captains, to whom the Gallick War alone did not demonſtrate him equal in Commendations, both as General, and as a Soldier. For, whether we conſider the Fabii, Scipioes, Metelli, his Contemporaries, or thoſe that went before him, as, Sylla, Marius, and both the Luculli, and even him whoſe Glory for all Warlike Abilities reacheth to the Skies, Pompey himſelf, the Actions of Cæſar excel all their Exploits. For, ſometimes he obtained greater Glory, for the inconvenience of the Places wherein he made War, ſometimes for the greatneſs of the Countries which he ſubdued, ſometimes for the multitude and ſtrength of his Enemies overthrown, ſometimes for the perfidiouſneſs and barbariſm of the Nations ſubdued, ſometimes for clemency ſhewed to the Conquered, or other-whiles for his Liberality towards his Fellow-Soldiers; but always in reſpect of the number of Battels, and of thoſe that were ſlain. For having carried on the War in Gall not fully ten years, he took above eight hundred Cities, ſubdued three hundred ſeveral ſorts of People, and having ingaged at ſeveral times with three Millions of Men, killed the third part, and took the other alive. So great was the affection of his Soldiers

* In Cæſare.

His Character.

diers to him, and their care to pleaſe him, that whereas otherwiſe they were nothing better than others, yet being invincible for his credit, they would not refuſe any danger. This diſpoſition in them he firſt bred, and then maintained, by conferring Honours and Rewards upon them, wherein he ſpared nothing; then by undertaking all dangers with them, and refuſing no labour. His boldneſs indeed, and courage, conſidering that it proceeded from incredible deſire of Glory, they admired not ſo much; but his labour and toil which he indured above his ſtrength did aſtoniſh them. For, he was of a thin habit of Body, pale and tender, had a ſickly Head, and was ſubject to the Falling-ſickneſs, or Epilepſie, which firſt took him at Corduba. But he took not an occaſion of lazineſs from his want of health, but by Expeditions, moſt difficult Journeys, ſlenderneſs of Diet, and by continuing abroad in the open Air, ſought to drive away his Diſeaſe, and keep his Body healthful. Moſt commonly he ſlept as he was carried in his Chariot or Litter, ſo that his ſleep was not idle. On the day time he was carried about the Forts, Cities and Camps, with a Boy ſitting by him, who wrote down what he dictated, and a Soldier with a Sword ſtanding at his Back. He made ſo great Journeys, that in his firſt Expedition from Rome, in eight Incampings he came to the River Rhodanus. From his Childhood he had learn'd and practiſed riding, ſo that putting his Hands behind him upon his Back, he would ſit an Horſe in his full ſpeed, which was very much for one that had his Diſeaſe. Moreover, in that Expedition he exerciſed himſelf ſo, that riding, he would dictate ſeveral Letters to two Secretaries or more. He was a Man ambitious of Power, and unſatisfied with any thing on this ſide Sovereignty, but Victory pleaſed him, not revenge nor cruelty, in which reſpect Cicero, to note his ambition, and yet acknowledge his goodneſs of Nature, compared him to Piſiſtratus.

Vide Appia. ut ſupra. Patercul. l. 2. c. 58. Dionem l. 44.

15. The Conſpirators conſcious of the greatneſs of the Fact, fearing the worſt, ſecured themſelves in the Capitol, it being in the Senate ſtrongly debated, how it ſhould look upon the thing, and conſequently upon them. But for Antonius the Conſul (who alſo reſolved when he ſhould be able, to puniſh it, though now he betrayed no ſuch intention) the Fact had been approved of, as done upon an Uſurper and a Tyrant, though they had not long before taken a Solemn Oath for his Preſervation, and decreed ſuch vaſt Honours to him. Antonius by putting them in mind, that if he were judged deſervedly ſlain, all his Acts were to be nulled, and conſequently the aſſignment of ſeveral Offices, which he had of late made to ſeveral of them, effected that no more was done than to decree an Amneſtie or Oblivion for all that was paſt, for which Cicero much laboured. The Offices were confirmed with this reaſon entered, becauſe it was requiſite for the good of the Common-wealth, and the day following the Senate meeting again, decreed Provinces to the Murderers, viz. to M. Brutus Crete, Africk to Caſſius, to Trebonius Aſia, to Cimber Bithynia, and Gall about Padus to Decimus Brutus. After this, Cæſar's Teſtament was opened, wherein he made Heirs three Nephews of his Siſters, C. Octavius of three parts in four of his Eſtate, (not of half only, as it's found in Livy's Epitome) and L. Pinarius and Q. Pedius of the other fourth part. G. Octavius he adopted into his Name and Family, and moſt of thoſe that killed him he named amongſt the Guardians of his Son, if one ſhould be born to him. As ſecond Heirs, if the former ſhould not poſſeſs the Inheritance, he named Decimus Brutus and M. Antonius. He alſo in his Will gave no ſmall matter to the Romans, to be divided Man by Man, as Plutarch writeth. This moved the People out of meaſure to indignation againſt the Conſpirators, Antonius the Conſul vehemently ſtirring up the multitude in his Funeral Oration. They were driven to that rage, that after the burning of the Corps they were hardly diſſwaded from firing their Houſes, and they tore in pieces one Cinna, whom they miſtook for another of that Name that was one of them.

An Amneſtie voted by the Senate.

Sueton. in Julio. Flor. l. 4. c. 4.

Cæſar's Teſtament.

16. Now the ſeries of Affairs bringeth us to Cæſar Octavianus, the adopted Son of Julius. He was Grand-ſon to his Siſter Julia, which Woman was Wife to M. Attilius Balbus, and by him had a Daughter that was married to C. Octavius. He was born in the Conſulſhip of Cicero, and loſt his Father (who governing Macedonia, died ſuddenly before he could ſtand for the Conſulſhip) when but four years old. He accompanied this his great Uncle in the laſt Spaniſh War, who ever kept him cloſe to him in their Travel, and was now ſent Octavius his Heir.

Appian de bello civili l. 3. Sueton. in Auguſto. Dio l. 45.

Sect. 8.

by him to Apollonia to ſtudy, intending to take him along with him in the Parthian War. There he heard of his death, and the Inheritance left to him. His Mother and Father-in-law Marcius Philippus, were unwilling he ſhould take the Name of Cæſar, as ſubject to much envy; but after ſome pauſe he reſolved to the contrary, and aſſuming the Name of Cæſar Octavianus, made uſe of the good affections of his Uncles Friends in Greece, who accompanying him to the City, he was met by a vaſt number of others from Rome. Here, after he had accepted of the Adoption, and confirmed it by the Authority of the Prætor as the Cuſtom was, he went to Antony, whom he expected to have his Friend and Aſſiſtant in proſecuting his Uncles Enemies. But after ſome waiting, he entertained him with great contempt, and though he had got a great quantity of Cæſar's Money, yet he denied to let him have any, fearing he ſhould grow into too much eſteem. Cæſar hereupon ſold his own Inheritance to pay the Legacy given to the People, which procured him much love, his Uncles (or Fathers, as now he muſt be called) old Soldiers flocked to him, whom he accepted of out of fear of Antony, who now every day became more odious, both to him, to People and Senate.

Purchaſeth the love of the People.

Appian. Livii Epitom. lib. 117. Dio l. 45.

Antony practiſeth for his own advancement.

17. The Senate ſuſpected Antony as intending to ſet up himſelf, and he intended nothing more, for which cauſe he reſolved to have ſome Province aſſigned to him, wherein he might get Power. To curry favour then he propounded to be conſidered Sextus Pompey, who yet remained of the Sons of Pompey the Great, (that beloved Man) that in requital for his Fathers Eſtate confiſcated, he might have an allowance out of the Publick, and command of the Seas, with that Navy he formerly had. This being received with great applauſe, was enacted; and ſo Pompey was called back into Sicily, where he afterwards waged a great War againſt Cæſar. Antony perſwaded Dolabella his Collegue, (a young Man whom Cæſar having ordained to be Conſul after his departure out of the City, when he was dead, took the Office, and inveighing againſt his Benefactor, would have had the day of his death ſtiled the Birth-day of the City) though he loved him not, to ask Syria, not of the Senate, but the People, hoping that after him he ſhould not be denied ſuch a requeſt. The difference increaſing betwixt him and Cæſar, he deſired to have the ſix Legions which lay in Macedonia, and obtained them, deceiving the Senate by a falſe rumour, that the Getes hearing of Cæſar's death, had invaded that Province. He baited them, by preferring a Law againſt any one's being Dictator. It was his deſign to bring theſe Legions over into Italy to awe and command all, and that he might effect this, he preferred by force a Law for changing of Provinces, and thereby procured to his Brother C. Antonius Macedonia, which formerly had been aſſigned to M. Brutus, and to himſelf the nearer Gall, (or Gallia Ciſalpina) which before was given to Decimus Brutus.

18. The Senate would in no wiſe grant this, whereupon he betook himſelf to the People. When he had brought over his Legions, part of them revolted to Cæſar, who now out of fear went up and down Italy, gathering Soldiers out of the Colonies his Father had planted. With a conſiderable Army at length Antony marched into Gall, whence he commanded Brutus to be gone, who gave way to him then, but departed to Mutina, reſolving there to ſtay and endure a Siege, for that he had ſome conſiderable ſtrength, and expected Aſſiſtance. Here Antony ſtraightly beſieged him, which the Senate hearing of, by Cicero's working eſpecially, (who now began to ſpeak and write his fourteen Orations, in imitation of thoſe of Demoſthenes, called Philipicks) declared him an Enemy to the State, which proved a means for the bringing in and preferring of Cæſar Octavianus. For though the Senate cared not at all for him, as being generally of Pompey's Faction, yet they reſolved to make uſe of him for his Armies ſake, and therefore erected him a Statue, made him a Senator, though but nineteen years old, decreed, that he ſhould be conſidered towards preferment as ten years older, and gave him equal Power with Hirtius and Pauſa the Conſuls, whom now they ſent to relieve Brutus. They took Bononia; but Antony being bold, for that he had got the better in ſome Skirmiſhes, went and met Pauſa, whom he overthrew, but returning careleſly into his Camp, was worſted by Hirtius. A little after a great Battle was fought near Mutina, wherein Antony was quite defeated, and fled to Lepidus then Proconſul in the further Gall. Both the Conſuls died of Wounds; Hirtius in Antony's

The hatred of him procureth young Cæſar's preferment.

Appian ut ſupra. Dio l. 46. Plutarch. in Antonio. Cicero Philip. 5. Sueton. in Octavio.

A. M. 3962. V. C. 712.

tony's Camp, and Pauſa at Bononia. Brutus being at this time ſpared by Cæſar, thought of departing with his ten Legions to M. Brutus and Caſſius, now in Greece, but his Soldiers, moved by the difficulty of the Journey, revolted, the ſix new raiſed Legions to Cæſar, and the four of old Soldiers to Antony. He then purpoſing with a ſmall Attendance to paſs through Gall, was taken at Aquilea, and betrayed by Capenus Sequanus, Governour of the Country, who ſent his Head to Antony. Before this, Trebonius, another of his Complices in Cæſar's death, excluding Dolabella (whom the Senate had judged an Enemy) from Pergamus and Smyrna, was taken by him in the latter Place, and after grievous torments, had his Head cut off, which the Soldiers kicking about as a Foot-ball, did ſo abuſe, as no Face was to be ſeen on it. Not long after the Death of Decimus Brutus, Minutius Baſilius, another of the Conſpirators, was ſlain by his Slaves, whom he had gelded in a great rage.

Appian.
Livius l. 120.
Cicero.
Philip. 11.

Yet having no need of Cæſar, the Senate again ſlighted him,

19. Now the Senate having no need of young Cæſar, ſlighted him exceedingly, decreeing the Honour due to him unto Brutus, whom he had relieved, giving him very bitter taunts, and denying him a Triumph. Being ſenſible hereof, and how moſt of them were of Pompey's Faction, he began to tamper with Antony by Letters, as alſo with Lepidus, for a Conjunction, and ſent four hundred Soldiers into the City, in the Name of the Army, to demand the Conſulſhip for him. Hereat the Senate ſtraining hard, one Cornelius a Centurion laying his Hand upon his Sword, ſaid, This ſhall do it, if you will not. Then called he Antony and Lepidus into Italy, whereat the Senate much ſtartled, and too late blaming their own rigidity, decreed him Conſul, and whomſoever he would take to himſelf. So he invaded the Conſulſhip, a month and five days before he was twenty years old, and took Q. Pedius for his Collegue. Then by a Law was Fire and Water forbidden to all that had an Hand in the death of Cæſar, and their Goods were ſold. The Senate was now ſo changed, either through good advice or fear, that in ſtead of ſlighting, they advanced him above all example. They reſolved, that after his Conſulſhip he ſhould take place of all Conſuls, and though formerly they were diſpleaſed with his levying Forces, being a private Man; now they deſired him to add to his Army, and decreed to him the Legions of Decimus Brutus. The City was committed to his care, and Power given him to act what he pleaſed, though without the preſcript of the Laws, which he retained fifty ſix years till his death. Not long after came Æmilius Lepidus and M. Antonius into Italy, whom he met about Bononia, and after a three days conference entered into a Confederacy with them, which is famous by the Name of the Triumvirate.

Appian ut ſupra.
Livius l. 119.
Sueton. in Auguſto.
Patercul. l. 2. c. 62.
Livii Epitom. lib. 120.
Vide Dionem lib. 46.

Which procureth the Triumvirate.

Livii Epit. l. 120.
Appian bell. civil. l. 4.

The Terms of the Combination.

20. The terms of this Combination were, That Cæſar, for the remainder of the Year, ſhould leave the Conſulſhip to Ventidius, who formerly in the Social War, when a Boy, was led in Triumph, and after that rubbed the heels of * Mules for his living. That a new Authority of three Men ſhould be erected to take away civil diſſentions; which they three ſhould execute for five years with Conſular Power, (for, the Dictatorſhip was waved, becauſe of a Law lately preferred againſt it by Antony) with Authority to diſpoſe of all Offices for that Term. That Antony ſhould have, as a Province, all Gall, except that of Narbon, which Lepidus was to have with Spain; and to Cæſar was Africk, with Sardinia and Sicily, aſſigned; other Places beyond the Seas being left to another time. They agreed further, That their Enemies ſhould be deſtroyed, wherein the Caſe of Cicero moved the greateſt Controverſie. For Antony would not meddle, except he in the firſt place ſhould be ſlain; Lepidus was content, but Cæſar ſtood much againſt it, yet on the third day he aſſented, an exchange being made; for he yielding up Cicero, Lepidus permitted his Brother Paulus, and Antony L. Cæſar, his Uncle by the Mother's ſide, to be proſcribed. Laſtly, it was agreed, That Lepidus ſhould be Conſul the following Year, in ſtead of Decimus Brutus, deſigned formerly by Julius Cæſar. He guarding Rome and Italy, the other two were to make War upon Brutus and Caſſius, who now (though at firſt without any Decree of the Senate) had ſeized on Macedonia and Syria. Caſſius in Laodicea beſieged Dolabella, who being judged an Enemy by the Senate for the death of Trebonius, when the City was taken cauſed his Page to cut off his Head, and ſo ended his Life, being a Man of no great ſolidity. He was Son-in-law to Cicero; but after the divorcing of Tullia they fell into great enmity, whereupon the Orator proved a

Idem ibid.
Dio lib. 46.

* Concurrite omnes Augures, Aruſpices. Portentum inuſitatum conflatum eſt recens, Nam mulos qui fricabat Conſul factus eſt.

These Verſes were ſcattered up and down the City.

Gellius lib. 5. cap. 4.

back Friend to him in the Senate, reigning amongſt the Fathers and the People with his Eloquence.

The effects of it.

Appian.

21. The firſt effect of the Triumvirate was a Proſcription of ſome three hundred Perſons of Equeſtrian and Senatorian Ranks. Though the pretence was to revenge Cæſar's Death, yet many were murdered for their rich Eſtates, others out of malice, and ſome for their convenient Houſes and Gardens. Amongſt thoſe of greateſt note was Varro, who now living to ſee and feel a ſecond Tricipitina, yet eſcaped with his Life. Cicero the Man moſt aimed at by Antony for oppoſing him ſo vehemently in the Senate, upon the Triumvirs their coming went to Sea; but the Winds being contrary, and becauſe he could not endure the ſhaking of the Ship, he returned, ſaying, He would die in his Country often preſerved by him. Being weary both of his Flight and Life, he came to a Village a little more than a Mile diſtant from the Sea. Here his Servants, terrified by ſeveral Prodigies, partly by perſwaſion, and partly by Force, put him again in his Litter, and were carrying him back to the Sea, when hearing of thoſe that came to ſeek for him, he cauſed the Litter to be ſet down, and quietly ſtretched out his Neck to Popilius Lænas, whom formerly by his Oratory he had ſaved from Condemnation. He ill-favouredly enough cut off his Head and Hands, which he preſented to Antony, and for ſo doing received a great Reward. After the Head had been ſufficiently gazed on by him and his Wife Fulvia, (who ſet on her Knees, pulled out the Tongue, and pricking it with Needles, otherwiſe ſhamefully ſhewed her ſpite) it was to the grief of all Men ſet up in the Pleading Place, or Roſtra. To ſuch an end came this moſt Famous Man, the Father of Roman Eloquence. He was born at Arpinum, on the third of the Nones of January, in the 648 year of the City, C. Atilius Serranus, and Q. Servilius Cæpio, being Conſuls, the ſame wherein Pompey the Great was born, on the Calends of October. His Father was of Equeſtrian Rank, and iſſued, as ſome ſaid, from Tullius Attius, a Noble King of the Volſci. He firſt deſerved the Triumph of the Gown, and the Laurel of the Tongue. And as Cæſar the Dictator wrote of him, he obtained a Laurel greater than all Triumphs, (though he had one decreed to him for his good Service in the Field) by how much the more 'tis a greater and more excellent thing to inlarge the Bounds of Roman Wit, than of Empire. He died on the ſeventh of December, when he had lived ſixty three years, eleven months, and five days. His Brother Quintus and his Sons were ſlain, but his own eſcaped; for that he had ſent him before-hand unto Athens.

Plutarch in Cicerone.

Cicero ſlain,

Paterculus l. 2. cap. 66.
Plinius lib. 7. cap. 30.

And many others.

Idem.

22. All Places in the City were full of Slaughters. The ordinary rate of one Head brought to the Triumvirs, if by a Free-man, was one hundred thouſand Seſterces; if by a Slave, half ſo much, with the Liberty of the City. This corrupted many, ſo as forgetting both Duty and Natural Affection, they betrayed thoſe for whoſe preſervation they ought to have laboured. Yet now many rare, and admirable Examples, of the Love of Wives to their Husbands, and of Slaves to their Maſters, appeared; feweſt of Children towards their Parents. Yet Oppius his Act ſeemeth to ſtand for many, who, Æneas like, carried out his old and decrepit Father, and conveyed him to the Sea, ſometimes leading, and ſometimes carrying him on his Back, till they both eſcaped into Sicily, whence afterwards returning, the People, out of a ſenſe of his Piety, made him Ædilis, and for that he wanted Money to ſet out the uſual Games, the Artificers willingly wrought for him without Wages, and the Spectators by a Contribution made him rich. Of ſuch proſcribed Perſons as eſcaped, ſome fled to Brutus and Caſſius, who received them kindly; but moſt of them to Sextus Pompey now in Sicily, who ſent out Veſſels to hover upon the Coaſts for them, and furniſhed them, when came over, with Neceſſaries. But the Triumvirs wanting great Sums for carrying on the War againſt Caſſius and Brutus, by reaſon that few would buy Confiſcated Eſtates, condemned alſo, though not the Perſons, yet the Goods of many Rich Women, as well as Men.

The Triumvirs condemn the Eſtates of women to get Money.

Idem.

23. Caſſius, after he had got Syria into his Power, thought of making an Expedition into Ægypt againſt Cleopatra, (who now was going with a great Power to the Aid of Cæſar, and his Followers) but was recalled by Brutus; for that Antony and Cæſar (who having attempted ſomething againſt Ptolomy in Sicily, put it now off till another time) were coming againſt them with forty Legions, whereof eight had already paſſed the Ionian Sea. Therefore leaving Plutarch. in M. Bruto.

And Caſſius and Brutus take extravagant courſes for Treaſure.

Syria to his Brothers Son with one Legion, he ſent ſome into Cappadocia, who killed Ariobarzanes, as one that had conſpired againſt him, and brought him a Maſſe of Money. Exacting Money with much rigour, he came into Aſia, and meeting Brutus at Smyrna, they conſulted about the War. Brutus moved that they ſhould paſs over into Macedonia, and there encounter their Enemies; but Caſſius prevailed that the Rhodians and Lycians ſhould firſt be reduced, who refuſed to contribute any thing, and were powerful at Sea. It ſeeming good not to leave any Enemy at their back, this was performed, and vaſt Sums of Money by that, and other means raiſed. The Xanthians ſtanding out, as they had done in former times againſt Cyrus and Alexander, were ſcarce any of them left alive; and the Rhodians had little beſides their Lives left unto them.

Oroſius lib. 6. cap. 18.

The two Parties meet at Philippi.

Appian belli civil. lib. 4. Plutarch. in Antonio. Florus l. 4. c. 7. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 70. Livii Epitom. lib. 124.

24. After this, both the Armies met at Philippi, that City of Macedonia, to which, being built by Philip to reſtrain the Thracians, as we have formerly ſhewn, St. Paul wrote his Epiſtle. Here appeared on either ſide nineteen Legions. Antony and Cæſar brought into the Field thirteen thouſand Horſe; but Brutus and Caſſius twenty thouſand, who coming thither firſt, incamped on a high and convenient Ground near the Sea, whence they could have Proviſions in abundance. The other Party was exceedingly ſtraightned for Neceſſities, having only Macedonia and Theſſaly open to it, for that Pompey cut off all entercourſe from Africk, as Marcus and Ænobarbus from Italy, by their Navies. This made Antony deſirous to fight above meaſure, which the Enemy knowing well enough, refuſed to ingage, till Antony making a way through a Fen to intercept his Proviſions, and a Work being raiſed by Caſſius againſt him, this procured a Fight, wherein Caſſius had the worſt on his part, and his Camp was taken by Antony. On the other ſide Cæſar's Wing was worſted, and his Camp alſo taken by Brutus. Caſſius departing to an Hill not far off, expected the event of the Fight on his Partners ſide, and becauſe, for the Duſt, he could not diſcern what Horſe it was that made towards him, ſent Titinius to diſcover. He being received with Joy by thoſe that were bringing Tidings of Victory, ſtayed ſo long, till Caſſius, fearing the worſt, and that the Meſſenger was intercepted, killed himſelf, or cauſed his Libertus, or Freed-man, to cut off his Head. Scarcely was it fal'n, when Titinius coming, followed him by his own Hands, whom, as he ſaid, he had killed by loitering.

Caſſius killeth himſelf out of miſapprehenſion.

Appian ut ſupra. Dio lib. 47. Plutarch. in M. Bruto. Patercul. ut prius. Livius l. 124.

25. Brutus preſently cauſed his Collegues Body to be buried out of ſight, leſt the Army ſhould be dejected; and then had no mind to fight, deſiring rather to ſtarve the Enemy, who now was in deſperate condition by want of Neceſſaries, till fearing a defection, for that ſome had revolted already, or till being forced by the earneſtneſs of his Soldiers he led them out to Battle. Both Parties, though Country-men, were ſo greedy of ingaging, that they neglected to uſe any miſſive Weapons, and betook themſelves to their Swords, fighting with great animoſity, till at length Brutus his ſide was born down, and put to the rout. He eſcaped to an Hill, where remaining all night, when in the morning he ſaw no way of eſcaping, (Antony having made him ſure, leſt he ſhould renew the War) he ſet his Swords point to his left Pap, where the motion of the Heart is felt, and forcing it into his Breaſt, expired. This was the end of theſe two Men, by the ſame Weapons, as ſome write, wherewith they killed Cæſar, who had given them their Lives, and received them into favour after the Battle of Pharſalum. While they ſought liberty by his death, by that very means they loſt that which they accounted ſuch, being indeed no other than a liberty for the common ſort to run into extravagancies, and for particular Men to abuſe their credulity, and by flattery to procure Power, which they then would improve (even Pompey himſelf, as well as Sylla, Cinna, Marius and Cæſar) further than their Commiſſions extended. With them periſhed the hopes of that called a Common-wealth, which thenceforth never was more ſeen. As for the ſucceeding Bickerings which the Triumviri had with young Pompey, they were but inconſiderable in compariſon of this War with Caſſius and Brutus, who having under their Power all the Roman Empire from Macedonia to the River Euphrates, with above twenty Legions, twenty thouſand Horſe, two hundred long Ships, and infinite Sums of Money, ſo long as they remained, the Common-wealth ſeemed (though not at Rome) as yet to be ſurviving.

And Brutus after a defeat.

A. M. 3963.
Ol. 185. ann. 3.
V. C. 712.
Hyrcani 22.
Ante Chriſt. 40.

Appian.

Sect. 8.

Cæſar returneth to Rome.

Appian belli civil. lib. 5. Plutarch. in Antonio. Dio lib. 48.

26. Cæſar being indiſpoſed, (for he had not his health this Expedition, and therefore was not in the firſt Fight) returned into Italy. Antony went into Aſia to gather up Money for the payment of Largeſſes promiſed to the Soldiers. Here he ſqueezed out of the poor Inhabitants that little which was left them by Caſſius and Brutus, the Followers of whom he alſo reſtored as he met with them, except ſuch as had an hand in Cæſar's death. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra Queen of Ægypt, on whom he preſently doated, having formerly had much affection for her when yet a Girl, at ſuch time as he accompanied Gabinius into that Kingdom. Thither he now followed her, having firſt ſent a Party of Horſe to plunder Palmyra, a Town ſituate near Euphrates, and laid moſt heavy Tributes and Impoſitions upon the Provinces. After Cæſar had recovered, according to their agreement at parting he ſet himſelf to divide Lands to the Army in Italy, which hereby was put into a great combuſtion, the number of Soldiers being ſo great, that multitudes of Inhabitants were turned out, and many Towns emptied to give place to thoſe new comers, who committed many outrages, and had not purchaſed thoſe Lands by any Service to the State, (as was complained) but by ſerving to inthrall it to the Dominion of three Men. Fulvia, the Wife of Antony, and Lucius his Brother, now Conſul, envied Cæſar this popularity with the Soldiers, and contended earneſtly that they ought to ſettle the Soldiers of Antony, which was granted. But herewith not contented, they reſolved to proſecute him with War. She, for that ſhe deſired her Husband might be recalled thereby from Cleopatra, concerning whom ſhe had too much cauſe to be jealous of him; and he, out of deſire to innovate, pretending an indeavour to ſuppreſs the Triumvirate, and to reduce the ancient form of Government, and truſting much to the ſtrength of his Brother.

Antony followeth Cleopatra into Ægypt.

A. M. 3964. V. C. 713.

The Peruſian War betwixt Cæſar, and the Brother and Wife of Antony.

Appian.

27. Much ado was made to reconcile them, but to no purpoſe. The ancient Poſſeſſors of the Grounds flocked to Lucius, and the new ones to Cæſar, to whom Salvidienus coming out of Gall with great ſtrength, Lucius went to oppoſe him, but was diverted by Agrippa, and reduced to ſuch ſtraights betwixt them two, (though Ventidius and Aſinius, two of Antonie's Captains, were not far off) that glad he was to betake himſelf for ſecurity to Peruſia a ſtrong Town, where he was cloſely beſieged by Cæſar and his Party. He ſtood out very courageouſly, till forced by famine to yield to mercy; then coming out firſt, and caſting himſelf into Cæſar's Hands, he interceded for his Soldiers, and deſired all the blame might be upon himſelf: He was received honourably, and his Soldiers were pardoned at the deſire of their Enemies. The Town was to be plundred, but by a mad-man, who ſet his own Houſe on fire, and therein periſhed, it was burnt down to the ground. About this time was the firſt Eclog of Virgil written (who now was ſome twenty eight years old) during the diviſion of thoſe Lands, as clearly appeareth from it: The above-mentioned L. Antonius and P. Servilius Iſauricus being Conſuls, in the 713*th* year of the City, and the third of the Triumvirate.

A. M. 3965. V. C. 714.

Vide Servium in locum.

Appian.

Cæſar provideth for the worſt.

28. After the Peruſian War (for ſo 'tis called) Cæſar ſuſpecting Antonies affection towards him; to ſtrengthen himſelf ſeized on Spain and Gall, though his Provinces, taking occaſion at the death of his Lieutenant, whereby being forty Legions ſtrong, he was able to grapple with him if need ſhould require. But having no Shipping, he was at a loſs as to Sea-matters, and therefore married Scribonia the Siſter of Libo, Father-in-law to Sextus Pompey, from whom he hoped by this alliance if need were to obtain Peace. Antony this Spring moved from Alexandria, where he had lived all Winter very looſely with Cleopatra, as againſt the Parthians, who now under conduct of Labienus had over-run Syria as far as Tyre. Though this Town was ſet upon by them, and he pretended he would relieve it, yet he did not, alledging a neceſſity of going to the War againſt Pompey, who now hindred all Proviſions from coming to the City, and thereby cauſed a great dearth: And he again excuſed himſelf why he came no ſooner to that againſt Pompey, becauſe he was retained by the Parthian War. Sailing then into Aſia, he had news of the event of the Peruſian War, and blamed much his Wife and Brother; whence paſſing into Greece he met with her, and his Mother Julia, whom Pompey having taken now ſent ſafe to him. Thence he ſailed over the Ionian Sea, where Ænobarbus delivered up all his Fleet and Forces to him; and ſo they came to Brunduſium, where they were kept out by a Garriſon placed there by Cæſar.

Antonies carriage in the Eaſt.

Dio lib. 48.

29. This

The Triumvirs fall out.

Appian.

Are reconciled, and a new agreement is made.

A great Famine cauſed by Sextus Pompey.

Procureth an agreement with him.

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 14. c. 26.

29. This made ſuch a breach betwixt them, that Antony blocked up the Town, and procured Pompey from Sicily to invade Italy. Cæſar came to Brunduſium, where the old Soldiers being unwilling to fight againſt Antony, the Army laboured to reconcile the Triumvirs, which Cocceius, friend to both, at length effected with much labour; Pollio on Antonie's ſide, and Mæcenas on Cæſar's, as Delegates making up the breach. All offences were mutually to be forgiven, and for that Marcellus, Husband to Octavia Cæſar's Siſter, was now dead, and alſo Fulvia Antonie's Wife, for grief that he neglected her, Antony married Octavia. Then was the Roman Empire divided betwixt them, the Bounds of their Dominions being Codropolis, a Town of Illyricum, all from it Weſtward being to obey Cæſar, and all Eaſtward Antony. Africk was left to Lepidus, who now was even no body, and having offended Cæſar, had been confined by him to that Province. The War againſt the Parthians was judged to Antony, and that againſt Pompey (who muſt needs now be ſuppreſſed) unto Cæſar. Antony ſent Ventidius into Aſia to reſtrain the Parthians, who now had made an incurſion as far as Ionia. But out of Sardinia did Menodorus Pompey's Admiral the ſecond time eject Helenus Cæſar's Captain, whereupon Cæſar refuſed to hearken to Antony, when he moved him to be reconciled unto Pompey. Both the Triumvirs (or rather now the Duumvirs) being come to the City, were received with moſt lamentable complaints of Poor People, ready to ſtarve for want of Proviſions, which Pompey hindered from coming, from the Eaſt by Sicily, from the Weſt by Sardinia and Corſica, which he had in his Power, and from Africk by his Navy alſo, which then was moſt powerful at Sea. Cæſar could not be drawn to make Peace with him, notwithſtanding the loud Cries and Prayers of the Multitude, which obſtinacy drew him, and Antony (reſcuing him) into ſuch danger, as both of them were near ſtoning. At length being forced to it, and Pompey being perſwaded, they met, but Pompey expecting to be admitted into the Power and Place of Lepidus, the Treaty came to nothing. Yet the preſſure of the Famine brought them together again, and amongſt other things it was concluded, That Pompey retaining all the Iſlands he had already, and Peloponneſus over and above, as long as they ſhould hold their Power; and having liberty to be Conſul, and to diſcharge the Office by any of his Friends, he was to leave the Sea open, and pay to the People what Corn was due out of Sicily. The proſcribed Perſons, except ſuch as were guilty of Cæſar's death, had now all liberty to return. The day following, Conſuls were deſigned for four years. Firſt Antonius and Libo, then Cæſar and Pompey, next Ænobarbus and Soſius, and laſtly, Cæſar and Antony, who then (it might be hoped) might reſtore the Government to the People. Then did Antony and Cæſar return, and were moſt joyfully received. And this Year being the 714 of the City, did they procure Herod the Great to be declared King of Judæa, in the firſt year of the 184 Olympiad, Cn. Domitius Calvinus the ſecond time, and C. Aſinius Pollio being Conſuls.

Dio lib. 49. Appian in Parthicis.

Florus l. 4. c. 9.

Ventidius proſpereth againſt the Parthians.

(a) Dio ut prius.

(b) Plutarch. in Antonio.

(c) Appian de bello civil. l. 4.

30. Antony departed toward the Eaſt again for the Parthian War, which hitherto Ventidius his Lieutenant had managed with good ſucceſs, having got ſeveral Victories, wherein Labienus, who brought them into Syria, and Pharnapates, (or Phraates, or Barzapharnes, being called by ſeveral Names) the greateſt of their Captains, with Pacorus Son to Orodes the King, were ſlain. After this he repelled them in Media and Meſopotamia, and beſieged Antiochus Comagenus in Samoſata, whom he ſuffered, upon promiſe of one thouſand Talents, to ſend Ambaſſadors unto Antony, who now drew near, and for that the Siege was likely long to continue, by reaſon of the deſperate reſolution of the Defendants, granted him Peace for three hundred Talents, accepted but of two Hoſtages, and thoſe inconſiderable ones; and he gave him leave to put to death Alexander, who had formerly revolted to the Romans. This by (a) ſome he was thought to do for fear of the Army, which was angry at his ill uſage of Ventidius; though others ſay, he honoured him according to his deſerts, who though a Man of an obſcure extract, now firſt of all others triumphed over the Parthians. Antony having ſetled the Affairs of Syria, departed to Athens, where he ſpent the Winter with Octavia. But the (c) Peace with Pompey continued but a ſhort time. The cauſe of the breach (whatever ſecretly was aimed at) was pretended to be, for that Antony being to quit Peloponneſus, would do it but upon this condition, that Pompey ſhould give him ſatisfaction for ſuch Moneys as was due to him from the Inhabitants. But Pompey liked not of any ſuch condition, and therefore rigged a new Fleet, and provided himſelf of Forces, perhaps giving credit to Metrodorus, who would tell him, that the preſent ſtate of Affairs was no true Peace, but rather a ceſſation of Arms. He then renewed his Piracy, which renewed the former grievances, and made the People cry out, that the matter was only altered from three Tyrants to four. But Metrodorus revolted to Cæſar, bringing in with him Corſica, Sardinia, and three Legions, and then Antony was called to Brunduſium to conſult about the War. Thither he came at the day appointed, but Cæſar keeping not his Word, he ſtayed not for him, either not liking the breach of the Peace, or for that he envied Cæſar all that Power he ſaw him have; for ſtill they ſuſpected and grudged each other. But Cæſar being provided, ſet out to Sea, as to invade Sicily, and was beaten back by Pompey, though he took him at unawares, who heard nothing of the Revolt of Metrodorus, till alſo of Cæſars coming. Afterward his Ships lying at Anchor, were extreamly battered, and moſt of the Men were caſt away.

The Peace with Pompey broken.

A. M. 3967. V. C. 716. Herodis 2.

31. Cæſar fortified the Coaſts of Italy, for fear leſt Pompey ſhould make an invaſion, which he, not knowing how to improve a Victory, was never wont to attempt. Then wanting all manner of Proviſions for the War, he ſent Mæcenas to Antony, who refuſing not to joyn with him, this cheared him, together with a Victory got by Agrippa in Aquitaine; many Cities, and private Perſons alſo promiſing aid. Antony came to Tarentum with three hundred Ships, but whether there was ſomething elſe betwixt them, or for that he was now furniſhed, he ſlighted his help, Cæſar excuſed himſelf that he met him not, which the other took in ill part, yet ſent for him again. For having laid out much upon the Fleet, he intended to exchange it for ſome Italian Legions, to be uſed in the Parthian War, it being difficult for him to raiſe Men in Italy, which was ſubject to Cæſar, though by their laſt agreement both were left free there to make their Levies. Octavia coming over to her Brother, agreed them, who then made the exchange, and becauſe the time of the Triumvirate ſet by the Senate was almoſt out, prorogued their Power for five years longer, without any conſideration had of the ſuffrages of the People. So Antony departed into Syria, Cæſar deferring his Expedition into Sicily until the following year.

Idem.

Antony and Cæſar make a new agreement, and prorogue their Power.

32. He determined to invade Sicily from three ſeveral Quarters: Lepidus, who now joyned with him, was to invade it from Africk, Taurus from Tarentum, and he himſelf from Puteoli. Pompey reſolved to oppoſe him ſo many ſeveral ways, but at this time it needed not; for Cæſar's Navy was the ſecond time wracked by a Tempeſt, which ſo puffed up Pompey, that he ſtiled himſelf Neptune's Son. But Cæſar gave not over the Enterprize; for the ſame Summer having recruited his Forces, and mended his Ships, he put forth to Sea, and then, though on Lepidus his part were loſt two Legions, overthrew Pompey's Fleet, but was again worſted, and yet landed twenty one Legions, and two thouſand Horſe, beſides five thouſand lightly Armed. No great or memorable Battel was there on Land; but Pompey ſent to his Enemy, to know if he would fight by Sea, fearing his Land-Forces. He accepted of his offer, and then finally defeated him, having ſunk twenty eight of his Veſſels. The reſt were either taken or broken, ſeventeen only eſcaped, and at the ſight of his overthrow his Land-Forces yielded to Cæſar, ſo that with his ſeventeen Veſſels he fled to Antony, from whom he expected protection, having reſtored formerly his Mother ſafe to him, when in ſuch a condition. Meſſana ſtill ſtood out, but the Garriſon at length yielded to Lepidus, who granted to the Soldiers, to draw them to his Party, the Plunder of the Town equal with his own. Having now by the addition of thoſe Forces twenty two Legions, and a ſtrong Body of Horſe under his Command, he pleaſed himſelf with thoughts of getting all Sicily into his Hands, to which he pretended a right, as firſt invaded by him; and he ſought to hinder Cæſar all he could from the poſſeſſion of it.

Idem.

Pompey overthrown by Cæſar.

A. M. 3969. V. C. 718.

33. Cæſar expoſtulated with him for his ingratitude; but to no purpoſe. Then found he means to draw away all his Army from him, which now was ſomething averſe to Civil Wars, and ſatisfied of the greater worth of Cæſar, being moreover incenſed againſt their General, for making Pompey's Soldiers partakers with them in the plunder of Meſſana. Yet though his Soldiers would have killed him, did he ſave them alive, but outed him of all Power, and baniſhed him; ſo Appian ut ſupra. Plutarch. in Antonio. Dio lib. 49.

One Head of the Tricipitina broken off.

ſo that thus fell one head of this Tricipitina. Pompey not being purſued by Cæſar, craved protection from Antony; yet ſent to the Parthian, in caſe he ſhould not be received by him. Then thought he of ſeizing upon Syria, and the Parts adjacent, upon a rumor of Antony's being overthrown; whereupon he was purſued by his Party, and at laſt taken and killed at Midaius, a Town of Phrygia, as Dio writeth, but as Florus and Appian at Miletus, in the fourtieth year of his Age, fourteen years after the death of his Father. Cæſar at his return reſtrained Roberies in the City, ſetting Watches therein, and adminiſtred things in the ancient way by annual Magiſtrates. He burnt all Letters written in time of War, promiſing he would reſtore the Common-wealth as ſoon as Antony ſhould return, who, he knew, would alſo lay down the Magiſtracy, all Civil Wars being ended. He was therefore received with lucky acclamations, and had a Perpetual Tribuneſhip beſtowed on him, as invited by this Honour to lay down his other Power. Concerning this he wrote privately to Antony, who, whilſt Cæſar was thus imployed about Pompey, had called Cleopatra into Syria, and there given her Phœnicia, Cæleſyria, Cyprus, a great part of Cilicia, with part of Arabia Nabathæa, and ſo much of Judæa as brought Balſamum. Then ſending her home, he marched into Armenia, where yet he could do nothing (for deſire of her) like himſelf; but ever thought of returning to her, which ſhortly after he did; but was much troubled in his Paſſage by the Parthians, to whom his Army had revolted, but that they killed ſuch as firſt paſſed over to them.

Pompey Killed.

Antony doateth on Cleopatra.

Plutarch. Dio.

34. The Year following, and that wherein Pompey was ſlain, he was ſolicited by the King of Media in conjunction with him to make War upon the Parthian; but was hindered by ſtirs which happened betwixt Cleopatra and Octavia his Wife, who now returning to him out of Italy, met with Letters at Athens to ſtop her there, he pretending neceſſary avocations by War. Cæſar then would have had her come to his Houſe, but ſhe would go to her Husbands, where ſhe educated both his Children and her own, as became her. Then did Antony return into Armenia, where he caught the King by a wile, and brought him in Triumph into Ægypt. Now would he be called Father Bacchus, as Cleopatra Iſis, who now was ſtiled by him Queen of Ægypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Cæleſyria, Cæſario, whom ſhe had by Julius Cæſar, being her Partner in theſe Principalities. But his own Sons by her, Alexander and Ptolomy, he named Kings of Kings; betwixt whom he did not only part what Provinces he himſelf had, but alſo Armenia, Parthia, and Media, and to Cleopatra their Daughter aſſigned Cyrene. Theſe things, together with the diſgrace of his Siſter, provoked Cæſar, who made report of them to the Senate and People. Hereby he incenſed Men's minds againſt Antony, who ſhortly after went into Media, and entered into League with the King thereof. Cæſar at the ſame time fought againſt ſeveral People of Illyricum, and the next year both provided for the Civil War betwixt themſelves.

His extravagancies in Ægypt.

35. Antony in way of recrimination to Cæſar, objected his putting Lepidus beſides the Triumvirate, and taking his Soldiers, as thoſe of Pompey, to himſelf, which ought to have been equally free for both; and he challenged his part of the Soldiers raiſed in Italy. For, Cæſar, beſides what we formerly mentioned, accuſed him of taking Ægypt as his Province, killing Pompey, abuſing Artavaſdes the Armenian King, to the great infamy of the Roman State; but above all, upbraided him with Cleopatra, and what he had aſſigned to their Children, as alſo for that he owned Cæſario as begotten by Cæſar, though to the Senate he had acknowledged him for his own Son. Antony, bewitched by Cleopatra ſo far as not to be able to rule himſelf, wrote to the Senate to have thoſe things confirmed, which he had ſetled upon her and her Children. The two Conſuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Soſius, being much for him, were forced to leave the City, and get over to him, who now alſo having raiſed great Forces, ſent to Rome, to drive Octavia out of his Houſe, and if taking his opportunity he had this Summer invaded Italy, he might in all probability have put an end to the Quarrel. For, Cæſar was not yet provided, wanting Money exceedingly, which he now exacted throughout Italy. But this delay herein helped him, that Men's minds were more and more bent againſt Antony, eſpecially after Cæſar had publiſhed his Teſtament, wherein he diſpoſed as formerly, to his and Cleopatra's Children, and ordained, that though he ſhould die at Rome, his Body ſhould be ſent to her at Alexandria: It was alſo reported, that he meant, if his matters proſpered, to give Cæſar and he fall out.

Dio lib. 50.
*Florus l.*4.*c.*12.

A. M. 3973.
Ol. 187. an. 1.
V. C. 722.
Herodis 8.

give

Sect. 8.

Vide Dionem ubi ſupra.

Their Preparations for War.

give her Rome, and transfer the Seat of the Empire into Ægypt. Hereupon the War was decreed againſt her, and he was deveſted of his Triumvirate, but not declared an Enemy, for fear of thoſe with him. For then muſt they neceſſarily have been included in the ſame capacity, and ſo driven upon deſperate Councils: To them therefore Rewards were promiſed, if they would forſake him; and hereby was he thought rendred more inexcuſable, in that being unhurt he ſhould make War for an Ægyptian woman againſt his Country. Then did the one draw all the Eaſt, and the other the Weſt to his Party. Cæſar had ready two hundred and fifty Ships of War, eighty thouſand Foot, and twelve thouſand Horſe. Antony had five hundred ſuch like Ships, very big and ſtately, with one hundred thouſand Foot, and alſo twelve thouſand Horſe. The King of the Medes alſo ſent him Aid, which being not ſent back, and Antony alſo re-calling his Forces he had left with him for the protection of that Country, the Parthian became Maſter of that Kingdom, and Armenia alſo was loſt.

Antony worſted.

Idem. Plutarch. in Antonio.

36. The following Year Agrippa, being ſent before by Cæſar, took divers Ships coming to Antony with Proviſions, and moleſted him exceedingly upon the Sea, wherewith Cæſar incouraged, paſſed from Brunduſium into Epirus, to a Promontory whereof, that lieth near the Bay of Ambracia ſending his Forces, he took in Corcyra; ſo did Agrippa the Iſland Leucas near to Actium, with Patræ and Corinth; Titius alſo and Taurus routed Antony's Horſe. Then ſeveral Perſons of note fell off from Antony. Soſius was beaten, and loſt his Life at Sea, and Antony himſelf was alſo worſted by a Guard of Cæſar's. Being much troubled hereat, Canidius would have perſwaded him to ſend away Cleopatra, and decide the Quarrel either in Thrace or Macedonia, for that he was ſtronger in Land-Forces. But though his Navy had been twice worſted, and he had loſt many Ships, yet ſhe obtained of him to fight at Sea, providing withal all things as for flight. For four days the Sea was ſo rough with Winds, that it hindered them from fighting; but on the fifth they joyned, and then Cæſar's Ships being light could eaſily tack about and invade Antony's, which were unwieldy, and of little uſe. Cleopatra wearied with long expectation, 'ere it could certainly be known how things would go, with her gilded Deck, Purple Sails, and ſixty light Ægyptian Gallies, fled away, which Antony ſeeing, preſently followed, forſaking his Men, and running away, who ought to have animadverted upon ſuch as did ſo. His Soldiers fought moſt valiantly, notwithſtanding the baſeneſs of their General, (who getting into Cleopatra's Gally, went, and ſate by himſelf in a deep ſilence, holding his Head with both his Hands) till at the tenth hour they were partly perſwaded, and partly conſtrained to ſubmit, it being confeſſed, that in this Fight they behaved themſelves like to, and executed the Office of, the beſt General, and their General played the part of a run-away Soldier. From this Victory of Cæſar at Actium, a Promontory of Epirus, ſeveral * Authors date his Monarchy, which laſted from the ſecond of September, whereon the Battel was fought, to the 19*th* of Auguſt, on which he died, forty four years wanting thirteen days. Now was he himſelf the third time, and M. Valerius Meſſala Conſuls, in the 723*d* Year of the City, the ſecond of the 187 Olympiad, and the ſeventh of Herod King of Judæa, as Joſephus gathereth, the 29*th* before the Æra of Chriſt, A. M. 3974.

A. M. 3974.
V. C. 723.
Herodis 9.
Ante Chriſt. 29.

Overthrown at Actium in a Sea-fight.

Patercul. l. 2. cap. 85.

* Dio. Suetonius. Aurelius Victor. Eutropius.

Plutarch in Antonio.

Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 87.
Dio lib. 51.

His Land-forces yield to Cæſar.

37. His Land-forces could ſcarcely believe his flight, having ſuch an Army left to him intire, and for ſeven days were ſo conſtant to him, that though the thing was clearly known, they rejected Cæſar's Meſſages, but being now overtaken by him, and forſaken of their Leader Canidius, who had poſted away after Antony, they yielded, and were taken into Cæſar's Army. Then did Cæſar go to Athens, where he put to death Caſſius Parmenſis, one of thoſe that ſlew his Uncle, and ſetling the Affairs both of Greece and Aſia, determined to Winter in Samus; but was called into Italy by Agrippa to quiet his Soldiers who now mutinied. He ſailed then to Brunduſium, but the Senate meeting him there, he went no further, and having diſpatched his Buſineſs within thirty days returned into Aſia. Antony for ſome time lived diſconſolately by himſelf. Cleopatra conveyed Ships over into the Red-Sea, intending there to ſeek her Fortune, ſhe had thought alſo of flying into Spain. They both ſent to Cæſar, ſhe that her Children might have Ægypt granted them, and he that he might be permitted to live privately at Athens. She ſent him a Golden Crown and Scepter, with a Royal Seat, privily to curry favour, and he, though openly he threatned her, ſecretly promiſed her ſafety and her Kingdom, if ſhe ſhould kill Antony, who was alſo adviſed by * Herod of Judæa to do as much by her.

* Joſephus Antiq. l. 15. c. 10.

38. They ſent again to him the firſt and ſecond time, and he gave up to him Turullius a Senator, and one of the Murderers of Julius Cæſar. He putting the Man to death returned no anſwer, neither the ſecond time, when he ſent Antyllus his Son to him with much Gold, which he received. But with her he ſtill dealt, ſending Thyrſus his Freed-man to her to make her believe that he was in love with her, hoping ſhe might kill Antony, and preſerve her Treaſures, which ſhe threatned to burn if ſhe came into any danger. Now going down into Ægypt, he ſent Cornelius Gallus before him, who ſeized on Parætonium the chief City on that part near Africk; and Peluſium the other ſtrongeſt Town towards Syria did Cleopatra betray to him, ſecretly forbidding the Alexandrians to go out againſt him. Antony once fought proſperouſly againſt his Horſe, and the ſecond time was beaten; then he ſent him a Challenge, which Cæſar refuſed, ſaying, That if Antony ſo pleaſed there were a thouſand ways lying open for his deſtruction. Wherefore bethinking himſelf that he could not die with more credit than in Battel, he reſolved to oppoſe Cæſar both by Sea and Land; but Cleopatra procured, that both his Navy, and Horſe revolted. Hereupon he returned into the City, crying out, That he was betrayed by her for whoſe ſake he had taken up Arms. She being afraid of him, departed to her Monument, and ſent ſome to tell him ſhe was dead, pretending fear of Cæſar. Upon which Meſſage, he reſolving to follow her, wounded himſelf in the Belly. The Wound not quickly diſpatching him, ſhe ſent for him up into her Monument, whither he was pulled up by her ſelf, and two Women, being willing to live now that ſhe was alive, and hoping he might poſſibly recover. But he ſhortly after died, willing her as well as ſhe could to provide for her ſelf, and not grieve for him, but rather rejoyce, in that he had been the moſt famous of Men, as alſo moſt powerful, and now being a Roman, was not through lazineſs overcome by a Roman. Such was the end of this Man, who through deſire of Fame became the Author of ſad Tragedies to his Country, who in the uſe of his Power greatly abuſed it, and was not only overcome by a Roman, but alſo by a Woman, and then ſo behaved himſelf, that he could not be excuſed from lazineſs, effeminateneſs, and luxury, all which things checked that goodneſs of diſpoſition ſuppoſed once to be in him, and left Cleopatra little cauſe to rejoyce for any real Glory that might accrue unto him.

Dio lib. 5. Plutarch. in Antonio.

Antony killeth himſelf.

39, Cæſar endeavoured to get Cleopatra into his Hands, that he might lead her in Triumph. He eaſily obtained Alexandria, the Inhabitants whereof he pardoned, but put to death Antyllus the Son of Antony, and ſome others. He viewed the Body of Alexander the Great, and out of Honour to his memory ſet on it a Golden Crown, and ſtrewed it with Flowers; but touching it, he broke off a little piece of the Noſe, and refuſed to ſee the Bodies of the Ptolomies, though the Alexandrians much deſired it, ſaying, He had a mind to ſee the King, and not dead Men. Cleopatra dealt with her Phyſician to diſpatch her, but being terrified by Cæſar upon the account of her Children, ſhe gave it over, and did all ſhe could, but in vain, to work upon his affections when he came to ſee her. Then did ſhe give him an Inventory of her Goods, and he promiſed her fair things, thinking thereby that he deceived her, though he himſelf was deceived. For ſhe underſtanding that ſhe was reſerved for a Triumph, prevented it by a voluntary death, as is in the Hiſtory of her Kingdom related. Cæſar made Ægypt a Tributary Province, and would have conferred the Government thereof upon Arius the Philoſopher, who formerly had taught him, but he refuſing the Imployment, he gave it to Cornelius Gallus, a Man of obſcure Birth. Cæſario the Son of Cleopatra by Julius Cæſar, had by his Mother been ſent towards India with a great Sum of Money, but at Rhodes his Governour perſwaded him to return, as now being to expect the Kingdom. Cæſar conſulting what to do with him, Ariæus, alluding to * that prudent Sentence of Homer, ſaid, 'Ουκ ἄγαθον πολυκαισαρίη. To have many Cæſars is not good; and ſo he was ſent after his Mother. Whil'ſt theſe things were doing at Alexandria, was M. Tullius Cicero, Son of the Orator, Conſul at Rome (taken in by Cæſar to blot out the ignominy of betraying his Father) in the room of Licinius Craſſus, where he publiſhed Cæſar his Collegue's Letters Dio ut ſuprà. Sueton. in Octavio. Plutarch. in Antonio. Oroſius lib. 6. Cap. 19. Patercul. l. 2. c. 87. Florus lib. 4. cap. 11. Livii Epitom. lib. 133. Julian ad Themiſtium.

So doth Cleopatra her ſelf, and Ægypt is made a Province.

* 'Ουκ ἄγαθον πολυκοιρανίη εἷς κοίρανος ἔστω εἷς Βασιλὲυς.

A. M. 3975.
Ol. 187. ann. 3.
V. C. 724.
Herodis 10.
Ante Chriſtum 28.

Sect. 8. Letters concerning the overthrow of Antony, and put them up over the Pleading Place, where his Father's Head had formerly been ſet. But this overthrow and death of Cleopatra happened in the fourteenth Year after the death of Julius Cæſar, the third of the 187 Olympiad, the 724 of the City, twenty eight before the Birth of Chriſt, A. M. 3975. 294 after the death of Alexander the Great, under whom, as the Macedonian Empire began, ſo now in Cleopatra (and not till now) it was quite extinct; and here the Contemporaries with it receive their Period.

AN

AN INSTITUTION
OF General Hiſtory.

The First Part.

BOOK IV.

The Roman Empire.

CHAP. I.

From the Abſoluteneſs of Octavius, to the Death of Tiberius, containing the ſpace of 66 Years.

The Grandeur of the Roman Empire.

1 THE Roman Empire had now ſwallowed up the Macedonian, with ſuch Kingdoms and States as were at all conſiderable, and Contemporary with it (whereof though ſome might retain a ſhew of Liberty, yet were they but in a condition of Vaſſalage) except the Parthian Kingdom, which as yet acknowledged no ſubjection, and when it did, being forced thereto for the moſt part by Inteſtine Diviſions, not long continued in that acknowledgment.

It laboureth under its own weight.

2. This Empire now laboured under its own weight, and, like to ſome unwieldy thing, ſtaggered, by reaſon of the turgency of its inward burthen, without any extraneous violence: It was grown up to an Athletick habit, and had already ſufficiently manifeſted the Danger of this Conſtitution. For, being all Head and no Body, it wanted thoſe Limbs, which by direction from a ſuperior ſenſe, could ſecure its Progreſs; or indeed being all Body, and no head, it was void of that influence which effecteth an orderly motion, and is neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of life it ſelf. The proper fruits of Popular Government were now grown fully ripe. Every one would command, and none would be ruled, yet every man challenging a part in the Supreme Power, none enjoyed it much, and therefore but few were really ſolicitous for the upholding of it as Popular, any further than ſome private intereſts led them. The heady multitude indeed was violently carried on in its deſires after the chief command; but ſome deſired it rather that others might not enjoy it, holding this Principle, to oppoſe all riſing, though excellent Perſons whatſoever. Others tickled with an humor of ruling, and in intellectuals above their fellows, ſet themſelves to pleaſe the Rabble by maligning other men, crying up Liberty and Equality, extolling the juſtice of the Agrarian, and vaunting of great matters intended to be done by themſelves, when in a Capacity. Sometimes their boldneſs and cunning procured their riſe, moſt commonly ſome Capitulations, and otherwhiles Money diſtributed to the Rabble, when the ſtep was great. For after that the Romans paſſed the Seas, more luxury, avarice, and corruption, than of Victory was brought home. When they came abroad, notwithſtanding the repute of their abſtinence, they found the ſame temptations as other men, and made themſelves Maſters of the manners, as well as the poſſeſſions of the conquered. All things were now bought and ſold, from the meaneſt Office to the Conſulſhip, and the loweſt privilege to the right of Suffrages.

3. The daily ſight of theſe things corrupted ſuch, as elſe might have proved juſt. It ſeemed a prudent Principle, rather to command than to be commanded; rather to buy than to be ſold, and to get ſomething, rather than ſuffer all things to be loſt. The body of the People was now grown large, the Italians being received to the freedom of the City, and liberty of Suffrages. Hence ambitious men had advantage enough to make parties, and to carry things in the Comitia or Aſſemblies, having once by indirect practices ingratiated themſelves. Having obtained commands afar off, they had opportunity to increaſe their power, through the diſtance of place, the credit of their conqueſts, and the affections of their Armies. Power once obtained, is difficultly laid down, both by reaſon that man's nature is averſe to diminution, and for that ſomething may be committed in height of paſſion, or through convenience, or otherwiſe, whereof it might not be ſafe to give an account, as neither to lye open and naked to the malice of revengeful Enemies. The Empire being now vaſt, ſeveral men at the ſame time might be found in theſe capacities, ſo that jealouſies and emulations muſt thence be heightned, and one ſtrive to reduce the other into order. Further, the largeneſs of Empire afforded multiplicity of places, always of ſeveral, and ſometimes of contrary intereſts or humours, which would eſpouſe quarrels accordingly, whence never would be wanting ſufficient and convenient matter for publick combuſtions.

And under ſuch diſtempers

As Monarchy could only cure.

4. Such was the preſent State of Roman affairs, and ſuch had been their conſtitution before the preſent juncture, which loudly, in the underſtanding of all prudent men, called for the help of ſome ſingle Perſon duly qualified, whoſe Monarchy could only put an end to the civil diſſentions, by removing the looſe liberty of the multitude, which gave occaſion to thoſe diſtempers, by preventing ambitious indeavours of private perſons after Soveraignty, which fomented them, and by checking all exorbitant power of particular men, which effectually procured them. Cæſar on the one ſide conſidering theſe things, as alſo being ſenſible of the power he already enjoyed, and of the danger he might incur by removing himſelf to a private life; and on the other, weighing the envy and odium he ſhould contract by the eſtabliſhment of himſelf, after he had conquered Antony and Cleopatra, and (having entered his fourth Conſulſhip in the Iſle Samus) returned to Rome, he asked the advice of his two moſt inward Counſellors and boſom friends, Agrippa and Mecænas. Vipſanius Agrippa, a man of mean Parentage (which Vipſanius manifeſting, he changed into Marcus) and no great endowments, except in what concerned War, though of a well-meaning mind, and a great lover of Cæſar, anſwered him firſt, and earneſtly adviſed him to lay down his power, and remit the Government into the hands of the Multitude. ‘His arguments for the moſt part reſpected the danger of Cæſar's perſon, being drawn from the averſneſs of the Romans to Monarchy, and inforced by examples of others, who had attempted to eſtabliſh themſelves. Againſt Monarchy it ſelf he could produce little of moment. He would prove that Popular Government was better for the Greeks, who, he ſaid, did nothing that was notable, till they put themſelves into that way. He ſaid, there were others alſo, the condition of whom pleaded for this Government, yet named none. But he eſpecially inſtanced in the Romans themſelves, who being averſe to Monarchy, had done all theſe great things under that form of rule and domination which was oppoſite to it.

Vid. Dionyſ. l. 52. ad initium p. 463, &c.

Agrippa his advice to Cæſar for Democracy.

Mecænas his plea for Monarchy.

5. But Mecænas, a man, though but of Equeſtrian rank, yet, of (a) high deſcent, and (b) extraordinary abilities, deſired Cæſar, that if he loved his Country, he would alter, correct and reduce it into a better form of Government. ‘He ſaid, he would not have him deceived with a ſpecious ſhew of names and words; but conſidering what ſhould follow, to reſtrain the fury of the multitude, and take to himſelf, aſſiſted by excellent perſons, the Government; that the moſt prudent might conſult, the beſt Captains have the command of Armies, and

the

(a) Mecænas atavis edite regibus. Horat. i. e. Cui Menodorus pater, Menippus avus, Cecinna Rex Etruſcorum fuit atavus.

(b) Ingenioſus vir ille (Mecænas) fuit. Magnum exemplum Romanæ eloquentiæ daturus, niſi illum enervaſſet fælicitas, imo caſtraſſet. Seneca Epiſtol. 19.

‘ the moſt robuſt and poor ſerve in them. Hereby every one minding his own buſi‘neſs, and one affording help to another, none would find any defect, and the ‘true power of the People with liberty and ſafety would be preſerved. For, the ‘power of the multitude, he ſaid, being indeed the ſlavery of every worthy man, was moſt ‘grievous, and brought common deſtruction unto all: but this, wherein modeſty ſhould ‘ever be preferred, and mens deſerts conſidered, would make all alike to be happy. ‘He would have him therefore aſſiſted and adviſed by worthy perſons, to order ‘all things needful, to make War, create Magiſtrates, reward, puniſh, and make Laws; ‘all others being obedient; ſo that Wars might be made with ſecrecy, and upon occa‘ſion, ſuch as were preferred might be choſen, not by lot, or through the prevalence of ‘their ambition, but for their worth. Thus good men might be honoured, and bad ‘puniſhed without diſturbance; and ſo at length things would be rightly car‘ried, when nothing ſhould be referred to the Vulgar, nor openly be conſul‘ted of, nor be committed to intruders, nor come into danger through their ‘ambition. In ſum, all would enjoy their own, no dangerous Wars nor wicked ‘Seditions being made.

The inſufferable inconveniencies of Popular Government.

6. ‘But theſe evils he proved to be common in a Popular Government, wherein ‘the great ones aſpiring to the top, and with money or otherwiſe purchaſing the help of ‘the ordinary ſort, diſturbed all things. He ſaid, they had now had large experience ‘of theſe things, and that by no other means could they be ended, than by that ‘whereof he ſpake; whereof this was an evident ſign, that for a long time they ‘had been vexed with Wars and Seditions, by reaſon of the multitude of men, and ‘greatneſs of affairs; for that men were ſo various in Nature and Nations, and in‘dued with ſuch diverſity of affections and deſires: and becauſe things hereby were ‘brought to that paſs, that with difficulty could they be managed. Now that he ſpake ‘true, he ſaid, the deeds themſelves bore mention; for, as long as the multitude ‘of the Roman People was not great, nor much more conſiderable than their neigh‘bours, the State was in a good condition, and almoſt all Italy was ſubdued by them. ‘But after that paſſing out of Italy, they went abroad into all Countreys and Iſlands, ‘and filled all Seas and Lands with their name and power, no good got they by it: but ‘firſt of all, at home and within the walls, riots being made, they ſhook the Common‘wealth, and afterwards propagated the ſame miſchief into their Armies. Therefore ‘their City, like to ſome great ſhip of burthen, filled with a various multitude, and ‘deſtitute of a Pilot, having been for many ages beaten and toſſed with grievous ‘waves, now floted, and having no ſtay, was toſſed here and there. He deſired him ‘therefore, that he would not ſtill neglect her thus conflicting with Tempeſts ‘(for he ſaw how much water ſhe had already taken in) nor ſuffer the ſtay to be ‘quite broken off (for ſhe was now battered, and could not long ſubſiſt) but ſee‘ing that the gods had preſented him as an Overſeer and Governour to his ‘Countrey, not to caſt her off; but as by his means ſhe had a little recovered her ‘ſpirits, ſo, for the ages to come, ſhe might remain in ſafety by the ſame means. ‘Having uſed theſe arguments drawn from the Thing, he took others from the ‘Man, and ſhewed him his imminent danger, in caſe he laid down his power. in the ‘ſeveral caſes of Pompey, Marius and Sylla. Pompey, he ſaid, having deveſted him‘ſelf of his power, was contemned, and being laid at by his Enemies periſhed, be‘cauſe he could not recover it. He told him, That his Father (meaning Julius Cæ‘ſar) going about the ſame miſcarried. The ſame had hapned to Marius and Sylla, ‘but that they were prevented by death; though ſome ſaid alſo that Sylla killed ‘himſelf to prevent his Enemies: 'tis certain, that many of his Laws began to be ‘repealed whilſt he yet lived. In concluſion, he told him, He muſt expect many ‘ſuch as Lepidus, Sertorius, Brutus, and Caſſius. This is the ſum of Mecænas his ſpeech ‘in behalf of Monarchy, whereof the beginning is loſt, as alſo the concluſion of ‘that of Agrippa.

Democratical Government impracticable in one or more Nations, conſiderable for wealth, and of various intereſts.

7. Theſe things ſufficiently evidence, that it was impoſſible in an humane way for the Empire to ſubſiſt in a Commonwealth ſo called; and not only that, but any one conſiderable Nation, or more (not to ſpeak of one, or a few Cities, or places at preſent) which muſt neceſſarily conſiſt of multitudes of people, diverſly qualified, variouſly inclined, and very unequally poſſeſſed of wealth and honours. Such having the Supream power in their own hands muſt needs foment ſeveral humours. The rich, and honourable, muſt either not medle, and ſo out of diſcontent watch for an advantage to alter things, or if they do, they will not be content with equal imployments. When any extraordinary power is obtained, ſuch inforcements as were formerly mentioned will happen, which being driven on by that ambition which is but natural to all mankind, will drive either fear, or deſire, into Monarchy. A civil War eſpecially produceth this, and more eſpecially when the quarrel is betwixt ſingle perſons; and yet more eſpecially is it inforced by a religious pretence, under which Vizard the greateſt deceit hath triumphed, accompanied, or uſhered in by a ſacrilegious aſſerting of approving Providence, whereby inviolable Majeſty, Order, Propriety, and all things excellent have been contaminated, overturned, and trampled on, and yet a ſtructure erected at length out of the materials of thoſe very things, which formerly were only by the intruders accounted bad, becauſe they ſtood upon another ground. But not only in a Democratical way is it impoſſible for one, or more conſiderable Nations to be governed, but in an Ariſtocratical alſo. For if the wealth and propriety of a Nation be diffuſed, and not limited in the poſſeſſions of a few of the chiefeſt perſons, ſuch would find a continual repugnancy in their ſubjects, others thinking themſelves as capable of power as they. Hence quarrels and implacable enmities muſt ariſe, and he who ſhall be beſt able will at length command the reſt, though he ought to have been their fellow ſubject, and demonſtrate a neceſſity of Monarchical Government.

An anſwer to Agrippa's Argument drawn from the Greeks.

8. The affairs of the Græcians urged by Agrippa to make againſt Monarchy do much plead for it, and evince the neceſſity of it. For after that the multitude in the ſeveral Cities had rebelliouſly withdrawn themſelves from that obedience, which both the Law of God, and juſt title of ſucceſſion challenged as due to their Kings (who as Thucydides acknowledgeth, governed them with Juſtice and Moderation) how miſerably were they inſlaved by their fellow Citizens (called by them Tyranni or Tyrants) and forced to ſubmit to Uſurpers, who puniſhed them for their diſobedience towards their rightful Soveraigns. Never were there ſuch Tumults, Seditions, Civil Wars, Maſſacres, and Deſolations, as in, and amongſt thoſe Cities which called themſelves Commonwealths. Such were the extravagancies of the multitude, that the beſt men were rejected, and bold, impudent, and ſawcy fellows domineered, who being corrupted with Money, bought and ſold all that was of conſequence, and by their cunning ſpeeches turned, and led the Rabble which way ſo ever they pleaſed. As for what Agrippa urged, that they only did things of moment after that the power came into the peoples hands, thoſe things of moment were amongſt themſelves, and ſuch as made them miſerable, they tearing one another in pieces in the Peloponneſian, and other Wars, breathing nothing but rage, malice, and revenge againſt one another. Nothing of conſequence did, or could they do againſt the Barbarians, as they accounted all beſides themſelves, till reduced under the Monarchy of Alexander they became inſtruments in his hands. Common danger ingaged them againſt Xerxes, whoſe multitudes deſtroyed themſelves; but had it not been for the meer wiſdom of Themiſtocles, want of Order, of Government, and Diſcretion, had ruined them all in departing into Peloponneſus, and fooliſhly applying themſelves to the fortifying of the Iſthmus. Though they ſeveral times aſſiſted the Ionians in their Rebellion, yet ſtill at length were their endeavours defeated. Cimon indeed got ſeveral Victories, and did notable exploits in a Piratical way, but what effects produced they? The moſt that was effected at Land was by Ageſilaus, but he having not done much, was recalled, for that many Cities having been allured with Perſian Gold (which never failed to corrupt the Councils, overthrow the projects, and diſturb the affairs of theſe petty States, by taking off the great Leaders of the Rabble) had conſpired againſt Sparta. But what great matters they could do againſt Monarchy appeared, in that, firſt Philip, then Alexander his Son, and their Succeſſors, eaſily ſubdued, and kept them under. As for their Colonies, each one uſually followed the fortune of its Metropolis, little but Tumults, Baniſhments, and Maſſacres do we hear of, or of private mens getting the power over them, for that wanting rightful, and ſucceſſive Princes, they lay open to the cheats of their fellow Citizens. The particular caſes of Corcyra, Samus, Syracuſe, and others demonſtrate this, and therewith the danger, and infirmity of Antimonarchical Government.

The conſtitutions of their ſeveral States were dangerous.

9. But in particular, ſuch were the ſeveral conſtitutions of theſe Cities, that Ariſtotle himſelf liked none of them, as appeareth in his Books of Politicks. The Cretian Commonwealth had its extravagancies, and if a Government may be judged from the carriage, and diſpoſition of the people, in the opinion of Epimenides one of their own Poets, it was moſt naught. Lycurgus by taking away the juſt, and Hereditary power of the Kings of Sparta, and contrary both to Nature and Loyalty, diſſolving the Government of his Forefathers, made but way for many inconveniences in the too great power of the Senate, and otherwiſe, but eſpecially for the tyranny of the Ephori, five fellows choſen yearly out of the Rabble, who domineer'd with unparalleld inſolence over all. Solon's conſtitution, after ſo many changes and alterations wherein no reſt could be procured from the time they forſook Kingly Government, gave no ſuch ſettlement, but that Piſiſtratus preſently after cheating the Rabble over and over, very eaſily made himſelf Maſter of Athens. Their Oſtraciſm frighted all able perſons from medling with the Commonwealth, as alſo did the Petaliſm of Syracuſe; whereupon their affairs went down the wind, till they were forced to recall the baniſhed, and change ſtill from one conſtitution to another, never being at quiet, for that the multitude tyrannized in their Aſſemblies. As for the learning of the Greeks, whereof they ſo much boaſted, they had it either from the Egyptians or Caldæans, who were ſubject to, and from the beginning flouriſhed under Monarchy: and Piſiſtratus who was a Monarch (though of his own making) made the firſt Collection of Books, and thereby brought Learning into Athens and Greece. Finally, the Greeks in their Wars were forced to make uſe of ſingle perſons; and at home in their greateſt neceſſities did they fly to them, as Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus mentioneth the Harmoſtes of Lacedæmon, the Archus of the Theſſalians, and the Æſymnetes of the Mitylenæans, whom he compareth with the Dictator of the Romans.

An Anſwer to Agrippa's Argument taken from the Romans.

10. For the Romans, 'tis a meer miſtake of Agrippa. Their affairs never more proſpered than under Monarchy, if we conſider the ſmall beginnings of the City. Romulus did exceeding much for his time, and ſo did his Succeſſors in their ſeveral ways, with ſo ſmall a power as ſuch a Colony could produce, inſomuch as revengeful and furious Brutus acknowledged, that no better way of Government could be found out than what they had chalked out to them. The faults in it ſeem to have been his ſomething too much indulging at his firſt conſtitutions a popular humour which might bring him to his end afterwards. Then Servius to curry favour with the Rabble, that they might maintain him in his illegally procured power, diminiſhed the Regal authority, and that of the Senate, which gave the multitude ſuch a ſcope, as after could they not be reduced into any order. After him Tarquinius the Heir of Priſcus might go about to recover this power (for, a little charity may be allowed us, for one who lived in ſo dark and remote times, and whoſe Actions were only recorded by his Enemies, ſeeing we have formerly related his Story as we find it) and thereby might incur that prejudice which, together with the fault of his Son, and the implacable malice of Brutus, procured his Baniſhment. This may be added as an ill accident, that Romulus dying childleſs, the Kingdom came to be Elective, which thing muſt at length bring great inconveniences, ſo that Experience now hath taught ſuch Kingdoms to continue the Government to particular Families. But Brutus his giving to his Conſuls full regal power (though they were two, and Annual) and putting the Sword fully into their hands, together with his acknowledgment of the good Government of all the former Kings, do more than make us ſuſpect his ſpleen to have acted him moſt in the change of the power, eſpecially the conſequences conſidered. For, the power of the Conſuls being ſhortly after diminiſhed, or rather enervated by Valerius (who by flattering of the multitude got the name of Poplicola) the common ſort got head, and confounded all things, nothing but changes, and re-changes happening, till at length they quite outed the Patricians of their power, giving them leiſure to repent their joyning with Brutus, and brought things to that ruin and diſorder formerly mentioned, as compelled them to turn about, and by their Lex Regia (hereafter to be ſpoken of) to devolve all their power upon a ſingle Perſon.

The Diſorders and Tumults ariſing from their Antimonarchical Government.

11. Such and ſo many were theſe Seditions and Tumults, that thrice the common ſort departed from the Patricians out of the City. And no ſooner was the War againſt their King ended, but the ſtirs begun; and theſe very ſtirs have we proved from Dionyſius, to have procured immediately the ſetting up of another King in effect, for half a year's continuance, viz. the Dictator, to which Officer they were forced to fly in all difficulties. Now it ſufficiently appeared, that the want of a King hindred the promotion of their affairs, for, ever when any work was to be done abroad, nay when the Enemy was even at the gates, would the multitude mutiny, and with ſo much a-do at length could be drawn out, that buſineſs was retarded, and thereby their affairs not a little impaired, the Monarch being wanting, who ſhould have kept both orders in ſubjection and awe. The weight of Uſury and Oppreſſion was the firſt pretended cauſe of theſe ſtirs; but from it the multitude paſſed on from one thing to another, never reſting till it had got all Offices of dignity, power, and profit, into its own hands, as hath been at large made out. To effect this, they would one while have Conſuls, and another while Tribunes Military, having formerly made Decemviri for the making of new Laws; ſo that within the ſpace of 134 years, they had 37 changes in the Government, whereof (to make it clear) fifteen were from Conſuls to Tribunes Military, and from Tribunes to Conſuls, the two grand ones from Kings to Conſuls, and from Conſuls to Decemviri, and twenty Dictatorſhips, beſides Interregnums many an one, whereby for five days the chief power was in the hands of their Interreges. Thus was the Government toſſed to and fro by the multitude, and little was done abroad, by reaſon of theſe confuſions, nay the City was taken by the Gauls, and razed, all but the Capitol, through the cowardiſe of their Tribunes, who alſo being in number three or more, by their ſeveral opinions confounded their Armies, and ſhewed the truth of that ſpeech of Agamemnon in Homer. And this is worthy obſervation, that when the contention aroſe about the Conſulſhip, which the Commons would have equally with the Patritians, ſo incredible were thoſe confuſions, that for five years the Tribuni Plebis (thoſe great incendiaries) ſuffered no ſupreme Magiſtrates at all to be created.

37 Changes of Government in 134 years.

Ουκ ἄγαθον πολυκοιρανίη, &c.

12. All the great conqueſts afterwards were made by ſingle perſons, who abroad had alone the command of Armies. And ſo far was this preſent kind of Government from being inſtrumental to them, that it manifeſtly hindred and obſtructed all good proceedings. For, when a Conſul's year was out, then muſt he be recalled, and a Succeſſor ſent him, though he was in never ſo fair a way for the conquering of any Nation, which at length began to be underſtood, and then was their command continued to them, under the name of Proconſuls, after which time it was, that the great matters were performed; before this the Generals being glad to ſhuffle up a Peace, leſt they ſhould be defrauded of the credit of ending the Wars by their Succeſſors. The main cauſe of the growth of their Empire (under the all diſpoſing Providence of God) was the valour and virtue of their Captains and Senators, at that time when Pyrrhus ſet upon them; the courage alſo of the Soldiers was extraordinary, ſo that (as Pyrrhus ſpoke of himſelf) a King, whoſe command and conduct would have been conſtant and uncontroled, might have done greater wonders with ſuch men. But as for the Government, ſo far was it from contributing to juſtice or virtue, that, even in theſe times, which their Writers ſo celebrate for theſe things, the multitude having by the Hortenſian Law wreſted this power from the Senate, to oblige all whatſoever by their Plebiſcita, decreed aid to be ſent to the Mamertines, though againſt all equity and conſcience, the Senate having utterly refuſed to aſſiſt thoſe thieves, murderers, intruders. But the multitude was told of great profit which would accrue to all men in particular, and therefore profit muſt bear down right, and forces muſt be ſent into Sicily to get footing there, to inrich theſe vertuous & temperate men: and hence is to be fetched the riſe of the Carthaginian Wars (which with what injuſtice they were managed on the Roman part, hath been ſeen) and indeed this was the original of all their conqueſts. The main things performed were done by ſuch, as rather awed the people, than were awed by it, though to obtain their commands, they corrupted the multitude with Money. Marius, Sylla, Pompey, and Cæſar, after they had ſucceſſively ingroſſed the power, made the greateſt conqueſts. After the overthrow of Carthage eſpecially, ſcarcely any great command was obtained, but by ſome great promiſes under-hand, ſome new attempts of innovation, or Money diſtributed to the Tribes. So weak, imperfect, and vitious was the Government.

Great Conqueſts were made by ſingle Perſons.

13. Theſe things evidence the excellency of Monarchical Government above the reſt; a neceſſity of it in any conſiderable Nation or Nations, and in Cities which extend the freedom of Suffrages to their Subjects or Aſſociates, and are conſiderable, for number, power and intereſt. Single Cities have for ſome time ſubſiſted otherwiſe; but if we view thoſe that have been mentioned in this Work, ſome of them we ſhall find to have been kept in that way by ſuch ſtrange diſcipline, and principles of equality and levelling, as are even repugnant to Nature, and deſtroy that lawful uſe of ſuch things as were ordained for man's comfort and delight. Such was the conſtitution of that of Sparta, which yet ſecured it

Hence appeareth the excellency and neceſſity of Monarchy.

not

The Antiquity,

And Authority of it.

not from the tyranny of the Ephori, and when but the uſe of Gold, Silver, and other things, very lawful in themſelves, came up, the Lacedæmonians were ſenſible of their ſlavery to ſuch harſh conſtitutions, and the Government tottered. Again, in others that were left more to their liberty, we ſee how impoſſible it was for the People to uſe it, but for their own deſtruction; ſo that for any one place to ſubſiſt without ſuch miſeries and diſaſters, is near to a miracle. Monarchy, though it may have its defects (as all things managed by meer men) yet in it ſelf includes more order, certainty, and ſecurity, its force being commonly turned outward. It's that which is moſt agreable with primitive prudence, when men were not arrived at that ambition and wickedneſs, which later times have produced. All Nations at firſt had their Kings from the very firſt foundation, as is clear in the caſe of the Greeks, and others; ſo that they voluntarily ſubmitted to them, at the firſt leading out of Colonies from the Eaſt, being their Captains; and thence we may ſee that the Government is natural, flowing from paternal rule, and proceeding from that Superiority, which Maſters of Families, and Heads of Kindreds might well challenge over others. It's moſt ſuitable to the Government of the Univerſe, which is in God alone, who therefore acknowledgeth Kings for his Vicegerents, and calleth them gods, promiſing they ſhould be nurſing Fathers to his Church, and taking no notice herein of other Governments. Hence our Kings owe account to him alone, are Sacroſanct (which term the Romans gave to their very Tribunes, who were inviolable, it being death to injure them in the leaſt, and therefore we may well apply it to Kings) and that perpetually, and are intruſted by him with a Prerogative, which is neceſſary for the good of their Subjects. For all power flowing from them, it's contradictory for authority to challenge it ſelf, as unnatural and violent, for a derived ſtream, to oppoſe the current of the Fountain.

Mecænas his advice to Cæſar for the ordering of his affairs.

Conſule Dionem l. 12.p.476.D.

Magiſtrates of Senatorian dignity.

14. But (to return from this requiſite digreſſion, whereby an anſwer is given to Agrippa's Arguments, and Students are directed to make the right and natural uſe of Hiſtory) after that Mecænas had preſſed Cæſar with theſe urgent reaſons, to take the Government upon him, he gave him directions for the management of his affairs. ‘Firſt, he adviſed him to regulate the Senate, placing and diſplacing according to the worth of perſons; and to have a ſpecial regard to Nobility and Gentry, to gratifie them with imployments. To admit none into the Equeſtrian rank before eighteen years of age, and none into the Senate till 25; before which time the Romans were never accounted of full age. When theſe had born the Offices of Quæſtor, Ædilis, and Tribunus plebis, then being thirty years old, he would have them made Prætors, all which at firſt were to be Romans alone, leſt he ſhould ſeem ſuddenly to change the cuſtoms of his Country. All theſe Magiſtrates he would have of Cæſar's making, and not this power to be left in any caſe to the Senate, or People. He counſelled him by all means to diminiſh their antient power, which elſe might procure trouble and alteration; but leave them their whole honour and dignity. The way to this was to make them execute their Offices in the City, and not ſuffer them then, nor preſently after, to have any Military command, but for ſome time to live privately. He would have theſe Magiſtrates, to celebrate games, and exerciſe judicial power in all caſes, except that of Murther; for ſome Judges were to be choſen from amongſt the reſt of the Senators, but the chief power to remain in theſe. Then he ſaid, a certain Governour or Mayor of the City was to be made out of the moſt principal men, who had born theſe Offices, to joyn with the reſt in governing the City, to receive Appeals, and judge capital Cauſes, except ſome afterwards to be ſpoken of, both in the City, and 81 miles round about. Another of the ſame rank was to be choſen, who ſhould make inſpection into the Stock, Eſtates and Manners of Senators, and Knights or Equites, both thoſe of under age and others, and as well of women as the other Sex, to correct ſuch things, as being not worthy of puniſhment, yet being neglected might occaſion great inconveniences; and refer the greater matters to Cæſar himſelf, who was to bear the name of Cenſor, and the other being a Patrician, and the next in dignity to the Mayor, but that of Subcenſor. Theſe two Officers might be, for life, except they committed ſome fault, or by old Age or Sickneſs were rendred unſerviceable; for no dammage could thence ariſe, the one having no Soldiers, and the other but a few, and who ſhould execute his Office before Cæſar's eyes, for the moſt part. The other Magiſtrates, would fear to do any unjuſt thing, being preſently to be reduced into a private con‘dition, and others to ſucceed them in their power. He added, that the ‘Provinces were only to be committed to men of Prætorian rank; the reſt being ‘Proprætors in order once and again, ſhould arrive at the Conſulſhip, (if they well ‘exerciſed their former Offices) and then be preferred to greater commands.

15. ‘He further adviſed him to divide Italy, for 94 miles round about the City, ‘and all the reſt of the conquered Countries after ſuch a manner, according to ‘People, Nations, and Cities, as if they were to be governed by ſingle men ‘with abſolute power. In each of theſe Soldiers were to be placed, over whom ‘was to be ſet one perſon of Conſular dignity, and two more of Prætorian rank, ‘from thoſe there lying appeal to the other, in all caſes, except when Officers ‘of the Army were to be animadverted on, who were to be puniſhed by none but ‘Cæſar himſelf, leſt they ſhould thereby be brought by fearing ſome one more, to ‘attempt ſomething againſt the Prince. All thoſe who had any command out ‘of the City, were to have their Salaries ſet as was ſuitable to the Imployment, ‘for that they could not live of their own, and it was not convenient they ſhould ‘ſpend what they liſt, as they did at preſent. They were not to hold their ‘imployments under the term of three years, nor longer than five, for in ſo ſhort ‘a ſpace they could but learn the intereſts of places, and how to behave ‘themſelves, and longer commands made men but proud, and provoked them to ‘attempt new matters. And one great command he ſaid, was not to be given them ‘preſently after another, for this would amount to as much, as if they had one ‘continued to them; but after they had been reduced to a private condition, and ‘therein lived at home. Thus much for Senators.

Of Equeſtrian rank.

16. ‘From amongſt the Equites, he would have him chuſe out two of the moſt ‘excellent, and make them Captains of his Guard. For to commit that truſt ‘to one would not be ſafe, and to more than two, would not want trouble. ‘Being two in number, if one ſhould be treacherous, the other would preſerve ‘him. They were to be ſuch as had been trained up in the Wars, and much ‘exerciſed in Offices, and to have the command not only of his Guard, but of all ‘Soldiers in Italy, ſo as to puniſh and reward them, except Centurions, and ‘ſuch as belonged to Senatorian Magiſtrates. Theſe Captains of the Guard ought ‘to have their Deputies, and hold their places for their lives, as alſo the Mayor ‘of the City, and the Subcenſor. Beſides, out of the next rank of Equites, one ‘ſhould be choſen for Captain of the Watch, and another to take care for ‘proviſion of Corn, but theſe for a limited time. The care of the Treaſury, ‘Exchequer, and other matters, as well at Rome as throughout Italy, was to be ‘committed to thoſe of Equeſtrian rank, who were to have Salaries ſuitable to their ‘condition, being poorer than Senators. He told him the reaſon why he would ‘have theſe Offices committed to them, was, for that it was inconvenient to ‘have both the Sword and Money in the ſame hands, and better that publick ‘buſineſs ſhould be managed by many, both that more might reap benefit from ‘it, and learn experience; and hereby his Subjects would love him more, and ‘he would have a ſufficient number fit for employment. One Eques would be ‘ſufficient at Rome for gathering Money, and one in each Province, who might ‘have aſſiſtants out of the Equites, and Cæſar's Liberti or Freed-men. For he told ‘him it was convenient to joyn thoſe with them, that his Servants might get ‘ſomething, and he receive certain intelligence how matters ſhould go. Now ‘if any Eques (or Knight, if we may ſo call him) ſhould grow ſo famous by ‘buſineſs, as to be thought worthy to be received into the Senatorian rank, his age ‘ought not to be any obſtacle: and ſometimes ſome Officers of the Army were ‘to be received into the Senate, provided they had never been ordinary Soldiers, ‘but from the beginning Centurions at the leaſt.

Education of the Children of Senators and Equites.

17. ‘He further adviſed him to educate all of Senatorian and Equeſtrian rank, ‘whilſt they were boys, at School in humanity, and when grown up, in Fencing ‘and Riding, by Maſters hired publickly in both places. Foraſmuch as it is the ‘part of an excellent Prince, not only that he do well himſelf, but to take care ‘that all elſe do ſo. This would be effected, not by permitting them to do ill, ‘and then correcting them, but teaching them beforehand ſuch things. And ‘he added, That he needed not to fear, that ſuch as were ſo excellently ‘educated, would attempt innovation; foraſmuch as ſuch as were not cultivated ‘by any diſcipline, but diſſolute in breeding and carriage, were hereof to be ‘ſuſpected, who eaſily would commit the moſt wicked and abominable things, both ‘againſt themſelves and others.

The Militia and Money.

18. ‘Foraſmuch as by reaſon of the largeneſs of the Empire, and nearneſs of Enemies, it was neceſſary to have a ſtanding Army, he would have levies made out of the pooreſt and luſtieſt young men, who being continually exerciſed and trained up in Military Diſcipline, all others were to be forbidden the uſe of Arms. Then for Money, which he ſhewed to be neceſſary for carrying on of Affairs, in all Governments, as well as under Monarchy, he adviſed him to make it of all publick Things gotten in War, and let it out upon moderate intereſt: to look well to the Mines, and impoſe Tribute upon all Subjects, it being reaſonable that all ſhould contribute to the expence of that, which tended to the protection and good of all. But there was no danger he ſaid, but men would be willing to pay, ſeeing moſt of them ſhould receive it back with advantage; either, by bearing Offices of Magiſtracy or Government, or ſerving in the War, eſpecially when they underſtood that Cæſar himſelf lived ſoberly and frugally, not improving the publick expence to any private exceſs.

Rome to be adorned.

The Provinces curbed.

How ſcandalous words to be thought of.

